<sup>i</sup> The traitor and treason are revealed by Nic. Gregoras (l. xv. c. 8) but the name is more discreetly suppressed by his great accomplice (Cantacuzene l. iii. c. 99).

<sup>k</sup> Nic. Gre. l. xv. 11. There were however some true pearls, but very thinly sprinkled. The rest of the stones had only παντοδαμα χρυσαν προς διαγυες.

Reign of John Cantacuzene, A D 1347
 Jan 8—
 A D 1355
 January

I hasten to conclude the personal history of John Cantacuzene.<sup>1</sup> He triumphed and reigned, but his reign and triumph were clouded by the discontent of his own and the adverse faction. His followers might style the general amnesty, an act of pardon for his enemies, and of oblivion for his friends: in his cause their estates had been forfeited or plundered, and as they wandered naked and hungry through the streets, they cursed the selfish generosity of a leader, who, on the throne of the empire, might relinquish without merit his private inheritance. The adherents of the empress blushed to hold their lives and fortunes by the precarious favour of an usurper, and the thirst of revenge was concealed by a tender concern for the succession, and even the safety, of her son. They were justly alarmed by a petition of the friends of Cantacuzene, that they might be released from their oath of allegiance to the Palæologus, and intrusted with the defence of some cautionary towns, a measure supported with argument and eloquence, and which was rejected (says the imperial historian) "by my sublime, and almost incredible, virtue." His repose was disturbed by the sound of plots and seditions, and he trembled lest the lawful prince should be stolen away by some foreign or domestic enemy, who would inscribe his name and his wrongs in the banners of rebellion. As the son of Andronicus advanced in the years of manhood, he began to feel and to act for himself, and his rising ambition was rather stimulated than checked by the imitation of his father's vices. If we may trust his own professions, Cantacuzene laboured with honest industry to correct these sordid and sensual appetites, and to raise the mind of the young prince to a level with his fortune. In the Servian expedition, the two emperors showed themselves in cordial harmony to the troops and provinces, and the younger colleague was initiated by the elder in the mysteries of war and government. After the conclusion of the peace, Palæologus was left at Thessalonica, a royal residence, and a frontier station, to secure by his absence the peace of Constantinople, and to withdraw his youth from the temptations of a luxurious capital. But the distance weakened the powers of control, and the son of Andronicus was surrounded with artful or unthinking companions, who taught him to hate his guardian, to deplore his exile, and to vindicate his rights. A private treaty with the cruel or despot of Servia, was soon followed by an open revolt, and Cantacuzene, on the throne of the elder Andronicus, defended the cause of age and prerogative, which in his youth he had so vigorously attacked. At his request, the empress-mother undertook the voyage of Thessalonica, and the office of mediation she returned without success, and unless Anne of Savoy was instructed by adversity, we may doubt the sincerity, or at least the fervour, of her zeal. While the regent grasped the sceptre with a firm and vigorous hand, she had been instructed to declare, that the ten years of his legal administration would soon elapse and that after a full trial of the vanity of the world, the emperor Cantacuzene sighed for the repose of a cloister, and was ambitious only of a heavenly crown. Had these sentiments been genuine, his voluntary abdication would have restored the peace of the empire, and his conscience would have been relieved by an act of justice. Palæologus alone was responsible for his future government, <sup>John Palæologus takes up arms against him</sup> and whatever might be his vices, they <sup>A D 1353</sup> were surely less formidable than the calamities of a civil war, in which the barbarians and infidels were again invited to assist the Greeks in their mutual destruction. By the arms of the Turks, who now struck a deep and everlasting root in Europe, Cantacuzene prevailed in the third contest in which he had been involved, and the young emperor, driven from the sea and land, was compelled to take shelter among the Latins of the isle of Tenedos. His insolence and obstinacy provoked the victor to a step which must render the quarrel irreconcilable and the association of his son Matthew, whom he invested with the purple, established the succession in the family of the Cantacuzeni. But Constantinople was still attached to the blood of her ancient princes, and this last injury accelerated the restoration of the rightful heir. A noble Genoese espoused the cause of Palæologus, obtained a promise of his sister, and achieved the revolution with two galleys and two thousand five hundred auxiliaries. Under the pretence of distress, they were admitted into the lesser port, a gate was opened, and the Latin shout of, "Long life and victory to the emperor, John Palæologus!" was answered by a general rising in his favour. A numerous and loyal party yet adhered to the standard of Cantacuzene, but he asserts in his history (does he hope for belief?) that his tender conscience rejected the assurance of conquest, that, in free obedience to the voice of religion and philosophy, he descended from the throne, and embraced with pleasure the monastic habit and profession.<sup>2</sup> So soon as he ceased to be a prince, his successor was not unwilling that he should be a saint: the remainder of his life was devoted to piety and learning, in the cells of Constantinople and mount Athos, the monk Joasaph was respected as the temporal and spiritual father of the emperor, and if he issued from his retreat, it was as the minister of peace, to subdue the obstinacy and solicit the pardon of his rebellious son.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> From his return to Constantinople, Cantacuzene continues his history and that of the empire, one year beyond the abdication of his son Matthew. A D 1357 (l. ii. c. 1—50 p. 705—911) Nicophorus Gregorius ends with the synod of Constantinople in the year 1351, (l. xxii. c. 3 p. 640 the rest to the conclusion of the twenty fourth book p. 717 is all controversy) and his fourteen last books are still MSS in the king of France's library.

<sup>2</sup> The emperor (Cantacuzen l. i. c. 1) represents his own virtues, and Nic. Gregorius (l. xv. c. 11) the complaints of his friends, who suffered by its effects. I have lent them the words of our pontifical letters after the restoration.

<sup>3</sup> The awkward apology of Cantacuzene (l. iv. c. 39—42) who relates with visible confusion his own downfall may be supplied by the less accurate, but more honest narratives of Matthew Villani (l. ii. c. 46. in the Script Rerum Ital. tom. xii. p. 268) and Ducera, (c. 10. 11) Cantacuzene, in the year 1375, was honoured with a letter from

clime so profusely favoured by nature, could not long remain desert after the flood. The learned Rudbeck allows the family of Noah a few years to multiply from eight to about twenty thousand persons. He then disperses them into small colonies to replenish the earth, and to propagate the human species. The German or Swedish detachment (which marched, if I am not mistaken, under the command of Askenez the son of Gomer, the son of Japhet) distinguished itself by a more than common diligence in the prosecution of this great work. The northern hive cast its swarms over the greatest part of Europe, Africa, and Asia, and (to use the author's metaphor) the blood circulated from the extremities to the heart.

The Germans ignorant of letters,

But all this well-laboured system of German antiquities is annihilated by a single fact, too well attested to admit of any doubt, and of too decisive a nature to leave room for any reply. The Germans, in the age of Tacitus, were unacquainted with the use of letters,<sup>a</sup> and the use of letters is the principal circumstance that distinguishes a civilized people from a herd of savages incapable of knowledge or reflection. Without that artificial help, the human memory soon dissipates or corrupts the ideas intrusted to her charge, and the noble faculties of the mind, no longer supplied with models or with materials, gradually forget their powers, the judgment becomes feeble and lethargic, the imagination languid or irregular. Fully to apprehend this important truth, let us attempt, in an improved society, to calculate the immense distance between the man of learning and the illiterate peasant. The former, by reading and reflection, multiplies his own experience, and lives in distant ages and remote countries, whilst the latter, rooted to a single spot, and confined to a few years of existence, surpasses, but very little, his fellow-labourer the ox in the exercise of his mental faculties. The same, and even a greater, difference will be found between nations than between individuals, and we may safely pronounce, that without some species of writing, no people has ever preserved the faithful annals of their history, ever made any considerable progress in the abstract sciences, or ever possessed, in any tolerable degree of perfection, the useful and agreeable arts of life.

of arts and agriculture,

Of these arts, the ancient Germans were wretchedly destitute. They passed their lives in a state of ignorance and poverty, which it has pleased some declaimers to dignify with the appellation of virtuous simplicity. Modern Germany is said to contain about two thousand three hundred walled towns.<sup>r</sup> In a much wider extent of country, the geographer Ptolemy could discover no more than ninety places, which he decorates with the name of cities,<sup>s</sup> though, according to our ideas, they would but ill deserve that splendid title. We can only suppose them to have been rude fortifications, constructed in the centre of the woods, and designed to secure the women, children, and cattle, whilst the warriors of the tribe marched out to repel a sudden invasion.<sup>t</sup> But Tacitus asserts, as a well-known fact, that the Germans, in his time, had no cities,<sup>u</sup> and that they affected to despise the works of Roman industry, as places of confinement rather than of security.<sup>x</sup> Their edifices were not even contiguous, or formed into regular villas,<sup>y</sup> each barbarian fixed his independent dwelling on a spot to which a plain, a wood, or a stream of fresh water, had induced him to give the preference. Neither stone, nor brick, nor tiles, were employed in these slight habitations.<sup>z</sup> They were indeed no more than low huts of a circular figure, built of rough timber, thatched with straw, and pierced at the top to leave a free passage for the smoke. In the most inclement winter, the hardy German was satisfied with a scanty garment made of the skin of some animal. The nations who dwelt towards the north, clothed themselves in furs, and the women manufactured for their own use a coarse kind of linen.<sup>a</sup> The game of various sorts, with which the forests of Germany were plentifully stocked, supplied its inhabitants with food and exercise.<sup>b</sup> Their monstrous herds of cattle, less remarkable indeed for their beauty than for their utility,<sup>c</sup> formed the principal object of their wealth. A small quantity of corn was the only produce exacted from the earth, the use of orchards or artificial meadows was unknown to the Germans, nor can we expect any improvements in agriculture from a people, whose property every year experienced a general change by a new division of the arable lands, and who, in that strange operation, avoided disputes, by suffering a great part of their territory to lie waste and without tillage.<sup>d</sup>

Gold, silver, and iron, were extremely scarce in Germany. Its bar-and of the use of metals<sup>e</sup>

Given two most curious extracts from it. Republique des Lettres, Janvier et Février, 1685.

<sup>a</sup> Tacit Germ. ii. 19. Literarum secretis vim pariter ac formam innotuit. We may not be contented with this decisive authority, without entering into the obscure disputes concerning the antiquity of the Runic characters. The learned Celsius, a Swede, a scholar, and a philosopher was of opinion, that they were nothing more than the Roman letters, with the curves changed into straight lines for the ease of engraving. See Pelloutier, Histoire des Celtes i. c. 11. Dictionnaire Diplomatique, tom. i. p. 223. We may add, that the oldest Runic inscriptions are supposed to be of the third century, and the most ancient writer who mentions the Runic characters is Vegetius Fortunatus, (Corm. vii. 18.) who lived towards the end of the sixth century. Barbara fraxineis pingitur Runi tabellæ.

<sup>r</sup> Recherches Philosophiques sur les Américains tom. iii. p. 228. The author of this very curious work is, if I am not misinformed, a German by birth.

<sup>s</sup> The Alexandrian Geographer is often criticised by the accurate Chuvrier.

<sup>t</sup> See Cæsar, and the learned Mr. Whitaker in his History of Manchester, vol. i.

<sup>u</sup> Tacit Germ. 15.

<sup>x</sup> When the Germans commanded the Ubii of Cologne to cast off the Roman yoke, and with their new freedom to resume their ancient manners, they insisted on the immediate demolition of the walls of the colony. Postumus a vobis muros colonie munimenta servata detrahite. etrim feri animalia, si clausa teneas, virtutis obliviscitur. Tacit Hist. iv. 64.

<sup>y</sup> The straggling villages of Silesia are several miles in length. See Cluver i. c. 13.

<sup>z</sup> One hundred and forty years after Tacitus, a few more regular structures were erected near the Rhine and Danube. Herod. i. vii. p. 234.

<sup>a</sup> Tacit Germ. 17.

<sup>b</sup> Tacit Germ. 5.

<sup>c</sup> Cæsar de Bell. Gall. vi. 21.

<sup>d</sup> Tacit Germ. 26. Cæsar, vi. 22.

Dispute concerning the light of mount Thabor,
A. D 1341—1351

Yet in the cloister, the mind of Cantacuzene was still exercised by theological war. He sharpened a controversial pen against the Jews and Mahometans,<sup>q</sup> and in every state he defended with equal zeal the divine light of mount Thabor, a memorable question, which consummates the religious follies of the Greeks. The fakirs of India,<sup>r</sup> and the monks of the oriental church, were alike persuaded, that in total abstraction of the faculties of the mind and body, the purer spirit may ascend to the enjoyment and vision of the Deity. The opinion and practice of the monasteries of mount Athos<sup>s</sup> will be best represented in the words of an abbot, who flourished in the eleventh century. "When thou art alone in thy cell," says the ascetic teacher, "shut thy door, and seat thyself in a corner, raise thy mind above all things vain and transitory, recline thy head and chin on thy breast, turn thy eyes and thy thought towards the middle of thy belly, the region of the navel, and search the place of the heart, the seat of the soul. At first, all will be dark and comfortless, but if you persevere day and night, you will feel an ineffable joy, and no sooner has the soul discovered the place of the heart, than it is involved in a mystic and ethereal light." This light, the production of a distempered fancy, the creature of an empty stomach and an empty brain, was adored by the Quietists as the pure and perfect essence of God himself, and as long as the folly was confined to mount Athos, the simple solitaries were not inquisitive how the divine essence could be a material substance, or how an immaterial substance could be perceived by the eyes of the body. But in the reign of the younger Andronicus, these monasteries were visited by Barlaam,<sup>t</sup> a Calabrian monk, who was equally skilled in philosophy and theology, who possessed the languages of the Greeks and Latins, and whose versatile genius could maintain their opposite creeds, according to the interest of the moment. The indiscretion of an ascetic revealed to the curious traveller the secrets of mental prayer, and Barlaam embraced the opportunity of ridiculing the Quietists, who placed the soul in the navel, of accusing the monks of mount Athos of heresy and blasphemy. His attack compelled the more learned to renounce or dissemble the simple devotion of their brethren, and Gregory Palamas introduced a scholastic distinction between the essence and operation of God. His inaccessible essence dwells in the midst of an uncreated and eternal light, and this beatific vision of the saints had been manifested to the disciples on mount Thabor, in the transfiguration of Christ. Yet this distinction could not escape the reproach of polytheism, the eternity of the light of Thabor was fiercely denied, and Barlaam still charged the Palamites with holding two eternal substances, a visible and an invisible God. From the rage of the monks of mount Athos, who threatened his life, the Calabrian retired to Constantinople, where his smooth and specious manners introduced him to the favour of the great domestic and the emperor. The court and the city were involved in this theological dispute, which flamed amidst the civil war, but the doctrine of Barlaam was disgraced by his flight and apostasy, the Palamites triumphed, and their adversary the patriarch John of Apria, was deposed by the consent of the adverse factions of the state. In the character of emperor and theologian, Cantacuzene presided in the synod of the Greek church, which established, as an article of faith, the uncreated light of mount Thabor, and, after so many insults, the reason of mankind was slightly wounded by the addition of a single absurdity. Many rolls of paper or parchment have been blotted, and the impenitent sectaries, who refused to subscribe the orthodox creed, were deprived of the honours of christian burial, but in the next age the question was forgotten, nor can I learn that the axe or the faggot were employed for the extirpation of the Barlaamite heresy.<sup>u</sup>

For the conclusion of this chapter, I have reserved the Genoese war, which the Genoese at Pera, or Galata shook the throne of Cantacuzene, and A. D 1261—1347 betrayed the debility of the Greek empire. The Genoese, who, after the recovery of Constantinople, were seated in the suburb of Pera or Galata, received that honourable sief from the bounty of the emperor. They were indulged in the use of their laws and magistrates, but they submitted to the duties of vassals and subjects. The forcible word of hegemen<sup>v</sup> was borrowed from the Latin jurisprudence, and their podesta, or chief, before he entered on his office, saluted the emperor with loyal acclamations and vows of fidelity. Genoa sealed a firm alliance with the Greeks, and, in a case of a defensive war, a supply of fifty empty galleys and a succour of fifty galleys completely armed and manned, was promised by the republic to the empire. In the revival of a naval force, it was the aim of Michael Palæologus to deliver himself from the pope. (Fleury Hist. Eccles. tom xx. p. 250.) His death is placed by respectable authority on the 20th of November 1411 (Ducange, Fam. Byzant. p. 260.) But if he were of the age of his companion Andronicus the younger, he must have lived 116 years, a rare instance of longevity, which in so illustrious a person would have attracted universal notice.

q His four discourses, or books, were printed at Basil, 1543 (Fabric. Bibliot. Græc. tom vi. p. 473.) He composed them to satisfy a proselyte who was assailed with letters from his friends of Ispahan. Cantacuzene had read the Koran, but I understand from Naracci, that he adopts the vulgar prejudices and fables against Mahomet and his religion.

r See the Voyages de Bernier, tom i. p. 127.

s Mosheim Institut. Hist. Eccles. p. 522, 523. Fleury, Hist. Eccles. tom xx. p. 22, 23, 107—114 &c. The former unfold the causes with the judgment of a philosopher, the latter transcribes and translates with the prejudices of a catholic priest.

u Basnage (in Canani Antiq. Lectiones tom iv. p. 363—368) has investigated the character and story of Barlaam. The duplicity of his opinions had inspired some doubts of the identity of his person. See likewise Fabricius (Bibliot. Græc. tom x. p. 427—432.)

t See Cantacuzene, (l. ii. c. 39, 40. l. iv. c. 3, 23, 24, 25) and Nic. Gregoras, (l. xi. c. 10. l. xv. 3, 7 &c.) whose last books, from the nineteenth to the twenty fourth are almost confined to a subject so interesting to the authors. Boivin, (in Vit. Nic. Gregoræ,) from the unpublished books and Fabricius (Bibliot. Græc. tom x. p. 462—473) or rather Montfaucon, from the MSS. of the Coislin library, have added some facts and documents.

v Pachymer (l. v. c. 10) very properly explains λῆγουσιν (ligous) by διοικῶν. The use of these words in the Greek and Latin of the feudal times, may be amply understood from the Glossaries of Ducange (Græc. p. 811, 812. Latin tom iv. p. 109—111.)

a foreign aid, and his vigorous government contained the Genoese of Galata within those limits which the insolence of wealth and freedom provoked them to exceed. A sailor threatened that they should soon be masters of Constantinople, and slew the Greek who resented this national affront, and an armed vessel, after refusing to salute the palace, was guilty of some acts of piracy in the Black sea. Their countrymen threatened to support their cause, but the long and open village of Galata was instantly surrounded by the imperial troops, till, in the moment of the assault, the prostrate Genoese implored the clemency of their sovereign. The defenceless situation which secured their obedience, exposed them to the attack of their Venetian rivals, who, in the reign of the elder Andronicus, presumed to violate the majesty of the throne. On the approach of their fleets, the Genoese, with their families and effects, retired into the city: their empty habitations were reduced to ashes, and the feeble prince, who had viewed the destruction of his suburb, expressed his resentment, not by arms, but by ambassadors. This misfortune, however, was advantageous to the Genoese, who obtained, and imperceptibly abused, the dangerous licence of surrounding Galata with a strong wall, of introducing into the ditch the waters of the sea, of erecting lofty turrets, and of mounting a train of military engines on the rampart. The narrow bounds in which they had been circumscribed, were insufficient for the growing colony, each day they acquired some addition of landed property, and the adjacent hills were covered with their villas and castles, which they joined and protected by new fortifications*. The navigation and trade of the Euxine was the patrimony of the Greek emperors, who commanded the narrow entrance, the gates, as it were, of that inland sea. In the reign of Michael Palæologus, their prerogative was acknowledged by the sultan of Egypt, who solicited and obtained the liberty of sending an annual ship for the purchase of slaves in Circassia and the Lesser Tartary a liberty pregnant with mischief to the christian cause, since these youths were transformed by education and discipline into the formidable Mamalukes†. From the colony of Pera, the Genoese engaged with superior advantage in the lucrative trade of the Black sea, and their industry supplied the Greeks with fish and corn, two articles of food almost equally important to a superstitious people. The spontaneous bounty of nature appears to have bestowed the harvests of the Ukraine, the produce of a rude and savage husbandry, and the endless exportation of salt fish and caviar is annually renewed by the enormous sturgeons that are caught at the mouth of the Don or Tanais, in their last station of the rich mud and shallow water of the Maëotis*. The waters of the Oxus, the Caspian, the Volga, and the Don, opened a rare and laborious passage for the gems and spices of India, and, after three months' march, the caravans of Carizme met the Italian vessels in the harbours of Crimea*. These various branches of trade were monopolized by the diligence and power of the Genoese. Their rivals of Venice and Pisa were forcibly expelled, the natives were awed by the castles and cities, which arose on the foundations of their humble factories, and their principal establishment of Caffa<sup>b</sup> was besieged without effect by the Tartar powers. Destitute of a navy, the Greeks were oppressed by these haughty merchants, who fed, or famished, Constantinople, according to their interest. They proceeded to usurp the customs, the fishery, and even the toll, of the Bosphorus, and while they derived from these objects a revenue of two hundred thousand pieces of gold, a remnant of thirty thousand was reluctantly allowed to the emperor*. The colony of Pera or Galata acted, in peace and war, as an independent state, and, as it will happen in distant settlements, the Genoese podesta too often forgot that he was the servant of his own masters.

Their trade and insolence

These usurpations were encouraged by the weakness of the elder Andronicus, and by the civil wars that afflicted his age and the minority of his grandson. The talents of Cantacuzene were employed to the ruin, rather than the restoration, of the empire, and after his domestic victory, he was condemned to an ignominious trial, whether the Greeks or the Genoese should reign in Constantinople. The merchants of Pera were offended by his refusal of some contiguous lands, some commanding heights, which they proposed to cover with new fortifications, and in the absence of the emperor, who was detained at Demotica by sickness, they ventured to brave the debility of a female reign. A Byzantine vessel, which had presumed to fish at the mouth of the harbour, was sunk by these audacious strangers, the fishermen were murdered. Instead of suing for pardon, the Genoese demanded satisfaction, required, in a haughty strain, that the Greeks should renounce the exercise of navigation, and encountered with regular arms the first sallies of the popular indignation. They instantly occupied the debatable land, and by the labour of a whole

Their war with the emperor Cantacuzene, A D 1348

* The establishment and progress of the Genoese at Pera, or Galatz, is described by Ducange (C. P. Christiana, l. i. p. 68, 69) from the Byzantine historians Pachymer (l. ii. c. 35 l. v. 10 39 l. ix. 15 l. xii. 6 9) Nicephorus Gregoras* (l. v. c. 4 l. vi. c. 11 l. ix. c. 5 l. xi. c. 1 l. xv. c. 1 6) and Cantacuzene, (l. i. c. 12 l. ii. c. 29 &c.)

† Both Ptolemy (l. iii. c. 3 4 5) and Nie. Greg. (l. iv. c. 7) understand and deplore the effects of this dangerous indulgence. Bibars sultan of Egypt himself a Tartar, but a devout musulman, obtained from the children of Zinzis the permission to build a stately mosque in the capital of Crimea (De Guignes, Hist. des Huns, tom. iii. p. 343.)

* Chardin (Voyages en Perse tom. i. p. 48) was assured at Caffa that these fishes were sometimes twenty four or twenty six feet long, weighed eight or nine hundred pounds and yielded three or four quintals of caviar. The corn of the Bosphorus had supplied the Athenians in the time of Demosthenes.

<sup>a</sup> De Guignes Hist. des Huns tom. iii. p. 343 344. Virgidi Ramusio tom. i. fol. 400. But this land or water carriage could only be practicable when Tartary was united under a wise and powerful monarch.

<sup>b</sup> Nie. Gregoras (l. xiii. c. 12) is judicious and well informed on the trade and colonies of the Black sea. Chardin describes the present ruins of Caffa where, in forty days, he saw above 400 sail employed in the corn and fish trade. (Voyages en Perse, tom. i. p. 46—48.)

<sup>c</sup> See Nie. Gregoras, l. xviii. c. 1.

people, of either sex and of every age, the wall was raised, and the ditch was sunk, with incredible speed. At the same time, they attacked and burnt two Byzantine galleys, while the three others, the remainder of the imperial navy, escaped from their hands. The habitations without the gates, or along the shore, were pillaged and destroyed, and the care of the regent, of the empress Irene, was confined to the preservation of the city. The return of Cantacuzene dispelled the public consternation, the emperor inclined to peaceful counsels, but he yielded to the obstinacy of his enemies, who rejected all reasonable terms, and to the ardour of his subjects, who threatened, in the style of Scripture, to break them in pieces like a potter's vessel. Yet they reluctantly paid the taxes, that he imposed for the construction of ships, and the expenses of the war, and as the two nations were masters, the one of the land, the other of the sea, Constantinople and Pera were pressed by the evils of a mutual siege. The merchants of the colony, who had believed that a few days would terminate the war, already murmured at their losses, the succours from their mother-country were delayed by the factions of Genoa, and the most cautious embraced the opportunity of a Rhodian vessel to remove their families and effects from the scene of hostility. In his fleet,

Destruction of
A D 1349

the spring, the Byzantine fleet, seven galleys and a train of smaller vessels, issued from the mouth of the harbour, and steered in a single line along the shore of Pera, unskilfully presenting their sides to the beaks of the adverse squadron. The crews were composed of peasants and mechanics, nor was their ignorance compensated by the native courage of barbarians. The wind was strong, the waves were rough, and no sooner did the Greeks perceive a distant and inactive enemy, than they leaped headlong into the sea, from a doubtful, to an inevitable, peril. The troops that marched to the attack of the lines of Pera were struck at the same moment with a similar panic, and the Genoese were astonished, and almost ashamed, at their double victory. Their triumphant vessels, crowned with flowers, and dragging after them the captive galleys, repeatedly passed and repassed before the palace. The only virtue of the emperor was patience, and the hope of revenge his sole consolation. Yet the distress of both parties interposed a temporary agreement; and the shame of the empire was disguised by a thin veil of dignity and power. Summoning the chiefs of the colony, Cantacuzene affected to despise the trivial object of the debate, and, after a mild reproof, most liberally granted the lands, which had been previously resigned to the seeming custody of his officers.<sup>d</sup>

But the emperor was soon solicited to violate the treaty, and to join his arms with the Venetians, the perpetual enemies of Genoa and her colonies.

Victory of the Genoese over the Venetians and Greeks,
A D 1352
Feb 13

While he compared the reasons of peace and war, his moderation was provoked by a wanton insult of the inhabitants of Pera, who discharged from their rampart a large stone that fell in the midst of Constantinople. On his just complaint, they coldly blamed the imprudence of their engineer, but the next day the insult was repeated, and they exulted in a second proof that the royal city was not beyond the reach of their artillery. Cantacuzene instantly signed his treaty with the Venetians, but the weight of the Roman empire was scarcely felt in the balance of these opulent and powerful republics. From the straits of Gibraltar to the mouth of the Tanais, their fleets encountered each other with various success, and a memorable battle was fought in the narrow sea, under the walls of Constantinople. It would not be an easy task to reconcile the accounts of the Greeks, the Venetians, and the Genoese,<sup>f</sup> and while I depend on the narrative of an impartial historian,<sup>g</sup> I shall borrow from each nation the facts that redound to their own disgrace and the honour of their foes. The Venetians, with their allies the Catalans, had the advantage of number, and their fleet, with the poor addition of eight Byzantine galleys, amounted to seventy-five sail, the Genoese did not exceed sixty-four, but in those times their ships of war were distinguished by the superiority of their size and strength. The names and families of their naval commanders, Pisani and Doria, are illustrious in the annals of their country, but the personal merit of the former was eclipsed by the fame and abilities of his rival. They engaged in tempestuous weather, and the tumultuary conflict was continued from the dawn to the extinction of light. The enemies of the Genoese applaud their prowess. The friends of the Venetians are dissatisfied with their behaviour, but all parties agree in praising the skill and boldness of the Catalans, who, with many wounds, sustained the brunt of the action. On the separation of the fleets, the event might appear doubtful, but the thirteen Genoese galleys, that had been sunk or taken, were compensated by a double loss of the allies, of fourteen Venetians, ten Catalans, and two Greeks, and even the grief of the conquerors expressed the assurance and habit of more decisive victories. Pisani confessed his defeat, by retiring into a fortified harbour, from whence, under the pretext of the orders of the senate, he steered with a broken and flying squadron for the isle of Candia, and abandoned to his rivals the sovereignty of the sea. In a public <sup>d</sup> The events of this war are related by Cantacuzene (l. iv c. 11) with obscurity and confusion, and by Nic. Gregoras (l. xii c. 1-7) in a clear and honest narrative. The priest was less responsible than the prince for the defeat of the fleet.

<sup>e</sup> The second war is darkly told by Cantacuzene, (l. iv c. 18 p. 24, 25-28-32.) who wishes to disguise what he dares not deny. I regret this part of Nic. Gregoras, which is still in MS. at Paris.

<sup>f</sup> Muratori (Annali d'Italia, tom. xii p. 144) refers to the most ancient Chronicles of Venice, (Caresinus the continuator of Andrew Dandolo, tom. xii p. 421-422) and Genoa, (George Stella, Annales Genuenses, tom. xvii p. 1091, 1092) both which I have diligently consulted in his great Collection of the Historians of Italy.
<sup>g</sup> See the Chronicle of Matteo Villani of Florence, l. ii c. 59, 60 p. 145-147 c. 74, 75 p. 156, 157 in Muratori's Collection, tom. xiv

epistle,<sup>a</sup> addressed to the doge and senate, Petrarch employs his eloquence to reconcile the maritime powers, the two luminaries of Italy. The orator celebrates the valour and victory of the Genoese, the first of men in the exercise of naval war: he drops a tear on the misfortunes of their Venetian brethren, but he exhorts them to pursue with fire and sword the base and perfidious Greeks, to purge the metropolis of the east from the heresy with which it was infected. Deserted by their friends, the Greeks were incapable of resistance, and three months after the battle, the emperor Cantacuzene solicited and subscribed a treaty, which for ever banished the Venetians and Catalans, and granted to the Genoese a monopoly of trade, and almost a right of dominion. The Roman empire (I smile in transcribing the name) might soon have sunk into a province of Genoa, if the ambition of the republic had not been checked by the ruin of her freedom and naval power. A long contest of one hundred and thirty years was determined by the triumph of Venice, and the factions of the Genoese compelled them to seek for domestic peace under the protection of a foreign lord, the duke of Milan, or the French king. Yet the spirit of commerce survived that of conquest, and the colony of Pera still awed the capital and navigated the Euxine, till it was involved by the Turks in the final servitude of Constantinople itself.

CHAP LXIV

Conquests of Zingis Khan and the Moguls from China to Poland—Escape of Constantinople and the Greeks—Origin of the Ottoman Turks in Bithynia—Reigns and victories of Othman, Orchan, Amurath the first, and Bajazet the first—Foundation and progress of the Turkish monarchy in Asia and Europe—Danger of Constantinople and the Greek empire

FROM the petty quarrels of a city and her suburbs, from the cowardice and discord of the falling Greeks, I shall now ascend to the victorious Turks, whose domestic slavery was ennobled by martial discipline, religious enthusiasm, and the energy of the national character. The rise and progress of the Ottomans, the present sovereigns of Constantinople, are connected with the most important scenes of modern history, but they are founded on a previous knowledge of the great eruption of the Moguls and Tartars, whose rapid conquests may be compared with the primitive convulsions of nature, which have agitated and altered the surface of the globe. I have long since asserted my claim to introduce the nations, the immediate or remote authors of the fall of the Roman empire, nor can I refuse myself to those events, which, from their uncommon magnitude, will interest a philosophic mind in the history of blood.<sup>a</sup>

From the spacious highlands between China, Siberia, and the Caspian sea, the tide of emigration and war has repeatedly been poured. These ancient seats of the Huns and Turks were occupied in the twelfth century by many pastoral tribes, of the same descent and similar manners, which were united and led to conquest by the formidable Zingis. In his ascent to greatness, that barbarian (whose private appellation was Temugin) had trampled on the necks of his equals. His birth was noble, but it was in the pride of victory, that the prince or people deduced his seventh ancestor from the immaculate conception of a virgin. His father had reigned over thirteen hordes, which composed about thirty or forty thousand families; above two thirds refused to pay tithes or obedience to his infant son, and at the age of thirteen, Temugin fought a battle against his rebellious subjects. The future conqueror of Asia was reduced to fly and to obey, but he rose superior to his fortune, and in his fortieth year he had established his fame and dominion over the circumjacent tribes. In a state of society, in which policy is rude and valour is universal, the ascendant of one man must be founded on his power and resolution to punish his enemies and recompense his friends. His first military league was ratified by the simple rites of sacrificing a horse and tasting of a running stream. Temugin pledged himself to divide with his followers the sweets and the bitters of life, and when he had shared among them his horses and apparel, he was rich in their gratitude and his own hopes. After his first victory, he placed seventy caldrons on the fire, and seventy of the most guilty rebels were cast headlong into the boiling water. The sphere of his attraction was continually enlarged by the ruin of the proud and the submission of the prudent, and the boldest chieftains might tremble, when they beheld, encased in silver, the skull of the khan of the Keraites,<sup>b</sup> who, under the name of Prester John, had corresponded with the Roman pontiff and the princes of Europe. The ambition of Temugin condescended to employ the arts of superstition, and it was from a naked prophet, who could ascend to heaven on a white horse, that he accepted the title of Zingis,<sup>c</sup> the most great, and a divine right to the first emperor of the Moguls and Tartars.

Zingis Khan,
A.D. 1206–1227

<sup>a</sup> The Abbé de Sade (Mémoires sur la Vie de Petrarque tom. iii. p. 267–268) translates this letter, which he had copied from a MS. in the library of the king of France. Though a servant of the duke of Milan, Petrarch puts forth his astonishment and grief at the defeat and despair of the Genoese in the following year (p. 323–332).

<sup>b</sup> The reader is invited to review the chapters of the fourth and sixth volumes, the manners of pastoral nations, the conquests of Attila and the Huns, which were composed at a time when I entertained the wish, rather than the hope of conclusion, my history.

<sup>c</sup> The khans of the Keraites were most probably incapable of reading the pompous epistles composed in their name by the Nestorian missionaries, who endowed them with the fabulous wonders of an Indian kingdom. Perhaps these Tartars (the presbyter or priest John) had submitted to the rites of baptism and ordination (Asseman Bibl. Orient. tom. iii. p. 11 p. 487–503).

<sup>d</sup> Since the history and tragedy of Voltaire Gengis at least in French seems to be the more fashionable spelling, but Abulghazi Khan must have known the true name of his ancestor. His etymology appears just. Zin, in the Mogul tongue, signifies great, and gis is the superlative termination (Hist. Genealogique des Tartars part. iii. p. 194, 195). From the same idea of magnitude, the appellation of Zingis is bestowed on the ocean.

conquest and dominion of the earth In a general couroultar, or dict, he was seated on a felt, which was long afterwards revered as a relic, and solemnly proclaimed great khan, or emperor of the Moguls<sup>d</sup> and Tartars<sup>e</sup> Of these kindred, though rival, names, the former had given birth to the imperial race, and the latter has been extended by accident or error over the spacious wilderness of the north

<sup>f</sup> His laws The code of laws which Zingis dictated to his subjects, was adapted to the preservation of domestic peace, and the exercise of foreign hostility The punishment of death was inflicted on the crimes of adultery, murder, perjury, and the capital thefts of a horse or ox, and the fiercest of men were mild and just in their intercourse with each other The future election of the great khan was vested in the princes of his family and the heads of the tribes, and the regulations of the chace were essential to the pleasures and plenty of a Tartar camp The victorious nation was held sacred from all servile labours, which were abandoned to slaves and strangers, and every labour was servile except the profession of arms The service and discipline of the troops, who were armed with bows, scymitars, and iron maces, and divided by hundreds, thousands, and ten thousands, were the institutions of a veteran commander Each officer and soldier was made responsible, under pain of death, for the safety and honour of his companions, and the spirit of conquest breathed in the law, that peace should never be granted unless to a vanquished and suppliant enemy But it is the religion of Zingis that best deserves our wonder and applause The catholic inquisitors of Europe, who defended nonsense by cruelty, might have been confounded by the example of a barbarian, who anticipated the lessons of philosophy,<sup>f</sup> and established by his laws a system of pure theism and perfect toleration His first and only article of faith was the existence of one God, the author of all good, who fills by his presence the heavens and earth, which he has created by his power The Tartars and Moguls were addicted to the idols of their peculiar tribes, and many of them had been converted by the foreign missionaries to the religions of Moses, of Mahomet, and of Christ These various systems in freedom and concord, were taught and practised within the precincts of the same camp, and the Bonze, the Imam, the Rabbi, the Nestorian, and the Latin priest, enjoyed the same honourable exemption from service and tribute in the mosque of Bochara, the insolent victor might trample the Koran under his horse's feet, but the calm legislator respected the prophets and pontiffs of the most hostile sects The reason of Zingis was not informed by books, the khan could neither read nor write, and, except the tribe of the Igours, the greatest part of the Moguls and Tartars were as illiterate as their sovereign The memory of their exploits was preserved by tradition sixty-eight years after the death of Zingis, these traditions were collected and transcribed,<sup>g</sup> the brevity of their domestic annals may be supplied by the Chinese,<sup>h</sup> Persians,<sup>i</sup> Armenians,<sup>j</sup> Syrians,<sup>k</sup> Arabians,<sup>l</sup> Greeks,<sup>m</sup> Russians,<sup>n</sup> Poles,<sup>o</sup> Hungarians,<sup>p</sup> and Latins,<sup>r</sup> and each nation will deserve credit in the relation of their own disasters and defeats<sup>s</sup>

The arms of Zingis and his lieutenants successively reduced the hordes of the desert, who pitched their tents

Invasion of China,
A D 1210—1214

<sup>d</sup> The name of Moguls has prevailed among the orientals, and still adheres to the titular sovereign the Great Mogul of Hindostan

<sup>e</sup> The Tartars (more properly Tatars) were descended from Tatar Khan the brother of Mo-ul Khan, (see Abulghazi, part i. mil ii) and once formed a horde of 70 000 families on the borders of Kilar, (p 103—112) In the great invasion of Europe, (A D 1238) they seem to have led the vanguard, and the multitude of the name of Tartars recommended that of Tartars to the Latins (Mitt Paris, p 398, &c)

<sup>f</sup> A singular conformity may be found between the religious laws of Zingis Khan and of Mr Locke (Constitutions of Carolina, in his Works, vol iv p 535 4th edition, 1777)

<sup>g</sup> In the year 1294, by the command of Cazan, khan of Persia, the fourth in his descent from Zingis From these traditions, his vizir Fadlallah composed a Mogul history in the Persian language, which has been used by Petit de la Croix (Hist de Genghiscan p 537—539) The Histoire Genealogique des Tartars (1 Leyde, 1726 in 12mo, 2 tomes) was translated by the Swedish prisoners in Siberia from the Mo-ul MS of Abulghazi Bihadur Khan, a descendant of Zingis, who reigned over the Usbecks of Charasim, or Carizmie (A D 1644—1663) He is of most value and credit for the names, pedigrees and manners of his nation Of his nine parts the first descends from Adam to Mogul Khan the second, from Mogul to Zingis the third is the life of Zingis, the fourth fifth, sixth, and seventh, the general history of his four sons, and their posterity the eighth and ninth, the particular history of the descendants of Sherbani Khan, who reigned in Maurenhar and Charasim

<sup>h</sup> Histoire de Genghiscan, et de toute la Dynastie des Mongous ses successeurs, Conquerans de la Chine, tirée de l'Histoire de la Chine, par le R P Gaubil, de la Société de Jesus, Missionnaire à Pekin, à Paris, 1739 in 4to This translation is stamped with the Chinese character of domestic accuracy and foreign ignorance

<sup>i</sup> See the Histoire du Grand Genghiscan, premier empereur des Mogols et Tartars, par M Petit de la Croix, à Paris, 1710 in 12mo, a work of ten years' labour, chiefly drawn from the Persian writers, among whom Nisavi, the secretary of sultan Gelaeddin, has the merit of the originals, or the compiler A slight air of romance is the fault of the originals, or the compiler See likewise the articles of Genghis can Mohammed, Gelaeddin, &c in the Bibliothèque Orientale of D Herbelot

<sup>k</sup> Aithonous, or Aithonous, an Armenian prince and afterwards a monk of Premonstré, (Fabric Bibliot Lat. mediæ ævi, tom i p 34) dictated, in the French language his book de Tartaris, his old fellow-soldiers It was immediately translated into Latin and inserted in the Novus Orbis of Symon Gryneus (Basil, 1555 in folio)

<sup>l</sup> Zingis Khan, and his first successors, occupy the conclusion of the ninth Dynasty of Ahulpharigius, (vers Pocock, Oxon 1663 in 4to,) and his tenth Dynasty is that of the Moguls of Persia Assemanus (Bibliot Orient tom ii) has extracted some facts from his Syriac writings, and the lives of the Jacobite maphrians, or primates of the east

<sup>m</sup> Amari, the Arabians, in language and religion, we may distinguish Abulfeda, sultan of Hamah in Syria, who fought in person, under the Mameluke standard, against the Moguls

<sup>n</sup> Nicephorus Gregoras (ii c 5, 6) has felt the necessity of connecting the Scythian and Byzantine histories He describes with truth and elegance the settlement and manners of the Moguls of Persia, but he is ignorant of their origin, and corrupts the names of Zingis and his sons

<sup>o</sup> M Levesque (Histoire de Russie, tom ii) has described the conquest of Russia by the Tartars, from the patriarch Nikon, and the old chronicles

<sup>p</sup> For Poland, I am content with the Sarmatia Asiatica et Europæa of Matthew a Michini, or de Mischurin, a canon and physician of Cracow, (A D 1506) inserted in the Novus Orbis of Gryneus Fabric Bibliot Latin mediæ et infimæ ævis, tom v p 56

<sup>q</sup> I should quote Thuroczius, the oldest general historian, (pars ii c 74 p 150) in the first volume of the Scriptores Rerum Hungaricarum, did not the same volume contain the original narrative of a contemporary, an eye witness, and a sufferer, (M Ruperi, Hungari, Varadiensis Capituli Cancellarius, Carmen miserabile, seu Historiam super Destructione Regni Hungaricæ, Temporibus Bela IV Regis per Tartaros facta, p 292—321) the best picture that I have ever seen of all the circumstances of a barbaric invasion

<sup>r</sup> Mithelw Paris has represented, from authentic documents, the danger and distress of Europe (consult the word Tartars in his copious Index) From motives of zeal and curiosity, the court of the great khan in the thirteenth century was visited by two freres, John de Plano Carpini, and William Rubruquis, and by Marco Polo, a Venetian gentleman The Italian relations of the two former are inserted in the first volume of Hackluyt, the Italian original or version of the third (Fabric Bibliot Latin mediæ ævi, tom ii p 198 tom v p 25) may be found in the second tome of Ramusio

<sup>s</sup> In his great History of the Huns, M de Guignes has most amply treated of Zingis Khan and his successors See tom iii l xv—xix and in the collateral articles of the Selukians of Roum, tom ii l xi the Carizmians, l xiv and the Mamelukes, tom iv l xxi consult likewise the tables of the first volume He is ever learned and accurate, yet I am only indebted to him for a general view, and some particulars of Abulfeda, which are still latent in the Arabic text

between the wall of China and the Volga, and the Mogul emperor became the monarch of the pastoral world, the lord of many millions of shepherds and soldiers, who felt their united strength, and were impatient to rush on the mild and wealthy climates of the south. His ancestors had been the tributaries of the Chinese emperors, and Temugin himself had been disgraced by a title of honour and servitude. The court of Pekin was astonished by an embassy from its former vassal, who, in the tone of the king of nations, exacted the tribute and obedience which he had paid, and who affected to treat the son of heaven as the most contemptible of mankind. A haughty answer disguised their secret apprehensions, and their fears were soon justified by the march of innumerable squadrons, who pierced on all sides the feeble rampart of the great wall. Ninety cities were stormed, or starved, by the Moguls, ten only escaped, and Zingis, from a knowledge of the filial piety of the Chinese, covered his vanguard with their captive parents, an unworthy, and by degrees a fruitless, abuse of the virtue of his enemies. His invasion was supported by the revolt of a hundred thousand Khitans, who guarded the frontier yet he listened to a treaty, and a princess of China, three thousand horses, five hundred youths, and as many virgins, and a tribute of gold and silk, were the price of his retreat. In his second expedition, he compelled the Chinese emperor to retire beyond the yellow river to a more southern residence. The siege of Pekin<sup>1</sup> was long and laborious: the inhabitants were reduced by famine to decimate and devour their fellow-citizens, when their ammunition was spent, they discharged ingots of gold and silver from their engines, but the Moguls introduced a mine to the centre of the capital, and the conflagration of the palace burnt above thirty days. China was desolated by Tartar war and domestic faction, and the five northern provinces were added to the empire of Zingis.

In the west, he touched the dominions of Mohammed sultan of Carizme, who reigned from the Persian gulf to the borders of India and Turkestan, and who, in the proud imitation of Alexander the Great, forgot the servitude and ingratitude of his fathers to the house of Seljuk. It was the wish of Zingis to establish a friendly and commercial intercourse with the most powerful of the Moslem princes, nor could he be tempted by the secret solicitations of the caliph of Bagdad, who sacrificed to his personal wrongs the safety of the church and state. A rash and inhuman deed provoked and justified the Tartar arms in the invasion of the southern Asia. A caravan of three ambassadors and one hundred and fifty merchants, was arrested and murdered at Otrar, by the command of Mohammed, nor was it till after a demand and denial of justice, till he had prayed and fasted three nights on a mountain, that the Mogul emperor appealed to the judgment of God and his sword. Our European battles, says a philosophic writer,<sup>2</sup> are petty skirmishes, if compared to the numbers that have fought and fallen in the fields of Asia. Seven hundred thousand Moguls and Tartars are said to have marched under the standard of Zingis and his four sons. In the vast plains that extend to the north of the Sihon or Javartes, they were encountered by four hundred thousand soldiers of the sultan, and in the first battle, which was suspended by the night, one hundred and sixty thousand Carizmians were slain. Mohammed was astonished by the multitude and valour of his enemies: he withdrew from the scene of danger, and distributed his troops in the frontier towns, trusting that the barbarians, invincible in the field, would be repulsed by the length and difficulty of so many regular sieges. But the prudence of Zingis had formed a body of Chinese engineers, skilled in the mechanic arts, informed perhaps of the secret of gunpowder, and capable, under his discipline, of attacking a foreign country with more vigour and success than they had defended their own. The Persian historians will relate the sieges and reduction of Otrar, Cogende, Bochara, Samarcand, Carizme, Herat, Merou, Nisabour, Balch, and Candahar, and the conquest of the rich and populous countries of Transoxiana, Carizme, and Chorasana. The destructive hostilities of Attila and the Huns have long since been elucidated by the example of Zingis and the Moguls, and in this more proper place I shall be content to observe, that, from the Caspian to the Indus, they ruined a tract of many hundred miles, which was adorned with the habitations and labours of mankind, and that five centuries have not been sufficient to repair the ravages of four years. The Mogul emperor encouraged or indulged the fury of his troops, the hope of future possession was lost in the ardour of rapine and slaughter, and the cause of the war exasperated their native fierceness by the pretence of justice and revenge. The downfall and death of the sultan Mohammed, who expired unpitied and alone, in a desert island of the Caspian sea, is a poor atonement for the calamities of which he was the author. Could the Carizman empire have been saved by a single hero, it would have been saved by his son Gelaeddin, whose active valour repeatedly checked the Moguls in the career of victory. Retreating, as he fought, to the banks of the Indus, he was oppressed by their innumerable host, till, in the last moment of despair, Gelaeddin spurred his horse into the waves, swam one of the broadest and most rapid rivers of Asia, and extorted the admiration and applause of Zingis himself. It was in this camp that the Mogul conqueror yielded with reluctance change of names perplex the most skilful readers of the Chinese geography, (p. 177.)

<sup>1</sup> More properly Yen king, an ancient city, whose ruins still appear some furlongs to the south east of the modern Pekin which was built by Cublai Khan (Gabel, p. 116). Pe king and Nan king are vague titles, the courts of the north and of the south. The identity and

<sup>2</sup> M. de Voltaire Essai sur l'Histoire Generale, tom. iii. c. 60. p. 8. His account of Zingis and the Moguls contains as usual much general sense and truth, with some particular errors.

to the murmurs of his weary and wealthy troops, who sighed for the enjoyment of their native land. Encumbered with the spoils of Asia, he slowly measured back his footsteps, betrayed some pity for the misery of the vanquished, and declared his intention of rebuilding the cities which had been swept away by the tempest of his arms. After he had repassed the Oxus and Jaxartes, he was joined by two generals, whom he had detached with thirty thousand horse, to subdue the western provinces of Persia. They had trampled on the nations which opposed their passage, penetrated through the gates of Derbent, traversed the Volga and the desert, and accomplished the circuit of the Caspian sea, by an expedition which had never been attempted, and has never been repeated. The return of Zingis was signalized by the overthrow of the rebellious or independent kingdoms of Tartary, and he died in the fulness of years and glory, with his last breath exhorting and instructing his sons to achieve the conquest of the Chinese empire.

The harem of Zingis was composed of five hundred wives and concubines, and of his numerous progeny, four sons, illustrious by their birth and merit, exercised under their father the principal offices of peace and war. Toushu was his great huntsman, Zagatai* his judge, Oetai his minister, and Tuli his general, and their names and actions are often conspicuous in the history of his conquests. Firmly united for their own and the public interest, the three brothers and their families wore content with dependent sceptres, and Oetai, by general consent, was proclaimed great khan, or emperor of the Moguls and Tartars. He was succeeded by his son Gayuk, after whose death the empire devolved to his cousins Mangou and Cublai, the sons of Tuli, and the grandsons of Zingis. In the sixty-eight years of his four first successors, the Moguls subdued almost all Asia, and a large portion of Europe. Without confining myself to the order of time, without expatiating on the detail of events, I shall present a general picture of the progress of their arms, I. In the east, II. In the south, III. In the west, and IV. In the north.

I. Before the invasion of Zingis, China was divided into two empires or dynasties of the north and south, and the difference of origin and interest was smoothed by a general conformity of laws, language, and national manners. The northern empire, which had been dismembered by Zingis, was finally subdued seven years after his death. After the loss of Pekin, the emperor had fixed his residence at Kaifong, a city many leagues in circumference, and which contained, according to the Chinese annals, fourteen hundred thousand families of inhabitants and fugitives. He escaped from thence with only seven horsemen, and made his last stand in a third capital, till at length the hopeless monarch, protesting his innocence and accusing his fortune, ascended a funeral pile, and gave orders, that, as soon as he had staked himself, the fire should be kindled by his attendants. The dynasty of the Song, the native and ancient sovereigns of the whole empire, survived about forty-five years the fall of the northern usurpers, and the perfect conquest was reserved for the arms of Cublai. During this interval, the Moguls were often diverted by foreign wars, and, if the Chinese seldom dared to meet their victors in the field, their passive courage presented an endless succession of cities to storm and of millions to slaughter. In the attack and defence of places, the engines of antiquity and the Greek fire were alternately employed. The use of gunpowder in cannon and bombs appears as a familiar practice,<sup>2</sup> and the sieges were conducted by the Mahometans and Franks, who had been liberally invited into the service of Cublai. After passing the great river, the troops and artillery were conveyed along a series of canals, till they invested the royal residence of Hamcheu, or Quinsay, in the country of silk, the most delicious climate of China. The emperor, a defenceless youth, surrendered his person and sceptre, and before he was sent in exile into Tartary, he struck nine times the ground with his forehead, to adore in prayer or thanksgiving the mercy of the great khan. Yet the war (it was now styled a rebellion) was still maintained in the southern provinces from Hamcheu to Canton, and the obstinate remnant of independence and hostility was transported from the land to the sea. But when the fleet of the Song was surrounded and oppressed by a superior armament, their last champion leaped into the waves with his infant emperor in his arms. "It is more glorious," he cried, "to die a prince, than to live a slave." A hundred thousand Chinese imitated his example; and the whole empire from Tonkin to the great wall, submitted to the dominion of Cublai. His boundless ambition aspired to the conquest of Japan: his fleet was twice shipwrecked, and the lives of a hundred thousand Moguls and Chinese were sacrificed in the fruitless expedition. But the circumjacent kingdoms, Corea, Tonkin, Cochinchina, Pegu, Bengal, and Thibet, were reduced in different degrees of tribute and obedience by the effort or terror of * Zagatai gave his name to his dominions of Maurenahar, or Transoxiana, and the Moguls of Hindostan, who emigrated from that country, are styled Zingisians by the Persians. This certain etymology and the similar example of Uzbek, Nogai, &c. may warn us not absolutely to reject the derivations of a national, from a personal, name.

1 In Marco Polo, and the oriental geographers, the names of Cathay and Mangi distinguish the northern and southern empires, which, from A. D. 1234 to 1279, were those of the great khan, and of the Chinese. The search of Cathay, after China had been found, excited and misled our navigators of the sixteenth century, in their attempts to discover the north-east passage.

2 I depend on the knowledge and fidelity of the Pere Grubil, who translates the Chinese text of the annals of the Moguls or Yuen, (p. 71, 93, 151) but I am ignorant at what time these annals were composed and published. The two uncles of Marco Polo, who served as engineers at the siege of Siensungfou, (1191 c. 61) in Ramusio, tom. II. See Grubil, p. 155, 157) must have felt and related the effects of this destructive powder and their silence is a weighty, and almost decisive, objection. I entertain a suspicion that the recent discovery was carried from Europe to China by the caravans of the fifteenth century, and falsely adapted as an old national discovery before the arrival of the Portuguese and Jesuits in the sixteenth. Yet the Pere Grubil affirms, that the use of gunpowder has been known to the Chinese above 1600 years.

his arms He explored the Indian ocean with a fleet of a thousand ships they sailed in sixty-eight days, most probably to the isle of Borneo, under the equinoctial line, and though they returned not without spoil or glory, the emperor was dissatisfied that the savage king had escaped from their hands

Of Persia, and the empire of the caliphs,
A D 1258

II The conquest of Hindostan by the Moguls was reserved in a later period for the house of Timour, but that of Iran or Persia, was achieved by Holagou Khan, the grandson of Zingis, the brother and lieutenant of the two successive emperors, Mangou and Cublai I shall not enumerate the crowd of sultans, emirs, and atabeks, whom he trampled into dust, but the extirpation of the Assassins, or Ismachiens<sup>a</sup> of Persia, may be considered as a service to mankind Among the hills to the south of the Caspian, these odious sectaries had reigned with impunity above a hundred and sixty years, and their prince, or imam, established his lieutenant to lead and govern the colony of mount Labanus, so famous and formidable in the history of the crusades<sup>b</sup> With the fanaticism of the Koran, the Ismachiens had blended the Indian transmigration, and the visions of their own prophets, and it was their first duty to devote their souls and bodies in blind obedience to the vicar of God The daggers of his missionaries were felt both in the east and west the christians and the Moslems enumerate, and perhaps multiply, the illustrious victims that were sacrificed to the zeal, avarice, or resentment of the old man (as he was corruptly styled) of the mountain But these daggers, his only arms, were broken by the sword of Holagou, and not a vestige is left of the enemies of mankind, except the word assassin, which, in the most odious sense, has been adopted in the languages of Europe The extinction of the Abbassides cannot be indifferent to the spectators of their greatness and decline Since the fall of their Seljukian tyrants, the caliphs had recovered their lawful dominion of Bagdad and the Arabian Irak, but the city was distracted by theological factions, and the commander of the faithful was lost in a harem of seven hundred concubines The invasion of the Moguls he encountered with feeble arms and haughty embassies "On the divine decree," said the caliph Mostasem, "is founded the throne of the sons of Abbas and their foes shall surely be destroyed in this world and in the next Who is this Holagou that dares to rise against them? If he be desirous of peace, let him instantly depart from the sacred territory and perhaps he may obtain from our clemency the pardon of his fault." This presumption was cherished by a perfidious vizir, who assured his master, that, even if the barbarians had entered the city, the women and children, from the terraces, would be sufficient to overwhelm them with stones

<sup>a</sup> All that can be known of the Assassins of Persia and Syria is poured from the copious and even profuse, erudition of M. Falconet, in two memoirs read before the Academy of Inscriptions, (tom xvii p. 127—170)

<sup>b</sup> The Ismachiens of Syria 40 000 Assassins, had acquired or founded ten castles in the hills about Tortosa About the year 1280, they were extirpated by the Mamlukes

But when Holagou touched the phantom, it instantly vanished into smoke After a siege of two months Bagdad was stormed and sacked by the Moguls and their savage commander pronounced the death of the caliph Mostasem, the last of the temporal successors of Mahomet, whose noble kinsmen, of the race of Abbas, had reigned in Asia above five hundred years Whatever might be the designs of the conqueror, the holy cities of Mecca and Medina<sup>c</sup> were protected by the Arabian desert, but the Moguls spread beyond the Tigris and Euphrates, pillaged Aleppo and Damascus, and threatened to join the Franks in the deliverance of Jerusalem Egypt was lost, had she been defended only by her feeble offspring, but the Mamlukes had breathed in their infancy the keenness of a Seythian air equal in valour, superior in discipline, they met the Moguls in many a well-fought field, and drove back the stream of hostility to the eastward of the Euphrates But it overflowed with resistless violence the kingdoms of Armenia and Anatolia, of which the former was possessed by the christians, and the latter by the Turks The sultans of Iconium opposed some resistance to the Mogul arms, till Azzadin sought a refuge among the Greeks of Constantinople, and his feeble successors, the last of the Seljukian dynasty, were finally extirpated by the khans of Persia

Of Anatolia,
A D 1212
—1272

III No sooner had Ocfai subverted the northern empire of China, than he resolved to visit with his arms the most remote countries of the west

Of Kipzak Russia Poland Hungary &c
A D 1235
—1245

Fifteen hundred thousand Moguls and Tartars were inscribed on the military roll of these the great khan selected a third, which he intrusted to the command of his nephew Batou, the son of Tuli, who reigned over his father's conquests to the north of the Caspian sea After a festival of forty days, Batou set forwards on this great expedition, and such was the speed and ardour of his innumerable squadrons, that in less than six years they had measured a line of ninety degrees of longitude, a fourth part of the circumference of the globe The great rivers of Asia and Europe, the Volga and Kama, the Don and Borysthenes, the Vistula and Danube, they either swam with their horses, or passed on the ice, or traversed in leathern boats, which followed the camp, and transported their waggons and artillery By the first victories of Batou, the remains of national freedom were eradicated in the immense plains of Turkestan and Kipzak<sup>d</sup> In his rapid progress, he overran the kingdoms, as they are now styled, of Astracan and Cazan, and the troops which he detached towards mount Caucasus, explored the most secret recesses of Georgia and Circassia The civil discord of the great dukes, or

<sup>c</sup> As a proof of the ignorance of the Chinese in foreign transactions I must observe, that some of their historians extend the conquests of Zingis himself to Medina, the country of Mahomet, (Gaubil p. 42)

<sup>d</sup> The Dashté Kipzak, or plain of Kipzak extends on either side of the Volga, in a boundless space towards the Juk and Borysthenes and is supposed to contain the primitive name and nature of the Cossaks

princes, of Russia, betrayed their country to the Tartars. They spread from Livonia to the Black sea, and both Moscow and Kiow, the modern and the ancient capitals, were reduced to ashes, a temporary ruin, less fatal than the deep, and perhaps indelible, mark, which a servitude of two hundred years has imprinted on the character of the Russians. The Tartars ravaged with equal fury the countries which they hoped to possess, and those which they were hastening to leave. From the permanent conquest of Russia, they made a deadly though transient inroad into the heart of Poland, and as far as the borders of Germany. The cities of Lublin and Cracow were obliterated: they approached the shores of the Baltic, and in the battle of Lignitz, they defeated the dukes of Silesia, the Polish palatines, and the great master of the Teutonic order, and filled nine sacks with the right ears of the slain. From Lignitz, the extreme point of their western march, they turned aside to the invasion of Hungary, and the presence or spirit of Batou inspired the host of five hundred thousand men: the Carpathian hills could not be long impervious to their divided columns, and their approach had been fondly disbelieved till it was irresistibly felt. The king, Bela the fourth, assembled the military force of his counts and bishops, but he had alienated the nation by adopting a vagrant horde of forty thousand families of Comans, and these savage guests were provoked to revolt by the suspicion of treachery and the murder of their prince. The whole country north of the Danube was lost in a day, and depopulated in a summer, and the ruins of cities and churches were overspread with the bones of the natives, who expiated the sins of their Turkish ancestors. An ecclesiastic, who fled from the sack of Waradin, describes the calamities which he had seen, or suffered, and the sanguinary rage of sieges and battles is far less atrocious than the treatment of the fugitives, who had been allured from the woods under a promise of peace and pardon, and who were coolly slaughtered as soon as they had performed the labours of the harvest and vintage. In the winter, the Tartars passed the Danube on the ice, and advanced to Gran or Strigonium, a German colony, and the metropolis of the kingdom. Thirty engines were planted against the walls, the ditches were filled with sacks of earth and dead bodies, and after a promiscuous massacre, three hundred noble matrons were slain in the presence of the khan. Of all the cities and fortresses of Hungary, three alone survived the Tartar invasion, and the unfortunate Bela hid his head among the islands of the Adriatic.

The Latin world was darkened by this cloud of

<sup>e</sup> In the year 1238, the inhabitants of Gothia (Sweden) and Frise were prevented, by their fear of the Tartars, from sending, as usual, their ships to the herring fishery on the coast of England: and as there was no exportation, forty or fifty of these fish were sold for a chilling (Matthew Paris, p. 398). It is whimsical enough, that the orders of a Mogul khan who reigned on the borders of China, should have lowered the price of herrings in the English market.

<sup>f</sup> I shall copy his characteristic or flattering epithets of the different countries of Europe: Furens ac fervens ad arma Germania, strenua militum genitrix et alumna Francia, bellicosa et audax Hispania, virtu-

savage hostility a Russian fugitive carried the alarm to Sweden: and the remote nations of the Baltic and the ocean trembled at the approach of the Tartars,<sup>e</sup> whom their fear and ignorance were inclined to separate from the human species. Since the invasion of the Arabs in the eighth century, Europe had never been exposed to a similar calamity, and if the disciples of Mahomet would have oppressed her religion and liberty, it might be apprehended that the shepherds of Seythia would extinguish her cities, her arts, and all the institutions of civil society. The Roman pontiff attempted to appease and convert these invincible pagans by a mission of Franciscan and Dominican friars, but he was astonished by the reply of the khan, that the sons of God and of Zingis were invested with a divine power to subdue or extirpate the nations, and that the pope would be involved in the universal destruction, unless he visited in person, and as a suppliant, the royal horde. The emperor Frederic the second embraced a more generous mode of defence, and his letters to the kings of France and England, and the princes of Germany, represented the common danger, and urged them to arm their vassals in this just and rational crusade.<sup>f</sup> The Tartars themselves were awed by the fame and valour of the Franks: the town of Newstadt in Austria was bravely defended against them by fifty knights and twenty cross-bows, and they raised the siege on the appearance of a German army. After wasting the adjacent kingdoms of Servia, Bosnia, and Bulgaria, Batou slowly retreated from the Danube to the Volga, to enjoy the rewards of victory in the city and palace of Serai, which started at his command from the midst of the desert.

IV Even the poor and frozen regions Of Siberia of the north attracted the arms of the A D 1242, &c
Moguls. Sherban khan, the brother of the great Batou, led a horde of fifteen thousand families into the wilds of Siberia, and his descendants reigned at Tobolskoy above three centuries, till the Russian conquest. The spirit of enterprise which pursued the course of the Oby and Yenisei must have led to the discovery of the icy sea. After brushing away the monstrous fables of men with dogs' heads and cloven feet, we shall find, that, fifteen years after the death of Zingis, the Moguls were informed of the name and manners of the Samoyedes in the neighbourhood of the polar circle, who dwelt in subterraneous huts, and derived their furs and their food from the sole occupation of hunting.<sup>g</sup>

While China, Syria, and Poland, The successors were invaded at the same time by the of Zingis, Moguls and Tartars, the authors of the A D 1227—1250
mighty mischief were content with the knowledge

ost virus et classe munita fertilis Anglia, impetuosus bellatoribus referta Alemannia, navalis Dacia, indomita Italia, pacis ignara Burgundia, in quiete Apulia, cum maris Græci, Adriatici, et Tyrreni insulis, pyratibus et invictis, Creta, Cypro, Sicilia cum Oceano conterminis insulis et regionibus, cruenta Hybernia cum æthi Walli palustris Scotia, glacialis Norwegia, suam electam militum sub vexillo Crucis destina bunt &c (Matthew Paris, p. 498).

<sup>g</sup> See Carpin's relation in Hackluyt, vol. i, p. 30. The pedigree of the khans of Siberia is given by Abulghazi, (part viii, p. 465—495.) Have the Russians found no Tartar chronicles at Tobolsk?

and declaration, that their word was the sword of death. Like the first caliphs, the first successors of Zingis seldom appeared in person at the head of their victorious armies. On the banks of the Onon and Selenga the royal or golden horde exhibited the contrast of simplicity and greatness, of the roasted sheep and mare's milk which composed their banquets, and of a distribution in one day of five hundred waggons of gold and silver. The ambassadors and princes of Europe and Asia were compelled to undertake this distant and laborious pilgrimage and the life and reign of the great dukes of Russia, the kings of Georgia and Armenia, the sultans of Iconium, and the emirs of Persia, were decided by the frown or smile of the great khan. The sons and grandsons of Zingis had been accustomed to the pastoral life, but the village of Caracorum<sup>a</sup> was gradually ennobled by their election and residence. A change of manners is implied in the removal of Octai and Mangou from a tent to a house, and their example was imitated by the princes of their family and the great officers of the empire. Instead of the boundless forest, the enclosure of a park afforded the more indolent pleasures of the chase, their new habitations were decorated with painting and sculpture, their superfluous treasures were cast in fountains, and basins, and statues of massy silver, and the artists of China and Paris vied with each other in the service of the great khan<sup>1</sup>. Caracorum contained two streets, the one of Chinese mechanics, the other of Mahometan traders, and the places of religious worship, one Nestorian church, two mosques, and twelve temples of various idols, may represent in some degree the number and division of inhabitants. Yet a French missionary declares, that the town of St Denys, near Paris, was more considerable than the Tartar capital, and that the whole palace of Mangou was scarcely equal to a tenth part of that Benedictine abbey. The conquests of Russia and Syria might amuse the vanity of the great khans, but they were seated on the borders of China, the acquisition of that empire was the nearest and most interesting object, and they might learn from their pastoral economy, that it is for the advantage of the shepherd to protect and propagate his flock. I have already celebrated the wisdom and virtue of a Mandarin, who prevented the desolation of five populous and cultivated provinces. In a spotless administration of thirty years, this friend of his country and of mankind continually laboured to mitigate, or suspend, the havoc of war, to save the monuments, and to rekindle the flame, of science, to restrain the military commander by the restoration of civil magistrates, and to instil the adopt the manners of China

A D
1259, 1368.

<sup>a</sup> The map of D Anville and the Chinese Itineries (de Guignes, tom. i. part i. p. 57) seem to mark the position of Holin or Caracorum, about six hundred miles to the north west of Pekin. The distance between Selinginsk and Pekin is near 2000 Russian versts, between 1300 and 1400 English miles (Bell's Travels vol. ii. p. 67).

<sup>1</sup> Rubricus found at Caracorum his countryman Guillaume Boucher officier de Paris who had executed for the Khan a silver tree supported by four lions and equestrian, four different liquors. Abulghazi (part ii. p. 336) mentions the painters of Kitay or China.

love of peace and justice into the minds of the Moguls. He struggled with the barbarism of the first conquerors, but his salutary lessons produced a rich harvest in the second generation. The northern, and by degrees the southern, empire, at quiesced in the government of Cublai, the lieutenant, and afterwards the successor, of Mangou, and the nation was loyal to a prince who had been educated in the manners of China. He restored the forms of her venerable constitution, and the victors submitted to the laws, the fashions, and even the prejudices, of the vanquished people. This peaceful triumph, which has been more than once repeated, may be ascribed in a great measure to the numbers and servitude of the Chinese. The Mogul army was dissolved in a vast and populous country, and their emperors adopted with pleasure a political system, which gives to the prince the solid substance of despotism, and leaves to the subject the empty names of philosophy, freedom, and filial obedience. Under the reign of Cublai, letters and commerce, peace and justice, were restored, the great canal, of five hundred miles, was opened from Nankin to the capital. He fixed his residence at Pekin, and displayed in his court the magnificence of the greatest monarch of Asia. Yet this learned prince declined from the pure and simple religion of his great ancestor, he sacrificed to the idol Fo, and his blind attachment to the lamas of Thibet and the bonzes of China<sup>k</sup> provoked the censure of the disciples of Confucius. His successors polluted the palace with a crowd of eunuchs, physicians, and astrologers, while thirteen millions of their subjects were consumed in the provinces by famine. One hundred and forty years after the death of Zingis, his degenerate race, the dynasty of the Yuen, was expelled by a revolt of the native Chinese, and the Mogul emperors were lost in the oblivion of the desert. Before this revolution, they had forfeited their supremacy over the Division of the Mogul empire,

A D 1259—1300

dependent branches of their house, the khans of Kipzak and Russia, the khans of Zagatai, or Transoxiana, and the khans of Iran or Persia. By their distance and power these royal lieutenants had soon been released from the duties of obedience, and after the death of Cublai, they scorned to accept a sceptre or a title from his unworthy successors. According to their respective situation they maintained the simplicity of the pastoral life, or assumed the luxury of the cities of Asia, but the princes and their hordes were alike disposed for the reception of a foreign worship. After some hesitation between the Gospel and the Koran, they conformed to the religion of Mahomet, and while they adopted for their brethren the Arabs and Persians, they re-

<sup>k</sup> The attachment of the khans and the hatred of the mandarins to the bonzes and lamas (Dunluid's Hist. de la Chine tom. i. p. 502, 503) seems to represent them as the priests of the same god, of the Indian Ed who worship prevails among the sects of Hindostan, Siam, Thibet, China, and Japan. But this mysterious subject is still lost in a cloud which the researches of our Asiatic society may gradually dispel.

barous inhabitants wanted both skill and patience to investigate those rich veins of silver, which have so liberally rewarded the attention of the princes of Brunswick and Saxony. Sweden, which now supplies Europe with iron, was equally ignorant of its own riches, and the appearance of the arms of the Germans furnished a sufficient proof how little iron they were able to bestow on what they must have deemed the noblest use of that metal. The various transactions of peace and war had introduced some Roman coins (chiefly silver) among the borderers of the Rhine and Danube, but the more distant tribes were absolutely unacquainted with the use of money, carried on their confined traffic by the exchange of commodities, and prized their rude earthen vessels as of equal value with the silver vases, the presents of Rome to their princes and ambassadors.<sup>a</sup> To a mind capable of reflection, such leading facts convey more instruction, than a tedious detail of subordinate circumstances. The value of money has been settled by general consent to express our wants and our property, as letters were invented to express our ideas, and both these institutions, by giving a more active energy to the powers and passions of human nature, have contributed to multiply the objects they were designed to represent. The use of gold and silver is in a great measure factitious, but it would be impossible to enumerate the important and various services which agriculture, and all the arts, have received from iron, when tempered and fashioned by the operation of fire, and the dexterous hand of man. Money, in a word, is the most universal incitement, iron the most powerful instrument, of human industry, and it is very difficult to conceive by what means a people, neither actuated by the one, nor seconded by the other, could emerge from the grossest barbarism.<sup>f</sup>

<sup>g</sup> Their indolence. If we contemplate a savage nation in any part of the globe, a supine indolence and a carelessness of futurity will be found to constitute their general character. In a civilized state, every faculty of man is expanded and exercised, and the great chain of mutual dependence connects and embraces the several members of society. The most numerous portion of it is employed in constant and useful labour. The select few, placed by fortune above that necessity, can, however, fill up their time by the pursuits of interest or glory, by the improvement of their estate or of their understanding, by the duties, the pleasures, and even the follies of social life. The Germans were not possessed of these varied resources. The care of the house and family, the management of the land and cattle, were delegated to the old and the infirm, to women and slaves. The lazy warrior, destitute of every art that might employ his leisure hours, consumed his days and nights in the animal gratifications of sleep and food.

<sup>a</sup> Tacit. Germ. 6.

<sup>f</sup> It is said that the Mexicans and Peruvians, without the use of either money or iron had made a very great progress in the arts. Those arts and the monuments they produced have been strangely magnified. See Recherches sur les Américains, tom. ii. p. 152, &c.

<sup>g</sup> Tacit. Germ. 15.

And yet, by a powerful diversity of nature, (according to the remark of a writer who had pierced into its darkest recesses,) the same barbarians are by turns the most indolent and the most restless of mankind. They delight in sloth, they detest tranquillity. The languid soul, oppressed with its own weight, anxiously required some new and powerful sensation, and war and danger were the only amusements adequate to its fierce temper. The sound that summoned the German to arms was grateful to his ear. It roused him from his uncomfortable lethargy, gave him an active pursuit, and, by strong exercise of the body, and violent emotions of the mind, restored him to a more lively sense of his existence. In the dull intervals of peace, these barbarians were immoderately addicted to deep gaming and excessive drinking, both of which, by different means, the one by inflaming their passions, the other by extinguishing their reason, alike relieved them from the pain of thinking. They gloried in passing whole days and nights at table, and the blood of friends and relations often stained their numerous and drunken assemblies.<sup>h</sup> Their debts of honour (for in that light they have transmitted to us those of play) they discharged with the most romantic fidelity. The desperate gamester, who had staked his person and liberty on a last throw of the dice, patiently submitted to the decision of fortune, and suffered himself to be bound, chastised, and sold into remote slavery, by his weaker but more lucky antagonist.<sup>i</sup>

Strong beer, a liquor extracted with <sup>their taste for</sup> very little art from wheat or barley, <sup>strong liquors</sup> and corrupted (as it is strongly expressed by Tacitus) into a certain semblance of wine, was sufficient for the gross purposes of German debauchery. But those who had tasted the rich wines of Italy, and afterwards of Gaul, sighed for that more delicious species of intoxication. They attempted not however, (as has since been executed with so much success,) to naturalize the vine on the banks of the Rhine and Danube, nor did they endeavour to procure by industry the materials of an advantageous commerce. To solicit by labour what might be ravished by arms, was esteemed unworthy of the German spirit.<sup>k</sup> The intemperate thirst of strong liquors often urged the barbarians to invade the provinces on which art or nature had bestowed those much envied presents. The Tuscan who betrayed his country to the Celtic nations, attracted them to Italy by the prospect of the rich fruits and delicious wines, the productions of a happier climate.<sup>l</sup> And in the same manner the German auxiliaries, invited into France during the civil wars of the sixteenth century, were allured by the promise of plenteous quarters in the provinces of Champagne and Burgundy.<sup>m</sup> Drunkenness, the most illiberal, but not the most dangerous of our vices, was sometimes ca-

<sup>h</sup> Tacit. Germ. 22, 23.

<sup>i</sup> Id. 24. The Germans might borrow the arts of play from the Romans: but the passion is wonderfully inherent in the human species.

<sup>k</sup> Tacit. Germ. 14.

<sup>l</sup> Plutarch in Camillo. T. Liv. v. 33.

<sup>m</sup> Dubou. Hist. de la Monarchie Française, tom. i. p. 103.

nounced all intercourse with the ancient Moguls, the idolaters of China

Escape of Constantinople and the Greek empire from the Mogul
A D 1240—1304

In this shipwreck of nations, some surprise may be excited by the escape of the Roman empire, whose relics, at the time of the Mogul invasion, were dismembered by the Greeks and Latins

Less potent than Alexander, they were pressed, like the Macedonian, both in Europe and Asia, by the shepherds of Scythia and had the Tartars undertaken the siege, Constantinople must have yielded to the fate of Pekin, Samarcand, and Bagdad. The glorious and voluntary retreat of Batou from the Danube was insulted by the vain triumph of the Franks and Greeks,<sup>1</sup> and in a second expedition death surprised him in full march to attack the capital of the Cæsars. His brother Borga carried the Tartar arms into Bulgaria and Thrace, but he was diverted from the Byzantine war by a visit to Novogorod, in the fifty-seventh degree of latitude, where he numbered the inhabitants and regulated the tributes of Russia. The Mogul khan formed an alliance with the Mamalukes against his brethren of Persia. Three hundred thousand horse penetrated through the gates of Derbend, and the Greeks might rejoice in the first example of domestic war. After the recovery of Constantinople, Michael Palæologus,<sup>m</sup> at a distance from his court and army, was surprised and surrounded, in a Thracian castle, by twenty thousand Tartars. But the object of their march was a private interest: they came to the deliverance of Azzadin, the Turkish sultan, and were content with his person and the treasure of the emperor. Their general Noga, whose name is perpetuated in the hordes of Astracan, raised a formidable rebellion against Mengo Timour, the third of the khans of Kipzak, obtained in marriage Maria the natural daughter of Palæologus, and guarded the dominions of his friend and father. The subsequent invasions of a Scythian cast were those of outlaws and fugitives and some thousands of Alan and Comans, who had been driven from their native seats, were reclaimed from a vagrant life, and enlisted in the service of the empire. Such was the influence in Europe of the invasion of the Moguls. The first terror of their arms secured, rather than disturbed, the peace of the Roman Asia. The sultan of Iconium solicited a personal interview with John Vataces, and his artful policy encouraged the Turks to defend their barrier against the common enemy.<sup>n</sup> That barrier indeed was soon overthrown, and the servitude and ruin of the Seljukians exposed the nakedness of the Greeks. The formidable Holagou threatened to march to Constantinople at the head of four hundred thousand men, and the groundless panic of the citizens of Nice will present an image of the terror which he had inspired. The accident of a procession, and the sound of a doleful litany, "From the fury of the Tartars, good Lord, deliver us," had scattered the hasty report of an assault and massacre. In the blind credulity of fear, the streets of Nice were crowded with thousands of both sexes, who knew not from what or to whom they fled, and some hours elapsed before the firmness of the military officers could relieve the city from this imaginary foe. But the ambition of Holagou and his successors was fortunately diverted by the conquest of Bagdad, and a long vicissitude of Syrian wars their hostility to the Moslems inclined them to unite with the Greeks and Franks,<sup>o</sup> and their generosity or contempt had offered the kingdom of Anatolia as the reward of an Armenian vassal. The fragments of the Seljukian monarchy were disputed by the emirs who had occupied the cities or the mountains, but they all confessed the supremacy of the khans of Persia, and he often interposed his authority, and sometimes his arms, to check their depredations, and to preserve the peace and balance of his Turkish frontier. The death of Cazan,<sup>p</sup> one of the greatest and most accomplished princes of the house of Zingis, removed this salutary control, and the decline of the Moguls gave a free scope to the rise and progress of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE.<sup>q</sup>

Decline of the Mongol khans of Persia,
A D 1304
May 31

After the retreat of Zingis, the sultan Gelaeddin of Carizme had returned from India to the possession and defence of his Persian kingdoms. In the space of eleven years, that hero fought in person fourteen battles and such was his activity, that he led his cavalry in seventeen days from Teflis to Kerman, a march of a thousand miles. Yet he was oppressed by the jealousy of the Moslem princes, and the innumerable armies of the Moguls and after his last defeat, Gelaeddin perished ignobly in the mountains of Curdistan. His death dissolved a veteran and adventurous army, which included under the name of Carizmians or Corasmins many Turkman hordes, that had attached themselves to the sultan's fortune. The bolder and more powerful chiefs invaded Syria, and violated the holy sepulchre of Jerusalem: the more humble engaged in the service of Aladin, sultan of Iconium, and among these were the obscure fathers of the Ottoman line. They had formerly pitched their tents near the southern banks of the Oxus, in the plains of Mahan and

Origin of the Ottomans,
A D 1240, &c

likewise the Armenians prince, celebrates their friendship for himself and his nation

<sup>p</sup> Pachymer gives a splendid character of Cazan Khan, the rival of Cyrus and Alexander, (I. xii c 1.) In the conclusion of his history, (I. xiii c 36) he hopes much from the arrival of 30,000 Tochars or Tartars, who were ordered by the successor of Cazan to restrain the Turks of Bithynia, A D 1309

<sup>q</sup> The origin of the Ottoman dynasty is illustrated by the critical learning of M M de Guignes (Hist des Huns tom iv p 329-337) and D Anville, (Empire Turc, p 14-22.) two inhabitants of Paris, from whom the orientals may learn the history and geography of their own country

<sup>1</sup> Some repulse of the Moguls in Hungary (Matthew Paris p 545, 546) might propagate and colour the report of the union and victory of the kings of the Franks on the confines of Bulgaria. Abulpharagius, (Dynast p 310) after forty years, beyond the Tigris, might be easily deceived

<sup>m</sup> See Pachymer, I. iii c 25 and I. ix c 26, 27 and the false alarm at Nice, I. iii c 27. Nicephorus Gregoras I. ii c 6

<sup>n</sup> G. Aeropolita, p 36 37. Nic Greg I. ii c 6 I. iv c 5

<sup>o</sup> Abulpharagius who wrote in the year 1284, declares, that the Moguls, since the fabulous defeat of Batou, had not attacked either the Franks or Greeks, and of this he is a competent witness. Hayton, Nesa, and it is somewhat remarkable, that the same spot should have produced the first authors of the Parthian and Turkish empires. At the head, or in the rear, of a Carizmian army, Soliman Shah was drowned in the passage of the Euphrates: his son Orthogrul became the soldier and subject of Aladin, and established at Surgut, on the banks of the Sangar, a camp of four hundred families or tents, whom he governed fifty-two years both in peace and war.

He was the father of Thaman, or Athman, whose Turkish name has been melted into the appellation of the caliph Othman, and if we describe that pastoral chief as a shepherd and a robber, we must separate from those characters all idea of ignominy and baseness. Othman possessed, and perhaps surpassed, the ordinary virtues of a soldier, and the circumstances of time and place were propitious to his independence and success. The Seljukian dynasty was no more, and the distance and decline of the Mogul khans soon enfranchised him from the control of a superior. He was situate on the verge of the Greek empire: the Koran sanctified his gazi, or holy war, against the infidels, and their political errors unlocked the passes of mount Olympus, and invited him to descend into the plains of Bithynia. Till the reign of Palæologus, these passes had been vigilantly guarded by the militia of the country, who were repaid by their own safety and an exemption from taxes. The emperor abolished their privilege and assumed their office, but the tribute was rigorously collected, the custody of the passes was neglected, and the hardy mountaineers degenerated into a trembling crowd of peasants without spirit or discipline. It was on the twenty-seventh of July, in the year twelve hundred and ninety-nine of the christian æra, that Othman first invaded the territory of Nicomedia,* and the singular accuracy of the date seems to disclose some foresight of the rapid and destructive growth of the monster. The annals of the twenty-seven years of his reign would exhibit a repetition of the same inroads, and his hereditary troops were multiplied in each campaign by the accession of captives and volunteers. Instead of retreating to the hills, he maintained the most useful and defensible posts, fortified the towns and castles which he had first pillaged, and renounced the pastoral life for the baths and palaces of his infant capitals. But it was not till Othman was oppressed by age and infirmities, that he received the welcome news of the conquest of Prusa, which had been surrendered by famine or treachery to the arms of his son Orchan. The glory of Othman is chiefly founded on that of his descendants, but the Turks have transcribed or composed a royal testament of his last counsels of justice and moderation.

From the conquest of Prusa, we may date the true æra of the Ottoman empire. The lives and possessions of the christian subjects were redeemed by a tribute or ransom of thirty thousand crowns of gold, and the city, by the labours of Orchan, assumed the aspect of a Mahometan capital, Prusa was decorated with a mosch, a college, and an hospital, of royal foundation, the Seljukian coin was changed for the name and impression of the new dynasty, and the most skilful professors, of human and divine knowledge, attracted the Persian and Arabian students from the ancient schools of oriental learning. The office of vizir was instituted for Aladin, the brother of Orchan, and a different habit distinguished the citizens from the peasants, the Moslems from the infidels. All the troops of Othman had consisted of loose squadrons of Turkman cavalry, who served without pay and fought without discipline: but a regular body of infantry was first established and trained by the prudence of his son. A great number of volunteers was enrolled with a small stipend, but with the permission of living at home, unless they were summoned to the field: their rude manners, and seditious temper, disposed Orchan to educate his young captives as his soldiers and those of the prophet, but the Turkish peasants were still allowed to mount on horseback, and follow his standard, with the appellation and the hopes of freebooters. By these arts he formed an army of twenty-five thousand Moslems: a train of battering-engines was framed for the use of sieges, and the first successful experiment was made on the cities of Nice and Nicomedia. Orchan granted a safe-conduct to all who were desirous of departing with their families and effects, but the widows of the slain were given in marriage to the conquerors, and the sacrilegious plunder, the hooks, the vases, and the images, were sold or ransomed at Constantinople. The emperor Andronicus the younger was vanquished and wounded by the son of Othman: he subdued the whole province or kingdom of Bithynia, as far as the shores of the Bosphorus and Hellespont, and the christians confessed the justice and clemency of a reign, which claimed the voluntary attachment of the Turks of Asia. Yet Orchan was content with the modest title of emir, and in the

* See Pachymer l. x. c. 25, 26 l. viii. c. 33—36 and concerning the guard of the mountain l. i. c. 3—6 Nicephorus Gregoras, l. vii. c. 1 and the first book of Laonicus Chalcondyles the Athenian.

I am ignorant whether the Turks have any writers older than Mahomet II. nor can I reach beyond a meagre chronicle (Annals Turcici ad Annum 1550) translated by John Gaudier, and published by Leunclavius, (ad calcem Laonic Chalcond p. 311—350) with copious pandects, or commentaries. The history of the Growth and Decay (A. D. 1300—1683) of the Ottoman empire was translated into English from the Latin MS. of Demetrius Cantemir, prince of Moldavia, (London 1734 in folio). The author is guilty of strange blunders in oriental history: but he was conversant with the language the annals and the institutions of the Turks. Cantemir partly draws his materials from the synopsis of Saadi Effendi of Larissa, dedicated in the year 1696 to sultan Mustapha, and a valuable abridgment of the original historian. In one of the Rambles Dr Johnson praises Anonius (a General History of the Turks to the present year London 1693) as the first of histories written only in the choice of his subject. Yet I much doubt whether a partial and verbose compilation from Latin writers: thirteen hundred folio pages of speeches and battles can either instruct or amuse an enlightened age which requires from the historian some structure of philosophy and criticism.

Cantacuzene though he relies the battle and heroic flight of the younger Andronicus (l. ii. c. 6, 7, 8) dissembles by his silence the loss of Prusa Nice and Nicomedia which are fully confessed by Nicephorus Gregoras (l. viii. 15. c. 13. 14. 6). It appears that Nice was taken by Orchan in 1330 and Nicomedia in 1339 which are somewhat different from the Turkish dates.

list of his compeers, the princes of Roum or Anatolia,<sup>a</sup> his military forces were surpassed by the emirs of Gherman and Caramania, each of whom could bring into the field an army of forty thousand men. Their dominions were situate in the heart of the Seljukian kingdom; but the holy warriors, though of inferior note, who formed new principalities on the Greek empire, are more conspicuous in the light of history. The maritime country from the Propontis to the Mæander and the isle of Rhodes, so long threatened and so often pillaged, was finally lost about the thirtieth year of Andronicus the elder.* Two Turkish chieftains, Sarukhan and Aidin, left their names to their conquests, and their conquests to their posterity. The captivity or ruin

Loss of the Asiatic provinces, of the seven churches of Asia was consummated, and the barbarous lords of Ionia and Lydia still trample on the monuments of classic and christian antiquity. In the loss of Ephesus, the christians deplored the fall of the first angel, the extinction of the first candlestick, of the Revelations; the desolation is complete, and the temple of Diana, or the church of Mary, will equally clude the search of the curious traveller. The circus and three stately theatres of Laodicea are now peopled with wolves and foxes; Sardis is reduced to a miserable village, the God of Mahomet, without a rival or a son, is invoked in the mosques of Thyatira and Pergamus, and the populousness of Smyrna is supported by the foreign trade of the Franks and Armenians. Philadelphia alone has been saved by prophecy, or courage. At a distance from the sea, forgotten by the emperors, encompassed on all sides by the Turks, her valiant citizens defended their religion and freedom above fourscore years, and at length capitulated with the proudest of the Ottomans. Among the Greek colonies and churches of Asia, Philadelphia is still erect, a column in a scene of ruins, a pleasing example, that the paths of honour and safety may sometimes be the same. The servitude

The knights of Rhodes,
A D 1310
Aug 15—
A D 1523
Jan 1

of Rhodes was delayed about two centuries by the establishment of the knights of St John of Jerusalem; under the discipline of the order, that island emerged into fame and opulence, the noble and warlike monks were renowned by land and sea, and the bulwark of Christendom provoked, and repelled, the arms of the Turks and Saracens.

The Greeks, by their intestine divisions, were the authors of their final ruin. During the civil wars of the elder and younger Andronicus, the son of Othman achieved, almost without resistance, the conquest of Bithynia, and the same disorders encouraged the Turkish emirs of Lydia and Ionia to build a fleet, and to pillage the adjacent islands and the sea-coast of Europe. In the defence of his life and honour, Cantacuzene was tempted to prevent, or imitate, his adversaries, by calling to his aid the public enemies of his religion and country. Amir, the son of Aidin, concealed under a Turkish garb the humanity and politeness of a Greek, he was united with the great domestic by mutual esteem and reciprocal services, and their friendship is compared, in the vain rhetoric of the times, to the perfect union of Orestes and Pylades.* On the report of the danger of his friend, who was persecuted by an ungrateful court, the prince of Ionia assembled at Smyrna a fleet of three hundred vessels, with an army of twenty-nine thousand men, sailed in the depth of winter, and cast anchor at the mouth of the Hebrus. From thence, with a chosen band of two thousand Turks, he marched along the banks of the river, and rescued the empress, who was besieged in Demotica by the wild Bulgarians. At that disastrous moment, the life or death of his beloved Cantacuzene was concealed by his flight into Servia; but the grateful Irene, impatient to behold her deliverer, invited him to enter the city, and accompanied her message with a present of rich apparel, and a hundred horses. By a peculiar strain of delicacy, the gentle barbarian refused, in the absence of an unfortunate friend, to visit his wife, or to taste the luxuries of the palace, sustained in his tent the rigour of the winter, and rejected the hospitable gift, that he might share the hardships of two thousand companions, all as deserving as himself of that honour and distinction. Necessity and revenge might justify his predatory excursions by sea and land; he left nine thousand five hundred men for the guard of his fleet, and persevered in the fruitless search of Cantacuzene, till his embarkation was hastened by a fictitious letter, the severity of the season, the clamours of his independent troops, and the weight of his spoil and captives. In the prosecution of the civil war, the prince of Ionia twice returned to Europe, joined his arms with those of the emperor, besieged Thessalonica, and threatened Constantinople. Calumny might affix some reproach on his imperfect aid, his hasty departure, and a bribe of ten thousand crowns, which he accepted from the Byzantine court, but his friend was satisfied, and the conduct of Amir is excused by the more sacred duty of defending against the Latins his hereditary dominions. The maritime power of the Turks had united the pope,

<sup>a</sup> The partition of the Turkish emirs is extracted from two contemporaries, the Greek Nicephorus Gregoras (l. vii. c. 1) and the Arabian Marakechi (De Guignes, tom. ii. p. 11. p. 76, 77). See likewise the first book of Laonicus Chalcondyles.

<sup>x</sup> Pachymer, l. xiii. c. 13.

<sup>y</sup> See the Travels of Wheeler and Spon, of Pococke and Chandler, and more particularly Smith's Survey of the Seven churches of Asia, p. 205—276. The more pious antiquaries labour to reconcile the promises and threats of the author of the Revelations with the present state of the seven cities. Perhaps it would be more prudent to confine his predictions to the characters and events of his own times.

<sup>z</sup> Consult the fourth book of the Histoire de l'Ordre de Malthe par l'Abbé de Vertot. That pleasing writer betrays his ignorance, in supposing, that Othman, a freebooter of the Bithynian hills, could besiege Rhodes by sea and land.

<sup>a</sup> Nicephorus Gregoras has expatiated with pleasure on this amiable character, (l. xii. c. 7. xiii. c. 4. xiv. c. 1. 9. xvi. c. 6.) Cantacuzene speaks with honour and esteem of his ally, (l. iii. c. 56, 57, 63, 64, 66—68, 80, 89, 95, 96.) but he seems ignorant of his own sentimental passion for the Turk, and indirectly denies the possibility of such unnatural friendship, (l. iv. c. 40.)

the king of Cyprus, the republic of Venice, and the order of St John, in a laudable crusade, their galleys invaded the coast of Ionia, and Amir was slain with an arrow, in the attempt to wrest from the Rhodian knights the citadel of Smyrna.<sup>b</sup> Before his death, he generously recommended another ally of his own nation, not more sincere or zealous than himself, but more able to afford a prompt and powerful succour, by his situation along the Propontis and in the front of Constantinople. By the

Marrage of Or chau with a Greek princess,
A D 1346

prospect of a more advantageous treaty, the Turkish prince of Bithynia was detached from his engagements with Anne of Savoy, and the pride of Orchan dictated the most solemn protestations, that if he could obtain the daughter of Cantacuzene, he would invariably fulfil the duties of a subject and a son. Parental tenderness was silenced by the voice of ambition, the Greek clergy connived at the marriage of a christian princess with a sectary of Mahomet, and the father of Theodora describes, with shameful satisfaction, the dishonour of the purple.<sup>c</sup> A body of Turkish cavalry attended the ambassadors, who disembarked from thirty vessels before his camp of Selybria. A stately pavilion was erected, in which the empress Irene passed the night with her daughters. In the morning, Theodora ascended a throne, which was surrounded with curtains of silk and gold, the troops were under arms, but the emperor alone was on horseback. At a signal the curtains were suddenly withdrawn, to disclose the bride, or the victim, encircled by kneeling eunuchs and hymenæal torches: the sound of flutes and trumpets proclaimed the joyful event, and her pretended happiness was the theme of the nuptial song, which was chanted by such poets as the age could produce. Without the rites of the church, Theodora was delivered to her barbarous lord, but it had been stipulated, that she should preserve her religion in the haram of Bursa, and her father celebrates her charity and devotion in this ambiguous situation. After his peaceful establishment on the throne of Constantinople, the Greek emperor visited his Turkish ally, who, with four sons, by various wives, expected him at Scutari, on the Asiatic shore. The two princes partook, with seeming cordiality, of the pleasures of the banquet and the chase, and Theodora was permitted to repass the Bosphorus, and to enjoy some days in the society of her mother. But the friendship of Orchan was subservient to his religion and interest, and in the Genoese war he joined without a blush the enemies of Cantacuzene.

Establishment of the Ottomans in Europe
A D 1353

In the treaty with the empress Anne, the Ottoman prince had inserted a singular condition, that it should be lawful for him to sell his prisoners at Constantinople, or transport them into Asia. A naked crowd of christians of both sexes and every age, of priests and monks, of matrons and virgins, was exposed in the public market, the whip was frequently used to quicken the charity of redemption, and the indigent Greeks deplored the fate of their brethren, who were led away to the worst evils of temporal and spiritual bondage.<sup>d</sup> Cantacuzene was reduced to subscribe the same terms, and their execution must have been still more pernicious to the empire: a body of ten thousand Turks had been detached to the assistance of the empress Anne, but the entire forces of Orchan were exerted in the service of his father. Yet these calamities were of a transient nature, as soon as the storm had passed away, the fugitives might return to their habitations, and at the conclusion of the civil and foreign wars, Europe was completely evacuated by the Moslems of Asia. It was in his last quarrel with his pupil that Cantacuzene inflicted the deep and deadly wound, which could never be healed by his successors, and which is poorly expiated by his theological dialogues against the prophet Mahomet. Ignorant of their own history, the modern Turks confound their first and their final passage of the Hellespont,<sup>e</sup> and describe the son of Orchan as a nocturnal robber, who, with eighty companions, explores by stratagem a hostile and unknown shore. Soliman, at the head of ten thousand horse, was transported in the vessels, and entertained as the friend, of the Greek emperor.<sup>f</sup> In the civil wars of Romania, he performed some service and perpetrated more mischief, but the Chersonesus was insensibly filled with a Turkish colony, and the Byzantine court solicited in vain the restitution of the fortresses of Thrace. After some artful delays between the Ottoman prince and his son, their ransom was valued at sixty thousand crowns, and the first payment had been made, when an earthquake shook the walls and cities of the provinces, the dismantled places were occupied by the Turks, and Gallipoli, the key of the Hellespont, was rebuilt and repopled by the policy of Soliman. The abdication of Cantacuzene dissolved the feeble bands of domestic alliance, and his last advice admonished his countrymen to decline a rash contest, and to compare their own weakness with the numbers and valour, the discipline and enthusiasm, of the Moslems. His prudent counsels were despised by the headstrong vanity of youth, and soon justified by the victories of the Ottomans. But as he practised in the field the exercise of the jerid, Soliman was killed by a Death of Orchan and his son Soli-

man fall from his horse, and the aged Orchan wept and expired on the tomb of his valiant son afterwards celebrates his kingdom and armies. See his reign in Cantemir, p. 24—30.

<sup>d</sup> The most lively and concise picture of this captivity may be found in the history of Ducas (c. 8.) who fairly describes what Cantacuzene confesses with a guilty blush.

<sup>e</sup> In this passage and the first conquests in Europe, Cantemir (p. 27, &c.) gives a miserable idea of his Turkish guides: nor am I much better satisfied with Chalcondyles, (l. i. p. 12, &c.) They forget to consult

<sup>b</sup> After the conquest of Smyrna by the Latins the defence of this fortress was imposed by pope Gregory XI on the knights of Rhodes, (see Vertot l. v.)

<sup>c</sup> See Cantacuzene (l. iii. c. 95.) Nicephorus Gregoras, who for the light of mount Thabor brands the emperor with the names of tyrant and Herod excuses, rather than blames this Turkish marriage and alliance the passion and power of Orchan. εγγι ταντος, και τη δυναμει τους κατ αυτον ηδη Περσικους (Turkish) περαινω Σατραπας, (l. xi. 5.) He

The reign and European conquests of Amu-rath I
A D 1360—1389
Sept

But the Greeks had not time to rejoice in the death of their enemies, and the Turkish scymitar was wielded with the same spirit by Amurath the first, the son of Orchan, and the brother of Soliman. By the pale and fainting light of the Byzantine annals,<sup>f</sup> we can discern, that he subdued without resistance the whole province of Romania or Thrace, from the Hellespont to mount Hæmns, and the verge of the capital, and that Adrianople was chosen for the royal seat of his government and religion in Europe. Constantinople, whose decline is almost coeval with her foundation, had often, in the lapse of a thousand years, been assaulted by the barbarians of the east and west, but never till this fatal hour had the Greeks been surrounded, both in Asia and Europe, by the arms of the same hostile monarchy. Yet the prudence or generosity of Amurath postponed for a while this easy conquest, and his pride was satisfied with the frequent and humble attendance of the emperor John Palæologus and his four sons, who followed at his summons the court and camp of the Ottoman prince. He marched against the Slavonian nations between the Danube and the Adriatic, the Bulgarians, Servians, Bosnians, and Albanians, and these warlike tribes, who had so often insulted the majesty of the empire, were repeatedly broken by his destructive inroads. Their countries did not abound either in gold or silver, nor were their rustic hamlets and townships enriched by commerce, or decorated by the arts of luxury. But the natives of the soil have been distinguished in every age by their hardness of mind and body, and they were converted by a prudent institution into the firmest and most faithful supporters of the Ottoman greatness. The vizir of Amurath reminded his sovereign that, according to the Mahometan law, he was entitled to a fifth part of the spoil and captives, and that the duty might easily be levied, if vigilant officers were stationed at Gallipoli, to watch the passage, and to select for his use the stoutest and most beautiful of the christian youth. The advice was followed, the edict was proclaimed, many thousands of the European captives were educated in religion and arms, and the new militia was consecrated and named by a celebrated dervish. Standing in the front of their ranks, he stretched the sleeve of his gown over the head of the foremost soldier, and his blessing was delivered in these words: "Let them be called Janizaries, (yengi cheri, or new soldiers,) may their countenance be ever bright! their hand victorious! their sword keen! may their spear always hang over the heads of their enemies!"

The Janizaries.

the most authentic record, the fourth book of Cantacuzene. I likewise regret the last books, which are still manuscript of Nicephorus Gregoras.

<sup>f</sup> After the conclusion of Cantacuzene and Gregoras, there follows a dark interval of a hundred years. George Philoxa Michael Ducas, and Laoniceus Chalcondyles, all three wrote after the taking of Constantinople.

<sup>g</sup> See Cantemir, p. 37—41 with his own large and curious annotations.

<sup>h</sup> White and black face are common and proverbial expressions of praise and reproach in the Turkish language. Hic niger est, hunc tu Romane caveto, was likewise a Latin sentence.

and wheresoever they go, may they return with a white face!"<sup>h</sup> Such was the origin of these haughty troops, the terror of the nations, and sometimes of the sultans themselves. Their valour has declined, their discipline is relaxed, and their tumultuary array is incapable of contending with the order and weapons of modern tactics, but at the time of their institution, they possessed a decisive superiority in war, since a regular body of infantry, in constant exercise and pay, was not maintained by any of the princes of Christendom. The janizaries fought with the zeal of proselytes against their idolatrous countrymen, and in the battle of Cossova, the league and independence of the Slavonian tribes was finally crushed. As the conqueror walked over the field, he observed that the greatest part of the slain consisted of beardless youths, and listened to the flattering reply of his vizir, that age and wisdom would have taught them not to oppose his irresistible arms. But the sword of his janizaries could not defend him from the dagger of despair: a Servian soldier started from the crowd of dead bodies, and Amurath was pierced in the belly with a mortal wound. The grandson of Othman was mild in his temper, modest in his apparel, and a lover of learning and virtue: but the Moslems were scandalized at his absence from public worship, and he was corrected by the firmness of the mufti, who dared to reject his testimony in a civil cause: a mixture of servitude and freedom not unfrequent in oriental history.

The character of Bajazet, the son and successor of Amurath, is strongly expressed in his surname of Ilderim,<sup>A D 1389—1403</sup> or the lightning, and he might glory in an epithet, which was drawn from the fiery energy of his soul and the rapidity of his destructive march. In the fourteen years of his reign,<sup>k</sup> he incessantly moved at the head of his armies, from Bursa to Adrianople, from the Danube to the Euphrates, and, though he strenuously laboured for the propagation of the law, he invaded, with impartial ambition, the christian and Mahometan princes of Europe and Asia. From Angora to Amasia and Erzeroum, the northern regions of Anatolia were reduced to his obedience: he stripped of their hereditary possessions, his brother emirs of Gherman and Caramania, of Aidin and Sarukhan, and after the conquest of Iconium the ancient kingdom of the Seljinkians again revived in the Ottoman dynasty. Nor were the conquests of Bajazet less rapid or important in Europe. No sooner had he imposed a regular form of servitude on the Servians and Bulgarians, than he passed the Danube to seek <sup>i</sup> See the life and death of Morid, or Amurath I in Cantemir (p. 33—45) the first book of Chalcondyles, and the Annales Turcici of Leunclavius. According to another story, the sultan was stabbed by a Croat in his tent: and this accident was alleged to Busbequius (Epist. i. p. 98) as an excuse for the unworthy precipitation of poisoning, as it were between two allendants, an ambassador's arms, when he is introduced to the royal presence.

<sup>k</sup> The reign of Bajazet I or Ilderim Bayazid, is contained in Cantemir, (p. 46) the second book of Chalcondyles and the Annales Turcici. The surname of Ilderim, or lightning, is an example, that the conquerors and poets of every age have felt the truth of a system which derives the sublime from the principle of terror.

new enemies and new subjects in the heart of Moldavia<sup>1</sup> Whatever yet adhered to the Greek empire in Thrace, Macedonia, and Thessaly, acknowledged a Turkish master an obsequious bishop led him through the gates of Thermopylae into Greece and we may observe, as a singular fact, that the widow of a Spanish chief, who possessed the ancient seat of the oracle of Delphi, deserved his favour by the sacrifice of a beautiful daughter The Turkish communication between Europe and Asia had been dangerous and doubtful, till he stationed at Gallipoli a fleet of galleys, to command the Hellespont and intercept the Latin succours of Constantinople While the monarch indulged his passions in a boundless range of injustice and cruelty, he imposed on his soldiers the most rigid laws of modesty and abstinence, and the harvest was peaceably reaped and sold within the precincts of his camp Provoked by the loose and corrupt administration of justice, he collected in a house the judges and lawyers of his dominions, who expected that in a few moments the fire would be kindled to reduce them to ashes His ministers trembled in silence but an Æthiopian buffoon presumed to insinuate the true cause of the evil, and future venality was left without excuse, by annexing an adequate salary to the office of cadhi<sup>m</sup> The humble title of emir was no longer suitable to the Ottoman greatness, and Bajazet condescended to accept a patent of sultan from the caliphs who served in Egypt under the yoke of the Mamalukes<sup>a</sup> a last and frivolous homage that was yielded by force to opinion, by the Turkish conquerors to the house of Abbas and the successors of the Arabian prophet The ambition of the sultan was inflamed by the obligation of deserving this august title and he turned his arms against the kingdom of Hungary, the perpetual theatre of the Turkish victories and defeats Sigismund, the Hungarian king, was the son and brother of the emperors of the west his cause was that of Europe and the church and, on the report of his danger, the bravest knights of France and Germany were eager to march under his standard and that of river and the Black sea, returned after a long circuit to his exhausted kingdom<sup>o</sup> In the pride of victory Bajazet threatened that he would besiege Buda, that he would subdue the adjacent countries of Germany and Italy, and that he would feed his horse with a bushel of oats on the altar of St Peter at Rome His progress was checked, not by the miraculous interposition of the apostle, not by a crusade of the christian powers, but by a long and painful fit of the gout The disorders of the moral, are sometimes corrected by those of the physical, world, and an acrimonious humour falling on a single fibre of one man, may prevent or suspend the misery of nations

Such is the general idea of the Hungarian war, but the disastrous adventure of the French has procured us some memorials which illustrate the victory and character of Bajazet<sup>p</sup> The duke of Burgundy, sovereign of Flanders, and uncle of Charles the sixth, yielded to the ardour of his son, John count of Nevers, and the fearless youth was accompanied by four princes, his cousins, and those of the French monarch Their inexperience was guided by the sire de Coucy, one of the best and oldest captains of Christendom,<sup>q</sup> but the constable, admiral, and marshal, of France<sup>r</sup> commanded an army which did not exceed the number of a thousand knights and squires These splendid names were the source of presumption and the bane of discipline So many might aspire to command, that none were willing to obey their national spirit despised both their enemies and their allies, and in the persuasion that Bajazet would fly, or must fall, they began to compute how soon they should visit Constantinople and deliver the holy sepulchre When their scouts announced the approach of the Turks, the gay and thoughtless youths were at table, already heated with wine, they instantly clasped their armour, mounted their horses, rode full speed to the vanguard, and resented as an affront the advice of Sigismund, which would have deprived them of the right and honour of the foremost attack The battle of Nicopolis would not have been lost, if the French would have obeyed the prudence of the Hungarians but it might have been gloriously won, had the Hungarians imitated the valour of the French They dispersed the first line, consisting of the troops of Asia, forced a rampart of stakes, which had been planted against were always derived from such books as the chronicle of honest Frois-sard (vol iv c 67 69 72 74 79—83 85 87 89) who read little inquired much, and believed all The original Memoires of the Mare-chal de Boucault (partie i c 22—28) add some facts, but they are dry and deficient, if compared with the pleasant garrulity of Froissard q An accurate Memoir on the Life of Enguerrand VII sire de Coucy has been given by the Baron de Zurlauben (Hist de l'Academie des Inscriptions tom xxv) His rank and possessions were equally considerable in France and England and, in 1375 he led an army of adventurers into Switzerland, to recover a large patrimony which he claimed in right of his grandmother, the daughter of the emperor Albert I of Austria (Sinier, Voyage dans la Suisse Occidentale, tom i p 118—124)

r That military office so respectable at present, was still more conspicuous when it was divided between two persons (Daniel, Hist de la Milice Frangoise tom ii p 5) One of these the marshal of the crusade was the famous Boucault who afterwards defected Constantinople, governed Genoa, invaded the coast of Asia, and died in the field of Azincour

Battle of Nicopolis
A D 1396
Sept 28

the cross In the battle of Nicopolis, Bajazet defeated a confederate army of a hundred thousand christians, who I had proudly boasted, that if the sky should fall, they could uphold it on their lances The far greater part were slain or driven into the Danube, and Sigismund, escaping to Constantinople by the

<sup>1</sup> Cantemir who celebrates the victories of the great Stephen over the Turks (p 47) had composed the ancient and modern state of his principality of Moldavia which has been long promised, and is still unpublished

<sup>a</sup> Leucoclav Aniri Turci p 318 319 The venality of the cadhis has long been an object of scandal and satire and if we distrust the observations of our travellers we may consult the feeling of the Turks themselves (D Herbelot, Bibliot Orientale, p 216, 217 229 230)

<sup>o</sup> The fact which is attested by the Arabic history of Ben Selounah
a contemporary Syrian, (De Gennes Hist des Huns, tom ii p 376.)
destroys the testimony of Saad Efendi and Cantemir, (p 14, 15) of the election of Othman to the dignity of sultan

<sup>p</sup> See the Decades Rerum Hungaricarum (Dec iii l i p 370) of Lodovico an Italian, who in the fifteenth century was invited into Hungary to compose an eloquent history of that kingdom Yet, if it be extant and accessible I should give the preference to some homely chronicle of the time and country

<sup>q</sup> I should not complain of the labour of this work, if my materials

the cavalry, broke, after a bloody conflict, the janizaries themselves, and were at length overwhelmed by the numerous squadrons that issued from the woods, and charged on all sides this handful of intrepid warriors. In the speed and secrecy of his march, in the order and evolutions of the battle, his enemies felt and admired the military talents of Bajazet. They accuse his cruelty in the use of victory. After reserving the count of Nevers, and four and twenty lords, whose birth and riches were attested by his Latin interpreters, the remainder of the French captives, who had survived the slaughter of the day, were led before his throne, and, as they refused to abjure their faith, were successively beheaded in his presence. The sultan was exasperated by the loss of his bravest janizaries, and if it be true, that, on the eve of the engagement, the French had massacred their Turkish prisoners,* they might impute to themselves the consequences of a just retaliation. A knight, whose life had been spared, was permitted to return to Paris, that he might relate the deplorable tale, and solicit the ransom of the noble captives. In the mean while, the count of Nevers, with the princes and barons of France, were dragged along in the marches of the Turkish camp, exposed as a grateful trophy to the Moslems of Europe and Asia, and strictly confined at Bursa, as often as Bajazet resided in his capital. The sultan was pressed each day to expiate with their blood the blood of his martyrs, but he had pronounced, that they should live, and either for mercy or destruction his word was irrevocable. He was assured of their value and importance by the return of the messenger, and the gifts and intercessions of the kings of France and of Cyprus. Lusignan presented him with a gold salt-cellar of curious workmanship, and of the price of ten thousand ducats, and Charles the sixth despatched by the way of Hungary a cast of Norwegian hawks, and six horse-loads of scarlet cloth, of fine linen of Rheims, and of Arras tapestry, representing the battles of the great Alexander. After much delay, the effect of distance rather than of art, Bajazet agreed to accept a ransom of two hundred thousand ducats for the count of Nevers and the surviving princes and barons. The marshal Boucicault, a famous warrior, was of the number of the fortunatè, but the admiral of France had been slain in the battle, and the constable, with the sire de Coucy, died in the prison of Bursa. This heavy demand, which was doubled by incidental costs, fell chiefly on the duke of Burgundy, or rather on his Flemish subjects, who were bound by the feudal laws to contribute for the knighthood and captivity of the eldest son of their lord. For the faithful discharge of the debt, some merchants of Genoa gave security to the amount of five times the sum, a lesson to those warlike times, that commerce and credit are the links of the society of nations. It had been stipulated in the treaty, that the French captives should swear never to bear arms against the person of their conqueror, but the ungenerous restraint was abolished by Bajazet himself. "I despise," said he to the heir of Burgundy, "thy oaths and thy arms. Thou art young, and mayst be ambitious of effacing the disgrace or misfortune of thy first chivalry. Assemble thy powers, proclaim thy design, and be assured that Bajazet will rejoice to meet thee a second time in the field of battle." Before their departure, they were indulged in the freedom and hospitality of the court of Bursa. The French princes admired the magnificence of the Ottoman, whose hunting and hawking equipage was composed of seven thousand huntsmen and seven thousand falconers.<sup>1</sup> In their presence, and at his command, the belly of one of his chamberlains was cut open, on a complaint against him for drinking the goat's milk of a poor woman. The strangers were astonished by this act of justice, but it was the justice of a sultan who disdains to balance the weight of evidence, or to measure the degrees of guilt.

After his enfranchisement from an oppressive guardian, John Palæologus remained thirty-six years the helpless, and, as it should seem, the careless, spectator of the public ruin.<sup>2</sup> Love, or rather lust, was his only vigorous passion, and in the embraces of the wives or virgins of the city, the Turkish slave forgot the dishonour of the emperor of the Romans. Andronicus, his eldest son, had formed, at Adrianople, an intimate and guilty friendship with Sauzes, the son of Amurath, and the two youths conspired against the authority and lives of their parents. The presence of Amurath in Europe soon discovered and dissipated their rash counsels, and, after depriving Sauzes of his sight, the Ottoman threatened his vassal with the treatment of an accomplice and an enemy, unless he inflicted a similar punishment on his own son. Palæologus trembled and obeyed, and a cruel precaution involved in the same sentence the childhood and innocence of John the son of the criminal. But the operation was so mildly, or so unskilfully, performed, that the one retained the sight of an eye, and the other was afflicted only with the infirmity of squinting. Thus excluded from the succession, the two princes were con-

The emperor
John Palæolo-gus,
A. D. 1355 Jan
8—A. D. 1391

Discord of the Greeks

lions, (idem, l. vi. c. 15.) Bajazet was particularly fond of flying his hawks at cranes (Chalcondyles, l. ii. p. 35.)

<sup>1</sup> For the reigns of John Palæologus and his son Manuel, from 1354 to 1402 see Duclos, c. 9—15. Phranza, l. i. c. 16—21 and the first and second books of Chalcondyles, whose proper subject is drowned in a sea of episode.

* For this odious fact, the Abbé de Vertot quotes the Hist. Anonyme de St. Denis l. xvi. c. 10, 11 (Ordre de Malthe, tom. ii. p. 310.)

<sup>1</sup> Sherefeddin Ali (Hist. de Timur Bec, l. i. c. 13) allows Bajazet a round number of 12,000 officers and servants of the chase. A part of his spoils was afterwards displayed in a hunting match of Timur l. hounds with satin housings, 2. leopards with collars set with jewels, 3. Grecian greyhounds, and 4. dogs from Europe, as strong as African

whence the two prisoners were exalted to the throne. Another period of two years afforded Palæologus and Manuel the means of escape. It was contrived by the magic, or subtilty, of a monk, who was alternately named the angel or the devil. They fled to Scutari, their adherents armed in their cause, and the two Byzantine factions displayed the ambition and animosity with which Cæsar and Pompey had disputed the empire of the world. The Roman world was now contracted to a corner of Thrace, between the Propontis and the Black sea, about fifty miles in length and thirty in breadth, a space of ground not more extensive than the lesser principalities of Germany or Italy, if the remains of Constantinople had not still represented the wealth and populousness of a kingdom. To restore the public peace, it was found necessary to divide this fragment of the empire, and while Palæologus and Manuel were left in possession of the capital, almost all that lay without the walls was ceded to the blind princes, who fixed their residence at Rhodosto and Selybria. In the tranquil slumber of royalty, the passions of John Palæologus survived his reason and his strength, he deprived his favourite and heir of a blooming princess of Trebizond, and while the feeble emperor laboured to consummate his nuptials, Manuel, with a hundred of the noblest Greeks, was sent on a peremptory summons to the Ottoman porte. They served with honour in the wars of Bajazet, but a plan of fortifying Constantinople excited his jealousy. He threatened their lives, the new works were instantly demolished; and we shall bestow a praise, perhaps above the merit of Palæologus, if we impute this last humiliation as the cause of his death.

The emperor Manuel A. D. 1391-1425 July 25 The earliest intelligence of that event was communicated to Manuel, who escaped with speed and secrecy from the palace of Bursa to the Byzantine throne. Bajazet affected a proud indifference at the loss of this valuable pledge, and while he pursued his conquests in Europe and Asia, he left the emperor to struggle with his blind cousin John of Selybria, who, in eight years of civil war, asserted his right of primogeniture. At length the ambition of the victorious Sultan pointed to the conquest of Constantinople, but he listened to the advice of his vizir, who represented, that such an enterprise might unite the powers of Christendom in a second and more formidable crusade. His epistle to the emperor was conceived in these words.

Distress of Constantinople A. D. 1395-1402 "By the divine clemency, our invincible scymitar has reduced to our obedience almost all Asia, with many and large countries in Europe, excepting only the city of Constantinople, for beyond the walls thou hast nothing left. Resign that city, stipulate thy reward, or tremble, for thyself and thy unhappy people, at the consequences of a rash refusal." But his ambassadors were instructed to soften their tone, and to propose a treaty, which was subscribed with submission and gratitude. A truce of ten years was purchased by an annual tribute of thirty thousand crowns of gold. The Greeks deplored the public toleration of the law of Mahomet, and Bajazet enjoyed the glory of establishing a Turkish cadhi, and founding a royal mosch in the metropolis of the eastern church*. Yet this truce was soon violated by the restless sultan in the cause of the prince of Selybria, the lawful emperor, an army of Ottomans again threatened Constantinople, and the distress of Manuel implored the protection of the king of France. His plaintive embassy obtained much pity and some relief, and the conduct of the succour was intrusted to the marshal Boucicault, whose religious chivalry was inflamed by the desire of revenging his captivity on the infidels. He sailed with four ships of war, from Aiguesmortes to the Hellespont, forced the passage, which was guarded by seventeen Turkish galleys, landed at Constantinople a supply of six hundred men at arms and sixteen hundred archers, and reviewed them in the adjacent plain, without condescending to number or array the multitude of Greeks. By his presence, the blockade was raised both by sea and land, the flying squadrons of Bajazet were driven to a more respectful distance, and several castles in Europe and Asia were stormed by the emperor and the marshal, who fought with equal valour by each other's side. But the Ottomans soon returned with an increase of numbers, and the intrepid Boucicault, after a year's struggle, resolved to evacuate a country, which could no longer afford either pay or provisions for his soldiers. The marshal offered to conduct Manuel to the French court, where he might solicit in person a supply of men and money, and advised in the mean while, that, to extinguish all domestic discord, he should leave his blind competitor on the throne. The proposal was embraced: the prince of Selybria was introduced to the capital, and such was the public misery, that the lot of the exile seemed more fortunate than that of the sovereign. Instead of applauding the success of his vassal, the Turkish sultan claimed the city as his own, and on the refusal of the emperor John, Constantinople was more closely pressed by the calamities of war and famine. Against such an enemy, prayers and resistance were alike unavailing, and the savage would have devoured his prey, if, in the fatal moment, he had not been overthrown by another savage stronger than himself. By the victory of Timour or Tamerlane, the fall of Constantinople was delayed about fifty years, and this important, though accidental, service may justly introduce the life and character of the Mogul conqueror.

* Canlemir, p. 50-53. Of the Greeks, Ducis alone (c. 13. 15.) acknowledges the Turkish cadhi at Constantinople. Yet even Ducis dissembles the mosch.

† Mémoires du bon Messire Jean le Mangre, dit Boucicault, Maréchal de France, partie i. c. 30, 35.

CHAP. LXV

Elevation of Timour or Tamerlane to the throne of Samarcand—His conquests in Persia, Georgia, Tartary, Russia, India, Syria, and Anatolia—His Turkish war—Defeat and captivity of Bajazet—Death of Timour—Civil war of the sons of Bajazet—Restoration of the Turkish monarchy by Mahomet the first—Siege of Constantinople by Amurath the second.

HISTORIES OF TIMOUR, or Tamerlane

THE conquest and monarchy of the world was the first object of the ambition of TIMOUR To live in the memory and esteem of future ages, was the second wish of his magnanimous spirit All the civil and military transactions of his reign were diligently recorded in the journals of his secretaries<sup>a</sup> the authentic narrative was revised by the persons best informed of each particular transaction, and it is believed in the empire and family of Timour, that the monarch himself composed the commentaries<sup>b</sup> of his life, and the institutions<sup>c</sup> of his government<sup>d</sup> But these cares were ineffectual for the preservation of his fame, and these precious memorials in the Mogul or Persian language were concealed from the world, or, at least, from the knowledge of Europe The nations which he vanquished exercised a base and impotent revenge, and ignorance has long repeated the tale of calumny,<sup>e</sup> which had disfigured the birth and character, the person, and even the name, of Tamerlane<sup>f</sup> Yet his real merit would be enhanced, rather than debased, by the elevation of a peasant to the throne of Asia, nor can his lameness be a theme of reproach, unless he had the weakness to blush at a natural, or perhaps an honourable, infirmity

In the eyes of the Moguls, who held the indefeasible succession of the house of Zingis, he was doubtless a rebel subject, yet he sprang from the

<sup>a</sup> These journals were communicated to Sherefeddin, or Cherefeddin Ali, a native of Yezid, who composed in the Persian language a history of Timour Beg, which has been translated into French by M. Peiris de la Croix, (Paris, 1722. in 4 vols. 12mo,) and has always been my faithful guide His geography and chronology are wonderfully accurate, and he may be trusted for public facts though he severely praises the virtue and fortune of the hero Timour's attention to procure intelligence from his own and foreign countries, may be seen in the Institutions p. 215 217 340 351

<sup>b</sup> These Commentaries are yet unknown in Europe but Mr White gives some hope that they may be imported and translated by his friend Major Davy, who had read in the east this "minute and faithful narrative of an interesting and eventful period"

<sup>c</sup> I am ignorant whether the original institution, in the Turkish or Mogul language, be still extant The Persian version, with an English translation, and a most valuable index, was published (Oxford, 1789. in 4to,) by the joint labours of Major Davy and Mr White the Arabic professor This work has been translated from the Persian into French (Paris, 1787) by Mr Langles, a learned orientalist, who has added the life of Timour, and many curious notes

<sup>d</sup> Shih Allum, the present Mogul, reads, values, but cannot imitate, the institutions of his great ancestor The English translator relies on their internal evidence, but if any suspicion should arise of fraud and fiction they will not be dispelled by Major Davy's letter The orientals have never cultivated the art of criticism, the patronage of a prince, less honourable perhaps, is not less lucrative than that of a book seller, nor can it be deemed incredible that a Persian, the real author, should renounce the credit, to raise the value and price, of the work

<sup>e</sup> The original of the tale is found in the following work which is much esteemed for its finish elegance of style Ahmedis Arabiadæ (Almud Ebu Arabiadæ) Vita et Iterum gestarum Timuri Arabice et Latine Editit Samuel Henricus Manger Francogæ, 1767 2 tom in 4to This Syrian author is ever a malicious, and often in ignorant, enemy the very titles of his chapters are injurious, as how the wicked, as how the impious, as how the viper, &c The copious

noble tribe of Berlass. his fifth ancestor, Carashar Nevian, had been the vizir of Zagatai, in his new realm of Transoxiana, and in the ascent of some generations, the branch of Timour is confounded, at least by the females,<sup>g</sup> with the imperial stem<sup>h</sup> He was born forty miles to the south of Samarcand, in the village of Sebzar, in the fruitful territory of Cash, of which his fathers were the hereditary chiefs, as well as of a toman of ten thousand horse.<sup>i</sup> His birth<sup>k</sup> was cast on one of those periods of anarchy which announce the fall of the Asiatic dynasties, and open a new field to adventurous ambition The khans of Zagatai were extinct, the emirs aspired to independence, and their domestic feuds could only be suspended by the conquest and tyranny of the khans of Kashgar, who, with an army of Getes or Calmucks,<sup>l</sup> invaded the Transoxian kingdom From the twelfth year of his age, Timour had entered the field of action, in the twenty-fifth, he stood forth as the deliverer of his country, and the eyes and wishes of the people were turned towards a hero who suffered in their cause The chiefs of the law and of the army had pledged their salvation to support him with their lives and fortunes, but in the hour of danger they were silent and afraid, and, after waiting seven days on the hills of Samarcand, he retreated to the desert with only sixty horsemen The fugitives were overtaken by a thousand Getes, whom he repulsed with incredible slaughter, and his enemies were forced to exclaim, "Timour is a wonderful man fortune and the divine favour are with him" But in this bloody action his own followers were reduced to ten, a number which was soon diminished by the desertion of three Carizmians. He wandered in the desert with his wife, seven companions, and four horses, and sixty-two days was he plunged in a loathsome dungeon, from whence he escaped by his own courage, and the remorse of the oppressor After swimming the broad and rapid article of TIMOUR, in Bibliothèque Orientale, is of a mixed nature, as D Herbelot indifferently draws his materials (p. 877—888) from Khondemir, Ebn Schounah, and the Iebtirikh

<sup>f</sup> Demir or Timur signifies, in the Turkish language, Iron, and Beg is the appellation of a lord or prince By the change of a letter or accent, it is changed into Lene or Lame and a European corruption confounds the two words in the name of Tamerlane

<sup>g</sup> After relating some false and foolish tales of Timour Lene, Arab-shah is compelled to speak truth, and to own him for a kinsman of Zingis, per mulieres (as he peevishly adds) laqueus Sitanæ, (pars i c. 1 p. 25) The testimony of Abulghazi Khan (p. 11 c. 5 p. v c. 4) is unquestionable and decisive

<sup>h</sup> According to one of the pedigrees, the fourth ancestor of Zingis, and the ninth of Timour were brothers and they agreed, that the posterity of the elder should succeed to the dignity of klan, and that the descendants of the younger should fill the office of their minister and general This tradition was at least convenient to justify the first steps of Timour's ambition (Institutions, p. 24, 25 from the MS fragments of Timour's History)

<sup>i</sup> See the preface of Sherefeddin, and Abulfeda's Geography (Chorasmia, &c. Description, p. 60, 61) in the third volume of Hudson's Moor Greek Geographers

<sup>k</sup> See his nativity in Dr Hyde (Synagmæ Dissertat tom ii p. 466) as it was cast by the astrologers of his grandson Ulugh Beg He was born, A D 1336 April 9 11<sup>o</sup> 57 P M 11 36 I know not whether they can prove the great conjunction of the planets from whence like other conquerors and prophets, Timour derived the surname of Salieb Kerni, or master of the conjunctions (Biblioth Orient p. 878)

<sup>l</sup> In the Institutions of Timour, these subjects of the khan of Kashgar are most improperly styled Onzbeys, or Uzbecks, a name which belongs to another branch and enemy of Turlars (Abulghazi, p. v c. 5 p. vi c. 5) Could I be sure that this word is in the Turkish original I would boldly pronounce, that the Institutions were framed a century after the death of Timour, since the establishment of the Uzbecks in Transoxiana

stream of the Jihoon, or Oxus, he led, during some months, the life of a vagrant and outlaw, on the borders of the adjacent states. But his fame shone brighter in adversity, he learned to distinguish the friends of his person, the associates of his fortune, and to apply the various characters of men for their advantage, and above all, for his own. On his return to his native country, Timour was successively joined by the parties of his confederates, who anxiously sought him in the desert, nor can I refuse to describe, in his pathetic simplicity, one of their fortunate encounters. He presented himself as a guide to three chiefs, who were at the head of seventy horse. "When their eyes fell upon me," says Timour, "they were overwhelmed with joy, and they alighted from their horses, and they came and kneeled, and they kissed my stirrup. I also came down from my horse, and took each of them in my arms. And I put my turban on the head of the first chief, and my girdle, rich in jewels and wrought with gold, I bound on the loins of the second, and the third, I clothed in my own coat. And they wept, and I wept also, and the hour of prayer was arrived, and we prayed. And we mounted our horses, and came to my dwelling, and I collected my people, and made a feast." His trusty bands were soon increased by the bravest of the tribes, he led them against a superior foe, and, after some vicissitudes of war, the Gètes were finally driven from the kingdom of Transoxiana. He had done much for his own glory, but much remained to be done, much art to be exerted, and some blood to be spilt, before he could teach his equals to obey him as their master. The birth and power of emir Houssein compelled him to accept a vicious and unworthy colleague, whose sister was the best beloved of his wives. Their union was short and jealous, but the policy of Timour, in their frequent quarrels, exposed his rival to the reproach of injustice and perfidy, and, after a final defeat, Houssein was slain by some sagacious friends, who presumed for the last time, to disobey the commands of their lord. At the age of thirty-four,<sup>m</sup> and in a general diet or

He ascends the throne of Zagatal
A D 1370
April

couroultai, he was invested with imperial command, but he affected to retain the house of Zingis, and while the emir Timour reigned over Zagatal and the east, a nominal khan served as a private officer in the armies of his servant. A fertile kingdom, five hundred miles in length and breadth, might have satisfied the ambition of a subject, but Timour aspired to the dominion of the world, and before his death, the crown of Zagatal was one of the twenty-seven crowns which he had placed on his head. Without expatiating on the victories of thirty-five campaigns, without describing the lines of march which he repeatedly traced over the continent of Asia, I shall briefly represent his conquests in, I Persia, II Tartary, and, III India,<sup>n</sup> and from thence proceed to the more interesting narrative of his Ottoman war.

I For every war, a motive of safety or revenge, of honour or zeal, of right or convenience, may be readily found in the jurisprudence of conquerors. No sooner had Timour re-united to the patrimony of Zagatal the dependent countries of Carizme and Candaliar, than he turned his eyes towards the kingdoms of Iran or Persia. From the Oxus to the Tigris, that extensive country was left without a lawful sovereign since the death of Abou-said, the last of the descendants of the great Houla-cou. Peace and justice had been banished from the land above forty years, and the Mogul invader might seem to listen to the cries of an oppressed people. Their petty tyrants might have opposed him with confederate arms: they separately stood, and successively fell, and the difference of their fate was only marked by the promptitude of submission, or the obstinacy of resistance. Ibrahim, prince of Skurwan or Albama, kissed the footstool of the imperial throne. His peace-offerings of silks, horses, and jewels, were composed, according to the Tartar fashion, each article of nine pieces, but a critical spectator observed, that there were only eight slaves. "I myself am the ninth,"<sup>o</sup> replied Ibrahim, who was prepared for the remark, and his flattery was rewarded by the smile of Timour. Shah Mansour, prince of Fars, or the proper Persia, was one of the least powerful, but most dangerous, of his enemies. In a battle under the walls of Shiraz, he broke, with three or four thousand soldiers, the coul or main-body of thirty thousand horse, where the emperor fought in person. No more than fourteen or fifteen guards remained near the standard of Timour, he stood firm as a rock, and received on his helmet two weighty strokes of a scymitar,<sup>p</sup> the Moguls rallied, the head of Mansour was thrown at his feet, and he declared his esteem of the valour of a foe, by extirpating all the males of so intrepid a race. From Shiraz, his troops advanced to the Persian gulf, and the riches and weakness of Ormuz<sup>q</sup> were displayed in an annual tribute of six hundred thousand dinars of gold. Bagdad was no

His conquests,
A D 1370-1400
I Of Persia,
A D
1380-1397

<sup>m</sup> The first book of Sherefeddin is employed on the private life of the hero, and he himself or his secretary (Institutions p. 3-77) enlarges with pleasure on the thirteen designs and enterprises which most truly constitute his personal merit. It even shines through the dark colouring of Arabshah p. 1 c. 1-12.

<sup>n</sup> The conquests of Persia, Tartary, and India, are represented in the second and third books of Sherefeddin and by Arabshah c. 13-57. Consult the excellent indexes to the Institutions.

<sup>o</sup> The reverence of the Tartars for the mysterious number of nine is declared by Abulghazi Khan who for that reason, divides his Genealogical History into nine parts.

<sup>p</sup> According to Arabshah (p. 1 c. 28. p. 183.) the coward Timour ran away to his tent and hid himself from the pursuit of Shah Mansour under the women's garments. Perhaps Sherefeddin (l. iii c. 25) has magnified his courage.

<sup>q</sup> The history of Ormuz is not unlike that of Tyre. The old city, on the continent, was destroyed by the Tartars, and renewed in a neighbouring island without fresh water or vegetation. The kings of Ormuz rich in the Indian trade and the pearl fishery, possessed large territories both in Persia and Arabia, but they were at first the tributaries of the sultans of Kermah and at last were delivered (A D 1505) by the Portuguese tyrants from the tyranny of their own vizirs, Marco Polo l. i c. 15. fol. 7, 8. Abulfeida Geograph. tabul. xi p. 261. 262. an original Chronicle of Ormuz in Texeira or Stevens's History of Persia p. 376-416 and the Itineraries inserted in the first volume of Hamelin de Tudesco Birlheima (1503) fol. 167 of Andrea Corsali (1517) fol. 202, 203 and of Odoardo Barbessa (in 1516) fol. 315-318.)

pable, in a less civilized state of mankind, of occasioning a battle, a war, or a revolution

State of population The climate of ancient Germany has been mollified, and the soil fertilized, by the labour of ten centuries from the time of Charlemagne. The same extent of ground which at present maintains, in ease and plenty, a million of husbandmen and artificers, was unable to supply an hundred thousand lazy warriors with the simple necessities of life.<sup>a</sup> The Germans abandoned their immense forests to the exercise of hunting, employed in pasturage the most considerable part of their lands, bestowed on the small remainder a rude and careless cultivation, and then accused the scantiness and sterility of a country that refused to maintain the multitude of its inhabitants. When the return of famine severely admonished them of the importance of the arts, the national distress was sometimes alleviated by the emigration of a third, perhaps, or a fourth part of their youth.<sup>b</sup> The possession and the enjoyment of property are the pledges which bind a civilized people to an improved country. But the Germans, who carried with them what they most valued, their arms, their cattle, and their women, cheerfully abandoned the vast silence of their woods for the unbounded hopes of plunder and conquest. The innumerable swarms that issued, or seemed to issue, from the great storehouse of nations, were multiplied by the fears of the vanquished, and by the credulity of succeeding ages. And from facts thus exaggerated, an opinion was gradually established, and has been supported by writers of distinguished reputation, that, in the age of Cæsar and Tacitus, the inhabitants of the north were far more numerous than they are in our days.<sup>c</sup> A more serious inquiry into the causes of population seems to have convicted modern philosophers of the falsehood, and indeed the impossibility, of the supposition. To the names of Mariana and of Machiavel,<sup>d</sup> we can oppose the equal names of Robertson and Hume.<sup>e</sup>

German freedom A warlike nation like the Germans, without either cities, letters, arts, or money, found some compensation for this savage state in the enjoyment of liberty. Their poverty secured their freedom, since our desires and our possessions are the strongest fetters of despotism. "Among the Suiones (says Tacitus) riches are held in honour. They are therefore subject to an absolute monarch, who, instead of intrusting his people with the free use of arms, as is practised in the rest of Germany, commits them to the safe custody not of a citizen, or even of a freedman, but of a slave. The neighbours of the Suiones, the Sitones, are sunk even below servitude, they obey a woman."<sup>f</sup> In the mention of these exceptions, the great historian sufficiently acknowledges the general theory of government. We are only at a loss to conceive by what means riches and despotism could penetrate into a remote corner of the north, and extinguish the generous flame that blazed with such fierceness on the frontier of the Roman provinces, or how the ancestors of those Danes and Norwegians, so distinguished in latter ages by their unconquerable spirit, could thus tamely resign the great character of German liberty.<sup>g</sup> Some tribes, however, on the coast of the Baltic, acknowledged the authority of kings, though without relinquishing the rights of men,<sup>h</sup> but in the far greater part of Germany, the form of government was a democracy, tempered, indeed, and controlled, not so much by general and positive laws, as by the occasional ascendant of birth or valour, of eloquence or superstition.<sup>i</sup>

Civil governments, in their first in- Assemblies of the people stitutions, are voluntary associations for mutual defence. To obtain the desired end, it is absolutely necessary, that each individual should conceive himself obliged to submit his private opinion and actions to the judgment of the greater number of his associates. The German tribes were contented with this rude but liberal outline of political society. As soon as a youth, born of free parents, had attained the age of manhood, he was introduced into the general council of his countrymen, solemnly invested with a shield and spear, and adopted as an equal and worthy member of the military commonwealth. The assembly of the warriors of the tribe was convened at stated seasons, or on sudden emergencies. The trial of public offences, the election of magistrates, and the great business of peace and war, were determined by its independent voice. Sometimes, indeed, these important questions were previously considered, and prepared in a more select council of the principal chieftains.<sup>j</sup> The magistrates might deliberate and persuade, the people only could resolve and execute, and the resolutions of the Germans were for the most part hasty and violent. Barbarians, accustomed to place their freedom in gratifying the present passion, and their courage in overlooking all future consequences, turned away with indignant contempt from the remonstrances of justice and policy, and it was the practice to signify by a hollow murmur their dislike of such timid counsels. But whenever a

<sup>a</sup> The Helvetian nation, which issued from the country called Switzerland continued, of every age and sex, 368 000 persons (Cæsar de Bell. Gall. l. 29). At present, the number of people in the Pays de Vaud (a small district on the banks of the Lemna Lake, much more distinguished for politeness than for industry) amounts to 112 591. See an excellent tract of M. Muret, in the Mémoires de la Société de Bern.

<sup>b</sup> Paul Diaconus c. 1—3. Machiavel Davila and the rest of Paul's followers represent these emigrations too much as regular and concerted measures.

<sup>c</sup> Sir Win. Temple and Montesquieu have indulged, on this subject, the usual weakness of their fancy.

<sup>d</sup> Machiavel, Hist. di Firenze l. 1. Mariana Hist. Hispan. l. 1. c. 1. Robertson & Charles V. Hume's Political Essay.

<sup>e</sup> Tacit. Germ. 44. 45. Freusheimius (who dedicated his supplé-ment to Livy to Christina of Sweden) thinks proper to be very angry with the Roman who expressed so very little reverence for northern queens.

<sup>f</sup> May we not suspect that superstition was the parent of despotism? The descendants of Odin (whose race was not extinct till the year 1060) are said to have reigned in Sweden above a thousand years. The temple of Upsal was the ancient seat of religion and empire. In the year 1151 I find a singular law, prohibiting the use and profession of arms to any except the king's guards. Is it not probable that it was coloured by the pretence of reviving an old institution? See Dalin's History of Sweden in the Bibliothèque Raisonnée, tom. xl. xlv.

<sup>g</sup> Tacit. Germ. c. 43.

<sup>h</sup> Id. c. 11—13 &c.

<sup>i</sup> Grotius climæsan expression of Tacitus pertractantur into prætractantur. The correction is equally just and ingenious.

longer the city of peace, the seat of the caliphs but the noblest conquest of Houlacou could not be overlooked by his ambitious successor The whole course of the Tigris and Euphrates, from the mouth to the sources of those rivers, was reduced to his obedience, he entered Edessa, and the Turkmans of the black sheep were chastised for the sacrilegious pillage of a caravan of Mecca In the mountains of Georgia, the native christians still braved the law and the sword of Mahomet, by three expeditions he obtained the merit of the gazie, or holy war, and the prince of Tellis became his proselyte and friend

II Of Turkestan. II A just retaliation might be urged for the invasion of Turkestan, or the eastern Tartary The dignity of Timour could not endure the impunity of the Getes, he passed the Sihoon, subdued the kingdom of Cashgar, and marched seven times into the heart of their country His most distant camp was two months' journey, or four hundred and eighty leagues, to the north-east of Samarcand, and his emirs, who traversed the river Irtysh, engraved in the forests of Siberia a rude memorial of their exploits The conquest of Kipzak, or the western Tartary,* was founded on the double motive of aiding the distressed, and chastising the ungrateful Toctamish, a fugitive prince, was entertained and protected in his court the ambassadors of Auruss Khan were dismissed with a haughty denial, and followed on the same day by the armies of Zagatai, and their success established Toctamish in the Mogul empire of the north But, after a reign of ten years, the new khan forgot the merits and the strength of his benefactor, the base usurper, as he deemed him, of the sacred rights of the house of Zingis Through the gates of Derbend, he entered Persia at the head of ninety thousand horse with the innumerable forces of Kipzak, Bulgaria, Circassia, and Russia, he passed the Sihoon, burnt the palaces of Timour, and compelled him, amidst the winter snows, to contend for Samarcand and his life After a mild expostulation, and a glorious victory, the emperor resolved on revenge and by the east, and the west, of the Caspian, and the Volga, he twice invaded Kipzac with such mighty powers, that thirteen miles were measured from his right to his left wing In a march of five months, they rarely beheld the footsteps of man, and their daily subsistence was often trusted to the fortune of

* Arabshah had travelled into Kipzak, and acquired a singular knowledge of the geography, cities, and revolutions, of that northern region (P 1 c 45—49)

* Institutions of Timour, p 123 125 Mr White the editor, bestows some inadvertence on the superficial account of Sherefeddin, (1 iii c 12 13 14) who was ignorant of the designs of Timour, and the true springs of action

* The furs of Russia are more credible than the ingots But the linen of Antioch has never been famous and Antioch was in ruins I suspect that it was some manufacture of Europe which the Hance merchants had imported by the way of Novogorod

* M Lefevre (Hist de Russie, tom ii p 247 Vie de Timour, p 64—67 before the French version of the Institutes) has corrected the error of Sherefeddin, and marked the true limit of Timour's conquests His arguments are superfluous, and a simple appeal to the Russian annals is sufficient to prove that Moscow, which six years before had been taken by Toctamish, escaped the arms of a more formidable invader

* An Egyptian consul from Grand Cairo is mentioned in Barbaro's

the chace At length the armies encountered each other, but the treachery of the standard-bearer, who in the heat of action, reversed the imperial standard of Kipzac, determined the victory of the Zagatai, and Toctamish (I speak the language of the Institutions) gave the tribe of Touthi to the wind of desolation * He fled to the christian duke of Lithuania, again returned to the banks of the Volga, and, after fifteen battles with a domestic rival, at last perished in the wilds of Siberia The pursuit of a flying enemy carried Timour into the tributary provinces of Russia a duke of the reigning family was made prisoner amidst the ruins of his capital, and Yelctz, by the pride and ignorance of the orientals, might easily be confounded with the genuine metropolis of the nation Moscow trembled at the approach of the Tartar, and the resistance would have been feeble, since the hopes of the Russians were placed in a miraculous image of the Virgin, to whose protection they ascribed the casual and voluntary retreat of the conqueror Ambition and prudence recalled him to the south, the desolate country was exhausted, and the Mogul soldiers were enriched with an immense spoil of precious furs, of linen of Antioch,† and of ingots of gold and silver * On the banks of the Don, or Tanais, he received an humble deputation from the consuls and merchants of Egypt,‡ Venice, Genoa, Catalonia, and Biscay, who occupied the commerce and city of Tana, or Azoph, at the mouth of the river They offered their gifts, admired his magnificence, and trusted to his royal word But the peaceful visit of an emir, who explored the state of the magazines and harbour, was speedily followed by the destructive presence of the Tartars The city was reduced to ashes, the Moslems were pillaged and dismissed, but all the christians, who had not fled to their ships, were condemned either to death or slavery * Revenge prompted him to burn the cities of Seraï and Astrachan, the monuments of rising civilization, and his vanity proclaimed, that he had penetrated to the region of perpetual daylight, a strange phenomenon, which authorized his Mahometan doctors to dispense with the obligation of evening prayer *

III When Timour first proposed to III Of Hindostan, his princes and emirs the invasion of A D 1398, 1399 India or Hindostan,§ he was answered by a murmur of discontent "The rivers|| and the mountains and deserts|| and the soldiers clad in armour|| and the elephants, destroyers of men!" But the displeasure

vyage to Tana to 1436, after the city had been rebuilt (Ramusio, tom ii fol 92.)

* The sack of Azoph is described by Sherefeddin (1 iii c 55) and much more particularly by the author of an Italian chronicle (Andreas de Reduasis de Quero, in Chron Tartarorum, in Muratori Script Rerum Italicarum tom xix p 802—805) He had conversed with the Miran, two Venetian brothers, one of whom had been sent a deputy to the camp of Timour, and the other had lost at Azoph three sons and 12,000 ducats

* Sherefeddin only says (1 iii c 13) that the rays of the setting, and those of the rising, sun, were scarcely separated by any interval a problem which may be solved in the latitude of Moscow, (the 56th degree,) with the aid of the Aurora Borealis, and a long summer twilight But a day of forty days (Khondemir apud D'Herbelot, p 880) would rigorously confine us within the polar circle

* For the Indian war see the Institutions, (p 129—139) the fourth book of Sherefeddin, and the history of Ferishta, (iii Dow, vol ii p 1—20) which throws a general light on the affairs of Hindostan

of the emperor was more dreadful than all these terrors, and his superior reason was convinced, that an enterprise of such tremendous aspect was safe and easy in the execution. He was informed by his spies of the weakness and anarchy of Hindostan: the soubahs of the provinces had erected the standard of rebellion, and the perpetual infancy of sultan Mahmoud was despised even in the haram of Delhi. The Mogul army moved in three great divisions, and Timour observes with pleasure, that the ninety-two squadrons of a thousand horse most fortunately corresponded with the ninety-two names or epithets of the prophet Mahomet. Between the Sihoon and the Indus they crossed one of the ridges of mountains, which are styled by the Arabian geographers, The stony girdles of the earth. The highland robbers were subdued or extirpated, but great numbers of men and horses perished in the snow, the emperor himself was let down a precipice on a portable scaffold, the ropes were one hundred and fifty cubits in length, and, before he could reach the bottom, this dangerous operation was five times repeated. Timour crossed the Indus at the ordinary passage of Attok, and successively traversed, in the footsteps of Alexander, the Punjab, or five rivers,<sup>b</sup> that fall into the master-stream. From Attok to Delhi, the high road measures no more than six hundred miles, but the two conquerors deviated to the south-east, and the motive of Timour was to join his grandson, who had achieved by his command the conquest of Moultan. On the eastern bank of the Hyphasis, on the edge of the desert, the Macedonian hero halted and wept: the Mogul entered the desert, reduced the fortress of Batnir, and stood in arms before the gates of Delhi, a great and flourishing city, which had subsisted three centuries under the dominion of the Mahometan kings. The siege, more especially of the castle, might have been a work of time, but he tempted, by the appearance of weakness, the sultan Mahmoud and his vizir to descend into the plain, with ten thousand cuirassiers, forty thousand of his foot-guards, and one hundred and twenty elephants, whose tusks are said to have been armed with sharp and poisoned daggers. Against these monsters, or rather against the imagination of his troops, he condescended to use some extraordinary precautions of fire and a ditch, of iron spikes and a rampart of bucklers, but the event taught the Moguls to smile at their own fears, and, as soon as these unwieldy animals were routed, the inferior species (the men of India) disappeared from the field. Timour made his triumphal entry into the capital of Hindostan, and admired, with a view to imitate, the architecture of the stately mosque, but the order and licence of a general pillage and massacre polluted the festival of his victory.

<sup>b</sup> The rivers of the Punjab: the five eastern branches of the Indus, have been laid down for the first time with truth and accuracy in Major Rennel's incomparable map of Hindostan. In his Critical Memoir he illustrates with judgment and learning the marches of Alexander and Timour.

<sup>c</sup> The two great rivers the Ganges and Burrampooter rise in Thibet, from the opposite ridges of the same hills, separate from each other to the distance of 1200 miles, and, after a winding course of 2000 miles,

He resolved to purify his soldiers in the blood of the idolaters, or Gentoos, who still surpass, in the proportion of ten to one, the numbers of the Moslems. In this pious design, he advanced one hundred miles to the north-east of Delhi, passed the Ganges, fought several battles by land and water, and penetrated to the famous rock of Coupele, the statue of the cow, that seems to discharge the mighty river, whose source is far distant among the mountains of Thibet. His return was along the skirts of the northern hills, nor could this rapid campaign of one year justify the strange foresight of his omirs, that their children in a warm climate would degenerate into a race of Hindoos.

It was on the banks of the Ganges that Timour was informed, by his speedy messengers, of the disturbances which had arisen on the confines of Georgia and Anatolia, of the revolt of the christians, and the ambitious designs of the sultan Bajazet. His vigour of mind and body was not impaired by sixty-three years, and innumerable fatigues, and, after enjoying some tranquil months in the palace of Samarcand, he proclaimed a new expedition of seven years into the western countries of Asia.<sup>d</sup> To the soldiers who had served in the Indian war, he granted the choice of remaining at home, or following their prince, but the troops of all the provinces and kingdoms of Persia were commanded to assemble at Ispahan, and wait the arrival of the imperial standard. It was first directed against the christians of Georgia, who were strong only in their rocks, their castles, and the winter season, but these obstacles were overcome by the zeal and perseverance of Timour, the rebels submitted to the tribute or the Koran, and if both religions boasted of their martyrs, that name is more justly due to the christian prisoners, who were offered the choice of abjuration or death. On his descent from the hills, the emperor gave audience to the first ambassadors of Bajazet, and opened the hostile correspondence of complaints and menaces, which fermented two years before the final explosion. Between two jealous and haughty neighbours, the motives of quarrel will seldom be wanting. The Mogul and Ottoman conquests now touched each other in the neighbourhood of Erzerum, and the Euphrates, nor had the doubtful limit been ascertained by time and treaty. Each of these ambitious monarchs might accuse his rival of violating his territory, of threatening his vassals, and protecting his rebels, and, by the name of rebels, each understood the fugitive princes, whose kingdoms he had usurped, and whose life or liberty he implacably pursued. The resemblance of character was still more dangerous than the opposition of interest, and sultan Bajazet,

His war against
A. D. 1400
Sept. 1

again meet in one point near the gulf of Bengal. Yet so capricious is fate, that the Burrampooter is a late discovery, while his brother Ganges has been the theme of ancient and modern story. Couple the scene of Timour's last victory, must be situated near Loldong, 1100 miles from Calcutta, and, in 1774, a British camp! (Rennel's Memoir, p. 7 59 90 91 93)

<sup>d</sup> See the Institutions p. 141 to the end of the first book and Sherfeddin (l. v. c. 1-10) to the entrance of Timour into Syria.

in their victorious career, Timour was impatient of an equal, and Bajazet was ignorant of a superior. The first epistle<sup>c</sup> of the Mogul emperor must have provoked, instead of reconciling, the Turkish sultan, whose family and nation he affected to despise. "Dost thou not know, that the greatest part of Asia is subject to our arms and our laws? that our invincible forces extend from one sea to the other? that the potentates of the earth form a line before our gate? and that we have compelled fortune herself to watch over the prosperity of our empire? What is the foundation of thy insolence and folly? Thou hast fought some battles in the woods of Anatolia, contemptible trophies! Thou hast obtained some victories over the christians of Europe, thy sword was blessed by the apostle of God, and thy obedience to the precept of the Koran, in waging war against the infidels, is the sole consideration that prevents us from destroying thy country, the frontier and bulwark of the Moslem world. Be wise in time, reflect, repent, and avert the thunder of our vengeance, which is yet suspended over thy head. Thou art no more than a pismire, why wilt thou seek to provoke the elephants? Alas! they will trample thee under their feet." In his replies, Bajazet poured forth the indignation of a soul which was deeply stung by such unusual contempt. After retorting the basest reproaches on the thief and rebel of the desert, the Ottoman recapitulates his boasted victories in Iran, Touran, and the Indies, and labours to prove, that Timour had never triumphed unless by his own perfidy and the vices of his foes. "Thy armies are innumerable be they so, but what are the arrows of the flying Tartar against the scymitars and battle-axes of my firm and invincible janizaries? I will guard the princes who have implored my protection seek them in my tents. The cities of Arzingan and Erzerum are mine, and unless the tribute be duly paid, I will demand the arrears under the walls of Tauris and Sultania." The ungovernable rage of the sultan at length betrayed him to an insult of a more domestic kind. "If I fly from my arms," said he, "may my wives be thrice divorced from my bed but if thou hast not courage to meet me in the field, mayst thou again receive thy wives after they have thrice endured the embraces of a stranger." Any violation by word or deed of the secrecy of the harem is an unpardonable offence among the Turkish nations,<sup>d</sup> and the political quarrel of the two monarchs was imbittered by private and personal resentment. Yet in his first expedition, Timour was satisfied with the siege and destruction of Siwas or Sebaste, a strong city on the borders of Anatolia and he revenged the indiscretion of the Ottoman, on a garrison of four thousand Armenians, who were buried alive for the brave and faithful discharge of their duty. As a mussulman he seemed to respect the pious occupation of Bajazet, who was still engaged in the blockade of Constantinople and after this salutary lesson, the Mogul conqueror checked his pursuit, and turned aside to the invasion of Syria and Egypt. In these transactions, <sup>Timour invades Syria, A D 1400</sup> the Ottoman prince, by the orientals, and even by Timour, is styled the

Kaissar of Roum, the Cæsar of the Romans, a title which, by a small anticipation, might be given to a monarch who possessed the provinces, and threatened the city, of the successors of Constantine.<sup>1</sup>

The military republic of the Mamalukes still reigned in Egypt and Syria but the dynasty of the Turks was overthrown by that of the Circassians<sup>k</sup> and their favourite Barkok, from a slave and a prisoner, was raised and restored to the throne. In the midst of rebellion and discord, he braved the menaces, corresponded with the enemies, and detained the ambassadors of the Mogul, who patiently expected his decease, to revenge the crimes of the father on the feeble reign of his son Farage. The Syrian emirs<sup>l</sup> were assembled at Aleppo to repel the invasion they confided in the fame and discipline of the Mamalukes, in the temper of their swords and lances of the purest steel of Damascus, in the strength of their walled cities, and in the populousness of sixty thousand villages and instead of sustaining a siege they threw open their gates, and arrayed their forces in the plain. But these forces were not cemented by virtue and union, and some powerful emirs had been seduced to desert or betray their more loyal companions. Timour's front was covered with a line of Indian elephants, whose turrets were filled with archers and Greek fire, the rapid evolutions of his cavalry completed the dismay and disorder, the Syrian crowds fell back on each other, many thousands were stifled or slaughtered in the entrance of the great street, the Moguls entered with the fugitives, and, after a short defence, the citadel, the impregnable citadel of Aleppo, was surrendered by cow-

<sup>c</sup> We have three copies of these hostile epistles in the Institutions, (p. 147) in Sherefeddin (l. v. c. 14) and in Arabshah, (tom. ii. c. 19 p. 183-201) which agree with each other in the spirit and substance rather than in the style. It is probable, that they have been translated with various latitude, from the Turkish original into the Arabic and Persian tongues.

<sup>d</sup> The Mogul emir distinguishes himself and his countrymen by the name of Turks, and stigmatizes the race and nation of Bajazet with the less honourable epithet of Turkians. Yet I do not understand how the Ottomans could be descended from a Turkman sailor: those inland shepherds were so remote from the sea and all maritime affairs.

<sup>e</sup> According to the Koran (c. ii. p. 27 and Sale's Discourses, p. 134) a mussulman who had thrice divorced his wife (who had thrice repented the words of a divorce) could not take her again, till after she had been married to and repudiated by, another husband: an ignominious transaction, which it is needless to aggravate, by supposing that the first husband must see her enjoyed by a second before his face. (Rycaut's State of the Ottoman empire, l. ii. c. 21.)

<sup>k</sup> The common delirium of the orientals, in never speaking of their women is ascribed in a much higher degree by Arabshah to the Turkish nations: and it is remarkable enough, that Chalcondyles (l. ii. p. 55) had some knowledge of the prejudice and the insult.

<sup>l</sup> For the style of the Moguls, see the Institutions, (p. 131-147) and for the Persians, the Bibliothèque Orientale (p. 882) but I do not find that the title of Cæsar has been applied by the Arabians, or assumed by the Ottomans themselves.

<sup>m</sup> See the reigns of Barkok and Pharadze in M. de Guignes, (tom. iv. l. xxv.) who, from the Arabic texts of Aboulmahaseu Ebn Selounnah, and Antah, has added some facts to our common stock of materials.

<sup>n</sup> For these recent and domestic transactions, Arabshah, though a partial, is a credible witness, (tom. i. c. 64-68. tom. ii. c. 1-14) Timour must have been odious to a Syrian: but the notoriety of facts himself. His bitterness may correct the luscious sweets of Sherefeddin, (l. v. 17-29.)

ardice or treachery Among the supplants and captives, Timour distinguished the doctors of the law, whom he invited to the dangerous honour of a personal conference<sup>m</sup> The Mogul prince was a zealous musulman, but his Persian schools had taught him to revere the memory of Ali and Hosein, and he had imbibed a deep prejudice against the Syrians, as the enemies of the son of the daughter of the apostle of God To these doctors he proposed a captious question, which the casuists of Bochara, Samarcand, and Herat, were incapable of resolving,
"Who are the true martyrs, of those who are slain on my side, or on that of my enemies?" But he was silenced, or satisfied, by the dexterity of one of the cadhis of Aleppo, who replied in the words of Mahomet himself, that the motive, not the ensign, constitutes the martyr, and that the Moslems of either party, who fight only for the glory of God, may deserve that sacred appellation The true succession of the caliphs was a controversy of a still more delicate nature, and the frankness of a doctor, too honest for his situation, provoked the emperor to exclaim "Ye are as false as those of Damascus Moawiyah was a usurper, Yezid a tyrant, and Ali alone is the lawful successor of the prophet" A prudent explanation restored his tranquillity, and he passed to a more familiar topic of conversation
"What is your age?" said he to the cadhi "Fifty years"—"It would be the age of my eldest son you see me here (continued Timour) a poor, lame, decrepit mortal Yet by my arm has the Almighty been pleased to subdue the kingdom of Iran, Touran, and the Indies I am not a man of blood, and God is my witness, that in all my wars I have never been the aggressor, and that my enemies have always been the authors of their own calamity" During this peaceful conversation, the streets of Aleppo streamed with blood, and re-echoed with the cries of mothers and children, with the shrieks of violated virgins The rich plunder that was abandoned to his soldiers might stimulate their avarice, but their cruelty was enforced by the peremptory command of producing an adequate number of heads, which, according to his custom, were curiously piled in columns and pyramids the Moguls celebrated the feast of victory, while the surviving Moslems passed the night in tears and in chains
I shall not dwell on the march of the destroyer from Aleppo to Damascus, where he was rudely encountered, and almost overthrown, by the armies of Egypt A retrograde motion was imputed to his distress and despair one of his nephews deserted to the enemy, and Syria rejoiced in the tale of his defeat, when the sultan was driven by the revolt of the Mamalukes to escape with precipitation and shame to his palace of Cairo Abandoned by their prince, the inhabitants of Damascus still defended their walls, and Timour consented to raise the siege, if they would adorn his retreat with a gift or ransom, each article of nine pieces But no sooner had he introduced himself into the city, under colour of a truce, than he perfidiously violated the treaty, imposed a contribution of ten millions of gold, and animated his troops to chastise the posterity of those Syrians who had executed, or approved, the murder of the grandson of Mahomet A family which had given honourable burial to the head of Hosein, and a colony of artificers, whom he sent to labour at Samarcand, were alone reserved in the general massacre, and, after a period of seven centuries, Damascus was reduced to ashes, because a Tartar was moved by religious zeal to avenge the blood of an Arab The losses and fatigues of the campaign obliged Timour to renounce the conquest of Palestine and Egypt, but in his return to the Euphrates, he delivered Aleppo to the flames, and justified his pious motive by the pardon and reward of two thousand sectaries of Ali, who were desirous to visit the tomb of his son I have expatiated on the personal anecdotes which mark the character of the Mogul hero, but I shall briefly mention, that he erected on the ruins of Bagdad a pyramid of ninety thousand heads, again visited Georgia, encamped on the banks of Araxes, and proclaimed his resolution of marching against the Ottoman emperor Conscious of the importance of the war, he collected his forces from every province eight hundred thousand men were enrolled on his military list,<sup>o</sup> but the splendid commands of five, and ten, thousand horse, may be rather expressive of the rank and pension of the chiefs, than of the genuine number of effective soldiers<sup>p</sup> In the pillage of Syria, the Moguls had acquired immense riches but the delivery of their pay and arrears for seven years, more firmly attached them to the imperial standard

During this diversion of the Mogul arms, Bajazet had two years to collect his forces for a more serious encounter They consisted of four hundred thousand horse and foot,<sup>q</sup> whose merit and fidelity were of an unequal complexion We may discriminate the janizaries, who have been gradually raised to an establishment of forty thousand men, a national cavalry, the Spahis

<sup>m</sup> These interesting conversations appear to have been copied by Arabshah (tom i c 68 p 625-645) from the edhis and historian Ebn Schimrui a principal actor Yet how could he be alive seventy five years afterwards? (D Herbelot p 792)

<sup>n</sup> The marches and occupations of Timour between the Syrian and Ottoman wars are represented by Shereffeddin, (l v c 29-43) and Arabshah (tom ii c 15-18)

<sup>o</sup> This number of 800 000 was extracted by Arabshah or rather by Ebn Schimrui extorting Timour on the faith of a Carizman officer (tom i c 68 p 617) and it is remarkable enough that a Greek historian (Phiraura l i c 29) adds no more than 20 000 men Poggins reckons 1 000 000 another Latin contemporary (Chron Turcivianum, apud Muratori, tom xix p 800) 1,100 000 and the enormous sum of 1 600 000 is attested by a German soldier, who was present at the battle of Angora (Lunelav at Chalendiv l iii p 62.) Timour, in his institutions has not deemed to circulate his troops, his subjects, or his revenue.

<sup>p</sup> A wide latitude of non effectives was allowed by the Great Mogul for his own pride and the benefit of his officers Bernier a patron was Penge Hazzari commander of 5000 horse of which he maintained no more than 500 (Voyages, tom i p 289 280)

<sup>q</sup> Timour himself fixes at 400,000 men the Ottoman army (Institutions p 153) which is reduced to 150 000 by Phranza, (l i c 29) and swelled by the German soldier to 1,400,000 It is evident that the Moguls were the more numerous

Damascus
A D 1401
Jan 23

and Bagdad
A D 1401
July 23

Invades Amto
lra, A D 1402

of modern times, twenty thousand cuirassiers of Europe, clad in black and impenetrable armour, the troops of Anatolia, whose princes had taken refuge in the camp of Timour, and a colony of Tartars, whom he had driven from Kipzak, and to whom Bajazet had assigned a settlement in the plains of Adrianople. The fearless confidence of the sultan urged him to meet his antagonist, and, as if he had chosen that spot for revenge, he displayed his banners near the ruins of the unfortunate Suvas. In the mean while, Timour moved from the Araxes through the countries of Armenia and Anatolia: his boldness was secured by the wisest precautions, his speed was guided by order and discipline, and the woods, the mountains, and the rivers, were diligently explored by the flying squadrons, who marked his road and preceded his standard. Firm in his plan of fighting in the heart of the Ottoman kingdom, he avoided their camp, dexterously inclined to the left, occupied Cæsarea, traversed the salt desert and the river Halys, and invested Angora, while the sultan, immovable and ignorant in his post, compared the Tartar swiftness to the crawling of a snail; he returned on the wings of indignation to the relief

Battle of Angora,
A. D. 1402,
July 28

of Angora, and as both generals were alike impatient for action, the plains round that city were the scene of a memorable battle, which has immortalized the glory of Timour and the shame of Bajazet. For this signal victory the Mogul emperor was indebted to himself, to the genius of the moment, and the discipline of thirty years. He had improved the tactics, without violating the manners, of his nation,* whose force still consisted in the missile weapons, and rapid evolutions, of a numerous cavalry. From a single troop to a great army, the mode of attack was the same, a foremost line first advanced to the charge, and was supported in a just order by the squadrons of the great vanguard. The general's eye watched over the field, and at his command the front and rear of the right and left wings successively moved forwards in their several divisions, and in a direct or oblique line the enemy was pressed by eighteen or twenty attacks, and each attack afforded a chance of victory. If they all proved fruitless or unsuccessful, the occasion was worthy of the emperor himself, who gave the signal of advancing to the standard and main body, which he led in person. But in the battle of Angora, the main body itself was supported, on the flanks and in the rear, by the bravest squadrons of the reserve, commanded by the sons and grandsons of Timour. The conqueror of Hindostan ostentatiously showed a line of elephants, the trophies, rather than the instruments, of victory: the use of the Greek fire was familiar to the Moguls and Ottomans but had they borrowed from Europe the recent invention of gunpowder and cannon, the artificial thunder in the hands of either nation must have turned the fortune of the day. In that day Bajazet displayed the qualities of a soldier and a chief but his genius sunk under a stronger ascendant and, from various motives, the greatest part of his troops failed him in the decisive moment. His rigour and avarice had provoked a mutiny among the Turks, and even his son Soliman too hastily withdrew from the field. The forces of Anatolia, loyal in their revolt, were drawn away to the banners of their lawful princes. His Tartar allies had been tempted by the letters and emissaries of Timour,† who reproached their ignoble servitude under the slaves of their fathers and offered to their hopes the dominion of their new, or the liberty of their ancient, country. In the right wing of Bajazet the cuirassiers of Europe charged, with faithful hearts and irresistible arms, but these men of iron were soon broken by an artful flight and headlong pursuit and the janizaries, alone, without cavalry or missile weapons, were encompassed by the circle of the Mogul hunters. Their valour was at length oppressed by heat, thirst, and the weight of numbers, and the unfortunate sultan, afflicted with the gout in his hands and feet, was transported from the field on the fleetest of his horses. He was pursued and taken by the titular khan of Zagatai, and, after his capture, and the defeat of the Ottoman powers, the kingdom of Anatolia submitted to the conqueror, who planted his standard at Kiotahia, and dispersed on all sides the ministers of rapine and destruction. Mirza Mehemed Sultan, the eldest and best beloved of his grandsons, was despatched to Bursa, with thirty thousand horse, and such was his youthful ardour, that he arrived with only four thousand at the gates of the capital, after performing in five days a march of two hundred and thirty miles. Yet fear is still more rapid in its course and Soliman, the son of Bajazet, had already passed over to Europe with the royal treasure. The spoil, however, of the palace and city was immense, the inhabitants had escaped but the buildings, for the most part of wood, were reduced to ashes. From Bursa, the grandson of Timour advanced to Nice, even yet a fair and flourishing city, and the Mogul squadrons were only stopped by the waves of the Propontis. The same success attended the other mirzas and emirs in their excursions and Smyrna, defended by the zeal and courage of the Rhodian knights, alone deserved the presence of the emperor himself. After an obstinate defence, the place was taken by storm, all that the English, but preserved in the French, version of the Institutes, (p. 155, 157.)

* The Greek fire, on Timour's side, is attested by Sherefeddin, (l. v. c. 47) but Voltaire's strange suspicion that some cannon, inscribed with strange characters, must have been sent by that monarch to Delhi, is refuted by the universal silence of contemporaries.

† Timour has dissembled this secret and important negotiation with the Tartars which is indisputably proved by the joint evidence of the Arabian (tom. i. c. 47. p. 391.) Turkish, (Annal. Leunclav. p. 321.) and Persian historians (Khondemir, apud D. Herbelot, p. 882.)

* It may not be useless to mark the distances between Angora and the neighbouring cities, by the journeys of the caravans, each of twenty or twenty five miles, to Smyrna twenty to Kiotahia ten, to Bursa ten, to Cæsarea eight to Sinope ten to Nicomedia nine, to Constantinople twelve, or thirteen (See Fourmont, Voyage au Levant, tom. ii. lettre xx.)

† See the Systems of Tactics in the Institutes, which the English editors have illustrated with elaborate plans, (p. 373—407.)

‡ The sultan himself (says Timour) must then put the foot of courage into the stirrup of patience. A Tartar metaphor, which is lost in breathed was put to the sword, and the heads of the christian heroes were launched from the engines, on board of two caracks, or great ships of Europe, that rode at anchor in the harbour. The Moslems of Asia rejoiced in their deliverance from a dangerous and domestic foe, and a parallel was drawn between the two rivals, by observing that Timour, in fourteen days, had reduced a fortress which had sustained seven years the siege, or at least the blockade, of Bajazet.<sup>1</sup>

The history of his iron cage

The iron cage in which Bajazet was imprisoned by Tamerlane, so long and so often repeated as a moral lesson, is now rejected as a fable by the modern writers, who smile at the vulgar credulity.<sup>2</sup> They appeal with confidence to the Persian history of Sherefeddin Ali, which has been given to our curiosity in a French version, and from which I shall collect and abridge a more specious narrative of this memorable transaction. No

disproved by the Persian historian
of Timour

sooner was Timour informed that the captive Ottoman was at the door of his tent, than he graciously stepped forwards to receive him, seated him by his side, and mingled with just reproaches a soothing pity for his rank and misfortune. "Alas!" said the emperor, "the decree of fate is now accomplished by your own fault: it is the web which you have woven, the thorns of the tree which yourself have planted. I wished to spare, and even to assist, the champion of the Moslems: you braved our threats, you despised our friendship, you forced us to enter your kingdom with our invincible armies. Behold the event. Had you vanquished, I am not ignorant of the fate which you reserved for myself and my troops. But I disdain to retaliate: your life and honour are secure, and I shall express my gratitude to God by my clemency to man." The royal captive showed some signs of repentance, accepted the humiliation of a robe of honour, and embraced with tears his son Mousa, who, at his request, was sought and found among the captives of the field. The Ottoman princes were lodged in a splendid pavilion, and the respect of the guards could be surpassed only by their vigilance. On the arrival of the harem from Bursa, Timour restored the queen Despina and her daughter to their father and husband, but he piously required, that the Servian princess, who had hitherto been indulged in the profession of christianity, should embrace without delay the religion of the prophet. In the feast of victory, to which Bajazet was invited, the Mogul emperor placed a crown on his head and a sceptre in his hand, with a solemn assurance of restoring him with an increase of glory to the throne of his ancestors. But the effect of this promise was disappointed by the sultan's untimely death: amidst the care of the most skilful physicians, he expired of an apoplexy at Akshehr, the Antioch of Pisidia, about nine months after his defeat. The victor dropped a tear over his grave, his body, with royal pomp, was conveyed to the mausoloum which he had erected at Bursa, and his son Mousa, after receiving a rich present of gold and jewels, of horses and arms, was invested by a patent in red ink with the kingdom of Anatolia.

Such is the portrait of a generous conqueror, which has been extracted from his own memorials, and dedicated to his son and grandson, nineteen years after his decease,<sup>a</sup> and, at a time when the truth was remembered by thousands, a manifest falsehood would have implied a satire on his real conduct. Weighty indeed is this evidence, adopted by all the Persian historians,<sup>b</sup> yet flattery, more especially in the east, is base and audacious, and the harsh and ignominious treatment of Bajazet is attested by a chain of witnesses, some of whom shall be produced in the order of their time and country. 1 The reader has not forgot<sup>c</sup> the garrison of Freuch, whom the marshal Boucicault left behind him for the defence of Constantinople. They were on the spot to receive the earliest and most faithful intelligence of the overthrow of their great adversary, and it is more than probable, that some of them accompanied the Greek embassy to the camp of Tamerlane. From their account, the hardships of the prison and death of Bajazet are affirmed by the marshal's servant and historian, within the distance of seven years.<sup>d</sup> 2 The name of Poggius the Italian<sup>e</sup> is deservedly famous among the re-<sup>2</sup> by the Italians, vivers of learning in the fifteenth century. His elegant dialogue on the vicissitudes of fortune<sup>f</sup> was composed in his fiftieth year, twenty-eight years after the Turkish victory of Tamerlane,<sup>g</sup> whom he celebrates as not inferior to the illustrious barbarians of antiquity. Of his exploits and discipline Poggius was informed by several ocular witnesses, nor does he forget an example so apposite to his theme as the Ottoman monarch, whom the Scythian confined like a wild beast in an iron cage, and

<sup>1</sup> For the war of Anatolia or Roum I add some hints in the Institutions to the copious narratives of Sherefeddin (l v c 44-65) and Arabshah, (tom ii c 20-35). On this part only of Timour's history, it is lawful to quote the Turks (Cantemir p 53-55 Annal Leonclaus p 320-322) and the Greeks. (Phranza, l i c 29 Ducas, c 15-17 Chalcondyles, l iii.)

<sup>2</sup> The scepticism of Voltaire (Essai sur l'Histoire Generale c 88) is ready on this, as on every occasion to reject a popular tale, and to diminish the magnitude of vice and virtue: and on most occasions his incredulity is reasonable.

<sup>3</sup> See the History of Sherefeddin (l v c 49 52 53 59, 60). This work was finished at Shiraz in the year 1424, and dedicated to Sultan Ibrahim, the son of Sharokh, the son of Timour, who reigned in Faristan in his father's lifetime.

<sup>4</sup> After the perusal of Khondemir Ebn Schounah &c. the learned D Herbetot (Biblioth. Orientale p 882) may affirm, that this fable is not mentioned in the most authentic histories: but his denial of the visible testimony of Arabshah leaves some room to suspect his accuracy.

<sup>a</sup> Et fut lui meme (Bajazet) pris et mené en prison, en laquelle mourut de dure mort. Memoires de Boucicault p i c 37. These memoirs were composed while the marshal was still governor of Genoa, from whence he was expelled in the year 1409 by a popular insurrection (Muratori, Annali d'Italia tom xii p 473, 474).

<sup>b</sup> The reader will find a satisfactory account of the life and writings of Poggius, in the Poggiana an entertaining work of M Lenfant, and in Bibliotheca Latina medice et infime Aetatis of Fabricius (tom i p 305-308). Poggius was born in the year 1380 and died in 1459.

<sup>c</sup> The dialogue de Varietate Fortunae (of which a complete and elegant edition has been published at Paris in 1723 in 4to) was composed a short time before the death of Pope Martin V (p 5) and consequently about the end of the year 1430.

<sup>d</sup> See a splendid and eloquent encomium of Tamerlane, p 36-39 ipse enim novi (says Poggius) qui fuerit in ejus castris Regem vivum cepti caveque in modum ferre inclisim per omnem Asiam er cunctis, e regium admirandumque spectaculum fortune.

exhibited a spectacle to Asia I might add the authority of two Italian chronicles, perhaps of an earlier date, which would prove at least that the same story, whether false or true, was imported into Europe with the first tidings of the revolution *

3 by the Arabs, 3 At the time when Poggius flourished at Rome, Ahmed Ebn Arabshah composed at Damascus the florid and malevolent history of Timour, for which he had collected materials in his journeys over Turkey and Tartary <sup>a</sup> Without any possible correspondence between the Latin and the Arabian writer, they agree in the fact of the iron cage, and their agreement is a striking proof of their common veracity Ahmed Arabshah likewise relates another outrage, which Bajazet endured, of a more domestic and tender nature. His indiscreet mention of women and divorces was deeply resented by the jealous Tartar in the feast of victory, the wine was served by female cup-bearers, and the sultan beheld his own concubines and wives confounded among the slaves, and exposed without a veil to the eyes of intemperance To escape a similar indignity, it is said, that his successors, except in a single instance, have abstained from legitimate nuptials, and the Ottoman practice and belief, at least in the sixteenth century, is attested by the observing Busbequius, <sup>i</sup> ambassador from the court of Vienna to the great Soli-man 4 Such is the separation of language, that the testimony of a Greek is not less independent than that of a Latin or an Arab I suppress the names of Chalcondyles and Ducas, who flourished in a later period, and who speak in a less positive tone, but more attention is due to George Phranza, <sup>k</sup> protovestiare of the last emperors, and who was born a year before the battle of Angora Twenty-two years after that event, he was sent ambassador to Amurath the second, and the historian might converse with some veteran janizaries, who had been made prisoners with the sultan, and had themselves seen him in his iron cage 5. The last evidence, in every sense, is that of the Turkish annals, which have been consulted or transcribed by Leunclavius, Pocock, and Cantemir <sup>l</sup> They unanimously deplore the captivity of the iron cage, and some credit may be allowed to national historians, who cannot stigmatize the Tartar without uncovering the shame of their king and country

4 by the Greeks, 4 Such is the separation of language, that the testimony of a Greek is not less independent than that of a Latin or an Arab I suppress the names of Chalcondyles and Ducas, who flourished in a later period, and who speak in a less positive tone, but more attention is due to George Phranza, <sup>k</sup> protovestiare of the last emperors, and who was born a year before the battle of Angora Twenty-two years after that event, he was sent ambassador to Amurath the second, and the historian might converse with some veteran janizaries, who had been made prisoners with the sultan, and had themselves seen him in his iron cage 5. The last evidence, in every sense, is that of the Turkish annals, which have been consulted or transcribed by Leunclavius, Pocock, and Cantemir <sup>l</sup> They unanimously deplore the captivity of the iron cage, and some credit may be allowed to national historians, who cannot stigmatize the Tartar without uncovering the shame of their king and country

Probable conclusion From these opposite premises, a fair and moderate conclusion may be deduced I am satisfied that Shercofeddin Ali has faithfully described the first ostentatious interview,

<sup>g</sup> The Chronicle Tarvisianum, (in Muratori, Script. Rerum Italicarum, tom. xix p. 800) and the Annales Estenses (tom. xviii p. 974) The two authors, Andrea de Reduensis de Quero, and James de Delayto, were both contemporaries, and both chancellors, the one of Treviso, the other of Ferrara The evidence of the former is the most positive.

<sup>h</sup> See Arabshah, tom. ii c. 28 34 He travelled in regiones Rumæas, A. H. 839 (A. D. 1435, July 27) tom. ii c. 2, p. 13

<sup>i</sup> Busbequius in Legatione Turcica epist. i p. 52 Yet his respectable authority is somewhat shaken by the subsequent marriages of Amurath II with a Servian, and of Mahomet II with an Asiatic, princess (Cantemir, p. 83 93)

<sup>k</sup> See the testimony of George Phranza, (l. i c. 29) and his life in Hancinius, (de Script. Byzant.) p. i c. 40 Chalcondyles and Ducas speak in general terms of Bajazet's chains

4 G 2

in which the conqueror, whose spirits were harmonized by success, affected the character of generosity But his mind was insensibly alienated by the unseasonable arrogance of Bajazet, the complaints of his enemies, the Anatolian princes, were just and vehement, and Timour betrayed a design of leading his royal captive in triumph to Samarcand An attempt to facilitate his escape, by digging a mine under the tent, provoked the Mogul emperor to impose a harsher restraint, and in his perpetual marches, an iron cage on a waggon might be invented, not as a wanton insult, but as a rigorous precaution Timour had read in some fabulous history a similar treatment of one of his predecessors, a king of Persia, and Bajazet was condemned to represent the person, and expiate the guilt, of the Roman Cæsar <sup>m</sup> But the strength of his mind and body fainter under the trial, and his premature death might, without injustice, be ascribed to the severity of Timour He warred not with the dead, a tear and a sepulchre was all that he could bestow on a captive who was delivered from his power, and if Mousa, the son of Bajazet, was permitted to reign over the ruins of Bursa, the greatest part of the province of Anatolia had been restored by the conqueror to their lawful sovereigns

Death of Bajazet
A. D. 1403
March 9

From the Irish and Volga to the Persian gulf, and from the Ganges to Damascus and the Archipelago, Asia

Term of the conquests of Timour,
A. D. 1403

was in the hands of Timour, his armies were invincible, his ambition was boundless, and his zeal might aspire to conquer and convert the christian kingdoms of the west, which already trembled at his name He touched the utmost verge of the land, but an insuperable, though narrow, sea rolled between the two continents of Europe and Asia, <sup>n</sup> and the lord of so many tomans, or myriads, of horse, was not master of a single galley The two passages of the Bosphorus and Hellespont, of Constantinople and Gallipoli, were possessed, the one by the christians, the other by the Turks On this great occasion, they forgot the difference of religion, to act with union and firmness in the common cause the double straits were guarded with ships and fortifications, and they separately withheld the transports which Timour demanded of either nation, under the pretence of attacking their enemy At the same time, they soothed his pride with tributary gifts and suppliant embassies, and prudently tempted him to retreat with the honours of victory Soliman, the son of Bajazet, implored his clemency for his father and himself, accepted, by a red patent, the invest-

<sup>l</sup> Annales Leunclavi p. 321 Pocock, Prolegomena ad Abulpharag. Dynast. Cantemir, p. 55

<sup>m</sup> A Sapor, king of Persia had been made prisoner, and enclosed in the figure of a cow &c. by Maximian or Galerius Cæsar Such is the fable related by Eutychius (Annal. tom. i p. 421 vers. Pocock) The recollection of the true history (Decline and Fall, &c. p. 147-150) will teach us to appreciate the knowledge of the orientals of the ages which precede the Hegira

<sup>n</sup> Arabshah (tom. ii c. 25) describes like a curious traveller, the straits of Gallipoli and Constantinople To acquire a just idea of these events, I have compared the narratives and prejudices of the Moguls, Turks, Greeks, and Arabians The Spanish ambassador mentions this hostile union, of the christians and Ottomans (Vie de Timour, p. 95)

ture of the kingdom of Romania, which he already held by the sword, and reiterated his ardent wish, of casting himself in person at the feet of the king of the world. The Greek emperor<sup>o</sup> (either John or Mannel) submitted to pay the same tribute which he had stipulated with the Turkish sultan, and ratified the treaty by an oath of allegiance, from which he could absolve his conscience so soon as the Mogul arms had retired from Anatolia. But the fears and fancy of nations ascribed to the ambitious Tamerlane a new design of vast and romantic compass—a design of subduing Egypt and Africa, marching from the Nile to the Atlantic Ocean, entering Europe by the straits of Gibraltar, and, after imposing his yoke on the kingdoms of Christendom, of returning home by the deserts of Russia and Tartary. This remote, and perhaps imaginary, danger was averted by the submission of the sultan of Egypt—the honours of the prayer and the coin, attested at Cairo the supremacy of Timour, and a rare gift of a giraffe, or camelopard, and nine ostriches, represented at Samarcand the tribute of the African world. Our imagination is not less astonished by the portrait of a Mogul, who, in his camp, before Smyrna, meditates, and almost accomplishes, the invasion of the Chinese empire<sup>p</sup>. Timour was urged to this enterprise by national honour and religious zeal. The torrents which he had shed of musulman blood could be expiated only by an equal destruction of the infidels, and as he now stood at the gates of paradise, he might best secure his glorious entrance by demolishing the idols of China, founding mosques in every city, and establishing the profession of faith in one God, and his prophet Mahomet. The recent expulsion of the house of Zingis was an insult on the Mogul name, and the disorders of the empire afforded the fairest opportunity for revenge. The illustrious Hongvon, founder of the dynasty of Ming, died four years before the battle of Angora, and his grandson, a weak and unfortunate youth, was burnt in his palace, after a million of Chinese had perished in the civil war<sup>q</sup>. Before he evacuated Anatolia, Timour despatched beyond the Sihoon a numerous army, or rather colony, of his old and new subjects, to open the road, to subdue the pagan Calmucks and Mungals, and to found cities and magazines in the desert, and, by the diligence of his lieutenant, he soon received a perfect map and description of the unknown regions, from the source of the Irtysh to the wall of China. During these preparations, the emperor achieved the final conquest of Georgia, passed the winter on the banks of the Araxes, appeased the troubles of Persia, and slowly returned to his capital, after a campaign of four years and nine months.

On the throne of Samarcand, he displayed, in a short repose, his magnificence and power, listened to the complaints of the people, distributed a just measure of rewards and punishments, employed his riches in the architecture of palaces and temples, and gave audience to the ambassadors of Egypt, Arabia, India, Tartary, Russia, and Spain, the last of whom presented a suit of tapestry which eclipsed the pencil of the oriental artists. The marriage of six of the emperor's grandsons was esteemed an act of religion as well as of paternal tenderness, and the pomp of the ancient caliphs was revived in their nuptials. They were celebrated in the gardens of Canighul, decorated with innumerable tents and pavilions, which displayed the luxury of a great city, and the spoils of a victorious camp. Whole forests were cut down to supply fuel for the kitchens, the plain was spread with pyramids of meat, and vases of every liquor, to which thousands of guests were courteously invited. The orders of the state, and the nations of the earth, were marshalled at the royal banquet, nor were the ambassadors of Europe (says the haughty Persian) excluded from the feast, since even the casses, the smallest of fish, find their place in the ocean<sup>r</sup>. The public joy was testified by illuminations and masquerades, the trades of Samarcand passed in review, and every trade was emulous to execute some quaint device, some marvellous pageant, with the materials of their peculiar art. After the marriage contracts had been ratified by the cadhis, the bridegrooms and their brides retired to the nuptial chambers, nine times, according to the Asiatic fashion, they were dressed and undressed, and at each change of apparel, pearls and rubies were showered on their heads, and contemptuously abandoned to their attendants. A general indulgence was proclaimed: every law was relaxed, every pleasure was allowed, the people were free, the sovereign was idle, and the historian of Timour may remark, that, after devoting fifty years to the attainment of empire, the only happy period of his life were the two months in which he ceased to exercise his power. But he was soon awakened to the cares of government and war. The standard was unfurled for the invasion of China. The emirs made their report of two hundred thousand, the select and veteran soldiers of Iran and Touran: their baggage and provisions were transported by five hundred great waggons, and an immense train of horses and camels, and the troops

His triumph at Samarcand
A D 1404
July—
A D 1405
January 8

<sup>o</sup> Since the name of Caesar had been transferred to the sultans of Room the Greek princes of Constantinople (Sherefeddin I v c. 51) were confounded with the christian lords of Gallipoli. Thesalonica, &c. under the title of Tekkur which is derived by corruption from the genuine rex christi (Caotemir p. 51).

<sup>p</sup> See Sherefeddin I v c. 4 who marks, in a just itinerary, the road to China which Arababab (tom. ii c. 33.) paints in vague and rhetorical colours.

<sup>q</sup> Synopsis Hist Sinica p. 74—76. (in the fourth part of the Relations de Thuercent, Dohalé, Hist. de la Chine. tom. i p. 507 508 folio addition) and for the Chronology of the Chinese emperors, De Guignes, Hist. des Huns tom. i p. 71 72.

<sup>r</sup> For the return triumph and death of Timour, see Sherefeddin (I v c. 1—30) and Arababab. (tom. ii c. 30—47).

<sup>s</sup> Sherefeddin (I v c. 24) mentions the ambassadors of one of the most potent sovereigns of Europe. We know that it was Henry III. king of Castile and the curious relation of his two embassies is still extant (Mariana Hist. Hispan. l. xix. c. 11 tom. ii p. 329 330). Avertissement a l'Hist. de Timur Bec p. 28—33. There appears likewise to have been some correspondence between the Mogul emperor and the court of Charles VII. king of France. (Histoire de France, par Velly et Villaret, tom. xii p. 336).

might, replete for a long absence, since more than six months were employed in the tranquil journey of a caravan from Samarcand to Peking. Neither age, nor the severity of the winter, could retard the impatience of Timour, he mounted on horseback, passed the Sihoon on the ice, marched seventy-six parasangs, three hundred miles, from his capital, and pitched his last camp in the neighbourhood of Otrar, where he was expected by the angel of death.

His death on the road to China, A. D. 1405 April 1. Fatigue, and the indiscreet use of iced water, accelerated the progress of his fever, and the conqueror of Asia expired in the seventieth year of his age, thirty-five years after he had ascended the throne of Zagatai. His designs were lost, his armies were disbanded, China was saved, and fourteen years after his decease, the most powerful of his children sent an embassy of friendship and commerce to the court of Peking.

Character and merits of Timour. The fame of Timour has pervaded the east and west, his posterity is still invested with the imperial title, and the admiration of his subjects, who revered him almost as a deity, may be justified in some degree by the praise or confession of his bitterest enemies. Although he was lame of a hand and foot, his form and stature were not unworthy of his rank, and his vigorous health, so essential to himself and to the world, was corroborated by temperance and exercise. In his familiar discourse he was grave and modest, and if he was ignorant of the Arabic language, he spoke with fluency and elegance the Persian and Turkish idioms. It was his delight to converse with the learned on topics of history and science, and the amusement of his leisure hours was the game of chess, which he improved or corrupted with new refinements. In his religion, he was a zealous, though not perhaps an orthodox, mussulman, but his sound understanding may tempt us to believe, that a superstitious reverence for omens and prophecies, for saints and astrologers, was only affected as an instrument of policy. In the government of a vast empire, he stood alone and absolute, without a rebel to oppose his power, a favourite to seduce his affections, or a minister to mislead his judgment. It was his firmest maxim, that whatever might be the consequence, the word of the prince should never be disputed or recalled; but his foes have maliciously observed, that the commands of anger and destruction were more strictly executed than those of beneficence and favour. His sons and grandsons, of whom Timour left six and thirty at his decease, were his first and most submissive subjects, and whenever they deviated from their duty, they were corrected according to the laws of Zingis, with the bastonade, and afterwards restored to honour and command. Perhaps his heart was not devoid of the social virtues, perhaps he was not incapable of loving his friends and pardoning his enemies, but the rules of morality are founded on the public interest, and it may be sufficient to applaud the wisdom of a monarch, for the liberality by which he is not impoverished, and for the justice by which he is strengthened and enriched. To maintain the harmony of authority and obedience, to chastise the proud, to protect the weak, to reward the deserving, to banish vice and idleness from his dominions, to secure the traveller and merchant, to restrain the depredations of the soldier, to cherish the labours of the husbandman, to encourage industry and learning, and, by an equal and moderate assessment, to increase the revenue, without increasing the taxes, are indeed the duties of a prince, but, in the discharge of these duties, he finds an ample and immediate recompence. Timour might boast, that, at his accession to the throne, Asia was the prey of anarchy and rapine, whilst under his prosperous monarchy a child, fearless and unhurt, might carry a purse of gold from the east to the west. Such was his confidence of merit, that from this reformation he derived excuse for his victories, and a title to universal dominion. The four following observations will serve to appreciate his claim to the public gratitude, and perhaps we shall conclude, that the Mogul emperor was rather the scourge than the benefactor of mankind. 1 If some partial disorders, some local oppressions, were healed by the sword of Timour, the remedy was far more pernicious than the disease. By their rapine, cruelty, and discord, the petty tyrants of Persia might afflict their subjects, but whole nations were crushed under the footsteps of the reformer. The ground which had been occupied by flourishing cities, was often marked by his abominable trophies, by columns, or pyramids, of human heads. Astracan, Carizme, Delhi, Ispahan, Bagdad, Aleppo, Damascus, Bouisa, Smyrna, and a thousand others, were sacked, or burnt, or utterly destroyed, in his presence, and by his troops, and perhaps his conscience would have been startled, if a priest or philosopher had dared to number the millions of victims whom he had sacrificed to the establishment of peace and order. 2 His most destructive wars were rather inroads than conquests. He invaded Turkestan, Kipzak, Russia, * See the translation of the Persian account of their embassy, a curious and original piece, (in the fourth part of the Relations de Thémur.) They presented the emperor of China with an old horse which Timour had formerly rode. It was in the year 1419, that they departed from the court of Herat, to which place they returned in 1422 from Peking.

† From Arabshah tom ii c 99. The bright or softer colours are borrowed from Sherefeddin, D Herbelot, and the Institutions.

‡ His new system was multiplied from 32 pieces and 61 squares to 56 pieces and 110 or 130 squares; but, except in his court, the old game has been thought sufficiently elaborate. The Mogul emperor was rather pleased than hurt with the victory of a subject a chess player will feel the value of this encomium.

§ See Sherefeddin l v c 15 25 Arabshah (tom ii c 96 p 801 803) reproves the impiety of Timour and the Moguls who almost preferred to the Koran the gasca, or law of Zin, (qui Deus maledical) nor will he believe that Sharakh had abolished the use and authority of that pagan code.

¶ Besides the bloody passages of this narrative, I must refer to an anticipation in the Decline and Fall which in a single note (p 558 note b) accumulates near 300 000 heads of the monuments of his cruelty. Except in Rowe's play on the fifth of November, I did not expect to hear of Timour's amiable moderation. (Which is preface, p 7.) Yet I can excuse a generous enthusiasm in the reader, and still more in the editor, of the Institutions.

Hindustan, Syria, Anatolia, Armenia, and Georgia, without a hope or a desire of preserving those distant provinces. From thence he departed laden with spoil, but he left behind him neither troops to awe the contumacious, nor magistrates to protect the obedient natives. When he had broken the fabric of their ancient government, he abandoned them to the evils which his invasion had aggravated or caused, nor were these evils compensated by any present or possible benefits. 3 The kingdoms of Transoxiana and Persia were the proper field which he laboured to cultivate and adorn, as the perpetual inheritance of his family. But his peaceful labours were often interrupted, and sometimes blasted, by the absence of the conqueror. While he triumphed on the Volga or the Ganges, his servants, and even his sons, forgot their master and their duty. The public and private injuries were poorly redressed by the tardy rigour of inquiry and punishment, and we must be content to praise the institutions of Timour, as the specious idea of a perfect monarchy. 4 Whatsoever might be the blessings of his administration, they evaporated with his life. To reign, rather than to govern, was the ambition of his children and grandchildren, the enemies of each other and of the people. A fragment of the empire was upheld with some glory by Sharokh, his youngest son, but after his decease, the scene was again involved in darkness and blood, and before the end of a century, Transoxiana and Persia were trampled by the Uzbeks from the north, and the Turkman of the black and white sheep. The race of Timour would have been extinct, if a hero, his descendant in the fifth degree, had not fled before the Uzbek arms to the conquest of Hindostan. His successors (the great Moguls<sup>b</sup>) extended their sway from the mountains of Cashmir to Cape Comorin, and from Candahar to the gulf of Bengal. Since the reign of Aurungzebe, their empire has been dissolved, their treasures of Delhi have been rifled by a Persian robber, and the richest of their kingdoms is now possessed by a company of christian merchants, of a remote island in the northern ocean.

Civil wars of the sons of Bajazet
A D 1403—1421

Far different was the fate of the Ottoman monarchy. The massy trunk was bent to the ground, but no sooner did the hurricane pass away, than it again arose with fresh vigour and more lively vegetation. When Timour, in every sense, had evacuated Anatolia, he left the cities without a palace, a treasure, or a king. The open country was overspread with hordes of shepherds and robbers of Tartar or Turkman origin, the recent conquests of Bajazet were restored to the emirs, one of whom, in base revenge, demolished his sepulchre, and his five sons were eager, by civil discord, to consume the remnant of their patrimony. I shall enumerate their names in the order of their age and actions.<sup>c</sup> 1 <sup>1</sup> Mustapha, It is doubtful, whether I relate the story of the true Mustapha, or of an impostor who personated that lost prince. He fought by his father's side in the battle of Angora, but when the captive sultan was permitted to inquire for his children, Mousa alone could be found, and the Turkish historians, the slaves of the triumphant faction, are persuaded that his brother was confounded among the slain. If Mustapha escaped from that disastrous field, he was concealed twelve years from his friends and enemies, till he emerged in Thessaly, and was hailed by a numerous party, as the son and successor of Bajazet. His first defeat would have been his last, had not the true, or false, Mustapha been saved by the Greeks, and restored, after the decease of his brother Mahomet, to liberty and empire. A degenerate mind seemed to argue his spurious birth, and if, on the throne of Adrianople, he was adored as the Ottoman sultan, his flight, his fetters, and an ignominious gibbet, delivered the impostor to popular contempt. A similar character and claim was asserted by several rival pretenders, thirty persons are said to have suffered under the name of Mustapha, and these frequent executions may perhaps insinuate, that the Turkish court was not perfectly secure of the death of the lawful prince. 2 <sup>2</sup> Isa, After his father's captivity, Isa<sup>d</sup> reigned for some time in the neighbourhood of Angora, Sinope, and the Black sea, and his ambassadors were dismissed from the presence of Timour with fair promises and honourable gifts. But their master was soon deprived of his province and life, by a jealous brother, the sovereign of Amasia, and the final event suggested a pious allusion, that the law of Moses and Jesus, of Isa and Mousa, had been abrogated by the greater Mahomet. 3 <sup>3</sup> Soliman, Soliman is not numbered in the lists of A D 1403—1410 the Turkish emperors, yet he checked the victorious progress of the Moguls, and after their departure, united for a while the thrones of Adrianople and Bursa. In war he was brave, active, and fortunate; his courage was softened by clemency, but it was likewise inflamed by presumption, and corrupted by intemperance and idleness. He relaxed the nerves of discipline, in a government where either the subject or the sovereign must continually tremble; his vices alienated the chiefs of the army and the law, and his daily drunkenness, so contemptible in a prince and a man, was doubly odious in a disciple of the prophet. In the slumber of intoxication he was surprised by his brother Monsa, and as he fled from Adrianople towards the Byzantine capital, Soliman was overtaken and slain in a bath, after a reign of seven years and ten months.

<sup>a</sup> Consult the last chapters of Sherifeddin and Arabshah and M de Cingnes (H. I. des Huns tom. iv. l. xx.) Fraser's History of Nadir Shah p. 1—62. The story of Timour a descendant is imperfectly told and the second and third parts of Sherifeddin are unknown.
<sup>b</sup> Shah Allum the present Mogul is in the fourteenth degree from Timour by Miran Shah his third son. See the second volume of Dow's History of Hindostan.

<sup>c</sup> The civil wars from the death of Bajazet to that of Mustapha are related according to the Turks by Demetrius Cantemir (p. 58—82.) Of the Greeks, Chalcondyles, (l. ix. and v.) Phranza (l. i. c. 30—32.) and Duca (c. 15—27.) the last is the most copious and best informed.
<sup>d</sup> Arabshah tom. ii. c. 26 whose testimony on this occasion is weighty and valuable. The existence of Isa (unknown to the Turks) is likewise confirmed by Sherifeddin, (l. v. c. 57.)

more popular orator proposed to vindicate the meanest citizen from either foreign or domestic injury, whenever he called upon his fellow-countrymen to assert the national honour, or to pursue some enterprise full of danger and glory, a loud clashing of shields and spears expressed the eager applause of the assembly. For the Germans always met in arms, and it was constantly to be dreaded, lest an irregular multitude, inflamed with faction and strong liquors, should use those arms to enforce, as well as to declare, their furious resolves. We may recollect how often the diets of Poland have been polluted with blood, and the more numerous party has been compelled to yield to the more violent and seditious.<sup>2</sup>

Authority of the princes and magistrates

A general of the tribe was elected on occasions of danger, and, if the danger was pressing and extensive, several tribes concurred in the choice of the same general. The bravest warrior was named to lead his countrymen into the field, by his example, rather than by his commands. But this power, however limited, was still invidious. It expired with the war, and in time of peace the German tribes acknowledged not any supreme chief.<sup>3</sup> Princes were, however, appointed, in the general assembly, to administer justice, or rather to compose differences,<sup>4</sup> in their respective districts. In the choice of these magistrates, as much regard was shown to birth as to merit.<sup>5</sup> To each was assigned, by the public, a guard, and a council of an hundred persons, and the first of the princes appears to have enjoyed a pre-eminence of rank and honour which sometimes tempted the Romans to compliment him with the regal title.<sup>6</sup> more absolute over the property than over the persons of the Germans.

The comparative view of the powers of the magistrates, in two remarkable instances, is alone sufficient to represent the whole system of German manners. The disposal of the landed property within their district was absolutely vested in their hands, and they distributed it every year according to a new division.<sup>7</sup> At the same time they were not authorized to punish with death, to imprison, or even to strike, a private citizen.<sup>8</sup> A people thus jealous of their persons, and careless of their possessions, must have been totally destitute of industry and the arts, but animated with a high sense of honour and independence.

Voluntary engagements The Germans respected only those duties which they imposed on themselves. The most obscure soldier resisted with disdain the authority of the magistrates. "The noblest youths blushed not to be numbered among the faithful companions of some renowned chief, to whom they devoted their arms and service. A noble emulation prevailed among the companions, to obtain the first place in the esteem of their chief, amongst the chiefs, to acquire the greatest number of valiant companions. To be ever surrounded by a band of select youths, was the pride and strength of the chiefs, their ornament in peace, their defence in war. The glory of such distinguished heroes diffused itself beyond the narrow limits of their own tribe. Presents and embassies solicited their friendship, and the fame of their arms often ensued victory to the party which they espoused. In the hour of danger it was shameful for the chief to be surpassed in valour by his companions, shameful for the companions not to equal the valour of their chief. To survive his fall in battle, was indelible infamy. To protect his person, and to adorn his glory with the trophies of their own exploits, were the most sacred of their duties. The chiefs combated for victory, the companions for the chief. The noblest warriors, whenever their native country was sunk in the laziness of peace, maintained their numerous bands in some distant scene of action, to exercise their restless spirit, and to acquire renown by voluntary dangers. Gifts worthy of soldiers, the warlike steed, the bloody and ever victorious lance were the rewards which the companions claimed from the liberality of their chief. The rude plenty of his hospitable board was the only pay that he could bestow, or they would accept. War, rapine, and the free-will offerings of his friends, supplied the materials of this munificence.<sup>9</sup> This institution, however it might accidentally weaken the several republics, invigorated the general character of the Germans, and even ripened amongst them all the virtues of which barbarians are susceptible, the faith and valour, the hospitality and the courtesy, so conspicuous long afterwards in the ages of chivalry. The honourable gifts, bestowed by the chief on his brave companions, have been supposed, by an ingenious writer, to contain the first rudiments of the fiefs, distributed, after the conquest of the Roman provinces, by the barbarian lords among their vassals, with a similar duty of homage and military service.<sup>10</sup> These conditions are, however, very repugnant to the maxims of the ancient Germans, who delighted in mutual presents, but without either imposing, or accepting, the weight of obligations.<sup>11</sup>

"In the days of chivalry, or more German chastity properly of romance, all the men were brave, and all the women were chaste," and notwithstanding the latter of these virtues is acquired and preserved with much more difficulty than the former, it is ascribed, almost without exception, to the wives of the ancient Germans. Polygamy was not in use, except among the princes, and among them only for

<sup>2</sup> Even in our ancient parliament the barons often carried a question not so much by the number of votes as by that of their armed followers.

<sup>3</sup> Cæsar de Bell. Gall. vi. 23.

<sup>4</sup> Minutius controversus is a very happy expression of Cæsar.

<sup>5</sup> Reges ex nobilitate duces ex virtute sumunt. Tacit. Germ. 7.

<sup>6</sup> Cluver. Germ. Ant. i. 1. c. 38.

<sup>7</sup> Cæsar vi. 22. Tacit. Germ. 26.

<sup>8</sup> Tacit. Germ. 7.

<sup>9</sup> Tacit. Germ. 11. 14.

<sup>10</sup> Esprit des Loix l. xxx. c. 3. The brilliant imagination of Montesquieu is corrected however by the dry cold reason of the Abbé de Mably. Observations sur l'Histoire de France tom. i. p. 354.

<sup>11</sup> Caudenti numeribus, sed uce datis impulant, nec acceptis obligantur. Tacit. Germ. c. 21.

<sup>4</sup> Mousa A. D 1410 4 The investiture of Mousa degraded him as the slave of the Moguls. his tributary kingdom of Anatolia was confined within a narrow limit, nor could his broken militia and empty treasury contend with the hardy and veteran bands of the sovereign of Romania. Mousa fled in disguise from the palace of Bursa, traversed the Propontis in an open boat, wandered over the Wallachian and Servian hills, and after some vain attempts, ascended the throne of Adrianople, so recently stained with the blood of Soliman. In a reign of three years and a half, his troops were victorious against the christians of Hungary and the Morea, but Mousa was ruined by his timorous disposition and unseasonable clemency. After resigning the sovereignty of Anatolia, he fell a victim to the perfidy of his ministers, and the superior ascen-

<sup>5</sup> Mahomet I A. D 1413-1421 5 The final victory of Mahomet was the just recompence of his prudence and moderation. Before his father's captivity, the royal youth had been intrusted with the government of Amasia, thirty days' journey from Constantinople, and the Turkish frontier against the christians of Trebizond and Georgia. The castle, in Asiatic warfare, was esteemed impregnable; and the city of Amasia, which is equally divided by the river Iris, rises on either side in the form of an amphitheatre, and represents on a smaller scale the image of Bagdad. In his rapid career, Timour appears to have overlooked this obscure and contumacious angle of Anatolia, and Mahomet, without provoking the conqueror, maintained his silent independence, and chased from the province the last stragglers of the Tartar host. He relieved himself from the dangerous neighbourhood of Isa, but in the contests of their more powerful brethren, his firm neutrality was respected, till, after the triumph of Mousa, he stood forth the heir and avenger of the unfortunate Soliman. Mahomet obtained Anatolia by treaty, and Romania by arms, and the soldier who presented him with the head of Mousa, was rewarded as the benefactor of his king and country. The eight years of his sole and peaceful reign were usefully employed in banishing the vices of civil discord, and restoring on a firmer basis the fabric of the Ottoman monarchy. His last care was the choice of two vizirs, Bajazet and Ibrahim,<sup>f</sup> who might guide the youth of his son Amurath, and such was their union and prudence, that they concealed above forty days the emperor's death, till the arrival of

<sup>e</sup> Arabshah loc. citat. Abulfeda, Geograph. tab. xvii. p. 302. Bus-bequius epist. i. p. 96, 97 in Itinere C. P. et Amasiano.

<sup>f</sup> The virtues of Ibrahim are praised by a contemporary Greek (Ducas c. 25). His descendants are the sole nobles in Turkey: they content themselves with the administration of his pious foundations, the sultan (Cantemir, p. 76).

<sup>g</sup> See Pachymer, (l. v. c. 29) Nicephorus Gregoras (l. ii. c. 1) Shereffeddin (l. v. c. 57) and Ducas (c. 25). The last of these, a curious and careful observer is entitled from his birth and station, to particular credit in all that concerns Ionia and the islands. Among the various that resorted to New Phocæa, he mentions the English (Αγγλικοί), an early evidence of Mediterranean trade.

<sup>h</sup> For the spirit of navigation, and freedom of ancient Phocæa, or rather of the Phocæans, consult the first book of Herodotus, and the

his successor in the palace of Bursa. A new war was kindled in Europe by the prince, or impostor, Mustapha, the first vizir lost his army and his head, but the more fortunate Ibrahim, whose name and family are still revered, extinguished the last pretender to the throne of Bajazet, and closed the scene of domestic hostility.

In these conflicts, the wisest Turks, and indeed the body of the nation, <sup>Reunion of the Ottoman empire, A. D 1421</sup> were strongly attached to the unity of the empire, and Romania and Anatolia, so often torn asunder by private ambition, were animated by a strong and invincible tendency of cohesion. Their efforts might have instructed the christian powers, and had they occupied, with a confederate fleet, the straits of Gallipoli, the Ottomans, at least in Europe, must have been speedily annihilated. But the schism of the west, and the factions and wars of France and England, diverted the Latins from this generous enterprise: they enjoyed the present respite, without a thought of futurity, and were often tempted by a momentary interest to serve the common enemy of their religion. A colony of Genoese,<sup>e</sup> which had been planted at Phocæa<sup>h</sup> on the Ionian coast, was enriched by the lucrative monopoly of alum,<sup>i</sup> and their tranquillity, under the Turkish empire, was secured by the annual payment of tribute. In the last civil war of the Ottomans, the Genoese governor, Adorno, a bold and ambitious youth, embraced the party of Amurath, and undertook, with seven stout galleys, to transport him from Asia to Europe. The sultan and five hundred guards embarked on board the admiral's ship; which was manned by eight hundred of the bravest Franks. His life and liberty were in their hands, nor can we, without reluctance, applaud the fidelity of Adorno, who, in the midst of the passage, knelt before him, and gratefully accepted a discharge of his arrears of tribute. They landed in sight of Mustapha and Gallipoli, two thousand Italians, armed with lances and battle-axes, attended Amurath to the conquest of Adrianople, and this venal service was soon repaid by the ruin of the commerce and colony of Phocæa.

If Timour had generously marched at the request, and to the relief, of the <sup>State of the Greek empire, A. D 1402-1425</sup> Greek emperor, he might be entitled to the praise and gratitude of the christians<sup>k</sup>. But a mussulman, who carried into Georgia the sword of persecution, and respected the holy warfare of Bajazet, was not disposed to pity or succour the idolaters of Europe. The Tartar followed the impulse of ambition, and the deliverance of Constantinople was the accidental consequence. When Mannel abdicated the government, it was his prayer, rather than his hope, that the ruin of the church and state might be delayed beyond his unhappy days, and after his return from a western pilgrimage, he expected every hour the news of the sad catastrophe. On a sudden, he was astonished and rejoiced by the intelligence of the retreat, the overthrow, and the captivity of the Ottoman. Manuel<sup>1</sup> immediately sailed from Modon in the Morea, ascended the throne of Constantinople, and dismissed his blind competitor to an easy exile in the isle of Lesbos. The ambassadors of the son of Bajazet were soon introduced to his presence, but their pride was fallen, their tone was modest, they were awed by the just apprehension, lest the Greeks should open to the Moguls the gates of Europe. Soliman saluted the emperor by the name of father, solicited at his hands the government or gift of Romania, and promised to deserve his favour by inviolable friendship, and the restitution of Thessalonia, with the most important places along the Strymon, the Propontis, and the Black sea. The alliance of Soliman exposed the emperor to the enmity and revenge of Mousa. The Turks appeared in arms before the gates of Constantinople, but they were repulsed by sea and land, and unless the city was guarded by some foreign mercenaries, the Greeks must have wondered at their own triumph. But, instead of prolonging the division of the Ottoman powers, the policy or passion of Manuel was tempted to assist the most formidable of the sons of Bajazet. He concluded a treaty with Mahomet, whose progress was checked by the insuperable barrier of Gallipoli: the sultan and his troops were transported over the Bosphorus, he was hospitably entertained in the capital, and his successful sally was the first step to the conquest of Romania. The ruin was suspended by the prudence and moderation of the conqueror: he faithfully discharged his own obligations and those of Soliman, respected the laws of gratitude and peace, and left the emperor guardian of his two younger sons, in the vain hope of saving them from the jealous cruelty of their brother Amurath. But the execution of his last testament would have offended the national honour and religion, and the divan unanimously pronounced, that the royal youths should never be abandoned to the custody and education of a christian dog. On this refusal, the Byzantine councils were divided: but the age and caution of Manuel yielded to the presumption of his son John, and they unsheathed a dangerous weapon of revenge, by dismissing the true or false Mustapha, who had long been detained as a captive and hostage, and for whose maintenance they received an annual pension of three hundred thousand aspers.<sup>m</sup> At the door of his prison, Mustapha subscribed to every proposal, and the keys of Gallipoli, or rather of Europe, were stipulated as the price of his deliverance. But no sooner was he seated on the throne of Romania, than he dismissed the Greek ambassadors with a smile of contempt, declaring, in a pious tone, that, at the day of judgment, he would rather answer for the violation of an oath, than for the surrender of a mussulman city into the hands of the infidels. The emperor was at once the enemy of the two rivals, from whom he had sustained, and to whom he had offered, an injury, and the victory of Amurath was followed, in the ensuing spring, by the siege of Constantinople.<sup>n</sup>

Geographical Index of his last and learned French translator, M Larcher, (tom. vii. p. 299).

<sup>i</sup> Phocæa is not enumerated by Pliny, (Hist. Nat. xxxv. 52.) among the places productive of alum. He reckons Egypt as the first and for the second the isle of Melos, whose alum mines are described by Tournefort, (tom. i. lettre iv.) a traveller and a naturalist. After the loss of Phocæa the Genoese in 1459 found that useful mineral in the isle of Ichia (Ismael Bouilland, ad Ducas, c. 25).

<sup>k</sup> The writer who has the most abused this fabulous generosity, is our ingenious Sir William Temple, (his Works, vol. iii. p. 349, 450 octavo edition,) that lover of exotic virtue. After the conquest of Russia, &c. and the passage of the Danube, his Tartar hero relieves, visits, admires, and refuses the city of Constantinople. His flattering pencil deviates in every line from the truth of history: yet his pleasing fictions are more excusable than the gross errors of Cantemir.

The religious merit of subduing the city of the Cæsars, attracted from Asia a crowd of volunteers, who aspired to the crown of martyrdom: their military ardour was inflamed by the promise of rich spoils and beautiful females, and the sultan's ambition was consecrated by the presence and prediction of Seid Beehar, a descendant of the prophet<sup>o</sup> who arrived in the camp, on a mule, with a venerable train of five hundred disciples. But he might blush, if a fanatic could blush, at the failure of his assurances. The strength of the walls resisted an army of two hundred thousand Turks, their assaults were repelled by the sallies of the Greeks and their foreign mercenaries, the old resources of defence were opposed to the new engines of attack, and the enthusiasm of the dervish, who was snatched to heaven in visionary converse with Mahomet, was answered by the credulity of the christians, who beheld the Virgin Mary, in a violet garment, walking on the rampart and animating their courage.<sup>p</sup> After a siege of two months, Amurath was recalled to Boursa by a domestic revolt, which had been kindled by Greek treachery, and was soon extinguished by the death of a guiltless brother. While he led his janizaries to new conquests in Europe and Asia, the Byzantine empire was indulged in a servile and precarious respite of thirty years. Manuel sunk into the grave, and John Palæologus was permitted to reign, for an annual tribute of three hundred thousand aspers, and the dereliction of almost all that he held beyond the suburbs of Constantinople.

In the establishment and restoration of the Turkish empire, the first merit must doubtless be assigned to the personal qualities of the sultans, since, in human life, the most important scenes will depend on the character of a single actor. By some shades of wisdom

<sup>1</sup> For the reigns of Manuel and John of Mahomet I and Amurath II see the Ottoman history of Cantemir (p. 70-90) and the three Greeks, Chaleondyles Phranza, and Ducas, who is still superior to his rivals.

<sup>m</sup> The Turkish asper (from the Greek ἀσπρὸς) is, or was a piece of white or silver money at present much debased but which was formerly equivalent to the 54th part, at least of a Venetian ducat or sequin and the 300,000 aspers a princely allowance or royal tribute may be computed at 2,000 sterling (Leunclav Pandect Turc p. 400-105).

<sup>n</sup> For the siege of Constantinople in 1422 see the particular and contemporary narrative of John Cananus published by Leo Allatius, at the end of his edition of Aecopolita (p. 188-199).

<sup>o</sup> Cantemir, p. 80. Cananus who describes Seid Beehar without name, him, supposes that the friend of Mahomet assumed in his amours the privilege of a prophet and that the fairest of the Greek nuns were promised to the saint and his disciples.

<sup>p</sup> For this marvellous apparition, Cananus appeals to the mussulman saint, but who will bear testimony for Seid Beehar?

Siege of Constantinople by Amurath II.
A D 1422.
June 10—
August 24

The emperor John Palæologus.
A D 1425
July 21—
A D 1448
October 31

Hereditary succession and merit of the Ottomans and virtue, they may be discriminated from each other, but, except in a single instance, a period of nine reigns, and two hundred and sixty-five years, is occupied, from the elevation of Othman to the death of Soliman, by a rare series of warlike and active princes, who impressed their subjects with obedience and their enemies with terror. Instead of the slothful luxury of the seraglio, the heirs of royalty were educated in the counsel and the field from early youth they were intrusted by their fathers with the command of provinces and armies, and this manly institution, which was often productive of civil war, must have essentially contributed to the discipline and vigour of the monarchy. The Ottomans cannot style themselves, like the Arabian caliphs, the descendants or successors of the apostle of God, and the kindred which they claim with the Tartar khans of the house of Zingis, appears to be founded in flattery rather than in truth.<sup>q</sup> Their origin is obscure, but their sacred and indefeasible right, which no time can erase, and no violence can infringe, was soon and unalterably implanted in the minds of their subjects. A weak or vicious sultan may be deposed and strangled, but his inheritance devolves to an infant or an idiot nor has the most daring rebel presumed to ascend the throne of his lawful sovereign.<sup>r</sup> While the transient dynasties of Asia have been continually subverted by a crafty vizir in the palace, or a victorious general in the camp, the Ottoman succession has been confirmed by the practice of five centuries, and is now incorporated with the vital principle of the Turkish nation.

Education and discipline of the Turks

To the spirit and constitution of that nation, a strong and singular influence may however be ascribed. The primitive subjects of Othman were the four hundred families of wandering Turkmans, who had followed his ancestors from the Oxus to the Sangar, and the plains of Anatolia are still covered with the white and black tents of their rustic brethren. But this original drop was dissolved in the mass of voluntary and vanquished subjects, who, under the name of Turks, are united by the common ties of religion, language, and manners. In the cities, from Erzeroum to Belgrade, that national appellation is common to all the Moslems, the first and most honourable inhabitants, but they have abandoned, at least in Romania, the villages, and the cultivation of the land, to the Christian peasants. In the vigorous age of the Ottoman government, the Turks were themselves excluded from all civil and military honours, and a servile class, an artificial people, was raised by the discipline of education to obey, to conquer, and to command.<sup>s</sup> From the time of Orchan and the first Amurath, the sultans were persuaded that a government of the sword must be renewed in each generation with new soldiers, and that such soldiers must be sought, not in effeminate Asia, but among the hardy and warlike natives of Europe. The provinces of Thrace, Macedonia, Albania, Bulgaria, and Servia, became the perpetual seminary of the Turkish army, and when the royal fifth of the captives was diminished by conquest, an inhuman tax, of the fifth child, or of every fifth year, was rigorously levied on the Christian families. At the age of twelve or fourteen years, the most robust youths were torn from their parents, their names were enrolled in a book, and from that moment they were clothed, taught, and maintained, for the public service. According to the promise of their appearance, they were selected for the royal schools of Bursa, Pera, and Adrianople, intrusted to the care of the bashaws, or dispersed in the houses of the Anatolian peasantry. It was the first care of their masters to instruct them in the Turkish language: their bodies were exercised by every labour that could fortify their strength, they learned to wrestle, to leap, to run, to shoot with the bow, and afterwards with the musket, till they were drafted into the chambers and companies of the janizaries, and severely trained in the military or monastic discipline of the order. The youths most conspicuous for birth, talents, and beauty, were admitted into the inferior class of agiamoglans, or the more liberal rank of whoglans, of whom the former were attached to the palace, and the latter to the person of the prince. In four successive schools, under the rod of the white eunuchs, the arts of horsemanship and of darting the javelin were their daily exercise, while those of a more studious cast applied themselves to the study of the Koran, and the knowledge of the Arabic and Persian tongues. As they advanced in seniority and merit, they were gradually dismissed to military, civil, and even ecclesiastical employments: the longer their stay, the higher was their expectation, till, at a mature period, they were admitted into the number of the forty agas, who stood before the sultan, and were promoted by his choice to the government of provinces and the first honours of the empire.<sup>t</sup> Such a mode of institution was admirably adapted to the form and spirit of a despotic monarchy. The ministers and generals were, in the strictest sense, the slaves of the emperor, to whose bounty they were indebted for their instruction and support. When they left the seraglio, and suffered their beards to grow as the symbol of enfranchisement, they found themselves in an important office, without faction or friendship, without parents and without heirs, dependent on the hand which had raised them.

<sup>q</sup> See Ricaut (l. i. c. 13). The Turkish sultans assume the title of khan. Yet Abulghazi is ignorant of his Ottoman cousins.

<sup>r</sup> The third grand vizir of the name of Kiuperli, who was slain at the battle of Brilankanen in 1691 (Caulemir, p. 382) presumed to say, that all the successors of Soliman had been fools or tyrants, and that it was time to abolish the race (Marsigli Stato Militare, &c. p. 28). This political heretic was a good wing and justified against the French minister (p. 434). His presumption condemns the singular exception of continuing offices in the same family.

<sup>s</sup> Chalcondyles (l. v.) and Ducis (c. 23) exhibit the rude lineaments of the Ottoman policy, and the transmutation of christian children into Turkish soldiers.

<sup>t</sup> This sketch of the Turkish education and discipline is chiefly borrowed from Ricaut's State of the Ottoman empire, the Stato Militare dell' Imperio Ottomano of count Marsigli, (in Hays, 1732 in folio), and a Description of the Seraglio, approved by Mr. Greaves himself, a curious traveller, and inserted in the second volume of his works.

from the dust, and which, on the slightest displeasure, could break in pieces these statues of glass, as they are aptly termed by the Turkish proverb.<sup>a</sup> In the slow and painful steps of education, their character and talents were unfolded to a discerning eye the man, naked and alone, was reduced to the standard of his personal merit, and, if the sovereign had wisdom to choose, he possessed a pure and boundless liberty of choice. The Ottoman candidates were trained by the virtues of abstinence to those of action, by the habits of submission to those of command. A similar spirit was diffused among the troops, and their silence and sobriety, their patience and modesty, have extorted the reluctant praise of their Christian enemies.<sup>b</sup> Nor can the victory appear doubtful, if we compare the discipline and exercise of the janizaries with the pride of birth, the independence of chivalry, the ignorance of the new levies, the mutinous temper of the veterans, and the vices of intemperance and disorder, which so long contaminated the armies of Europe.

The only hope of salvation for the Greek empire, and the adjacent kingdoms, would have been some more powerful weapon, some discovery in the art of war, that should give them a decisive superiority over their Turkish foes. Such a weapon was in their hands, such a discovery had been made in the critical moment of their fate. The chemists of China or Europe had found, by casual or elaborate experiments, that a mixture of salt-petre, sulphur, and charcoal, produces, with a spark of fire, a tremendous explosion. It was soon observed, that if the expansive force were compressed in a strong tube, a ball of stone or iron might be expelled with irresistible and destructive velocity. The precise æra of the invention and application of gunpowder<sup>c</sup> is involved in doubtful traditions and equivocal language, yet we may clearly discern, that it was known before the middle of the fourteenth century, and that before the end of the same, the use of artillery in battles and sieges, by sea and land, was familiar to the states of Germany, Italy, Spain, France, and England.<sup>d</sup> The priority of nations is of small account, none could derive any exclusive benefit from their previous or superior knowledge, and in the common improvement, they stood on the same level of relative power and military silence. Nor was it possible to circumscribe the secret within the pale of the church, it was disclosed to the Turks by the treachery of apostates and the selfish policy of rivals, and the sultans had sense to adopt, and wealth to reward, the talents of a Christian engineer. The Genoese, who transported Amurath into Europe, must be accused as his preceptors, and it was pro-

<sup>a</sup> From the series of one hundred and fifteen vizirs till the siege of Vienna (Maragli, p. 13) their place may be valued at three years and a half purchase.

<sup>b</sup> See the entertaining and judicious letters of Busbequius.

<sup>c</sup> The first and second volumes of Dr Watson's chemical Essays contain two valuable discourses on the discovery and composition of gunpowder.

<sup>d</sup> On this subject modern testimonies cannot be trusted. The original passages are collected by Ducauge (Gloss Latin tom. i. p. 675 Rombardie). But in the early doubtful twilight, the name sound, fire, and effect, that seem to express our artillery, may be fairly inter-ably by their bands that his cannon was cast and directed at the siege of Constantinople.<sup>e</sup> The first attempt was indeed unsuccessful, but in the general warfare of the age, the advantage was on their side who were most commonly the assailants, for a while the proportion of the attack and defence was suspended, and this thundering artillery was pointed against the walls and towers which had been erected only to resist the less potent engines of antiquity. By the Venetians, the use of gunpowder was communicated without reproach to the sultans of Egypt and Persia, their allies against the Ottoman power, the secret was soon propagated to the extremities of Asia, and the advantage of the European was confined to his easy victories over the savages of the new world. If we contrast the rapid progress of this mischievous discovery with the slow and laborious advances of reason, science, and the arts of peace, a philosopher, according to his temper, will laugh or weep at the folly of mankind.

CHAP LXVI

Applications of the eastern emperors to the popes — Visits to the west, of John the first, Manuel, and John the second Palæologus — Union of the Greek and Latin churches, promoted by the council of Basil, and concluded at Ferrara and Florence — State of literature at Constantinople — Its revival in Italy by the Greek fugitives — Curiosity and emulation of the Latins

In the four last centuries of the Greek emperors, their friendly or hostile aspect towards the pope and the Latins may be observed as the thermometer of their prosperity or distress, as the scale of the rise and fall of the barbarian dynasties. When the Turks of the house of Seljuk pervaded Asia, and threatened Constantinople, we have seen at the council of Placentia, the suppliant ambassadors of Alexius imploring the protection of the common father of the christians. No sooner had the arms of the French pilgrims removed the sultan from Nice to Iconium, than the Greek princes resumed, or avowed, their genuine hatred and contempt for the schismatics of the west, which precipitated the first downfall of their empire. The date of the Mogul invasion is marked in the soft and charitable language of John Vatanes. After the recovery of Constantinople, the throne of the first Palæologus was encompassed by foreign and domestic enemies as long as the sword of Charles was suspended over his head he basely courted the favour of the Roman pontiff, and sacrificed to the present danger his faith, his virtue, and the affection of his subjects. On the decease of Michael, the prince and people asserted the independence of the church, and the purity of their creed. the elder Andronicus neither feared nor loved the Latins, in his last distress pride was the safeguard of superstition, nor could he decently retract in his age the firm and orthodox declarations of his youth. His grandson, the younger Andronicus, was less a slave in his temper and situation, and the conquest of Bithynia by the Turks, admonished him to seek a temporal and spiritual alliance with the western princes. After a separation and silence of fifty years, a secret agent, the monk Barlaam, was despatched to pope Benedict the twelfth, and his artful instructions appear to have been drawn by the master-hand of the great domestic.<sup>a</sup> "Most holy father," was

Embassy of the younger Andronicus to pope Benedict XIII A.D. 1379

<sup>e</sup> The Turkish cannon, which Ducas (c. 30) first introduces before Belgrade (A.D. 1436) is mentioned by Chircondyles (l. v. p. 123) in 1422, at the siege of Constantinople.

<sup>a</sup> The arguments for a crusade and union

he commissioned to say, "the emperor is not less desirous than yourself of a union between the two churches. but in this delicate transaction, he is obliged to respect his own dignity and the prejudices of his subjects. The ways of union are two-fold, force, and persuasion. Of force, the inefficacy has been already tried, since the Latins have subdued the empire, without subduing the minds, of the Greeks. The method of persuasion, though slow, is sure and permanent. A deputation of thirty or forty of our doctors would probably agree with those of the Vatican, in the love of truth and the unity of belief, but on their return, what would be the use, the recompence of such agreement? the scorn of their brethren, and the reproaches of a blind and obstinate nation. Yet that nation is accustomed to reverence the general councils, which have fixed the articles of our faith, and if they reprobate the decrees of Lyons, it is because the eastern churches were neither heard nor represented in that arbitrary meeting. For this salutary end, it will be expedient, and even necessary, that a well-chosen legate should be sent into Greece, to convene the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, and, with their aid, to prepare a free and universal synod. But at this moment," continued the subtle agent, "the empire is assaulted and endangered by the Turks, who have occupied four of the greatest cities in Anatolia. The christian inhabitants have expressed a wish of returning to their allegiance and religion, but the forces and revenues of the emperor are insufficient for their deliverance. and the Roman legate must be accompanied, or preceded, by an army of Franks, to expel the infidels, and open a way to the holy sepulchre." If the suspicious Latins should require some pledge, some previous effect of the sincerity of the Greeks, the answers of Barlaam were perspicuous and rational. "1 A general synod can alone consummate the union of the churches, nor can such a synod be held till the three oriental patriarchs, and a great number of bishops, are enfranchised from the Mahometan yoke. 2 The Greeks are alienated by a long series of oppression and injury. they must be reconciled by some act of brotherly love, some effectual succour, which may fortify the authority and arguments of the emperor, and the friends of the union. 3 If some difference of faith or ceremonies should be found incurable, the Greeks however are the disciples of Christ, and the Turks are the common enemies of the christian name. The Armenians, Cyprians, and Rhodians, are equally attacked, and it will become the piety of the French princes to draw their swords in the general defence of religion. 4 Should the subjects of Andronicus be treated as the worst of schismatics, of heretics, of pagans, a judicious policy may yet instruct the powers of the west to embrace a useful ally, to uphold a sinking empire, to guard the confines of Europe, and rather to join the Greeks against the Turks, than to expect the union of the Turkish arms with the troops and treasures of captive Greece." The reasons, the offers, and the demands, of Andronicus, were eluded with cold and stately indifference. The kings of France and Naples declined the dangers and glory of a crusade. the pope refused to call a new synod to determine old articles of faith. and his regard for the obsolete claims of the Latin emperor and clergy engaged him to use an offensive superscription, "To the moderator<sup>b</sup> of the Greeks, and the persons who style themselves the patriarchs of the eastern churches." For such an embassy, a time and character less propitious could not easily have been found. Benedict the twelfth<sup>c</sup> was a dull peasant, perplexed with scruples, and immersed in sloth and wine. his pride might enrich with a third crown the papal tiara, but he was alike unfit for the regal and the pastoral office.

<sup>a</sup> This curious instruction was transcribed (I believe) from the Vatican archives, by Odoricus Raynaldus, in his Continuation of the Annals of Baronius (Rome, 1646-1677 in ten volumes in folio). I have contented myself with the Abbé Fleury, (Hist. Ecclesiastique, tom. x. p. 1-8) whose abstracts I have always found to be clear, accurate, and impartial.

<sup>b</sup> The ambiguity of this title is happy or ingenious, and moderator, is synonymous to rector gubernator, is a word of classical and even Ciceronian Latinity which may be found, not in the Glossary of Ducange, but in the Thesaurus of Robert Stephens.

After the decease of Andronicus, Negotiation of while the Greeks were distracted by Cantacuzene with Clement VI intestine war, they could not presume. A D 1348 to agitate a general union of the christians. But as soon as Cantacuzene had subdued and pardoned his enemies, he was anxious to justify, or at least to extenuate, the introduction of the Turks into Europe, and the nuptials of his daughter with a musulman prince. Two officers of state, with a Latin interpreter, were sent in his name to the Roman court, which was transplanted to Avignon, on the banks of the Rhone, during a period of seventy years, they represented the hard necessity which had urged him to embrace the alliance of the miscreants,

<sup>c</sup> The first epistle (sine titulo) of Petrarch exposes the danger of the basil and the incapacity of the pope. Hæc inter, vinn madidus, ævo præcipis, ac saporifero rore perfusus, junjam nutulal, dormitit, jani somno præcepis, alique (ultimam solus) ruit. Hæc quanto felicius patriam sulcasset aratro, quam scalmum prætorum ascendisset. This satire engages his biographer to weigh the virtues and vices of Benedict XII which have been exaggerated by Guichard and Glubelines, by p. 259 in not. xv p. 13-16. He gave occasion to the saying, Bibamus papaliter.

and pronounced by his command the specious and edifying sounds of union and crusade Pope Clement the sixth,<sup>d</sup> the successor of Benedict, received them with hospitality and honour, acknowledged the innocence of their sovereign, excused his distress, applauded his magnanimity, and displayed a clear knowledge of the state and revolutions of the Greek empire, which he had imbibed from the honest accounts of a Savoyard lady, an attendant of the empress Anne<sup>e</sup> If Clement was all endowed with the virtues of a priest, he possessed however the spirit and magnificence of a prince, whose liberal hand distributed benefices and kingdoms with equal facility Under his reign Avignon was the seat of pomp and pleasure in his youth he had surpassed the licentiousness of a baron, and the palace, nay, the bed-chamber, of the pope, was adorned, or polluted, by the visits of his female favourites The wars of France and England were adverse to the holy enterprise, but his vanity was amused by the splendid idea, and the Greek ambassadors returned with two Latin bishops, the ministers of the pontiff On their arrival at Constantinople, the emperor and the nuncios admired each other's piety and eloquence and their frequent conferences were filled with mutual praises and promises, by which both parties were amused, and neither could be deceived "I am delighted," said the devout Cantacuzene, "with the project of our holy war, which must redound to my personal glory, as well as to the public benefit of Christendom My dominions will give a free passage to the armies of France my troops, my galleys, my treasures, shall be consecrated to the common cause, and happy would be my fate, could I deserve and obtain the crown of martyrdom Words are insufficient to express the ardour with which I sigh for the re-union of the scattered members of Christ If my death could avail, I would gladly present my sword and my neck if the spiritual phoenix could arise from my ashes, I would erect the pile, and kindle the flame with my own hands" Yet the Greek emperor presumed to observe, that the articles of faith which divided the two churches had been introduced by the pride and precipitation of the Latins he disclaimed the servile and arbitrary steps of the first Palæologus, and firmly declared, that he would never submit his conscience unless to the decrees of a free and universal synod "The situation of the times," continued he, "will not allow the pope and myself to meet either at Rome or Constantinople, but some maritime city may be chosen on the verge of the two empires, to unite the bishops, and to instruct the faithful, of the east and west" The nuncios seemed content with the proposition, and Cantacuzene affects to deplore the failure of his hopes, which were soon overthrown by the death of Clement, and the different temper of his successor His own life was prolonged, but it was prolonged in a cloister, and, except by his prayers, the humble monk was incapable of directing the counsels of his pupil or the state<sup>f</sup>

Yet of all the Byzantine princes, that pupil, John Palæologus, was the best disposed to embrace, to believe, and to obey, the shepherd of the west

Treaty of John Palæologus I with Innocent
VI
A D 1355

His mother, Anne of Savoy, was baptized in the bosom of the Latin church her marriage with Andronicus imposed a change of name, of apparel, and of worship, but her heart was still faithful to her country and religion, she had formed the infancy of her son, and she governed the emperor, after his mind, or at least his stature, was enlarged to the size of man In the first year of his deliverance and restoration, the Turks were still masters of the Hellespont, the son of Cantacuzene was in arms at Adrianople, and Palæologus could depend neither on himself nor on his people By his mother's advice, and in the hope of foreign aid, he abjured the rights both of the church and state, and the act of slavery,<sup>g</sup> subscribed in purple ink, and sealed with the golden bull, was privately intrusted to an Italian agent The first article of the treaty is an oath of fidelity and obedience to Innocent the sixth and his successors, the supreme pontiffs of the Roman and catholic church The emperor promises to entertain with due reverence their legates and nuncios, to assign a palace for their residence, and a temple for their worship, and to deliver his second son Manuel as the hostage of his faith For these condescensions he requires a prompt succour of fifteen galleys, with five hundred men at arms, and a thousand archers, to serve against his christian and mussulman enemies Palæologus engages to impose on his clergy and people the same spiritual yoke, but as the resistance of the Greeks might be justly foreseen, he adopts the two effectual methods of corruption and education The legate was empowered to distribute the vacant benefices among the ecclesiastics who should subscribe the creed of the Vatican three schools were instituted to instruct the youth of Constantinople in the language and doctrine of the Latins, and the name of Andronicus, the heir of the empire, was enrolled as the first student Should he fail in the measures of persuasion or force, Palæologus declares himself unworthy to reign, transferred to the pope all regal and paternal authority, and invests Innocent with full power to regulate the

<sup>d</sup> See the original Lives of Clement VI in Muratori (Script. Rerum Italicarum tom. ii. p. 550—589) Matteo Villani (Chron. l. iii. c. 43) Muratori tom. xiv. p. 186) who styles him, molto cavallaresco poco religioso, Fleury (Hist. Eccles. tom. xx. p. 123) and the Vie de Petrarche (tom. ii. p. 42—45) The Abbe de Sade treats him with the most indulgence but he is a gentleman as well as a priest

<sup>e</sup> Her name (most probably corrupted) was Zampa. She had accompanied and alone remained with her mistress at Constantinople,

where her prudence, erudition and politeness deserved the praises of the Greeks themselves (Cantacuzen l. i. c. 42.)

<sup>f</sup> See this whole negotiation in Cantacuzene (l. iv. c. 9) who amidst the praises and virtues which he bestows on himself, reveals the uneariness of a guilty conscience

<sup>g</sup> See the inominous treaty in Fleury (Hist. Eccles. p. 151—154) from Raynaldus who drew it from the Vatican archives It was not worth the trouble of a pious forgery family, the government, and the marriage, of his son and successor. But this treaty was neither executed nor published. The Roman galleys were as vain and imaginary as the submission of the Greeks, and it was only by the secrecy, that their sovereign escaped the dishonour of this fruitless humiliation.

The tempest of the Turkish arms soon burst on his head, and, after the loss of Adrianople and Romania, he was enclosed in his capital, the vassal of the haughty Amurath, with the miserable hope of being the last devoured by the savage. In this abject state, Palæologus embraced the resolution of embarking for Venice, and casting himself at the feet of the pope, he was the first of the Byzantine princes who had ever visited the unknown regions of the west, yet in them alone he could seek consolation or relief. And with less violation of his dignity he might appear in the sacred college than at the Ottoman Porte. After a long absence, the Roman pontiffs were returning from Avignon to the banks of the Tiber, Urban the fifth,<sup>h</sup> of a mild and virtuous character, encouraged or allowed the pilgrimage of the Greek prince, and, within the same year, enjoyed the glory of receiving in the Vatican the two imperial shadows who represented the majesty of Constantine and Charlemagne. In this suppliant visit, the emperor of Constantinople, whose vanity was lost in his distress, gave more than could be expected of empty sounds and formal submissions. A previous trial was imposed, and in the presence of four cardinals, he acknowledged, as a true catholic, the supremacy of the pope, and the double procession of the Holy Ghost. After this purification he was introduced to a public audience in the church of St Peter, Urban, in the midst of the cardinals, was seated on his throne, the Greek monarch, after three genuflections, devoutly kissed the feet, the hands, and at length the mouth, of the holy father, who celebrated high mass in his presence, allowed him to lead the bridle of his rule, and treated him with a sumptuous banquet in the Vatican. The entertainment of Palæologus was friendly and honourable, yet some difference was observed between the emperors of the east and west,<sup>i</sup> nor could the former be entitled to the rare privilege of chanting the gospel in the rank of a deacon.<sup>k</sup> In favour of his proselyte, Urban strove to rekindle the zeal of the French king, and the other powers of the west, but he found them cold in the general cause, and active only in their domestic quarrels. The last hope of the emperor was in an English mercenary, John Hawkwood,<sup>l</sup> or Acuto, who with a band of adventurers, the white brotherhood, had ravaged Italy from the Alps to Calabria, sold his services to the hostile states, and incurred a just excommunication by shooting his arrows against the papal residence. A special licence was granted to negotiate with the outlaw, but the forces, or the spirit, of Hawkwood were unequal to the enterprise, and it was for the advantage, perhaps, of Palæologus to be disappointed of a succour that must have been costly, that could not be effectual, and which might have been dangerous.<sup>m</sup> The disconsolate Greek<sup>n</sup> prepared for his return, but even his return was impeded by a most ignominious obstacle. On his arrival at Venice, he had borrowed large sums at exorbitant usury, but his coffers were empty, his creditors were impatient, and his person was detained as the best security for the payment. His eldest son Andronicus, the regent of Constantinople, was repeatedly urged to exhaust every resource, and, even by stripping the churches, to extricate his father from captivity and disgrace. But the unnatural youth was insensible of the disgrace, and secretly pleased with the captivity of the emperor, the state was poor, the clergy were obstinate, nor could some religious scruple be wanting to excuse the guilt of his indifference and delay. Such undutiful neglect was severely reproved by the piety of his brother Manuel, who instantly sold or mortgaged all that he possessed, embarked for Venice, relieved his father, and pledged his own freedom to be responsible for the debt. On his return to Constantinople, the parent and king distinguished his two sons with suitable rewards, but the faith and manners of the slothful Palæologus had not been improved by his Roman pilgrimage, and his apostasy or conversion devoid of any spiritual or temporal effects, was speedily forgotten by the Greeks and Latins.<sup>o</sup>

Thirty years after the return of Palæologus, his son and successor, Manuel, from a similar motive, but on a larger scale, again visited the countries of the west. In a preceding chapter I have related his treaty with

<sup>h</sup> See the two first original Lives of Urban V (in Muratori, Script. Rerum Italicarum, tom iii p 11 p 623 630) and the Ecclesiastical Annals of Spandanus (tom i p 571 A D 1369 No 7) and Raynaldus, (Flcury, Hist. Leetes tom xx p 223 224). Yet, from some variations I suspect the papal writers of slightly magnifying the genuflections of Palæologus.

<sup>i</sup> Paulo minus quam si fuisset imperator Romanorum. Yet his title of imperialor Græcorum was no longer disputed (Vit. Urban V p 623).

<sup>k</sup> It was confined to the successors of Charlemagne, and to them only on Christmas day. On all other festivals these imperial deacons were content to serve the pope, as he said mass, with the book and the corporal. Yet the Abbé de Sade generously thinks that the merits of Charles IV might have entitled him, though not on the proper day, (A D 1368 November 1) to the whole privilege. He seems to asfix just value on the privilege, and the man (Vic de Pelrarque, tom iii p 735).

<sup>l</sup> Through some Italian corruption the etymology of Falcone in bosco (Matthieu Villani, l xi c 79 in Muratori, tom xv p 746) suggests the English word Hawkwood, the true name of our adventurous

countryman (Thomas Walsingham, Hist. Anglican inter Scriptores Cambdeni p 184). After two and twenty victories, and one defeat, he died, in 1394, general of the Florentines, and was buried with such honours as the republic has not paid to Dante or Petrarch (Muratori, Annali d'Italia, tom xii p 212-371).

<sup>m</sup> This torrent of English (by birth or service) overflowed from France into Italy after the peace of Bretigny in 1360. Yet the exclamation of Muratori (Annali, tom xii p 197) is rather true than evil. "Ci maneava ancor questo, che dopo essere cospirata l'Italia da tanti misfatti Tedeschi ed Ungheri, venissero fin dall'Inghilterra nuovi cani a finire di divorarla."

<sup>n</sup> Chalcondyles, l i p 25, 26. The Greek supposes his journey to the king of France, which is sufficiently refuted by the silence of the national historians. Nor am I much more inclined to believe that Palæologus departed from Italy, valde bene consolatus et contentus (Vit. Urban V p 623).

<sup>o</sup> His return in 1370, and the coronation of Manuel Sept 25, 1373, (Ducange Fam. Byzant p 241) leaves some intermediate era for the conspiracy and punishment of Andronicus.

Bajazet, the violation of that treaty, the siege or blockade of Constantinople, and the French succour under the command of the gallant Boucicault.<sup>p</sup> By his ambassadors, Manuel had solicited the Latin powers, but it was thought that the presence of a distressed monarch would draw tears and supplies from the hardest barbarians,<sup>q</sup> and the marshal who advised the journey, prepared the reception, of the Byzantine prince. The land was occupied by the Turks, but the navigation of Venice was safe and open. Italy received him as the first, or at least as the second, of the christian princes, Manuel was pitied as the champion and confessor of the faith, and the dignity of his behaviour prevented that pity from sinking into contempt. From Venice he proceeded to Padua and Pavia, and even the duke of Milan, a secret ally of Bajazet, gave him safe and honourable conduct to the verge of his dominions.<sup>r</sup>

On the confines of France<sup>s</sup> the royal officers undertook the care of his person, journey, and expenses, and two thousand of the richest citizens, in arms and on horseback, came forth to meet him as far as Charenton, in the neighbourhood of the capital. At the gates of Paris, he was saluted by the chancellor and the parliament, and Charles the sixth, attended by his princes and nobles, welcomed his brother with a cordial embrace. The successor of Constantine was clothed in a robe of white silk, and mounted on a milk-white steed, a circumstance, in the French ceremonial, of singular importance, the white colour is considered as the symbol of sovereignty, and, in a late visit, the German emperor, after a haughty demand and a peevish refusal, had been reduced to content himself with a black courser. Manuel was lodged in the Louvre, a succession of feasts and balls, the pleasures of the banquet and the chase, were ingeniously varied by the politeness of the French, to display their magnificence, and amuse his grief. He was indulged in the liberty of his chapel, and the doctors of the Sorbonne were astonished, and possibly scandalized, by the language, the rites, and the vestments, of his Greek clergy. But the slightest glance on the state of the kingdom must teach him to despair of any effectual assistance. The unfortunate Charles, though he enjoyed some lucid intervals, continually relapsed into furious or stupid insanity; the reins of government were alternately seized by his brother and uncle, the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, whose factious competition prepared the miseries of civil war. The former was a gay youth, dissolved in luxury and love; the latter was the father of John count of Nevers, who had so lately been ransomed from Turkish captivity, and, if the fearless son was ardent to revenge his defeat, the more prudent Burgundy was content with the cost and peril of the first experiment. When Manuel had satiated the curiosity, and perhaps fatigued the patience, of the French, he resolved on a visit to the adjacent island. In his progress from Dover, he was entertained at Canterbury with due reverence by the prior and monks of St Austin, and, on Blackheath, king Henry the fourth, (with the English court, saluted the Greek hero, (I copy our old historian,) who, during many days, was lodged and treated in London as emperor of the east.<sup>t</sup> But the state of England was still more adverse to the design of the holy war. In the same year, the hereditary sovereign had been deposed and murdered; the reigning prince was a successful usurper, whose ambition was punished by jealousy and remorse; nor could Henry of Lancaster withdraw his person or forces from the defence of a throne incessantly shaken by conspiracy and rebellion. He pitied, he praised, he flattered, the emperor of Constantinople, but if the English monarch assumed the cross, it was only to appease his people, and perhaps his conscience, by the merit or semblance of this pious intention.<sup>u</sup> Satisfied, however, with gifts and honours, Manuel returned to Paris, and, after a residence of two years in the west, shaped his course through Germany and Italy, embarked at Venice, and patiently expected, in the Morea, the moment of his ruin or deliverance. Yet he had escaped the ignominious necessity of offering his religion to public or private sale. The Latin church was distracted by the great schism; the kings, the nations, the universities, of Europe, were divided in their obedience between the popes of Rome and Avignon, and the emperor, anxious to conciliate the friendship of both parties, abstained from any correspondence with the indigent and unpopular rivals. His journey coincided with the year of the jubilee, but he passed through Italy without desiring, or deserving, the plenary indulgence which abolished the guilt or penance of the sins of the faithful. The Roman pope was offended by this neglect, accused him of irreverence to an image of Christ, and exhorted the princes of Italy to reject and abandon the obstinate schismatic.<sup>x</sup>

During the period of the crusades, the Greeks beheld with astonishment and terror the perpetual stream of emigra-

of England,
A D 1400
December

His return to Greece,
A D 1402

Greek knowledge and descriptions

<sup>p</sup> Memoires de Boucicault, p. 1 c. 35, 36.

<sup>q</sup> His journey into the west of Europe is slightly, and I believe reluctantly, noticed by Chalcondyles (l. ii. c. 44-50) and Ducus, (c. 14.)

<sup>r</sup> Muratori, Annali d'Italia, tom. xxi. p. 406. John Galeazzo was the first and most powerful duke of Milan. His connexion with Bajazet is attested by Froissard, and he contributed to save and deliver the French captives of Nicopolis.

<sup>s</sup> For the reception of Manuel at Paris see Spondanus (Annal. Eccles. tom. i. p. 676, 677 A D 1400 No 5) who quotes Juvenal des Ursins and the monk of St. Denis; and Villaret (Hist. de France tom. xii. p. 331-334) who quotes nobody, according to the last fashion of the French writers.

<sup>t</sup> A short note of Manuel in England, is extracted by Dr. Hody from a MS. at Lambeth, (de Græcis illustribus, p. 14.) C. 1<sup>p</sup> Imperator, divi varisque et horrendis paganorum insultibus coarctatus, ut pro eisdem resistentium triumphalem perquireret Anglorum Regem visulare decerneret, &c. Rex (says Walsingham p. 364) nobili apparatu suscepit (ut deest) tantum Hæna, duxitque Londoniam et per multos dies exhibuit gloriose pro expensis hospitii sui solvens, et eum respiciens tanto fastigio donativis. He repeats the same in his Upodigma Neustrie, (p. 556.)

<sup>u</sup> Shakspeare begins and ends the play of Henry IV. with that prince's vow of a crusade, and his belief that he should die in Jerusalem.

<sup>x</sup> This fact is preserved in the Historia Politica, A D 1391-1478 published by Martin Crusius (Turco Græcia, p. 1-43.) The image

tion that flowed, and continued to flow, from the unknown climates of the west. The visits of their last emperors removed the veil of separation, and they disclosed to their eyes the powerful nations of Europe, whom they no longer presumed to brand with the name of barbarians. The observations of Manuel, and his more inquisitive followers, have been preserved by a Byzantine historian of the times; his scattered ideas I shall collect and abridge, and it may be amusing enough, perhaps instructive, to contemplate the rude pictures of Germany, France, and England, whose ancient and modern state are so familiar to our minds. I of Germany, GERMANY (says the Greek Chalcondyles) is of ample latitude from Vienna to the ocean, and it stretches (a strange geography) from Prague in Bohemia to the river Tartessus, and the Pyrenean mountains. The soil, except in figs and olives, is sufficiently fruitful, the air is salubrious, the bodies of the natives are robust and healthy, and these cold regions are seldom visited with the calamities of pestilence or earthquakes. After the Scythians or Tartars, the Germans are the most numerous of nations, they are brave and patient, and were they united under a single head, their force would be irresistible. By the gift of the pope they have acquired the privilege of choosing the Roman emperor, nor is any people more devoutly attached to the faith and obedience of the Latin patriarch. The greatest part of the country is divided among the princes and prelates, but Strasburgh, Cologne, Hamburg, and more than two hundred free cities, are governed by sage and equal laws, according to the will, and for the advantage, of the whole community. The use of duels, or single combats on foot, prevails among them in peace and war, their industry excels in all the mechanic arts, and the Germans may boast of the invention of gunpowder and cannon, which is now diffused over the greatest part of the world.

II The kingdom of FRANCE is spread of France, above fifteen or twenty days' journey from Germany to Spain, and from the Alps to the British ocean, containing many flourishing cities, and among these Paris, the seat of the king, which surpasses the rest in riches and luxury. Many princes and lords alternately wait in his palace, and acknowledge him as their sovereign, the most powerful are the dukes of Bretagne and Burgundy, of whom the latter possesses the wealthy province of Flanders, whose harbours are frequented by the

of Christ, which the Greek emperor refused to worship, was probably a work of sculpture.

The Greek and Turkish history of Laonicus Chalcondyles ends with the winter of 1463, and the abrupt conclusion seems to mark, that he laid down his pen in the same year. We know that he was an Alienian, and that some contemporaries of the same name contributed to the revival of the Greek language in Italy. But in his numerous digressions, the modest historian has never introduced himself and his editor Leunclavius as well as Fabricius (Biblioth. Græc. tom. vi. p. 474) seems ignorant of his life and character. For his descriptions of Germany, France and England see l. ii. p. 36, 37, 44—50.

I shall not animadvert on the geographical errors of Chalcondyles in this instance, he perhaps followed, and mistook, Herodotus (l. ii. c. 33) whose text may be explained, (Herodote de Larcher, tom. ii. p. 219, 220) or whose ignorance may be excused. Had these modern Greeks ever read Strabo, or any of their lesser geographers?

A citizen of new Rome, while new Rome survived, would have ships and merchants of our own, and the more remote, seas. The French are an ancient and opulent people, and their language and manners, though somewhat different, are not dissimilar from those of the Italians. Vain of the imperial dignity of Charlemagne, of their victories over the Saracens, and of the exploits of their heroes, Oliver and Rowland,<sup>b</sup> they esteem themselves the first of the western nations, but this foolish arrogance has been recently humbled by the unfortunate events of their wars against the English, the inhabitants of the British island.

III BRITAIN, in the of England ocean, and opposite to the shores of Flanders, may be considered either as one or as three islands, but the whole is united by a common interest, by the same manners, and by a similar government. The measure of its circumference is five thousand stadia, the land is overspread with towns and villages, though destitute of wine, and not abounding in fruit-trees, it is fertile in wheat and barley, in honey and wool, and much cloth is manufactured by the inhabitants. In populousness and power, in riches and luxury, London, the metropolis of the isle, may claim a pre-eminence over all the cities of the west. It is situate on the Thames, a broad and rapid river, which at the distance of thirty miles falls into the Gallic sea, and the daily flow and ebb of the tide affords a safe entrance and departure to the vessels of commerce. The king is the head of a powerful and turbulent aristocracy; his principal vassals hold their estates by a free and unalterable tenure, and the laws define the limits of his authority and their obedience. The kingdom has been often afflicted by foreign conquest and domestic sedition, but the natives are bold and hardy, renowned in arms and victorious in war. The form of their shields or targets is derived from the Italians, that of their swords from the Greeks, the use of the long-bow is the peculiar and decisive advantage of the English. Their language bears no affinity to the idioms of the continent. In the habits of domestic life, they are not easily distinguished from their neighbours of France, but the most singular circumstance of their manners is their disregard of conjugal honour and of female chastity. In their mutual visits, as the first acts of hospitality, the guest is welcomed in the embraces of their wives and daughters, among friends they are lent and borrowed without shame, nor are the islanders offended at this strange commerce, and its inevitable consequences.<sup>d</sup> Informed as we are of the scorned to dignify the German Phif with the titles of Βασιλεως or Αυτοκρατωρ Ρωμαίων, but all pride was extinct in the bosom of Chalcondyles, and he describes the Byzantine prince, and his subject, by the proper, though humble, names of Ἑλληνας and Βασιλεως Ἑλλήνων.

<sup>b</sup> Most of the old romances were translated in the fourteenth century into French prose, and soon became the favourite amusement of the knights and ladies in the court of Charles VI. If a Greek believed in the exploits of Rowland and Oliver, he may surely be excused, since the monks of St. Denys, national historians, have inserted the fables of archbishop Turpin in their Chronicles of France.

<sup>c</sup> Λοιδίον δε τε πολις δυναμις τε προχουσα των εν τη νησω ταυτη πασαν γαλειαν, ολβω τε και τη αλλη ευδαιμονια ουδεμιαν των προεστεραν λειπομενη. Even since the time of Fitzstephen, (the twelfth century) London appears to have maintained this pre-eminence of wealth and magnitude, and her gradual increase has, at least, kept pace with the general improvement of Europe.

<sup>d</sup> If the double sense of the verb Κωω (ocular, and in utero gero) be

customs of old England, and assured of the virtue of our mothers, we may smile at the credulity, or resent the injustice, of the Greek, who must have confounded a modest salute with a criminal embrace. But his credulity and injustice may teach an important lesson, to distrust the accounts of foreign and remote nations, and to suspend our belief of every tale that deviates from the laws of nature and the character of man.<sup>c</sup>

Indifference of Manuel towards the Latins,
A D
1402—1417

After his return, and the victory of Timour, Manuel reigned many years in prosperity and peace. As long as the sons of Bajazet solicited his friendship and spared his dominions, he was satisfied with the national religion, and his leisure was employed in composing twenty theological dialogues for its defence. The appearance of the Byzantine ambassadors at the council of Constance<sup>e</sup> announces the restoration of the Turkish power, as well as of the Latin church, the conquest of the sultans, Mahomet and Amurath, reconciled the emperor to the Vatican, and the siege of Constantinople almost tempted him to acquiesce in the double procession of the Holy Ghost. When Martin the fifth ascended without a rival the chair of St Peter, a friendly intercourse of letters and embassies was revived between the east and west.

His negotiations,
A D
1417—1420

Ambition on one side, and distress on the other, dictated the same decent language of charity and peace. The artful Greek expressed a desire of marrying his six sons to Italian princesses, and the Roman, not less artful, despatched the daughter of the marquis of Montferrat, with a company of noble virgins, to soften, by their charms, the obstinacy of the schismatics. Yet under this mask of zeal, a discerning eye will perceive that all was hollow and insincere in the court and church of Constantinople. According to the vicissitudes of danger and repose, the emperor advanced or retreated, alternately instructed and disavowed his ministers, and escaped from an importunate pressure by urging the duty of inquiry, the obligation of collecting the sense of his patriarchs and bishops, and the impossibility of convening them at a time when the Turkish arms were at the gates of his capital. From a review of the public transactions it will appear, that the Greeks insisted on three successive measures, a succour, a council, and a final re-union, while the Latins eluded the second, and only promised the first, as a consequential and voluntary reward of the third. But we have an opportunity of unfolding <sup>His private motives.</sup> the most secret intentions of Manuel,

as he explained them in a private conversation without artifice or disguise. In his declining age, the emperor had associated John Palæologus, the second of the name, and the eldest of his sons, on whom he devolved the greatest part of the authority and weight of government. One day, in the presence only of the historian Phranza,<sup>b</sup> his favourite chamberlain, he opened to his colleague and successor the true principle of his negotiations with the pope: "Our last resource," said Manuel, "against the Turks is their fear of our union with the Latins, of the warlike nations of the west, who may arm for our relief and for their destruction. As often as you are threatened by the miscreants, present this danger before their eyes. Propose a council, consult on the means, but ever delay and avoid the convocation of an assembly, which cannot tend either to our spiritual or temporal emolument. The Latins are proud, the Greeks are obstinate, neither party will recede or retract, and the attempt of a perfect union will confirm the schism, alienate the churches, and leave us, without hope or defence, at the mercy of the barbarians." Impatient of this salutary lesson, the royal youth arose from his seat, and departed in silence, and the wise monarch (continues Phranza) casting his eyes on me, thus resumed his discourse: "My son deems himself a great and heroic prince, but, alas! our miserable age does not afford scope for heroism or greatness. His daring spirit might have suited the happier times of our ancestors, but the present state requires not an emperor, but a cautious steward of the last relics of our fortunes. Well do I remember the lofty expectations which he built on our alliance with Mustapha, and much do I fear, that his rash courage will urge the ruin of our house, and that even religion may precipitate our downfall." Yet the experience and authority of Manuel preserved the peace, and eluded the council, till, in the seventy-eighth year of his age, and in the habit of a monk, he terminated his career, dividing his precious mov- <sup>His death</sup> ables among his children and the poor, his physicians and his favourite servants. Of his six sons,<sup>c</sup> Andronicus the second was invested with the principality of Thessalonica, and died of a leprosy soon after the sale of that city to the Venetians and its final conquest by the Turks. Some fortunate incidents had restored Peloponnesus, or the Morea, to the empire, and in his more prosperous days, Ma-

equivocal the context and pious horror of Chalcondyles can leave no doubt of this meaning and mistake, (p. 49.)

<sup>c</sup> Erasmus (Ejusd. Fausto Andreliano) has a pretty passage on the English fashion of kissing strangers on their arrival and departure, from whence, however, he draws no scandalous inferences.

<sup>f</sup> Perhaps we may apply this remark to the community of wives among the old Britons, as it is supposed by Cæsar and Dion, (Dion Cassius, l. xii. tom. ii. p. 1007.) with Reimar's judicious annotation. The Arroyo of Otahette so certain at first, is become less visible and scandalous in proportion as we have studied the manners of that gentle and amorous people.

<sup>g</sup> See Lénfant Hist. du Concile de Constance tom. ii. p. 578 and for the ecclesiastical history of the times the Annals of Spandanus, the Bibliothèque of Dupin tom. xii. and twenty first and twenty second volumes of the History or rather the Continuation of Fleury.

<sup>b</sup> From his early youth, George Phranza, or Phranzes, was employed in the service of the state and palace. Hanekius (de Script. Byzant. p. 1. c. 40.) has collected his life from 's own writings. He was no more than four and twenty years of age at the death of Manuel, who recommended him in the strongest terms to his successor. Imprimis vero lunc Phranzen ubi commendat, qui ministravit mihi fideliter et diligenter (Phranzes l. ii. c. 1.) Yet the emperor John was cold, and he preferred the service of the despots of Peloponnesus.

<sup>i</sup> See Phranzes, l. ii. c. 13. While so many manuscripts of the Greek originals are extant in the libraries of Rome, Milan, the Escorial, &c. it is a matter of shame and reproach, that we should be reduced to the Latin version or abstract of James Pontanus, (ad eadem Theophylacti Simocattæ Ingotatili, 1601.) so deficient in accuracy and elegance (Fabric. Bibliot. Græc. tom. vi. p. 615—620.)

<sup>k</sup> See Ducange, Fam. Byzant. p. 243—248.

the sake of multiplying their alliances. Divorces were prohibited by manners rather than by laws. Adulteries were punished as rare and inexcusable crimes, nor was seduction justified by example and fashion.<sup>1</sup> We may easily discover, that Tacitus indulges an honest pleasure in the contrast of barbarian virtue with the dissolute conduct of the Roman ladies; yet there are some striking circumstances that give an air of truth or at least of probability, to the conjugal faith and chastity of the Germans.

<sup>Its probable cause</sup> Although the progress of civilization has undoubtedly contributed to assuage the fiercer passions of human nature, it seems to have been less favourable to the virtue of chastity, whose most dangerous enemy is the softness of the mind. The refinements of life corrupt while they polish the intercourse of the sexes. The gross appetite of love becomes most dangerous when it is elevated, or rather indeed disguised by sentimental passion. The elegance of dress, of motion, and of manners, gives a lustre to beauty, and inflames the senses through the imagination. Luxurious entertainments, midnight dances and licentious spectacles, present at once temptation and opportunity to female frailty.<sup>1</sup> From such dangers the unpolished wives of the barbarians were secured by poverty, solitude, and the painful cares of a domestic life. The German huts, open on every side to the eye of indiscretion or jealousy, were a better safeguard of conjugal fidelity, than the walls, the bolts, and the eunuchs of a Persian harem. To this reason another may be added of a more honourable nature. The Germans treated their women with esteem and confidence, consulted them on every occasion of importance and fondly believed, that in their breasts resided a sanctity and wisdom more than human. Some of these interpreters of fate, such as Velleda, in the Batavian war, governed, in the name of the deity, the fiercest nations of Germany.<sup>2</sup> The rest of the sex, without being adored as goddesses, were respected as the free and equal companions of soldiers, associated even by the marriage ceremony to a life of toil, of danger, and of glory.<sup>3</sup> In their great invasions, the camps of the barbarians were filled with a multitude of women who remained firm and undaunted amidst the sound of arms, the various forms of destruction, and the honourable wounds of their sons and husbands.<sup>4</sup> Fainting armies of Germans have, more than once, been driven back upon the enemy, by the generous despair of the women who dreaded death much less than servitude. If the day was irrecoverably lost, they well knew how to deliver themselves and their children, with their own

<sup>1</sup> The adulteress was whipped through the village. Neither wealth nor beauty could inspire compassion or procure her a second husband, 19 19.

<sup>2</sup> Ovid employs two hundred lines in the rehearsal of places the most favourable to love. Above all, he considers the theatre as the best adapted to collect the beauties of Rome, and to melt them into tenderness and exultation.

<sup>3</sup> Tacit. Hist. iv. c. 16.

<sup>4</sup> The marriage present was a yoke of oxen, horses, and arms. See Germ. c. 19. Tacitus is somewhat too fond on the subject.

<sup>5</sup> The elegance of dress, into elegance is a most excellent correction. Tacit. Germ. c. 7. Plutarch in Marius. Ref. c. 11. v. 11. c. 11.

hands, from an insulting victor.<sup>5</sup> Heroines of such a cast may claim our admiration; but they were most assuredly neither lovely, nor very susceptible of love. Whilst they affected to emulate the stern virtues of man, they must have resigned that attractive softness, in which principally consists the charm and weakness of woman. Conscious pride taught the German females to suppress every tender emotion that stood in competition with honour, and the first honour of the sex has ever been that of chastity. The sentiments and conduct of these high-spirited matrons may, at once, be considered as a cause, as an effect, and as a proof of the general character of the nation. Female courage, however it may be raised by fanaticism or confirmed by habit, can be only a faint and imperfect imitation of the manly valour that distinguishes the age or country in which it may be found.

The religious system of the Germans <sup>Religion</sup> (if the wild opinions of savages can deserve that name) was dictated by their wants, their fears, and their ignorance.<sup>1</sup> They adored the great visible objects and agents of nature, the sun and the moon, the fire and the earth, together with those imaginary deities, who were supposed to preside over the most important occupations of human life. They were persuaded, that, by some ridiculous arts of divination, they could discover the will of the superior beings, and that human sacrifices were the most precious and acceptable offering to their altars. Some applause has been hastily bestowed on the sublime notion, entertained by that people, of the Deity, whom they neither confined within the walls of a temple, nor represented by any human figure, but when we recollect, that the Germans were unskilled in architecture, and totally unacquainted with the art of sculpture, we shall readily assign the true reason of a scruple, which arose not so much from a superiority of reason, as from a want of ingenuity. The only temples in Germany were dark and ancient groves, consecrated by the reverence of succeeding generations. Their secret gloom, the imagined residence of an invisible power, by presenting no distinct object of fear or worship, impressed the mind with a still deeper sense of religious horror,<sup>2</sup> and the priests, rude and illiterate as they were, had been taught by experience the use of every artifice that could preserve and fortify impressions so well suited to their own interest.

The same ignorance, which renders <sup>Its effects in</sup> barbarians incapable of conceiving or <sup>peace</sup> embracing the useful restraints of laws, exposes them naked and unarmed to the blind terrors of superstition. The German priests, improving this Tenores destroyed themselves and their children, they had offered to surrender on condition that they should be received as the slaves of the vestal virgins.

<sup>3</sup> Tacitus has employed a few lines and Claudian one hundred and twenty-four pages, on this obscure subject. The former discovers in Germany the gods of Greece and Rome. The latter is positive, that, under the emblems of the sun, the moon, and the fire, his pious ancestors worshipped the Trinity in unity.

<sup>4</sup> The sacred wood described with such sublime horror by Lucan, was in the relict of the Rhod of Marseilles, but there were many of the same kind in Germany.

nuel had fortified the narrow isthmus of six miles<sup>1</sup> with a stone wall and one hundred and fifty-three towers. The wall was overthrown by the first blast of the Ottomans: the fertile peninsula might have been sufficient for the four younger brothers, Theodore and Constantine, Demetrius and Thomas, but they wasted in domestic contests the remains of their strength, and the least successful of the rivals were reduced to a life of dependence in the Byzantine palace.

Zerlin of John Palæologus II A D 1425—1437 The eldest of the sons of Manuel, John Palæologus the second, was acknowledged, after his father's death, as the sole emperor of the Greeks. He immediately proceeded to repudiate his wife, and to contract a new marriage with the princess of Trebizond: beauty was in his eyes the first qualification of an empress, and the clergy had yielded to his firm assurance, that unless he might be indulged in a divorce, he would retire to a cloister, and leave the throne to his brother Constantine. The first, and in truth the only, victory of Palæologus, was over a Jew,<sup>m</sup> whom, after a long and learned dispute, he converted to the christian faith, and this momentous conquest is carefully recorded in the history of the times. But he soon resumed the design of uniting the east and west, and, regardless of his father's advice, listened, as it should seem with sincerity, to the proposal of meeting the pope in a general council beyond the Adriatic. This dangerous project was encouraged by Martin the fifth, and coldly entertained by his successor Eugenius, till, after a tedious negotiation, the emperor received a summons from the Latin assembly of a new character, the independent prelates of Basil, who styled themselves the representatives and judges of the catholic church.

Corruption of the Latin church

The Roman pontiff had fought and conquered in the cause of ecclesiastical freedom, but the victorious clergy were soon exposed to the tyranny of their deliverer, and his sacred character was invulnerable to those arms which they found so keen and effectual against the civil magistrate. Their great charter, the right of election, was annihilated by appeals, evaded by trusts or commendams, disappointed by reversionary grants, and superseded by previous and arbitrary reservations.<sup>n</sup> A public auction was instituted in the court of Rome: the cardinals and favourites were enriched with the spoils of nations, and every country might complain that the most important and valuable benefices were accumulated on the heads of aliens and absentees. During their residence at Avignon, the ambition of the popes subsided in the meaner passions of avarice<sup>o</sup> and luxury, they rigorously imposed on the clergy the tributes of first-fruits and tenths, but they freely tolerated the impunity of vice, disorder, and corruption. These manifold scandals were aggravated by the great schism of the west, which continued above fifty years. In the furious conflicts of Rome and Avignon, the vices of the rivals were mutually exposed, and their precarious situation degraded their authority, relaxed their discipline, and multiplied their wants and exactions. To heal the wounds, and restore the monarchy, of the church, the synods of Pisa and Constance<sup>p</sup> were successively convened, but these great assemblies, conscious of their strength, resolved to vindicate the privileges of the christian aristocracy. From a personal sentence against two pontiffs, whom they rejected, and a third, their acknowledged sovereign, whom they deposed, the fathers of Constance proceeded to examine the nature and limits of the Roman supremacy, nor did they separate till they had established the authority, above the pope, of a general council. It was enacted, that, for the government and reformation of the church, such assemblies should be held at regular intervals, and that each synod, before its dissolution, should appoint the time and place of the subsequent meeting. By the influence of the court of Rome, the next convocation at Sienna was easily eluded, but the bold and vigorous proceedings of the council of Basil<sup>q</sup> had almost been fatal to the reigning pontiff, Eugenius the fourth.

Schism, A D 1377—1429

Council of Pisa, A D 1409 of Constance, A D 1414—1418

of Basil, A D 1431—1443

A just suspicion of his design prompted the fathers to hasten the promulgation of their first decree, that the representatives of the church militant on earth were invested with a divine and spiritual jurisdiction over all christians, without excepting the pope, and that a general council could not be dissolved, prorogued, or transferred, unless by their free deliberation and consent. On the notice that Eugenius had fulminated a bull for that purpose, they ventured to summon, to admonish, to threaten, to censure, the contumacious successor of St. Peter. After many delays, to allow time for repentance, they finally declared, that, unless he submitted within the term of sixty days, he was suspended from the exercise of all temporal

Their opposition to Eugenius IV

<sup>1</sup> The exact measure of the Hexamilion, from sea to sea was 3800 orgyias, or louses of six Greek feet, (Phranzes, l. i. c. 38) which would produce a Greek mile still smaller than that of 660 French toises, which is assumed by D'Anville as still in use in Turkey. Five miles are commonly reckoned for the breadth of the isthmus. See the Travels of Span, Whitaker, and Chandler.

<sup>m</sup> The first objection of the Jews is on the death of Christ: if it were voluntary, Christ was a suicide: which the emperor turns with a mystery. They then dispute on the conception of the Virgin, the sense of the prophecies &c. (Phranzes, l. ii. c. 12. a whole chapter.)

<sup>n</sup> In the trattato delle Materie Beneficentie of Fra Paolo (in the fourth volume of the last, and best, edition of his works,) the papal system is deeply studied and freely described. Should Rome and her religion be annihilated, this golden volume may still survive, a philosophical history and a salutary warning.

<sup>o</sup> Pope John XXIII (in 1334) left behind him, at Avignon, eighteen

millions of gold florins and the value of seven millions more in plate and jewels. See the Chronicle of John Villani, (l. xi. c. 20 in Muratori's Collection, tom. xiii. p. 765) whose brother received the account from the papal treasurers. A treasure of six or eight millions sterling in the fourteenth century is enormous, and almost incredible.

<sup>p</sup> A learned and liberal protestant, M. Lenfant, has given a fair history of the councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basil, in six volumes in quarto, but the last part is the most hasty and imperfect, except in the account of the troubles of Bohemia.

<sup>q</sup> The original acts or minutes of the council of Basil are preserved in the public library, in twelve volumes in folio. Basil was a free city, conveniently situate on the Rhine and guarded by the arms of the neighbouring, and confederate Swiss. In 1459, the university was founded by pope Pius II (Æneas Sylvius) who had been secretary to the council. But what is a council, or a university, to the presses of Froben and the studies of Erasmus?

and ecclesiastical authority. And to mark their jurisdiction over the prince as well as the priest, they assumed the government of Avignon, annulled the alienation of the sacred patrimony, and protected Rome from the imposition of new taxes. Their boldness was justified, not only by the general opinion of the clergy, but by the support and power of the first monarchs of Christendom. The emperor Sigismond declared himself the servant and protector of the synod, Germany and France adhered to their cause, the duke of Milan was the enemy of Eugenius, and he was driven from the Vatican by an insurrection of the Roman people. Rejected at the same time by his temporal and spiritual subjects, submission was his only choice. By a most humiliating bull, the pope repealed his own acts, and ratified those of the council, incorporated his legates and cardinals with that venerable body, and seemed to resign himself to the decrees of the supreme legislature. Their fame pervaded the countries of the east, and it was in their presence that Sigismond received the ambassadors of the Turkish sultan, who laid at his feet twelve large vases, filled with

Negotiations
with the Greeks,
A D
1434-1437

robes of silk and pieces of gold. The fathers of Basil aspired to the glory of reducing the Greeks, as well as the Bohemians, within the pale of the church, and their deputies invited the emperor and patriarch of Constantinople to unite with an assembly which possessed the confidence of the western nations. Palæologus was not averse to the proposal, and his ambassadors were introduced with due honours into the catholic senate. But the choice of the place appeared to be an insuperable obstacle, since he refused to pass the Alps, or the sea of Sicily, and positively required that the synod should be adjourned to some convenient city in Italy, or at least on the Danube. The other articles of this treaty were more readily stipulated. It was agreed to defray the travelling expenses of the emperor, with a train of seven hundred persons,* to remit an immediate sum of eight thousand ducats† for the accommodation of the Greek clergy, and in his absence to grant a supply of ten thousand ducats, with three hundred archers and some galleys, for the protection of Constantinople. The city of Avignon advanced the funds for the preliminary expenses, and the embarkation was prepared at Marseilles with some difficulty and delay.

* This Turkish embassy, attested only by Grantzius is related with some doubt by the annalist Spondanus A D 1433 No 25 torn p 825

† Syropulus, p 19. In this list, the Greeks appear to have exceeded the real numbers of the clergy and laity which afterwards attended the emperor and patriarch; but which are not clearly specified by the great ecclesiastical. The 75 000 florins which they asked in this negotiation of the pope (p 9) were more than they could hope or want.

‡ I use indifferently the words ducat and florin which derive their names, the former from the dukes of Milan the latter from the republic of Florence. These gold pieces the first that were coined in Italy perhaps in the Latin world may be compared to weight and value to one third of the English guinea.

§ At the end of the Latin version of Phranzes we read a long Greek epistle or declaration of George of Trebizond who advises the emperor to prefer Eugenius and Italy. He treats with contempt the schismatic assembly of Basil the barbarians of Gaul and Germany, who

In his distress the friendship of Palæologus was disputed by the ecclesiastical powers of the west, but the dexterous activity of a monarch prevailed over the slow debates and inflexible temper of a republic. The decrees of Basil continually tended to circumscribe the despotism of the pope, and to erect a supreme and perpetual tribunal in the church. Eugenius was impatient of the yoke, and the union of the Greeks might afford a decent pretence for translating a rebellious synod from the Rhine to the Po. The independence of the fathers was lost if they passed the Alps. Savoy or Avignon, to which they acceded with reluctance, were described at Constantinople as situate far beyond the pillars of Hercules, the emperor and his clergy were apprehensive of the dangers of a long navigation, they were offended by a haughty declaration, that after suppressing the new heresy of the Bohemians, the council would soon eradicate the old heresy of the Greeks. On the side of Eugenius, all was smooth, and yielding, and respectful and he invited the Byzantine monarch to heal by his presence the schism of the Latin, as well as of the eastern, church. Ferrara, near the coast of the Adriatic, was proposed for their amicable interview, and with some indulgence of forgery and theft, a surreptitious decree was procured, which transferred the synod, with its own consent, to that Italian city. Nine galleys were equipped for this service at Venice, and in the isle of Candia, their diligence anticipated the slower vessels of Basil. The Roman admiral was commissioned to burn, sink, and destroy, and these priestly squadrons might have encountered each other in the same seas where Athens and Sparta had formerly contended for the pre-eminence of glory. Assailed by the opportunity of the factions, who were ready to fight for the possession of his person, Palæologus hesitated before he left his palace and country on a perilous experiment. His father's advice still dwelt on his memory and reason must suggest, that since the Latins were divided among themselves, they could never unite in a foreign cause. Sigismond dissuaded the unseasonable adventure, his advice was impartial, since he adhered to the council, and it was enforced by the strange belief, that the German Cæsar would nominate a Greek his heir and successor in the empire of the west. Even the Turkish sultan was a counsellor whom it might be unsafe

John Palæologus
embarks in the pope's galley,
A D 1437,
Nov 4

had conspired to transport the chair of St Peter beyond the Alps αθλαιοι (εξ) ης σε και την μετα σοι σινδοον εξω των Ιρακλειων ηλων και περα Γαδρων εξαγουσι Was Constantinople unprovided with a map?

× Syropulus (p 26-31) attests his own indignation and that of his countrymen and the Basil deputies who excused the rash declaration, could neither deny nor resist an act of the council.

γ Condolmieri the Pope's nephew and admiral expressly declared ότι ορισμον έχει παρα τον Παπα να πολεμηση οπου αι ευρη τα καταργη της Συνόδου, και ει δινηθη κατανοση και αφανιση. The naval orders of the synod were less peremptory and till the hostile squadrons appeared both parties tried to conceal their quarrel from the Greeks.

z Syropulus mentions the hopes of Palæologus (p 36) and the last advice of Sigismond, (p 37) At Corfu the Greek emperor was informed of his friend's death had he known it sooner he would have returned home, (p 39)

to trust, but whom it was dangerous to offend Amurath was unskilled in the disputes, but he was apprehensive of the union, of the Christians From his own treasures, he offered to relieve the wants of the Byzantine court, yet he declared with seeming magnanimity, that Constantinople should be secure and inviolate, in the absence of her sovereign <sup>a</sup> The resolution of Palæologus was decided by the most splendid gifts and the most specious promises he wished to escape for a while from a scene of danger and distress, and after dismissing with an ambiguous answer the messengers of the council, he declared his intention of embarking in the Roman galleys The age of the patriarch Joseph was more susceptible of fear than of hope, he trembled at the perils of the sea, and expressed his apprehension, that his feeble voice, with thirty perhaps of his orthodox brethren, would be oppressed in a foreign land by the power and numbers of a Latin synod He yielded to the royal mandate, to the flattering assurance, that he would be heard as the oracle of nations, and to the secret wish of learning from his brother of the west, to deliver the church from the yoke of kings <sup>b</sup> The five cross-bearers, or dignitaries, of St Sophia, were bound to attend his person, and one of these, the great ecclesiarch or preacher, Sylvester Syropulus, <sup>c</sup> has composed a free and curious history <sup>d</sup> of the false union <sup>e</sup> Of the clergy that reluctantly obeyed the summons of the emperor and the patriarch, submission was the first duty, and patience the most useful virtue In a chosen list of twenty bishops, we discover the metropolitan titles of Heraclæa and Cyzicus, Nice and Nicomedia, Ephesus and Trebizond, and the personal merit of Mark and Bessarion, who, in the confidence of their learning and eloquence, were promoted to the episcopal rank Some monks and philosophers were named to display the science and sanctity of the Greek church and the service of the choir was performed by a select band of singers and musicians The patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, appeared by their genuine or fictitious deputies, the primate of Russia represented a national church, and the Greeks might contend with the Latins in the extent of their spiritual empire The precious vases

<sup>a</sup> Phranzes himself, though from different motives, was of the advice of Amurath (I ii c 13) Utinam ne synodus ista unquam fuisset, si tantis offensionibus et detrimentis purituri erat This Turkish embassy is likewise mentioned by Syropulus (p 58) and Amurath kept his word He might threaten, (p 125-219) but he never attacked, the city

<sup>b</sup> The reader will smile at the simplicity with which he imparted these hopes to his favourites ταυτην πληροφοριαν σχησεν ηλιπε και δια του Πα-α ελθερωσαι την εκκλησιαν απο της αποτθ θεισης αυτου δουλειας παρα τον βασιλευς, (p 92) Yet it would have been difficult for him to have practised the lessons of Gregory VII

<sup>c</sup> The Christian name of Sylvester is borrowed from the Latin calendar In modern Greek, ποιητορ, as a diminutive, is added to the ends of words nor can any reasoning, of Creighton, the editor, excuse his changing into Sguropulus (Σγυρος, fuscus) the Syropulus of his own manuscript, whose name is subscribed with his own hand in the acts of the council of Florence Why might not the author be of Syrian extraction?

<sup>d</sup> From the conclusion of the history, I should fix the date to the year 1444, four years after the synod, when the great ecclesiarch had abdicated his office, (section xii p 330-350) His passions were cooled by time and retirement, and, although Syropulus is often partial he is never intemperate

<sup>e</sup> Vera historia unionis non vere inter Græcos et Latinos (Hagæ Comitum, 1660 in folio,) was first published with a loose and florid

of St Sophia were exposed to the winds and waves, that the patriarch might officiate with becoming splendour, whatever gold the emperor could procure, was expended in the massy ornaments of his bed and chariot, <sup>f</sup> and while they affected to maintain the prosperity of their ancient fortune, they quarrelled for the division of fifteen thousand ducats, the first alms of the Roman pontiff After the necessary preparations, John Palæologus, with a numerous train, accompanied by his brother Demetrius, and the most respectable persons of the church and state, embarked in eight vessels with sails and oars, which steered through the Turkish straits of Gallipoli to the Archipelago, the Morea, and the Adriatic Gulf <sup>g</sup>

After a tedious and troublesome navigation of seventy-seven days, this religious squadron cast anchor before

His triumphal entry, at Venice, A D 1438 Feb 9

Venice, and their reception proclaimed the joy and magnificence of that powerful republic In the command of the world, the modest Augustus had never claimed such honours from his subjects as were paid to his feeble successor by an independent state Seated on the poop, on a lofty throne, he received the visit, or, in the Greek style; the adoration, of the doge and senators <sup>h</sup> They sailed in the Bucentaur, which was accompanied by twelve stately galleys the sea was overspread with innumerable gondolas of pomp and pleasure, the air resounded with music and acclamations, the mariners, and even the vessels, were dressed in silk and gold, and in all the emblems and pageants, the Roman eagles were blended with the lions of St Mark. The triumphal procession, ascending the great canal, passed under the bridge of the Rialto, and the eastern strangers gazed with admiration on the palaces, the churches, and the populousness of a city, that seems to float on the bosom of the waves <sup>i</sup> They sighed to behold the spoils and trophies with which it had been decorated after the sack of Constantinople After an hospitable entertainment of fifteen days, Palæologus pursued his journey by land and water from Venice to Ferrara and, on this occasion, the pride of the Vatican was tempered by policy to indulge the ancient dignity of the emperor of the east He

into Ferrara, Feb 28

version, by Robert Creighton, chaplain to Charles II in his exile The zeal of the editor has prefixed a polemic title, for the beginning, of the original is wanting Syropulus may be ranked with the best of the Byzantine writers for the merit of his narration, and even of his style but he is excluded from the orthodox collections of the councils

<sup>f</sup> Syropulus (p 63) simply expresses his intention ἵν' οὕτω πομπῶν ἐν Ἰταλίῳ μεγάλῳ βασιλεὺς παρ' ἐκείνων νομιζοίτο and the Latin of Creighton may afford a specimen of his florid paraphrase Ut pompa circumductus noster Imperator Italice populis aliquis decoratus Jupiter crederetur, aut Cræsus ex opulenta Lydia

<sup>g</sup> Although I cannot stop to quote Syropulus for every fact, I will observe that the navigation of the Greeks from Constantinople to Venice and Ferrara is contained in the fourth section, (p 67-100) and that the historian has the uncommon talent of placing, each scene before the reader's eye

<sup>h</sup> At the time of the synod, Phranzes was in Peloponnesus, but he received from the despot Demetrius, a faithful account of the honourable reception of the emperor and patriarch both at Venice and Ferrara, (Dux sedentem Imperatorem adorant) which are more slightly mentioned by the Latins, (I ii c 14-16)

<sup>i</sup> The astonishment of a Greek prince and a French Ambassador (Memoires de Philippe de Comines, I vii c 18) at the sight of Venice abundantly prove, that in the fifteenth century it was the first and most splendid of the christian cities For the spoils of Constantinople at Venice, see Syropulus, (p 87)

made his entry on a black horse, but a milk-white steed, whose trappings were embroidered with golden eagles, was led before him, and the canopy was borne over his head by the princes of Este, the sons or kinsmen of Nicholas, marquis of the city, and a sovereign more powerful than himself.<sup>k</sup> Palæologus did not alight till he reached the bottom of the staircase the pope advanced to the door of the apartment, refused his proffered genuflection, and, after a paternal embrace, conducted the emperor to a seat on his left-hand. Nor would the patriarch descend from his galley, till a ceremony, almost equal, had been stipulated between the bishops of Rome and Constantinople. The latter was saluted by his brother with a kiss of union and charity nor would any of the Greek ecclesiastics submit to kiss the feet of the western primate. On the opening of the synod, the place of honour in the centre was claimed by the temporal and ecclesiastical chiefs, and it was only by alleging that his predecessors had not assisted in person at Nice or Chalcedon, that Eugenius could evade the ancient precedents of Constantine and Marcellian. After much debate, it was agreed that the right and left sides of the church should be occupied by the two nations, that the solitary chair of St. Peter should be raised the first of the Latin line, and that the throne of the Greek emperor, at the head of his clergy, should be equal and opposite to the second place, the vacant seat of the emperor of the west.<sup>l</sup>

But as soon as festivity and form had given place to a more serious treaty, the Greeks were dissatisfied with their journey, with themselves, and with the pope. The artful pencil of his emissaries had painted him in a prosperous state, at the head of the princes and prelates of Europe, obedient at his voice, to believe and to arm. The thin appearance of the universal synod of Ferrara betrayed his weakness, and the Latins opened the first session with only five archbishops, eighteen bishops, and ten abbots, the greatest part of whom were the subjects or countrymen of the Italian pontiff. Except the duke of Burgundy, none of the potentates of the west condescended to appear in person, or by their ambassadors, nor was it possible to suppress the judicial acts of Basil against the dignity and person of Eugenius, which were finally concluded by a new election. Under these circumstances, a truce or delay was asked and granted, till

<sup>k</sup> Nicholas III. of Este reigned for forty-eight years (A. D. 1333—1411) and was lord of Ferrara Modena, Reggio, Parma, Ravenna, and Comacina. See his Life in Muratori (Antichità Estense, tom. ii. p. 159—201).

<sup>l</sup> The Latin vulgar was provoked to laughter at the strange dresses of the Greeks and especially the length of their garments their sleeves, and their beards. Nor was the emperor distinguished except by the purple colour and his diadem or tiara with a jewel on the top (Hody de Græcæ Illustribus p. 31). Yet another spectator confessed that the Greek fashion was più grave e più degna than the Italian (Vespasiano in Vit. Eugen. IV. in Muratori tom. xxv. p. 261).

<sup>m</sup> For the emperor's hunting see Syropulus (p. 143 144 191). The pope had sent him eleven miserable blacks but he bought a strong and swift horse that came from Russia. The name of janizaries may survive but the name rather than the institution had passed from the Ottoman to the Byzantine court, and is often used in the last age of

Palæologus could expect from the consent of the Latins some temporal reward for an unpopular union, and after the first session, the public proceedings were adjourned above six months. The emperor, with a chosen band of his favourites and janizaries, fixed his summer residence at a pleasant spacious monastery, six miles from Ferrara, forgot, in the pleasures of the chace, the distress of the church and state, and persisted in destroying the game, without listening to the just complaints of the marquis or the husbandman.<sup>n</sup> In the mean while, his unfortunate Greeks were exposed to all the miseries of exile and poverty, for the support of each stranger, a monthly allowance was assigned of three or four gold florins, and although the entire sum did not amount to seven hundred florins, a long arrear was repeatedly incurred by the indigence or policy of the Roman court.<sup>o</sup> They sighed for a speedy deliverance, but their escape was prevented by a triple chain a passport from their superiors was required at the gates of Ferrara, the government of Venice had engaged to arrest and send back the fugitives, and inevitable punishment awaited them at Constantinople excommunication, fines, and a sentence, which did not respect the sacerdotal dignity, that they should be stripped naked and publicly whipped.<sup>p</sup> It was only by the alternative of hunger or dispute that the Greeks could be persuaded to open the first conference, and they yielded with extreme reluctance to attend from Ferrara to Florence the rear of a flying synod. This new translation was urged by inevitable necessity, the city was visited by the plague, the fidelity of the marquis might be suspected, the mercenary troops of the duke of Milan were at the gates, and as they occupied Romagna, it was not without difficulty and danger that the pope, the emperor, and the bishops, explored their way through the unfrequented paths of the Apennine.<sup>q</sup>

Yet all these obstacles were surmounted by time and policy. The violence of the fathers of Basil rather promoted than injured the cause of Eugenius the nations of Europe abhorred the schism, and disowned the election, of Felix the fifth, who was successively a duke of Savoy, a hermit, and a pope, and the great princes were gradually reclaimed by his competitor to a favourable neutrality and a firm attachment. The legates, with some respectable members, deserted to the Roman army, which insensibly rose in numbers and reputation

<sup>n</sup> The Greeks obtained, with much difficulty, that instead of provisions, money should be distributed four florins per month to the persons of honourable rank, and three florins to their servants, with an addition of thirty more to the emperor, twenty five to the patriarch and twenty in the prince or despot Demetrius. The payment of the first month amounted to 691 florins, a sum which will not allow us to reckon above 200 Greeks of every condition (Syropulus, p. 104 105). On the 20th of October 1439 there was an arrear of four months in April 1439 of three and of five and a half in July, at the time of the union (p. 172 225 271).

<sup>o</sup> Syropulus (p. 141 142 204 221) deprecates the imprisonment of the Greeks and the tyranny of the emperor and patriarch.

<sup>p</sup> The wars of Italy are most clearly represented in the thirteenth volume of the Annals of Muratori. The schismatic Greek Syropulus (p. 145) appears to have exaggerated the fear and disorder of the pope in his retreat from Ferrara to Florence which is proved by the acts to have been somewhat more decent and deliberate.

the council of Basil was reduced to thirty-nine bishops, and three hundred of the inferior clergy<sup>a</sup> while the Latins of Florence could produce the subscriptions of the pope himself, eight cardinals, two patriarchs, eight archbishops, fifty-two bishops, and forty-five abbots, or chiefs of religious orders. After the labour of nine months, and the debates of twenty-five sessions, they attained the advantage and glory of the re-union of the Greeks. Four principal questions had been agitated between the two churches. 1 The use of unleavened bread in the communion of Christ's body. 2 The nature of purgatory. 3 The supremacy of the pope. And, 4 The single or double procession of the Holy Ghost. The cause of either nation was managed by ten theological champions. the Latins were supported by the inexhaustible eloquence of cardinal Julian and Mark of Ephesus and Bessarion of Nice were the bold and able leaders of the Greek forces. We may bestow some praise on the progress of human reason, by observing, that the first of these questions was now treated as an immaterial rite, which might innocently vary with the fashion of the age and country. With regard to the second, both parties were agreed in the belief of an intermediate state of purgation for the venial sins of the faithful, and whether their souls were purified by elemental fire was a doubtful point, which in a few years might be conveniently settled on the spot by the disputants. The claims of supremacy appeared of a more weighty and substantial kind, yet by the orientals the Roman bishop had ever been respected as the first of the five patriarchs, nor did they scruple to admit, that his jurisdiction should be exercised agreeable to the holy canons, a vague allowance, which might be defined or eluded by occasional convenience. The procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father alone, or from the Father and the Son, was an article of faith which had sunk much deeper into the minds of men, and in the sessions of Ferrara and Florence, the Latin addition of filioque was subdivided into two questions, whether it were legal, and whether it were orthodox. Perhaps it may not be necessary to boast on this subject of my own impartial indifference, but I must think that the Greeks were strongly supported by the prohibition of the council of Chalcedon, against adding any article whatsoever to the creed of Nice, or rather of Constantinople. In earthly affairs, it is not easy to conceive how an assembly of legislators can bind their successors invested with powers equal to their own. But the dictates of inspiration must be true and unchangeable nor should a private bishop, or a provincial synod, have presumed to innovate against the judgment of the catholic church. On the substance of the doctrine, the controversy was equal and endless. reason is confounded by the procession of a deity, the gospel, which lay on the altar, was silent, the various texts of the fathers might be corrupted by fraud or entangled by sophistry, and the Greeks were ignorant of the characters and writings of the Latin saints. Of this at least we may be sure, that neither side could be convinced by the arguments of their opponents. Prejudice may be enlightened by reason, and a superficial glance may be rectified by a clear and more perfect view of an object adapted to our faculties. But the bishops and monks had been taught from their infancy to repeat a form of mysterious words, their national and personal honour depended on the repetition of the same sounds, and their narrow minds were hardened and inflamed by the acrimony of a public dispute.

While they were lost in a cloud of dust and darkness, the pope and emperor were desirous of a seeming union, which could alone accomplish the purposes of their interview, and the obstinacy of public dispute was softened by the arts of private and personal negotiation. The patriarch Joseph had sunk under the weight of age and infirmities, his dying voice breathed the counsels of charity and concord, and his vacant benefice might tempt the hopes of the ambitious clergy. The ready and active obedience of the archbishops of Russia and Nice, of Isidore and Bessarion, was prompted and recompensed by their speedy promotion to the dignity of cardinals. Bessarion, in the first debates, had stood forth the most strenuous and eloquent champion of the Greek church, and if the apostate, the bastard, was reprobated by his country, he appears in ecclesiastical story a rare example of a patriot who was recommended to court-favour by loud opposition and well-timed compliance. With the aid of his two spiritual coadjutors, the emperor applied his arguments to the general situation and personal characters of the bishops, and each was successively moved by authority and example. Their revenues were in the hands of the Turks, their persons in those of the Latins, an episcopal treasure, three robes and forty ducats, was soon exhausted. the hopes of their return still depended on the ships of Venice and the alms of Rome. and such was their indigence, that their arrears, the payment of a debt, would be accepted as a favour, and might operate as a bribe. The danger and relief of Constantinople might excuse

Negotiations
with the Greeks

<sup>a</sup> Syropulus is pleased to reckon seven hundred prelates in the council of Basil. The error is manifest, and perhaps voluntary. That extravagant number could not be supplied by all the ecclesiastics of every degree who were present at the council nor by all the absent bishops of the west, who, expressly or tacitly might adhere to its decrees.

<sup>r</sup> The Greeks who disliked the union were unwilling to rally from this strong fortress, (p. 178 183 195 202. of Syropulus.) The shame of the Latins was aggravated by their producing an old MS. of the second council of Nice, with filioque in the Nicene creed. A palpable forgery. (p. 173.)

<sup>s</sup> Ως εγω (said an eminent Greek) όταν εις ναον εισελθω Λατινικον ου

προσκυνω τινα των εκεισε αγιων, επει ουδε γιωριζω τινα (Syropulus, p. 109.) See the perplexity of the Greeks (p. 217, 218 252, 253 273.)

<sup>t</sup> See the polite alteration of Mark and Bessarion in Syropulus, (p. 257) who never dissembles the vices of his own party, and fairly praises the virtues of the Latins.

<sup>u</sup> For the poverty of the Greek bishops, see a remarkable passage of Ducas, (c. 31.) One had possessed for his whole property, three old gowns &c. By teaching, one and twenty years in his monastery, Bessarion himself had collected forty gold florins, but of these, the archbishop had expended twenty eight in his voyage from Peloponnesus, and the remainder at Constantinople (Syropulus, p. 127.)

<sup>x</sup> Syropulus denies that the Greeks received any money before they

some prudent and pious dissimulation, and it was insinuated, that the obstinate heretics who should resist the consent of the east and west, would be abandoned in a hostile land to the revenge or justice of the Roman pontiff.<sup>7</sup> In the first private assembly of the Greeks, the formulary of union was approved by twenty-four, and rejected by twelve, members, but the five cross-bearers of St Sophia, who aspired to represent the patriarch, were disqualified by ancient discipline, and their right of voting was transferred to an obsequious train of monks, grammarians, and profane laymen. The will of the monarch produced a false and servile unanimity, and no more than two patriots had courage to speak their own sentiments and those of their country. Demetrius, the emperor's brother, retired to Venice, that he might not be witness of the union, and Mark of Ephesus, mistaking perhaps his pride for his conscience, disclaimed all communion with the Latin heretics, and avowed himself the champion and confessor of the orthodox creed.<sup>8</sup> In the treaty between the two nations, several forms of consent were proposed, such as might satisfy the Latins, without dishonouring the Greeks; and they weighed the scruples of words and syllables, till the theological balance trembled with a slight preponderance in favour of the Vatican. It was agreed, (I must entreat the attention of the reader,) that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son, as from one principle and one substance, that he proceeds by the Son, being of the same nature and substance, and that he proceeds from the Father and the Son, by one spiration and production. It is less difficult to understand the articles of the preliminary treaty, that the pope should defray all the expenses of the Greeks in their return home, that he should annually maintain two galleys and three hundred soldiers for the defence of Constantinople, that all the ships which transported pilgrims to Jerusalem should be obliged to touch at that port, that as often as they were required, the pope should furnish ten galleys for a year, or twenty for six months, and that he should powerfully solicit the princes of Europe, if the emperor had occasion for land-forces.

The same year, and almost the same day, were marked by the deposition of Eugenius at Basil, and, at Florence, by his re-union of the Greeks and Latins. In the former synod, (which he styled indeed an assembly of dæmons;) the pope was branded with had subscribed the act of union (p. 283) yet he relates some suspicious circumstances, and their bribery and corruption are positively affirmed by the historian Ducas.

<sup>7</sup> The Greeks most piteously express their own fears of exile and perpetual slavery; (Syropul p. 196) and they were strongly moved by the emperor's threats; (p. 280)

<sup>8</sup> I had forgot another impular and orthodox protester, a favourite hound who usually lay quiet on the foot cloth of the emperor's throne but who barked most furiously while the act of union was reading without being silenced by the soothing or the lashes of the royal attendants (Syropul p. 265, 266)

<sup>a</sup> From the original Lives of the Popes in Muratori's Collection (tom. liii p. u tom cxi) the manner of Eugenius IV appears to have been decent and even exemplary. His situation, exposed to the world and to his enemies, was a restraint and a pledge.

<sup>b</sup> Syropulus rather than sub erbe would have assisted as the least evil, at the ceremony of the union. He was compelled to do both, and the guilt of simony, perjury, tyranny, heresy, and schism,<sup>9</sup> and declared to be incorrigible in his vices, unworthy of any title, and incapable of holding any ecclesiastical office. In the latter he was revered as the true and holy vicar of Christ, who after a separation of six hundred years had reconciled the catholics of the east and west in one fold, and under one shepherd. The act of union was subscribed by the pope, the emperor, and the principal members of both churches, even by those who, like Syropulus,<sup>b</sup> had been deprived of the right of voting. Two copies might have sufficed for the east and west, but Eugenius was not satisfied, unless four authentic and similar transcripts were signed and attested as the monuments of his victory.<sup>c</sup> On a memorable day, the sixth of July, the successors of St Peter and Constantine ascended their thrones, the two nations assembled in the cathedral of Florence, their representatives, cardinal Julian and Bessarion archbishop of Nice, appeared in the pulpit, and, after reading in their respective tongues the act of union, they mutually embraced, in the name and the presence of their applauding brethren. The pope and his ministers then officiated according to the Roman liturgy, the creed was chanted with the addition of filioque, the acquiescence of the Greeks was poorly excused by their ignorance of the harmonious, but inarticulate, sounds,<sup>d</sup> and the more scrupulous Latins refused any public celebration of the Byzantine rite. Yet the emperor and his clergy were not totally unmindful of national honour. The treaty was ratified by their consent: it was tacitly agreed that no innovation should be attempted in their creed or ceremonies: they spared and secretly respected the generous firmness of Mark of Ephesus, and, on the decease of the patriarch, they refused to elect his successor, except in the cathedral of St Sophia. In the distribution of public and private rewards, the liberal pontiff exceeded their hopes and his promises: the Greeks, with less

Re union of the Greeks at Florence
A D 1438
July 6

pomp and pride, returned by the same road of Ferrara and Venice, and their reception at Constantinople was such as will be described in the following chapter.<sup>e</sup> The success of the first trial encouraged Eugenius to repeat the same edifying scenes, and the deputies of the Armenians, the Maronites, the Jacobites of Syria and Egypt, the Nestorians and the Æthiopians, were successively introduced, to kiss the feet of the Roman pontiff, and to announce the great ecclesiarch poorly excuses his submission to the emperor, (p. 280—282.)

<sup>c</sup> None of these original acts of union can at present be produced. Of the ten MSS that are preserved, (five at Rome, and the remainder at Florence Bologna, Venice Paris and London) none have been examined by an accurate critic, (M de Brequigny) who condemns them for the variety and imperfections of the Greek signatures. Yet several of these may be esteemed as authentic copies, which were subscribed at Florence before (26th August 1439) the final separation of the pope and emperor (Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xliii p. 287—311)

<sup>d</sup> ἡ μὴν δὲ οὐκ ἀσπασίως ἐδοκίμασε (Syropul p. 297)

<sup>e</sup> In their return, the Greeks conversed at Bologna with the ambassadors of England and after some questions and answers, these impartial strangers laughed at the pretended union of Florence (Syropul p. 307)

the obedience and the orthodoxy of the east These oriental embassies, unknown in the countries which they presumed to represent,<sup>f</sup> diffused over the west the fame of Eugenius and a clamour was artfully propagated against the remnant of a schism in Switzerland and Savoy, which alone impeded the harmony of the christian world The vigour of opposition was succeeded by the lassitude of despair the council of Basil was silently dissolved, and Felix, renouncing the tiara, again withdrew to the devout or delicious hermitage of Ripaille <sup>g</sup>

A general peace was secured by mutual acts of oblivion and indemnity all ideas of reformation subsided the popes continued to exercise and abuse their ecclesiastical despotism, nor has Rome been since disturbed by the mischiefs of a contested election <sup>h</sup>

The journeys of three emperors were unavailing for their temporal, or perhaps their spiritual, salvation, but they were productive of a beneficial consequence, the revival of the Greek learning in Italy, from whence it was propagated to the last nations of the west and north In their lowest servitude and depression, the subjects of the Byzantine throne were still possessed of a golden key that could unlock the treasures of antiquity, of a musical and prolific language, that gives a soul to the objects of sense, and a body to the abstractions of philosophy Since the barriers of the monarchy, and even of the capital, had been trampled under foot, the various barbarians had doubtless corrupted the form and substance of the national dialect, and ample glossaries have been composed, to interpret a multitude of words of Arabic, Turkish, Slavonian, Latin, or French origin But a purer idiom was spoken in the court and taught in the college, and the flourishing state of the language is described, and perhaps embellished, by a learned Italian,<sup>k</sup> who, by a long residence and noble marriage,<sup>l</sup> was naturalized at Constantinople about thirty years before the Turkish conquest "The vulgar speech," says Philéplus,<sup>m</sup> "has been depraved by the people, and infected by the multitude of strangers and merchants who every day flock to

<sup>f</sup> So nugatory, or rather so fabulous, are these re-unions of the Nestorians, Jacobites, &c. that I have turned over, without success, the Bibliotheca Orientalis of Assemanus, a faithful slave of the Vatican & Ripaille is situated near Thoon in Savoy, on the southern side of the lake of Geneva It is now a Carthusian abbey, and Mr Addison (Travels into Italy, vol. ii. p. 147, 148 of Baskervill's edition of his works) has celebrated the place and the founder Aneas Sylvius, and the fathers of Basil, applaud the austere life of the dual hermit, but the French and Italian proverbists most unluckily attest the popular opinion of his luxury

<sup>h</sup> In this recount of the councils of Basil, Ferrara and Florence I have consulted the original acts, which fill the seventeenth and eighteenth tomes of the edition of Venice and are closed by the perspicuous though partial history of Augustin Patricius, an Italian of the fifteenth century They are digested and abridged by Dupin (Bibliothèque Eccles. tom. xii.) and the continuator of Henry, (1001 xxii.) and the respect of the Gallican church for the adverse parties confines their neighbors to an awkward moderation

<sup>i</sup> In the first attempt, Meursius collected 3600 Græco barbarous words to which, in a second edition, he subjoined 1800 more yet what plentiful gleanings did he leave to Porcius, Duange Fabrotti, the Bollandists &c. (Fabric. Bibliot. Græc. tom. x. p. 101, &c.) Some Persian words may be found in Xenophon, and some Latin ones in Plinarch and such is the inevitable effect of war and commerce but the form and substance of the language were not affected by this slight alloy

the city and mingle with the inhabitants It is from the disciples of such a school that the Latin language received the versions of Aristotle and Plato, so obscure in sense, and in spirit so poor But the Greeks who have escaped the contagion, are those whom we follow, and they alone are worthy of our imitation In familiar discourse, they still speak the tongue of Aristophanes and Euripides, of the historians and philosophers of Athens, and the style of their writings is still more elaborate and correct The persons who, by their birth and offices, are attached to the Byzantine court, are those who maintain, with the least alloy, the ancient standard of elegance and purity, and the native graces of language most conspicuously shine among the noble matrons, who are excluded from all intercourse with foreigners With foreigners do I say? They live retired and sequestered from the eyes of their fellow-citizens Seldom are they seen in the streets, and when they leave their houses, it is in the dusk of evening, on visits to the churches and their nearest kindred On these occasions, they are on horseback, covered with a veil, and encompassed by their parents, their husbands, or their servants <sup>no</sup>

Among the Greeks, a numerous and opulent clergy was dedicated to the service of religion their monks and bishops have ever been distinguished by the gravity and austerity of their manners nor were they diverted, like the Latin priests, by the pursuits and pleasures of a secular, and even military, life After a large deduction for the time and talents that were lost in the devotion, the laziness, and the discord, of the church and cloister, the more inquisitive and ambitious minds would explore the sacred and profane erudition of their native language The ecclesiasties presided over the education of youth, the schools of philosophy and eloquence were perpetuated till the fall of the empire, and it may be affirmed, that more books and more knowledge were included within the walls of Constantinople, than could be dispersed over the extensive countries of the west <sup>o</sup> But an important distinction has been already noticed the Greeks were stationary or retrograde, while the Latins were ad-

Comparison of the Greeks and Latins

<sup>k</sup> The Life of Francis Philéplus, a sophist, proud, restless, and rapacious, has been diligently composed by Lauocelot, (Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. x. p. 691-751) and Tiraboschi, (Storia della Letteratura Italiana, tom. vii. p. 282-294) for the most part from his own letters His elaborate writings, and those of his contemporaries, are forgotten but their familiar epistles still describe the men and the times

<sup>l</sup> He married, and had perhaps debauched, the daughter of John, and the grand daughter of Manuel Chrysoloras She was young, beautiful, and wealthy and her noble family was allied to the Dorrus of Gooea and the emperors of Constantinople

<sup>m</sup> Græci quibus lingua depravata non sit hæc etiam tempestas ut Aristophanes comicus ait Euripides tragicus, ut oratores omnes, ut historiographi, ut philosophi literati aulem homines et doctissimi et emendatissimi Nam viri viriliter vellem sermone dignitatem atque elegantiam retinebant in primisque ipse nobiles mulieres quibus cum nullum esset omnino cum viris pergruis commercium, merus ille æ purus Græcorum sermo servabatur itaetna (Philéplus Epist. ad anno 1451, apud Rodium, p. 188, 189) He observes in another passage, uxor illa mea Theodora locutur erat admodum moderatè et suavè et maxime Atticè

<sup>n</sup> Philéplus, absurdly enough, derives this Greek or Oriental jealousy from the manners of ancient Rome

<sup>o</sup> See the state of learning in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries in the learned and judicious Mosheim (Institut. Hist. Eccles. p. 474-440 490-494)

vancing with a rapid and progressive motion. The nations were excited by the spirit of independence and emulation, and even the little world of the Italian states contained more people and industry than the decreasing circle of the Byzantine empire. In Europe, the lower ranks of society were relieved from the yoke of feudal servitude, and freedom is the first step to curiosity and knowledge. The use, however rude and corrupt, of the Latin tongue had been preserved by superstition, the universities, from Bologna to Oxford,<sup>p</sup> were peopled with thousands of scholars, and their misguided ardour might be directed to more liberal and manly studies. In the resurrection of science, Italy was the first that cast away her shroud, and the eloquent Petrarch, by his lessons and his example, may justly be applauded as the first harbinger of day. A purer style of composition, a more generous and rational strain of sentiment, flowed from the study and imitation of the writers of ancient Rome, and the disciples of Cicero and Virgil approached, with reverence and love, the sanctuary of their Grecian masters. In the sack of Constantinople, the French, and even the Venetians, had despised and destroyed the works of Lysippus and Homer: the monuments of art may be annihilated by a single blow, but the immortal mind is renewed and multiplied by the copies of the pen, and such copies it was the ambition of Petrarch and his friends to possess and understand. The arms of the Turks undoubtedly pressed the flight of the muses, yet we may tremble at the thought, that Greece might have been overwhelmed, with her schools and libraries, before Europe had emerged from the deluge of barbarism, that the seeds of science might have been scattered by the winds, before the Italian soil was prepared for their cultivation.

Revival of the Greek learning in Italy

The most learned Italians of the fifteenth century have confessed and applauded the restoration of Greek literature, after a long oblivion of many hundred years.<sup>q</sup> Yet in that country, and beyond the Alps, some names are quoted, some profound scholars, who in the darker ages were honourably distinguished by their knowledge of the Greek tongue, and national vanity has been loud in the praise of such rare examples of erudition. Without scrutinizing the merit of individuals, truth must observe, that their science is without a cause, and without an effect, that it was easy for them to satisfy themselves, and their more ignorant contemporaries, and

<sup>p</sup> At the end of the fifteenth century there existed in Europe about fifty universities, and of these the foundation of ten or twelve is prior to the year 1300. They were crowded in proportion to their scarcity. Bologna contained 10 000 students, chiefly of the civil law. In the year 1357 the number at Oxford had decreased from 30 000 to 6000 scholars (Henry's History of Great Britain, vol. iv. p. 478). Yet even this decrease is much superior to the present list of the members of the university.

<sup>q</sup> Of those writers who professedly treat of the restoration of the Greek learning in Italy, the two principal are Hædus, Dr Humphrey Hædus (de Græcis Illustribus Linguae Græcæ Literarumque humaniorum Institutibus. Londoni, 1742, in large octavo) and Tiraboschi (Storia della Letteratura Italiana, tom. v. p. 364—377 tom. vii. p. 112—143). The Oxford professor is a laborious sehnur, but the librarian of Modena enjoys the superiority of a modern and national historian.

<sup>r</sup> In Calabria quæ olim magna Græcia dicebatur colonis Græcæ repleta, remansit quædam hogue veleris cognitio (Hædus, p. 2). If

that the idiom, which they had so marvellously acquired, was transcribed in few manuscripts, and was not taught in any university of the west. In a corner of Italy, it faintly existed as the popular, or at least as the ecclesiastical, dialect.<sup>r</sup> The first impression of the Doric and Ionic colonies has never been completely erased. The Calabrian churches were long attached to the throne of Constantinople, and the monks of St Basil pursued their studies in mount Athos and the schools of the east. Calabria was the native country of Barlaam, who has already appeared as a sectary and an ambassador, and Barlaam was the first who revived, beyond the Alps, the memory, or at least the writings, of Homer.<sup>s</sup> He is described, by Petrarch and Boecace,<sup>t</sup> as a man of a diminutive stature, though truly great in the measure of learning and genius, of a piercing discernment, though of a slow and painful elocution. For many ages (as they affirm) Greece had not produced his equal in the knowledge of history, grammar, and philosophy, and his merit was celebrated in the attestations of the princes and doctors of Constantinople. One of these attestations is still extant, and the emperor Cantacuzene, the protector of his adversaries, is forced to allow, that Euclid, Aristotle, and Plato, were familiar to that profound and subtle logician.<sup>u</sup> In the court of Avignon, he formed an intimate connexion with Petrarch,<sup>v</sup> the first of the Latin scholars, and the desire of mutual instruction was the principle of their literary commerce. The Tuscan applied himself with eager curiosity and assiduous diligence to the study of the Greek language, and in a laborious struggle with the dryness and difficulty of the first rudiments, he began to reach the sense, and to feel the spirit, of poets and philosophers, whose minds were congenial to his own. But he was soon deprived of the society and lessons of this useful assistant. Barlaam relinquished his fruitless embassy, and, on his return to Greece, he rashly provoked the swarms of fanatic monks, by attempting to substitute the light of reason to that of their navel. After a separation of three years, the two friends again met in the court of Naples, but the generous pupil renounced the fairest occasion of improvement, and by his recommendation Barlaam was finally settled in a small bishopric of his native Calabria.<sup>w</sup> The manifold avocations of Petrarch, love and friendship, his various correspondence and frequent jour-

Lessons of Bar
laam
A D 1339

Studies of Pe trarch,
A D 1339—1374

it were eradicated by the Romans, it was revived and perpetuated by the monks of St Basil, who possessed seven convents at Rosanno alone (Giannone Storia di Napoli tom. i. p. 520).

<sup>s</sup> Ji Barlaam (says Petrarch, the French and Germans) vix, non dicam libros sed nomen Homeri indivisum. Perhaps, in that respect, the thirteenth century was less happy than the age of Charlemagne.

<sup>t</sup> See the character of Barlaam, in Boecace de Genealog. Deorum, l. xv. c. 6.

<sup>u</sup> Cantacuzene, l. ii. c. 36.

<sup>v</sup> For the connexion of Petrarch and Barlaam and the two interviews, at Avignon in 1339 and at Naples in 1342, see the excellent Memmres sur la Vie de Petrarch, tom. i. p. 406—410 tom. ii. p. 75—77.

<sup>w</sup> The bishopric to which Barlaam retired, was the old Loeri in the middle ages Sancta Cyrica and by corruption Hieracium, Gerace (Disert Chorographia Iolice medii ævi, p. 312). The divanum of the Norman times soon lapsed into poverty, since even the church was poor: yet the town still contains 3000 inhabitants (Swinburne, p. 340).

neys, the Roman laurel, and his elaborate compositions in prose and verse, in Latin and Italian, diverted him from a foreign idiom, and as he advanced in life, the attainment of the Greek language was the object of his wishes rather than of his hopes. When he was about fifty years of age, a Byzantine ambassador, his friend, and a master of both tongues, presented him with a copy of Homer, and the answer of Petrarch is at once expressive of his eloquence, gratitude, and regret. After celebrating the generosity of the donor, and the value of a gift more precious in his estimation than gold or rubies, he thus proceeds: "Your present of the genuine and original text of the divine poet, the fountain of all invention, is worthy of yourself and of me; you have fulfilled your promise, and satisfied my desires. Yet your liberality is still imperfect: with Homer you should have given me yourself, a guide, who could lead me into the fields of light, and disclose to my wondering eyes the specious miracles of the Iliad and Odyssey. But, alas! Homer is dumb, or I am deaf, nor is it in my power to enjoy the beauty which I possess. I have seated him by the side of Plato, the prince of poets near the prince of philosophers, and I glory in the sight of my illustrious guests. Of their immortal writings, whatever had been translated into the Latin idiom I had already acquired, but, if there be no profit, there is some pleasure, in beholding these venerable Greeks in their proper and national habit. I am delighted with the aspect of Homer, and as often as I embrace the silent volume, I exclaim with a sigh, illustrious bard! with what pleasure should I listen to thy song, if my sense of hearing were not obstructed and lost by the death of one friend, and in the much-lamented absence of another. Nor do I yet despair, and the example of Cato suggests some comfort and hope, since it was in the last period of age that he attained the knowledge of the Greek letters."

The prize which eluded the efforts of Petrarch, was obtained by the fortune and industry of his friend Boccace,<sup>a</sup> the father of the Tuscan prose. That popular writer, who derives his reputation from the Decameron, a hundred novels of pleasantry and love, may aspire to the more serious praise of restoring in Italy the study of the Greek language. In the year one thousand three hundred and sixty, a disciple of Barlaam, whose name was Leo, or Leontius Pilatus, was detained in his way to Avignon by the advice and hospitality of Boccace, who lodged the stranger in his house, prevailed on the republic of Florence to allow him an annual stipend, and devoted his leisure to the first Greek professor, who taught that language in the western countries of Europe. The appearance of Leo might disgust the most eager disciple, he was clothed in the mantle of a philosopher, or a mendicant, his countenance was hideous, his face was overshadowed with black hair, his beard long and uncombed, his deportment rustic, his temper gloomy and inconstant, nor could he grace his discourse with the ornaments, or even the perspicuity, of Latin elocution. But his mind was stored with a treasure of Greek learning, history and fable, philosophy and grammar, were alike at his command, and he read the poems of Homer in the schools of Florence. It was from his explanation that Boccace composed and transcribed a literal prose version of the Iliad and Odyssey, which satisfied the thirst of his friend Petrarch, and which perhaps, in the succeeding century, was clandestinely used by Laurentius Valla, the Latin interpreter. It was from his narratives that the same Boccace collected the materials for his treatise on the genealogy of the heathen gods, a work, in that age, of stupendous erudition, and which he ostentatiously sprinkled with Greek characters and passages, to excite the wonder and applause of his more ignorant readers.<sup>b</sup> The first steps of learning are slow and laborious, no more than ten votaries of Homer could be enumerated in all Italy, and neither Rome, nor Venice, nor Naples, could add a single name to this studious catalogue. But their numbers would have multiplied, their progress would have been accelerated, if the inconstant Leo, at the end of three years, had not relinquished an honourable and beneficial station. In his passage, Petrarch entertained him at Padua a short time, he enjoyed the scholar, but was justly offended with the gloomy and unsocial temper of the man. Discontented with the world and with himself, Leo depreciated his present enjoyments, while absent persons and objects were dear to his imagination. In Italy he was a Thessalian, in Greece a native of Calabria, in the company of the Latins he disdained their language, religion, and manners, no sooner was he landed at Constantinople, than he again sighed for the wealth of Venice and the elegance of Florence. His Italian friends were deaf to his importunity, he depended on their curiosity and indulgence, and embarked on a second voyage, but on his entrance into the Adriatic, the ship was assailed by a tempest, and the unfortunate teacher, who like Ulysses had fastened himself to the mast, was struck dead by a flash of lightning. The humane Petrarch dropt a tear on his disaster, but he was most anxious to learn whether some copy of Euripides or Sophocles might not be saved from the hands of the mariners.<sup>c</sup>

<sup>a</sup> I will transcribe a passage from this epistle of Petrarch (Fam. lib. 2.) Donasti Homerum non in alienum sermonem violento alio derivatum, sed ex ipsis Greci eloqui scatebris, et qualis divino ille profudit in æmo. Sine tua voce Homerus tuus apud me mutis immo vero cæcis apud illum auribus sum. Gaudeo tamen vel inspectu solo, ne cepe illum complexus atque suspirans dico, O magne vir &c.
<sup>b</sup> For the life and writings of Boccace, who was born in 1313, and died in 1375, Fabricius (Bibliot. Latinæ mediæ ævi, tom. 1. p. 248, &c.) and Tiraboschi (tom. v. p. 83, 439–451) may be consulted. The editions, versions, imitations, of his novels, are innumerable. Yet he was ashamed to communicate that trifling, and perhaps scandalous, work to

Petrarch his respectable friend, in whose letters and memoirs he conspicuously appears.

<sup>b</sup> Boccace indulges an honest vanity, Ostentationis causa Græcæ carmina adscripsi. Iure utor meo, meum est hoc decus mea gloria. scilicet inter Ltrusco Græcis uti carminibus. Nonne ego fui qui Leontium Pilatum, &c. (de Genealogia Deorum, l. xv. c. 7. a work which, though now forgotten, has run through thirteen or fourteen editions.)

<sup>c</sup> Leontius, or Leo Pilatus, is sufficiently well known by Hody (2–11) and the Abbe de Sade, (Vie de Petrarche tom. iii. p. 625–634, 670–673) who has very happily caught the lively and dramatic manner of his original.

Leo Pilatus,
first Greek professor at Florence and in the west,
A D
1360–1363

Foundation of the Greek language in Italy by Manuel Chrysoloras,
A D 1390—1415

But the faint rudiments of Greek learning, which Petrarch had encouraged and Boece had planted, soon withered and expired. The succeeding generation was content for a while with the improvement of Latin eloquence, nor was it before the end of the fourteenth century, that a new and perpetual flame was rekindled in Italy.<sup>d</sup> Previous to his own journey, the emperor Manuel despatched his envoys and orators to implore the compassion of the western princes. Of these envoys, the most conspicuous, or the most learned, was Manuel Chrysoloras,<sup>e</sup> of noble birth, and whose Roman ancestors are supposed to have migrated with the great Constantine. After visiting the courts of France and England, where he obtained some contributions and more promises, the envoy was invited to assume the office of a professor, and Florence had again the honour of this second invitation. By his knowledge, not only of the Greek, but of the Latin, tongue, Chrysoloras deserved the stipend, and surpassed the expectation, of the republic. His school was frequented by a crowd of disciples of every rank and age, and one of these, in a general history, has described his motives and his success. "At that time," says Leonard Aretin,<sup>f</sup> "I was a student of the civil law, but my soul was inflamed with the love of letters, and I bestowed some application on the sciences of logic and rhetoric. On the arrival of Manuel, I hesitated whether I should desert my legal studies, or relinquish this golden opportunity, and thus, in the ardour of youth, I communed with my own mind—Wilt thou be wanting to thyself and thy fortune? Wilt thou refuse to be introduced to a familiar converse with Homer, Plato, and Demosthenes? with those poets, philosophers, and orators, of whom such wonders are related, and who are celebrated by every age as the great masters of human science? Of professors and scholars in civil law, a sufficient supply will always be found in our universities, but a teacher, and such a teacher, of the Greek language, if he once be suffered to escape, may never afterwards be retrieved. Convinced by these reasons, I gave myself to Chrysoloras, and so strong was my passion, that the lessons which I had imbibed in the day were the constant subject of my nightly dreams."<sup>g</sup> At the same time and place, the Latin classics were explained by John of Ravenna, the domestic pupil of Petrarch<sup>h</sup> the Italians, who illustrated their age and country, were formed in this double school, and Florence became the fruitful seminary of Greek and Roman erudition. The presence of the emperor recalled Chrysoloras from the college to the court, but he afterwards taught at Pavia and Rome with equal industry and applause. The remainder of his life, about fifteen years, was divided between Italy and Constantinople, between embassies and lessons. In the noble office of enlightening a foreign nation, the grammarian was not unmindful of a more sacred duty to his prince and country, and Emanuel Chrysoloras died at Constance on a public mission from the emperor to the council.

After his example, the restoration of the Greek letters in Italy was prosecuted by a series of emigrants, who were destitute of fortune, and endowed with learning, or at least with language. From the terror or oppression of the Turkish arms, the natives of Thessalonica and Constantinople escaped to a land of freedom, curiosity, and wealth. The synod introduced into Florence the lights of the Greek church and the oracles of the Platonic philosophy, and the fugitives who adhered to the union, had the double merit of renouncing their country, not only for the christian, but for the catholic cause. A patriot, who sacrifices his party and conscience to the allurements of favour, may be possessed however of the private and social virtues. He no longer hears the reproachful epithets of slave and apostate, and the consideration which he acquires among his new associates, will restore in his own eyes the dignity of his character. The prudent conformity of Bessarion was rewarded with the Roman purple. He fixed his residence in Italy, and the Greek cardinal, the titular patriarch of Constantinople, was respected as the chief and protector of his nation.<sup>k</sup> His abilities were exercised in the legations of Bologna, Venice, Germany, and France, and his election to the chair of St Peter floated for a moment on the uncertain breath of a conclave.<sup>l</sup> His ecclesiastical honours diffused a splendour and pre-eminence over his literary merit and service. His palace was a school, as often as the cardinal visited the Vatican, he was attended by a learned train of both nations.<sup>m</sup> of

<sup>d</sup> Dr Hody (p 54) is angry with Leonard Aretin Guarinus Paulus Jovius &c. for affirming, that the Greek letters were restored in Italy post septingentos annos as if says he they had flourished till the end of the seventh century. These writers most probably reckoned from the last period of the exarinate and the presence of the Greek magistrates and troops at Ravenna and Rome must have preserved, in some degree, the use of their native tongue.

<sup>e</sup> See the article of Emanuel or Manuel Chrysoloras in Hody (p 12—54) and Tiraboschi (tom vii p 113—118). The precise date of his arrival floats between the years 1390 and 1400 and is only confined by the reign of Boniface IX.

<sup>f</sup> The name of Aretinus has been assumed by five or six natives of Arezzo in Tuscany of whom the most famous and the most worthless lived in the sixteenth century. Leonardus Brunus Aretinus the disciple of Chrysoloras was a linguist, an orator and an historian the secretary of four successive popes and the chancellor of the republic of Florence, where he died A D 1444 at the age of seventy five (Fabrici Bibliot. mediæ ævi, tom i p 190, &c. Tiraboschi tom vii p 33—38).

<sup>g</sup> See the passage in Aretin Commentario Rerum suo Tempore in Italia, Gestarum apud Hodium p 28—30.

<sup>h</sup> To this domestic discipline Petrarch, who loved the youth, often complains of the eager curiosity, restless temper, and proud feelings, which announce the genius and glory of a ripening age (Mémoires sur Petrarque tom iii p 700—709).

<sup>i</sup> Hinc Græca. Latineque scholæ exoritur, Guarini Philiphio, Leonardo Aretino Caroloque ac perrisque aliis, tanquam ex equo Trojano prodentibus, quorum emulatione multa ingenia deinceps ad laudem excitata sunt (Petrus in Bonifacio IX.) Another Italian writer adds the names of Paulus Petrus Vergerius Omobonus Vinctus, Pogius Franciscus Barbarus, &c. But I question whether a rigid chronology would allow Chrysoloras all these eminent scholars (Hody, p 25—27 &c).

<sup>k</sup> See in Hody the article of Bessarion, (p 136—177) Theodore Gaza, George of Trebizond and the rest of the Greeks whom I have named or omitted are inserted in their proper chapters of his learned work. See likewise Tiraboschi, in the 1st and 2nd parts of the sixth tome.

<sup>l</sup> The cardinals knoeled at his door but his conclavist refused to interrupt the studies of Bessarion. "Nicholas," said he "thy respect has cost thee a hair, and me the hair."

<sup>m</sup> Such as George of Trebizond Theodore Gaza Argyropolus Andronicus of Thessalonica Philiphio, Paulus Blondus Nicholas Perrot, Volth Campanus Platina, &c. Viri (says Hody with the pious zeal of a scholar) nullo ævo perituri, (p 156).

favourable temper of their countrymen, had assumed a jurisdiction even in temporal concerns, which the magistrate could not venture to exercise, and the haughty warrior patiently submitted to the lash of correction, when it was inflicted, not by any human power, but by the immediate order of the god of war*. The defects of civil policy were sometimes supplied by the interposition of ecclesiastical authority. The latter was constantly exerted to maintain silence and decency in the popular assemblies, and was sometimes extended to a more enlarged concern for the national welfare. A solemn procession was occasionally celebrated in the present countries of Mecklenburgh and Pomerania. The unknown symbol of the Earth, covered with a thick veil, was placed on a carriage drawn by cows, and in this manner the goddess, whose common residence was in the isle of Rugen, visited several adjacent tribes of her worshippers. During her progress the sound of war was hushed, quarrels were suspended, arms laid aside, and the restless Germans had an opportunity of tasting the blessings of peace and harmony. The voice of God, so often and so ineffectually proclaimed by the clergy of the eleventh century, was an obvious imitation of this ancient custom.

But the influence of religion was far more powerful to inflame, than to moderate, the fierce passions of the Germans. Interest and fanaticism often prompted its ministers to sanctify the most daring and the most unjust enterprises, by the approbation of Heaven, and full assurances of success. The consecrated standards, long revered in the groves of superstition, were placed in the front of the battle,* and the hostile army was devoted with dire execrations to the gods of war and of thunder. In the faith of soldiers (and such were the Germans) cowardice is the most unpardonable of sins. A brave man was the worthy favourite of their martial deities, the wretch, who had lost his shield, was alike banished from the religious and the civil assemblies of his countrymen. Some tribes of the north seem to have embraced the doctrine of transmigration,† others imagined a gross paradise of immortal drunkenness.‡ All agreed, that a life spent in arms, and a glorious death in battle, were the best preparations for a happy futurity, either in this or in another world.

The immortality so vainly promised by the priests, was, in some degree, conferred by the bards. That singular order of men has most deservedly attracted the notice of all who have attempted to investigate the antiquities of the Celts, the Scandinavians, and the Germans. Their genius and character, as well as the reverence paid to that important office, have been sufficiently illustrated. But we cannot so easily express, or even conceive, the enthusiasm of arms and glory which they kindled in the breast of their audience. Among a polished people, a taste for poetry is rather an amusement of the fancy, than a passion of the soul. And yet, when in calm retirement we peruse the combats described by Homer or Tasso, we are insensibly seduced by the fiction, and feel a momentary glow of martial ardour. But how faint, how cold is the sensation which a peaceful mind can receive from solitary study! It was in the hour of battle, or in the feast of victory, that the bards celebrated the glory of heroes of ancient days, the ancestors of those warlike chieftains, who listened with transport to their artless but animated strains. The view of arms and of danger heightened the effect of the military song, and the passions which it tended to excite, the desire of fame, and the contempt of death, were the habitual sentiments of a German mind.‡

Such was the situation, and such were the manners, of the ancient Germans. Their climate, their want of learning, of arts, and of laws, their notions of honour, of gallantry, and of religion, their sense of freedom, impatience of peace, and thirst of enterprise, all contributed to form a people of military heroes. And yet we find, that, during more than two hundred and fifty years that elapsed from the defeat of Varus to the reign of Decius, these formidable barbarians made few considerable attempts, and not any material impression, on the luxurious and enslaved provinces of the empire. Their progress was checked by their want of arms and discipline, and their fury was diverted by the intestine divisions of ancient Germany.

It has been observed, with ingenuity, and not without truth, that the command of iron soon gives a nation the command of gold. But the rude tribes of Germany, alike destitute of both those valuable metals, were reduced slowly to acquire, by their unassisted strength, the possession of the one as well as the other. The fact of a German army displayed their poverty of iron. Swords, and the longer kind of lances, they could seldom use. Their francea (as they called them in their own language) were long spears headed with a sharp but narrow iron point, and which, as occasion required, they either darted from a distance, or pushed in close onset. With this spear, and with a shield, their cavalry was contented. A multitude of darts, scattered with incredible force, were an additional resource of the infantry. Their military * Tacit. Germania, c. 7. † Tacit. Germania, c. 40.

‡ See Dr. Robertson's History of Charles V. vol. 3. note 10.

* Tacit. Germ. c. 7. These standards were only the heads of wild beasts.

† See an instance of this custom, Tacit. Annal. xiii. 57.

‡ Cesar. Dindorus, and Lucan, seem to ascribe this doctrine to the Celts, but M. Pelloutier (Histoire des Celtes, l. iii. c. 18.) labours to reduce their expressions to a more orthodox sense.

* Concerning this gross but alluring doctrine of the Ida, see Fablie in the curious version of that book, published by M. Mallet, in his Introduction to the History of Denmark.

Causes which checked the progress of the Germans.

Want of arms.

b See Tacit. Germ. c. 3. Diod. Sicul. l. iv. p. 107. The classical reader may remember the rank of Demodocus in the Phæacian court, and the ardour infused by Tyrtæus into the fainting Spartans. Yet there is little probability that the Greeks and the Germans were the same people. Much learned trifling might be spared, if our antiquarians would emendate to reflect that similar manners will naturally be produced by similar situations.

c Mississia spargunt, Tacit. Germania, c. 6. Either that historian used a vague expression, or he meant that they were thrown at random.

men applauded by themselves and the public, and whose writings, now overspread with dust, were popular and useful in their own times. I shall not attempt to enumerate the restorers of Grecian literature in the fifteenth century, and it may be sufficient to mention with gratitude the names of Theodore Gaza, of George of Trebizond, of John Argyropulus, and Demetrius Chalcondyles, who taught their native language in the schools of

Their faults and merits

Florence and Rome. Their labours were not inferior to those of Bessarion, whose purple they revered, and whose fortune was the secret object of their envy. But the lives of these grammarians were humble and obscure: they had declined the lucrative paths of the church, their dress and manners secluded them from the commerce of the world, and since they were confined to the merit, they might be content with the rewards, of learning. From this character, Janus Lascaris<sup>a</sup> will deserve an exception. His eloquence, politeness, and imperial descent, recommended him to the French monarchs, and in the same cities he was alternately employed to teach and to negotiate. Duty and interest prompted them to cultivate the study of the Latin language, and the most successful attained the faculty of writing and speaking with fluency and elegance in a foreign idiom. But they ever retained the inveterate vanity of their country, their praise, or at least their esteem, was reserved for the national writers, to whom they owed their fame and subsistence, and they sometimes betrayed their contempt in licentious criticism or satire on Virgil's poetry and the oratory of Tully. The superiority of these masters arose from the familiar use of a living language, and their first disciples were incapable of discerning how far they had degenerated from the knowledge, and even the practice, of their ancestors. A vicious pronunciation,<sup>p</sup> which they introduced, was banished from the schools by the reason of the succeeding age. Of the power of the Greek accents they were ignorant, and those musical notes, which, from an Attic tongue, and to an Attic ear, must have been the secret soul of harmony, were to their eyes, as to our own, no more than minute and unmeaning marks, in prose superfluous, and troublesome in verse. The art of grammar they truly possessed: the valuable fragments of Apollonius and Herodian were transfused into their lessons, and their treatises of syntax and etymology, though devoid of philosophic spirit, are still useful to the Greek student. In the shipwreck of the Byzantine libraries, each fugitive seized a fragment of treasure, a copy of some author, who, without his industry, might have perished: the transcripts were multiplied by an assiduous, and sometimes an elegant, pen, and the text was corrected and explained by their own comments, or those of the elder scholiasts. The sense, though not the spirit, of the Greek classics, was interpreted to the Latin world: the beauties of style evaporate in a version, but the judgment of Theodore Gaza selected the more solid works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, and their natural histories of animals and plants opened a rich fund of genuine and experimental science.

<sup>a</sup> He was born before the taking of Constantinople, but his honourable life was stretched far into the sixteenth century (A D 1535). Leo X and Francis I were his noblest patrons, under whose auspices he founded the Greek colleges of Rome and Paris (Holtz, p 247—275). He left posterity in France, but the counts de Vintimille, and their numerous branches, derive the name of Lascaris from a doubtful marriage in the thirteenth century with the daughter of a Greek emperor (Ducange, Fam Byzant p 224—230).

<sup>p</sup> Two of his epigrams against Virgil, and three against Tully, are preserved and refuted by Franciscus Floridus, who can find no better names than Græculus neptus et impudens (Holtz, p 274). In our own guide, ingratorum, spiritus et majestate carminis herici defecta, many such verses as he the said Jeremiah Markland, would have been ashamed of owning, (præfixi id Statii Sylvis p 21, 22).

<sup>q</sup> Luanuel Chrysoloras, and his colleagues, are accused of ignorance, envy, or avarice (Sylloge, &c tom ii p 235). The modern Greeks

Yet the fleeting shadows of metaphysics were pursued with more curiosity and ardour. After a long oblivion, Plato was revived in Italy by a venerable Greek, who taught in the house of Cosmo of Medicis. While the synod of Florence was involved in theological debate, some beneficial consequences might flow from the study of his elegant philosophy: his style is the purest standard of the Attic dialect, and his sublime thoughts are sometimes adapted to familiar conversation, and sometimes adorned with the richest colours of poetry and eloquence. The dialogues of Plato are a dramatic picture of the life and death of a sage, and, as often as he descends from the clouds, his moral system inculcates the love of truth, of our country, and of mankind. The precept and example of Socrates recommended a modest doubt and liberal inquiry: and if the Platonists, with blind devotion, adored the visions and errors of their divine master, their enthusiasm might correct the dry dogmatic method of the Peripatetic school. So equal, yet so opposite, are the merits of Plato and Aristotle, that they may be balanced in endless controversy, but some spark of freedom may be produced by the collision of adverse servitude. The modern Greeks were divided between the two sects: with more fury than skill they fought under the banner of their leaders, and the field of battle was removed in their flight from Constantinople to Rome. But this philosophical debate soon degenerated into an angry and personal quarrel of grammarians, and Bessarion, though an advocate for Plato, protected the national honour, by interposing the advice and authority of a mediator. In the gardens of the Medici, the academical doctrine was enjoyed by the polite and learned: but their philosophic society was quickly dissolved, and if the writings of the Attic sage were perused in the closet, the more pronounce the  $\beta$  as a V consonant, and confound three vowels ( $\eta$ ,  $\epsilon$ ,  $\iota$ ), and several diphthongs. Such was the vulgar pronunciation which the stern Gardiner maintained by penal statutes in the university of Cambridge: but the monosyllable  $\beta\eta$  represented to an Attic ear the bleating of sheep, and a bell-wether is better evidence than a bishop or a chancellor. The treatises of those scholars, particularly Erasmus, who asserted a more classical pronunciation, are collected in the Sylloge of Flavercamp, (2 vols in octavo, Lugd Bat 1736, 1740) but it is difficult to paint sounds by words, and in their reference to modern use, they can be understood only by their respective countrymen. We may observe, that our peculiar pronunciation of the  $\theta$ ,  $\delta$ , is approved by Erasmus (tom ii p 130).

<sup>q</sup> George Gemistus Pletho, a various and voluminous writer, the master of Bessarion and all the Platonists of the times. He visited Italy in his old age, and soon returned to end his days in Peloponnesus. See the curious Diatribe of Leo Allatius de Georgis, in Fabricius (Biblioth Græc tom x p 739—756).

powerful Stagyrite continued to reign the oracle of the church and school *

I have fairly represented the literary merits of the Greeks, yet it must be confessed, that they were seconded and surpassed by the ardour of the Latins Italy was divided into many independent states, and at that time, it was the ambition of princes and republics to vie with each other in the encouragement and reward of literature The fame of

Nicholas V Nicholas the fifth<sup>s</sup> has not been adequate to his merits From a plebeian origin he raised himself by his virtue and learning the character of the man prevailed over the interest of the pope, and he sharpened those weapons which were soon pointed against the Roman church<sup>t</sup> He had been the friend of the most eminent scholars of the age he became their patron, and such was the humility of his manners, that the change was scarcely discernible either to them or to himself If he pressed the acceptance of a liberal gift, it was not as the measure of desert, but as the proof of benevolence and when modest merit declined his bounty, "accept it," would he say with a consciousness of his own worth, "ye will not always have a Nicholas among you" The influence of the holy see pervaded Christendom, and he exerted that influence in the search, not of benefices, but of books From the ruins of the Byzantine libraries, from the darkest monasteries of Germany and Britain, he collected the dusty manuscripts of the writers of antiquity, and wherever the original could not be removed, a faithful copy was transcribed and transmitted for his use The Vatican, the old repository for bulls and legends, for superstition and forgery, was daily replenished with more precious furniture, and such was the industry of Nicholas, that in a reign of eight years, he formed a library of five thousand volumes To his munificence the Latin world was indebted for the versions of Xenophon, Diodorus, Polybius, Thucydides, Herodotus, and Appian, of Strabo's Geography, of the Iliad, of the most valuable works of Plato and Aristotle, of Ptolemy and Theophrastus, and of the fathers of the Greek church The example of the

and without a title Cosmo of Medicis<sup>s</sup> was the father of a line of princes, whose name and age are almost synonymous with the restoration of learning, his credit was ennobled into fame, his riches were dedicated to the service of mankind, he corresponded at once with Cairo and London and a cargo of Indian spices and Greek books was often imported in the same vessel The genius and education of his grandson Lorenzo rendered him not only a patron, but a judge and candidate, in the literary race In his palace, distress was entitled to relief, and merit to reward, his leisure hours were delightfully spent in the Platonic academy he encouraged the emulation of Demetrius Chalcondyles and Angelo Politian, and his active missionary Janus Lascaris returned from the East with a treasure of two hundred manuscripts, fourscore of which were as yet unknown in the libraries of Europe<sup>x</sup> The rest of Italy was animated by a similar spirit, and the progress of the nation repaid the liberality of her princes The Latins held the exclusive property of their own literature and these disciples of Greece were soon capable of transmitting and improving the lessons which they had imbibed After a short succession of foreign teachers, the tide of emigration subsided, but the language of Constantinople was spread beyond the Alps, and the natives of France, Germany, and England, imparted to their country the sacred fire which they had kindled in the schools of Florence and Rome<sup>y</sup> In the productions of the mind, as in those of the soil, the gifts of nature are excelled by industry and skill the Greek authors, forgotten on the banks of the Ilissus, have been illustrated on those of the Elbe and the Thames and Bessarion or Gaza might have envied the superior science of the barbarians, the accuracy of Budæus, the taste of Erasmus, the copiousness of Stephens, the erudition of Scaliger, the discernment of Reiske, or of Bentley On the side of the Latins, the discovery of printing was a casual advantage but this useful art has been applied by Aldus, and his innumerable successors, to perpetuate and multiply the works of antiquity<sup>z</sup> A single manuscript imported from Greece is revived in ten thousand copies, and each copy is fairer than the original In this form Homer and Plato would peruse with more satisfaction their own writings, and their scholiasts must resign the prize to the labours of our western editors et quantorū emendos pretio bonos libros It is remarkable enough, that the research was facilitated by sultan Bajazet II

y The Greek language was introduced into the university of Oxford in the last years of the fifteenth century by Greycyn Linacer and Iatmer who had all studied at Florence under Demetrius Chalcondyles See Dr Knight's curious life of Erasmus Altho' in a stout academical patriot he is forced to acknowledge that Erasmus learned Greek at Oxford, and taught it at Cambridge

z The jealous Italians were desirous of keeping a monopoly of Greek learning When Aldus was about to publish the Greek scholiasts on Sophocles and Euripides, Cave (said they,) cave hoc facias ne barbari istis adiuti domi moneant et pauciores in Italiam ventitent (Dr Knight, in his life of Erasmus p 365 from Beatus Rhenanus)

a The press of Aldus Manutius a Roman was established at Venice about the year 1494 he printed above sixty considerable works of Greek literature, almost all for the first time several containing different treatises and authors and of several authors two, three, or four editions (Fabrie Bibliot Græcæ tom xiii p 605 &c) Yet his glory must not tempt us to forget, that the first Greek book the Grammar of Constantine Lascaris was printed at Milan in 1476 and that the Florence Homer of 1488 displays all the luxury of the typographical art See the Annales Typographici de Maitaire and the Bibliographie Instructive de De Bure, a knowing bookseller of Paris.

Roman pontiff was preceded or imitated by a Florentine merchant, who governed the republic without arms

* The state of the Platonic philosophy in Italy, is illustrated by Boivin, (Mem de l'Acad des Inscriptions, tom ii p 715-729) and Tiraboschi, (tom vi p 1 p 259-288)

a See the Life of Nicholas V by two contemporary authors Janitius Manettus (tom iii p 90-962.) and Vespasian of Florence (tom xxv p 267-290) in the collection of Muratori and consult Tiraboschi (tom vi p 1 p 46-52 103) and Hody in the articles of Theodore Gaza George of Trebizond, &c b Lord Bolingbroke observes with truth and spirit that the popes in this instance were worse politicians than the muslis, and that the alarm which had bound mankind for so many ages was broken by the magicians themselves (Letters on the Study of History, i vi p 165 166 octavo edition 1770)

c See the literary history of Cosmo and Lorenzo of Medicis in Tiraboschi (tom vi p 1 p 11 c 2) who bestows a due measure of praise on Alphonsus of Arragon king of Naples the dukes of Milan, Ferrara Urbino &c The republic of Venice has deserved the least from the gratitude of scholars.

d Tiraboschi (tom vi p 1 p 104) from the preface of Janus Lascaris to the Greek Antiquity printed at Florence 1494 Latebant (says Aldus in his preface to the Greek orators apud Hodium p 249) in Atho Thiriac monte. Las Lascaris in Italiam reportavit. Mirerat enim ipsum Laurentius ille Medicus in Græciam ad inquirendos simul,

Before the revival of classic literature, the barbarians in Europe were immersed in ignorance, and their vulgar tongues were marked with the rudeness and poverty of their manners. The students of the more perfect idioms of Rome and Greece were introduced to a new world of light and science to the society of the free and polished nations of antiquity, and to a familiar converse with those immortal men who spoke the sublime language of eloquence and reason. Such an intercourse must tend to refine the taste, and to elevate the genius, of the moderns, and yet, from the first experiments, it might appear that the study of the ancients had given fetters, rather than wings, to the human mind. However laudable, the spirit of imitation is of a servile cast, and the first disciples of the Greeks and Romans were a colony of strangers in the midst of their age and country. The minute and laborious diligence which explored the antiquities of remote times, might have improved or adorned the present state of society: the critic and metaphysician were the slaves of Aristotle: the poets, historians, and orators, were proud to repeat the thoughts and words of the Augustan age, the works of nature were observed with the eyes of Pliny and Theophrastus, and some Pagan votaries professed a secret devotion to the gods of Homer and Plato.<sup>b</sup> The Italians were oppressed by the strength and number of their ancient auxiliaries: the century after the deaths of Petrarch and Boecace was filled with a crowd of Latin imitators, who decently repose on our shelves, but in that æra of learning, it will not be easy to discern a real discovery of science, a work of invention or eloquence, in the popular language of the country.<sup>c</sup> But as soon as it had been deeply saturated with the celestial dew, the soil was quickened into vegetation and life, the modern idioms were refined, the classics of Athens and Rome inspired a pure taste and a generous emulation, and in Italy, as afterwards in France and England, the pleasing reign of poetry and fiction was succeeded by the light of speculative and experimental philosophy. Genius may anticipate the season of maturity, but in the education of a people, as in that of an individual, memory must be exercised, before the powers of reason and fancy can be expanded, nor may the artist hope to equal or surpass, till he has learned to imitate, the works of his predecessors.

<sup>b</sup> I will select three singular examples of this classic enthusiasm. 1. At the synod of Florence Gemistus Pletho said in familiar conversation to George of Trebizond that in a short time mankind would unanimously renounce the Gospel and the Koran, for a religion similar to that of the Geotiles (Leo Allatius apud Fabricium, tom. x. p. 751). 2. Paul II. persecuted the Roman academy, which had been founded by Pomponius Laetus and the principal members were accused of heresy, impiety, and paganism (Tiraboschi, tom. vi. p. 1. p. 81, 82). 3. In the next century, some scholars and poets in France celebrated the success of Jodelle's tragedy of Cleopatra, by a festival of Bacchus and, as it is said, by the sacrifice of a goat. (Bayle Dictionnaire, JODELLE Fontenelle, tom. iii. p. 56-61.) Yet the spirit of bigotry might often discern a serious impiety in the sportive play of fancy and learning.

CHAP LXVII

Schism of the Greeks and Latins — Reign and character of Amurath the second — Crusade of Ladislaus king of Hungary — His defeat and death — John Huniades — Scanderbeg — Constantine Palæologus, last emperor of the east

THE respective merits of Rome and Constantinople are compared and celebrated by an eloquent Greek, the father of the Italian schools.<sup>a</sup> The view of the ancient capital, the seat of his ancestors, surpassed the most sanguine expectations of Emanuel Chrysoloras, and he no longer blamed the exclamation of an old sophist, that Rome was the habitation, not of men, but of gods. Those gods, and those men, had long since vanished, but to the eye of liberal enthusiasm, the majesty of ruin restored the image of her ancient prosperity. The monuments of the consuls and Cæsars, of the martyrs and apostles, engaged on all sides the curiosity of the philosopher and the christian, and he confessed, that in every age the arms and the religion of Rome were destined to reign over the earth. While Chrysoloras admired the venerable beauties of the mother, he was not forgetful of his native, country, her fairest daughter, her imperial colony, and the Byzantine patriot expatiates with zeal and truth, on the eternal advantages of nature, and the more transitory glories of art and dominion, which adorned, or had adorned, the city of Constantine. Yet the perfection of the copy still redounds (as he modestly observes) to the honour of the original, and parents are delighted to be renewed, and even excelled, by the superior merit of their children. "Constantinople," says the orator, "is situate on a commanding point, between Europe and Asia, between the Archipelago and the Euxine. By her interposition, the two seas, and the two continents, are united for the common benefit of nations, and the gates of commerce may be shut or opened at her command. The harbour, encompassed on all sides by the sea and the continent, is the most secure and capacious in the world. The walls and gates of Constantinople may be compared with those of Babylon: the towers are many, each tower is a solid and lofty structure, and the second wall, the outer fortification, would be sufficient for the defence and dignity of an ordinary capital. A broad and rapid stream may be introduced into the ditches, and the artificial island may be encompassed, like

Comparison of Rome and Constantinople

<sup>c</sup> The survivor of Boecace died in the year 1375 and we cannot place before 1480 the composition of the Morgante Magiore of Pulci, and the Orlando Innamorato of Boyardo (Tiraboschi, tom. vi. p. 11. p. 174-177).

<sup>a</sup> The epistle of Emanuel Chrysoloras to the emperor John Palæologus will not offend the eye or ear of a classical student, (ad calcem Codicis de Antiquitatibus C. P. p. 107-126.) The superscription suggests a chronological remark, that John Palæologus II. was associated in the empire before the year 1414, the date of Chrysoloras's death. A still earlier date, at least 1408 is deduced from the age of his youngest sons Demetrius and Thomas, who were both Porphyrogeniti (Ducauge, Fam. Byzant. p. 244-247.)

Athens,<sup>b</sup> by land or water " Two strong and natural causes are alleged for the perfection of the model of new Rome. The royal founder reigned over the most illustrious nations of the globe, and in the accomplishment of his designs, the power of the Romans was combined with the art and science of the Greeks. Other cities have been reared to maturity by accident and time, their beauties are mingled with disorder and deformity, and the inhabitants, unwilling to remove from their natal spot, are incapable of correcting the errors of their ancestors, and the original vices of situation or climate. But the free idea of Constantinople was formed and executed by a single mind, and the primitive model was improved by the obedient zeal of the subjects and successors of the first monarch. The adjacent isles were stored with an inexhaustible supply of marble, but the various materials were transported from the most remote shores of Europe and Asia, and the public and private buildings, the palaces, churches, aqueducts, cisterns, porticoes, columns, baths, and hippodromes, were adapted to the greatness of the capital of the east. The superfluity of wealth was spread along the shores of Europe and Asia, and the Byzantine territory, as far as the Euxine, the Hellespont, and the long wall, might be considered as a populous suburb and a perpetual garden. In this flattering picture, the past and the present, the times of prosperity and decay, are artfully confounded, but a sigh and a confession escape from the orator, that his wretched country was the shadow and sepulchre of its former self. The works of ancient sculpture had been defaced by christian zeal or barbaric violence, the fairest structures were demolished, and the marbles of Paros or Numidia were burnt for lime, or applied to the meanest uses. Of many a statue, the place was marked by an empty pedestal, of many a column, the size was determined by a broken capital, the tombs of the emperors were scattered on the ground, the stroke of time was accelerated by storms and earthquakes, and the vacant space was adorned, by vulgar tradition, with fabulous monuments of gold and silver. From these wonders, which lived only in memory or belief, he distinguishes, however, the porphyry pillar, the column and colossus of Justinian,<sup>c</sup> and the church, more especially the dome, of St Sophia, the best conclusion, since it could not be described according to its merits, and after it no other object could deserve to be mentioned. But he forgets, that a century before, the trembling fabrics of the colossus and the church had been saved and supported by the timely care of Andro-

<sup>b</sup> Somebody observed that the city of Athens might be circumnavigated (το εἶπεν τὴν πόλιν τῶν Ἀθηναίων δύνασθαι καὶ περιελθῆναι καὶ περιελθῆναι). But what may be true in a rhetorical sense of Constantinople, cannot be applied to the situation of Athens five miles from the sea, and not intersected or surrounded by any navigable streams.

<sup>c</sup> Nicephorus Gregoras has described the Colossus of Justinian (I vii 12) but his measures are false and inconsistent. The editor Hovius consulted his friend Girardon and the sculptor gave him the true proportions of an equestrian statue. That of Justinian was still visible to Peter Cyllinus, not so the column but in the outward court of the seraglio, and he was at Constantinople when it was melted down, and cast into a brass cannon (de Topographia C P I ii c. 17).

<sup>d</sup> See the decay and repairs of St Sophia, in Nicephorus Gregoras

nicus the elder. Thirty years after the emperor had fortified St Sophia with two new buttresses or pyramids, the eastern hemisphere suddenly gave way, and the images, the altars, and the sanctuary, were crushed by the falling ruin. The mischief indeed was speedily repaired, the rubbish was cleared by the incessant labour of every rank and age, and the poor remains of riches and industry were consecrated by the Greeks to the most stately and venerable temple of the east.<sup>d</sup>

The last hope of the falling city and The Greek schism empire was placed in the harmony of after the council of Florence, the mother and daughter, in the maternal A D 1440-1448 tenderness of Rome, and the filial obedience of Constantinople. In the synod of Florence, the Greeks and Latins had embraced, and subscribed, and promised, but these signs of friendship were perfidious or fruitless,<sup>e</sup> and the baseless fabric of the union vanished like a dream.<sup>f</sup> The emperor and his prelates returned home in the Venetian galleys but as they touched at the Morea and the isles of Corfu and Lesbos, the subjects of the Latins complained that the pretended union would be an instrument of oppression. No sooner did they land on the Byzantine shore, than they were saluted, or rather assailed, with a general murmur of zeal and discontent. During their absence, above two years, the capital had been deprived of its civil and ecclesiastical rulers. fanaticism fermented in anarchy, the most furious monks reigned over the conscience of women and bigots, and the hatred of the Latin name was the first principle of nature and religion. Before his departure for Italy, the emperor had flattered the city with the assurance of a prompt relief and a powerful succour, and the clergy, confident in their orthodoxy and science, had promised themselves and their flocks an easy victory over the blind shepherds of the west. The double disappointment exasperated the Greeks, the conscience of the subscribing prelates was awakened, the hour of temptation was past, and they had more to dread from the public resentment, than they could hope from the favour of the emperor or the pope. Instead of justifying their conduct, they deplored their weakness, professed their contrition, and cast themselves on the mercy of God and of their brethren. To the reproachful question, what had been the event or the use of their Italian synod? they answered with sighs and tears, "Alas! we have made a new faith, we have exchanged piety for impiety, we have betrayed the immaculate sacrifice, and we are become Azymites" (The Azymites were those who celebrated the communion with unleavened bread, and I must retract or qualify the praise which I have bestowed on the growing philosophy of the times) "Alas! we have been seduced by distress, by fraud, and by the hopes and fears of a transitory life. The hand that has signed the union should be cut off, and the tongue that has pronounced the Latin creed deserves to be torn from the root." The best proof of their repentance was an increase of zeal for the most trivial rites and the most incomprehensible doctrines, and an absolute separation from all, without excepting their prince, who preserved some regard for honour and consistency. After the decease of the patriarch Joseph, the archbishops of Heraclea and Trebizond had courage to refuse the vacant office, and cardinal Bessarion preferred the warm and comfortable shelter of the Vatican. The choice of the emperor and his clergy was confined to Metrophanes of Cyzicus, he was consecrated in St Sophia, but the temple was vacant. The cross-bearers abdicated their service, the infection spread from the city to the villages, and Metrophanes discharged, without effect, some ecclesiastical thunders against a nation of schismatics. The eyes of the Greeks were directed to Mark of Ephesus, the champion of his country, and the sufferings of the holy confessor were repaid with a tribute of admiration and applause. His example and writings propagated the flame of religious discord, age and infirmity soon removed him from the world, but the gospel of Mark was not a law of forgiveness, and he requested with his dying breath, that none of the adherents of Rome might attend his obsequies or pray for his soul.

(I vii 12 l. xv 2) The building was propped by Andronicus in 1317, the eastern hemisphere fell in 1345. The Greeks in their pompous rhetoric exalted the beauty and holiness of the church, an earthly heaven the abode of angels and of God himself &c.

<sup>e</sup> The genuine and original narrative of Syropoulos, (p. 312-351) opens the schism from the first office of the Greeks at Venice, to the general opposition at Constantinople of the clergy and people.

<sup>f</sup> On the schism of Constantinople see Phranza (I ii c. 17) Lancelmus Chaleandyles, (I vi p. 155, 156) and Ducas (c. 31), the last of whom writes with truth and freedom. Among the moderns we may distinguish the continuator of Fleury (tom. xxii p. 338 401 420 &c.) and Spondanus (A D 1440-50). The sense of the latter is drowned in prejudice and passion as soon as Rome and religion are concerned.

Zeal of the orientals and Russian<sup>a</sup>

The schism was not confined to the narrow limits of the Byzantine empire. Secure under the Mameluke sceptre, the three patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, assembled a numerous synod, disowned their representatives at Ferrara and Florence, condemned the creed and council of the Latins, and threatened the emperor of Constantinople with the censures of the eastern church. Of the sectaries of the Greek communion, the Russians were the most powerful, ignorant, and superstitious. Their primate, the cardinal Isidore, hastened from Florence to Moscow, to reduce the independent nation under the Roman yoke. But the Russian bishops had been educated at mount Athos, and the prince and people embraced the theology of their priests. They were scandalized by the title, the pomp, the Latin cross of the legate, the friend of those impious men who shaved their beards, and performed the divine <sup>a</sup> Isidore was metropolitan of Kiow, but the Greeks subject to Poland have removed that see from the ruins of Kiow to Lemberg, or Leopold (Herbestem in Ramusio, tom ii p 127). On the other hand, the Russians transferred their spiritual obedience to the archbishop, who became, in 1588 the patriarch of Moscow (Levesque, Hist de Russie, tom iii p 188, 190 from a Greek MS at Turin, Iter et labores Archiepiscopi Arsenii).

<sup>b</sup> The curious narrative of Levesque (Hist de Russie, tom ii p 242—247) is extracted from the patriarchal archives. The scenes of Ferrara and Florence are described by ignorance and passion, but the Russians are credible in the account of their own prejudices.

<sup>c</sup> The stamannism, the ancient religion of the Samartians and Gymnosophists, has been driven by the more popular bramins from India into the northern deserts. The naked philosophers were compelled to wrap themselves in fur but they insensibly sunk into wizards and office with gloves on their hands and rings on their fingers. Isidore was condemned by a synod, his person was imprisoned in a monastery, and it was with extreme difficulty that the cardinal could escape from the hands of a fierce and fanatic people.<sup>b</sup> The Russians refused a passage to the missionaries of Rome who aspired to convert the pagans beyond the Tanais,<sup>c</sup> and their refusal was justified by the maxim, that the guilt of idolatry is less damnable than that of schism. The errors of the Bohemians were excused by their abhorrence for the pope, and a deputation of the Greek clergy solicited the friendship of those sanguinary enthusiasts.<sup>k</sup> While Eugenius triumphed in the union and orthodoxy of the Greeks, his party was contracted to the walls, or rather to the palace, of Constantinople. The zeal of Palæologus had been excited by interest, it was soon cooled by opposition. An attempt to violate the national belief might endanger his life and crown, nor could the pious rebels be destitute of foreign and domestic aid. The sword of his brother Demetrius, who in Italy had maintained a prudent and popular silence, was half unsheathed in the cause of religion, and Amurath, the Turkish sultan, was displeased and alarmed by the seeming friendship of the Greeks and Latins.

"Sultan Murad, or Amurath, lived forty-nine, and reigned thirty years, six months, and eight days. He was a just and valiant prince, of a great soul, patient of labours, learned, merciful, religious, charitable, a lover and encourager of the studious, and of all who excelled in any art or science, a good emperor, and a great general. No man obtained more or greater victories than Amurath. Belgrade alone withstood his attacks. Under his reign, the soldier was ever victorious, the citizen rich and secure. If he subdued any country, his first care was to build moschs and caravanseras, hospitals and colleges. Every year he gave a thousand pieces of gold to the sons of the prophet, and sent two thousand five hundred to the religious persons of Mecca, Medina, and Jerusalem."<sup>l</sup> This portrait is transcribed from the historian of the Ottoman empire but the applause of a servile and superstitious people has been lavished on the worst of tyrants, and the virtues of a sultan are often the vices most useful to himself, or most agreeable to his subjects. A nation ignorant of the equal benefits of liberty and law, must be awed by the flashes of arbitrary power. The cruelty of a despot will assume the character of justice, his profusion, of liberality,

Reign and character of Amurath II

A D 1421—1451
Feb 9

physicians. The Mordvans and Tcheremisses in the European Russia adhere to this religion which is formed on the earthly model of one king or God, his ministers or angels, and the rebellious spirits who oppose his government. As these tribes of the Volga have no images, they might more justly retort on the Latin missionaries the name of idolaters (Levesque, Hist des Peuples soumis à la Domination des Russes, tom i p 194—237 423—460).

<sup>l</sup> Spoudamius Annal Eccles tom ii A D 1451, No 13. The epistle of the Greeks, with a Latin version, is extant in the college library at Prague.

<sup>k</sup> See Cantemir, History of the Ottoman empire p 94. Murad, or Morad, may be more correct but I have preferred the popular name in that obscure diligence which is rarely successful in translating an oriental, into the Roman alphabet.

his obstinacy, of firmness. If the most reasonable excuse be rejected, few acts of obedience will be found impossible and guilt must tremble, where innocence cannot always be secure. The tranquillity of the people, and the discipline of the troops, were best maintained by perpetual action in the field, war was the trade of the janizaries, and those who survived the peril, and divided the spoil, applauded the generous ambition of their sovereign. To propagate the true religion, was the duty of a faithful mussulman: the unbelievers were his enemies, and those of the prophet, and, in the hands of the Turks, the scymitar was the only instrument of conversion. Under these circumstances, however, the justice and moderation of Amurath are attested by his conduct, and acknowledged by the christians themselves, who consider a prosperous reign and a peaceful death as the reward of his singular merits. In the vigour of his age and military power, he seldom engaged in a war till he was justified by a previous and adequate provocation: the victorious sultan was disarmed by submission, and in the observance of treaties, his word was inviolate and sacred.<sup>m</sup> The Hungarians were commonly the aggressors, he was provoked by the revolt of Scanderbeg, and the perfidious Caramanian was twice vanquished and twice pardoned, by the Ottoman monarch. Before he invaded the Morea, Thebes had been surprised by the despot: in the conquest of Thessalonica, the grandson of Bajazet might dispute the recent purchase of the Venetians, and after the first siege of Constantinople, the sultan was never tempted, by the distress, the absence, or the injuries of Palæologus, to extinguish the dying light of the Byzantine empire.

But the most striking feature in the life and character of Amurath, is the double abdication. A D 1442—1444. double abdication of the Turkish throne, and, were not his motives debased by an alloy of superstition, we must praise the royal philosopher,<sup>n</sup> who at the age of forty could discern the vanity of human greatness. Resigning the sceptre to his son, he retired to the pleasant residence of Magnesia, but he retired to the society of saints and hermits. It was not till the fourth century of the Hegira, that the religion of Mahomet had been corrupted by an institution so adverse to his genius, but in the age of the crusades, the various orders of Dervishes were multiplied by the example of the christian, and even the Latin, monks.<sup>o</sup> The lord of nations submitted to fast, and pray, and turn round in endless rotation with the fanatics, who mistook the giddiness of the head for the illumination of the spirit.<sup>p</sup> But he was soon awakened from this dream of enthusiasm, by the Hungarian invasion, and his obedient son was the foremost to urge the public danger and wishes of the people. Under the banner of their veteran leader, the janizaries fought and conquered, but he withdrew from the field of Varna, again to pray, to fast, and to turn round with his Magnesian brethren. These pious occupations were again interrupted by the danger of the state. A victorious army disdained the inexperience of their youthful ruler: the city of Adrianople was abandoned to rapine and slaughter, and the unanimous divan implored his presence to appease the tumult, and prevent the rebellion, of the janizaries. At the well-known voice of their master, they trembled and obeyed, and the reluctant sultan was compelled to support his splendid servitude, till, at the end of four years, he was relieved by the angel of death. Age or disease, misfortune or caprice, have tempted several princes to descend from the throne, and they have had leisure to repent of their irremediable step. But Amurath alone, in the full liberty of choice, after the trial of empire and solitude, has repeated his preference of a private life.

After the departure of his Greek brethren, Eugenius had not been unmindful of their temporal interest, and his tender regard for the Byzantine empire was animated by a just apprehension of the Turks, who approached, and might soon invade, the borders of Italy. But the spirit of the crusades had expired, and the coldness of the Franks was not less unreasonable than their headlong passion. In the eleventh century, a fanatic monk could precipitate Europe on Asia for the recovery of the holy sepulchre, but in the fifteenth, the most pressing motives of religion and policy were insufficient to unite the Latins in the defence of Christendom. Germany was an inexhaustible storehouse of men and arms, but that complex and languid body required the impulse of a vigorous hand, and Frederic the third was alike impotent in his personal character and his imperial dignity. A long war had impaired the strength, without satiating the animosity, of France and England.<sup>r</sup> but Philip, duke of Burgundy, was a vain and magnificent prince, and he enjoyed, without danger or expense, the adventurous piety of his subjects, who sailed, in a gallant fleet, from the coast of Flanders to the Hellespont. The maritime republics of Venice and Genoa were less remote from the scene of action, and their hostile fleets were associated under the standard of St Peter

<sup>m</sup> See Chalcandryes, (l vii p 186 198) Ducas, (c 33) and Marinus Barleti, (in Vit. Scanderbeg p 145 146) In his good faith towards the garrison of Stetigrade he was a lesson and example to his son Mahomet.

<sup>n</sup> Voltaire (Lect. sur l'Histoire Generale c 89 p 283 284) admires the philosopher Turc, would he have bestowed the same praise on a Christian prince for retiring to a monastery? In his way, Voltaire was a bigot, an intolerant bigot.

<sup>o</sup> See the articles Derwische, Fakir, Nasser Rohbanat, in D Herbelot a Bibliothèque Orientale. Yet the subject is superficially treated from the Persian and Arabian writers. It is among the Turks that these orders have principally flourished.

<sup>p</sup> It is tant in the present State of the Ottoman Empire, p 242—268) affords much information which he drew from his personal conversation with the heads of the dervishes, most of whom ascribed their origin to the time of Orctian. He does not mention the Zichide of Chalcon

dyles, (l vii p 286) among whom Amurath retired: the Seids of that author are the descendants of Mahomet.

<sup>q</sup> In the year 1431, Germany raised 40,000 horse, men at arms, against the Hussites of Bohemia (Lefant, Hist. du Concile de Basle tom 1 p 318). At the siege of Nuys on the Rhine in 1474 the princes prelates and cities, sent their respective quotas: and the bishop of Munster (qui n'est pas des plus grands) furnished 1400 horse, 6000 foot, all in green with 1200 waggoners. The united armies of the king of England and the duke of Burgundy scarcely equalled one third of this German host (Memoires de Philippe de Comines, l iv c 2). At present, six or seven hundred thousand men are maintained in constant pay and admirable discipline by the powers of Germany.

<sup>r</sup> It was not till the year 1444 that France and England could agree on a truce of some months. (See Rymer's Fœdera and the chronicles of both nations.)

The kingdoms of Hungary and Poland, which covered as it were the interior pale of the Latin church, were the most nearly concerned to oppose the progress of the Turks. Arms were the patrimony of the Scythians and Sarmatians, and these nations might appear equal to the contest, could they point, against the common foe, those swords that were so wantonly drawn in bloody and domestic quarrels. But the same spirit was adverse to concord and obedience: a poor country and a limited monarch are incapable of maintaining a standing force, and the loose bodies of Polish and Hungarian horse were not armed with the sentiments and weapons which, on some occasions, have given irresistible weight to the French cavalry. Yet, on this side, the designs of the Roman pontiff, and the eloquence of cardinal Julian, his legate, were promoted by the circumstances of the time,* by the union of the two crowns on the head of Ladislaus,† a young and ambitious soldier, by the valour of a hero, whose name, the name of John Huniades, was already popular among the christians, and formidable to the Turks. An endless treasure of pardons and indulgences was scattered by the legate, many private warriors of France and Germany enlisted under the holy banner, and the crusade derived some strength, or at least some reputation, from the new allies both of Europe and Asia. A fugitive despot of Servia exaggerated the distress and ardour of the christians beyond the Danube, who would unanimously rise to vindicate their religion and liberty. The Greek emperor,‡ with a spirit unknown to his fathers, engaged to guard the Bosphorus, and to sally from Constantinople at the head of his national and mercenary troops. The sultan of Caramania,§ announced the retreat of Amurath, and a powerful division in the heart of Anatolia, and if the fleets of the west could occupy at the same moment the straits of the Hellespont, the Ottoman monarchy would be dismembered and destroyed. Heaven and earth must rejoice in the perdition of the miscreants, and the legate, with prudent ambiguity, instilled the opinion of the invisible, perhaps the visible, aid of the Son of God, and his divine mother.

Ladislaus, king of Poland and Hungary marches against them

Of the Polish and Hungarian diets, a religious war was the unanimous cry, and Ladislaus, after passing the Danube, led an army of his confederate subjects as far as Sophia, the capital of the Bulgarian kingdom. In this expedition they obtained two signal victories, which were justly ascribed to the valour

* In the Hungarian crusade, Spondanus (Annal Eccles. A. D. 1443, 1444) has been my leading guide. He has diligently read and critically compared, the Greek and Turkish materials, the historians of Hungary, Poland, and the west. His narrative is perspicuous, and where he can be free from a religious bias, the judgment of Spondanus is not contemptible.

† I have curtailed the harsh letter (Wladislaus) which most writers affix to his name, either in compliance with the Polish pronunciation, or to distinguish him from his rival the infant Ladislaus of Austria. Their competition for the crown of Hungary is described by Callimachus (l. i. p. 447—486) Bouffinius, (Decad. iii. l. v.) Spondanus, and Lenfant.

‡ The Greek historians, Phranza, Chalcondyles, and Ducar, do not ascribe to their prince a very active part in this crusade which he seems to have promoted by his wishes, and injured by his fears.

and conduct of Huniades. In the first, with a vanguard of ten thousand men, he surprised the Turkish camp, in the second, he vanquished and made prisoner the most renowned of their generals, who possessed the double advantage of ground and numbers. The approach of winter, and the natural and artificial obstacles of mount Hæmus, arrested the progress of the hero, who measured a narrow interval of six days' march from the foot of the mountains to the hostile towers of Adrianople, and the friendly capital of the Greek empire. The retreat was undisturbed, and the entrance into Buda was at once a military and religious triumph. An ecclesiastical procession was followed by the king and his warriors on foot: he nicely balanced the merits and rewards of the two nations, and the pride of conquest was blended with the humble temper of christianity. Thirteen bashaws, nine standards, and four thousand captives, were unquestionable trophies, and as all were willing to believe, and none were present to contradict, the crusaders multiplied, with unblushing confidence, the myriads of Turks whom they had left on the field of battle. The most solid proof, <sup>The Turkish peace</sup> and the most salutary consequence, of victory, was a deputation from the divan to solicit peace, to restore Servia, to ransom the prisoners, and to evacuate the Hungarian frontier. By this treaty, the rational objects of the war were obtained: the king, the despot, and Huniades himself, in the diet of Segedin, were satisfied with public and private emolument, a truce of ten years was concluded, and the followers of Jesus and Mahomet, who swore on the Gospel and the Koran, attested the word of God as the guardian of truth and the avenger of perfidy. In the place of the gospel, the Turkish ministers had proposed to substitute the eucharist, the real presence of the catholic deity, but the christians refused to profane their holy mysteries, and a superstitious conscience is less forcibly bound by the spiritual energy, than by the outward and visible symbols, of an oath.

During the whole transaction, the cardinal legate had observed a sullen <sup>Violation of the peace, A. D. 1444</sup> silence, unwilling to approve, and unable to oppose, the consent of the king and people. But the diet was not dissolved before Julian was fortified by the welcome intelligence, that Anatolia was invaded by the Caramanian, and Thrace by the Greek emperor, that the fleets of Genoa, Venice, and Burgundy, were masters of the Hellespont, and that the allies, informed of the victory

× Cantemir (p. 89) ascribes to his policy the original plan, and transcribes his animating epistle to the king of Hungary. But the Mahometan powers are seldom informed of the state of Christendom, and the situation and correspondence of the knights of Rhodes must connect them with the sultan of Caramania.

† In their letters to the emperor Frederic III. the Hungarians slay 300,000 Turks in one battle, but the modest Julian reduces the slaughter to 6000 or even 2000 inside's (Æneas Sylvius in Europ. c. 5 and epist. 44. 81. apud Spondanum).

‡ See the origin of the Turkish war, and the first expedition of Ladislaus, in the fifth and sixth books of the third Decad. of Bouffinius, who, in his division and style, copies Livy with tolerable success. Callimachus (l. i. p. 487—496) is still more pure and authentic.

and ignorant of the treaty, of Ladislaus, impatiently waited for the return of his victorious army "And is it thus," exclaimed the cardinal, "that you will desert their expectations and your own fortune? It is to them, to your God, and your fellow-Christians, that you have pledged your faith, and that prior obligation annihilates a rash and sacrilegious oath to the enemies of Christ. His vicar on earth is the Roman pontiff, without whose sanction you can neither promise nor perform. In his name I absolve your perjury and sanctify your arms: follow my footsteps in the paths of glory and salvation, and if still ye have scruples, devolve on my head the punishment and the sin." This mischievous easuistry was seconded by his respectable character, and the levity of popular assemblies. War was resolved on the same spot where peace had so lately been sworn, and, in the execution of the treaty, the Turks were assaulted by the Christians, to whom, with some reason, they might apply the epithet of infidels. The falsehood of Ladislaus to his word and oath, was palliated by the religion of the times, the most perfect, or at least the most popular, excuse would have been the success of his arms and the deliverance of the eastern church. But the same treaty which should have bound his conscience, had diminished his strength. On the proclamation of the peace, the French and German volunteers departed with indignant murmurs; the Poles were exhausted by distant warfare, and perhaps disgusted with foreign command, and their palatines accepted the first licence, and hastily retired to their provinces and castles. Even Hungary was divided by faction, or restrained by a laudable scruple, and the relics of the crusade that marched in the second expedition, were reduced to an inadequate force of twenty thousand men. A Walachian chief, who joined the royal standard with his vassals, presumed to remark that their numbers did not exceed the hunting retinue that sometimes attended the sultan, and the gift of two horses of matchless speed, might admonish Ladislaus of his secret foresight of the event. But the despot of Servia, after the restoration of his country and children, was tempted by the promise of new realms, and the inexperience of the king, the enthusiasm of the legate, and the martial presumption of Huniades himself, were persuaded that every obstacle must yield to the invincible virtue of the sword and the cross. After the passage of the Danube, two roads might lead to Constantinople and the Hellespont, the one direct, abrupt, and difficult, through the mountains of Hæmus, the other more tedious and secure, over a level country, and along the shores of the Euxine, in which their flanks, according to the Seythian discipline, might always be covered by a movable fortification of waggons. The latter was judiciously preferred: the Catholics marched through the plains of Bulgaria, burning, with wanton cruelty, the churches and villages of the Christian natives, and their last station was at Warnæ, near the sea-shore, on which the defeat and death of Ladislaus have bestowed a memorable name.<sup>b</sup>

It was on this fatal spot, that, instead of finding a confederate fleet to second their operations, they were alarmed by the approach of Amurath himself, who had issued from his Magnesian solitude, and transported the forces of Asia to the defence of Europe. According to some writers, the Greek emperor had been awed, or seduced, to grant the passage of the Bosphorus, and an indelible stain of corruption is fixed on the Genoese, or the pope's nephew, the Catholic admiral, whose mercenary connivance betrayed the guard of the Hellespont. From Adrianople, the sultan advanced by hasty marches at the head of sixty thousand men, and when the cardinal, and Huniades, had taken a nearer survey of the numbers and order of the Turks, these ardent warriors proposed the tardy and impracticable measure of a retreat. The king alone was resolved to conquer or die, and his resolution had almost been crowned with a glorious and salutary victory. The princes were opposite to each other in the centre, and the Beglerbegs, or generals of Anatolia and Romania, commanded on the right and left, against the adverse divisions of the despot and Huniades. The Turkish wings were broken on the first onset, but the advantage was fatal, and the rash victors, in the heat of the pursuit, were carried away far from the annoyance of the enemy, or the support of their friends. When Amurath beheld the flight of his squadrons, he despaired of his fortune and that of the empire: a veteran Janizary seized his horse's bridle, and he had magnanimity to pardon and reward the soldier who dared to perceive the terror, and arrest the flight, of his sovereign. A copy of the treaty, the monument of Christian perfidy, had been displayed in the front of battle, and it is said, that the sultan in his distress, lifting his eyes and his hands to heaven, implored the protection of the God of truth, and called on the prophet Jesus himself to avenge the impious mockery of his name and religion.<sup>c</sup> With inferior numbers and disordered ranks, the king of Hungary rushed forwards in the confidence of victory, till his career was stopped by the impenetrable phalanx of the Janizaries. If we may credit the Ottoman annals, his horse was pierced by the javelin of Amurath,<sup>d</sup> Death of Ladislaus riplus of the Euxine (p. 24-25 in the first volume of Hudson's Geography) it was situate 1740 stadia, or furlongs from the mouth of the Danube, 1240 from Byzantium, and 360 to the north of a ridge or promontory of mount Hæmus, which advances into the sea.

<sup>a</sup> I do not pretend to warrant the literal accuracy of Julian's speech, which is variously worded by Callimachus, (l. iii. p. 505-507) Bonifinus (Dec. iii. l. vi. p. 457-458) and other historians: who might indulge their own eloquence while they represent one of the orators of the age. But they all agree in the advice and arguments for perjury, which in the field of controversy are fiercely attacked by the Protestants and feebly defended by the Catholics. The latter are discouraged by the misfortune of Warnæ.

<sup>b</sup> Warnæ under the Grecian name of Odessus was a colony of the Milesians, which they denominated from the hero Ulysses (Cællæus tom. i. p. 374. D'Anville, tom. i. p. 312). According to Arian's Pe-

<sup>c</sup> Some Christian writers affirm, that he drew from his bosom the host or wafer on which the treaty had not been sworn. The Moslems suppose with more simplicity an appeal to God and his prophet Jesus, which is likewise insinuated by Callimachus, (l. iii. p. 516. Spoodian A. D. 1444 No. 8).

<sup>d</sup> A critic will always distrust these spolia opima of a victorious general, so difficult for valour to obtain, so easy for flattery to invent.

try, and a Turkish soldier proclaimed with a loud voice, " Hungarians, behold the head of your king!" The death of Ladislaus was the signal of their defeat. On his return from an intemperate pursuit, Huniades deplored his error and the public loss: he strove to rescue the royal body, till he was overwhelmed by the tumultuous crowd of the victors and vanquished, and the last efforts of his courage and conduct were exerted to save the remnant of his Walachian cavalry. Ten thousand christians were slain in the disastrous battle of Warna: the loss of the Turks, more considerable in numbers, bore a smaller proportion to their total strength, yet the philosophic sultan was not ashamed to confess, that his ruin must be the consequence of a second and similar victory. At his command a column was erected on the spot where Ladislaus had fallen, but the modest inscription, instead of accusing the rashness, recorded the valour, and bewailed the misfortune, of the Hungarian youth.<sup>e</sup>

Before I lose sight of the field of
The cardinal
Julian      Warna, I am tempted to pause on the character and story of two principal actors, the cardinal Julian and John Huniades. Julian<sup>f</sup> Cæsari<sup>g</sup> was born of a noble family of Rome: his studies had embraced both the Latin and Greek learning, both the sciences of divinity and law, and his versatile genius was equally adapted to the schools, the camp, and the court. No sooner had he been invested with the Roman purple, than he was sent into Germany to arm the empire against the rebels and heretics of Bohemia. The spirit of persecution is unworthy of a christian, the military profession ill becomes a priest, but the former is excused by the times, and the latter was ennobled by the courage of Julian, who stood dauntless and alone in the disgraceful flight of the German host. As the pope's legate, he opened the council of Basil, but the president soon appeared the most strenuous champion of ecclesiastical freedom, and an opposition of seven years was conducted by his ability and zeal. After promoting the strongest measures against the authority and person of Eugenius, some secret motive of interest or conscience engaged him to desert on a sudden the popular party. The cardinal withdrew himself from Basil to Ferrara, and, in the debates of the Greeks and Latins, the two nations admired the dexterity of his arguments and the depth of his theological erudition.<sup>h</sup> In his Hungarian embassy, we have already seen the mischievous effects of his sophistry and eloquence, of which Julian himself was the first victim. The cardinal, who performed the duties of a priest and a soldier, was lost in the defeat of Warna. The circumstances of his death are variously related, but it is believed, that a weighty incumbrance of gold impeded his flight, and tempted the cruel avarice of some christian fugitives.

From an humble, or at least a doubtful, origin, the merit of John Huniades promoted him to the command of the Hungarian armies. His father was a Walachian, his mother a Greek, her unknown race might possibly ascend to the emperors of Constantinople, and the claims of the Walachians, with the surname of Corvinus, from the place of his nativity, might suggest a thin pretence for mingling his blood with the patricians of ancient Rome.<sup>h</sup> In his youth he served in the wars of Italy, and was retained, with twelve horsemen, by the bishop of Zagrab: the valour of the white knight<sup>i</sup> was soon conspicuous, he increased his fortunes by a noble and wealthy marriage, and in the defence of the Hungarian borders, he won in the same year three battles against the Turks. By his influence, Ladislaus of Poland obtained the crown of Hungary, and the important service was rewarded by the title and office of Waiwod of Transylvania. The first of Julian's crusades added two Turkish laurels on his brow, and in the public distress the fatal errors of Warna were forgotten. During the absence and minority of Ladislaus of Austria, the titular king, Huniades was elected supreme captain and governor of Hungary, and if envy at first was silenced by terror, a reign of twelve years supposes the arts of policy as well as of war. Yet the idea of a consummate general is not delineated in his campaigns, the white knight fought with the hand rather than the head, as the chief of desultory barbarians, who attack without fear and fly without shame, and his military life is composed of a romantic alternative of victories and escapes. By the Turks, who employed his name to frighten their perverse children, he was corruptly denominated Jancus Lar, or the Wicked: their hatred is the proof of their esteem, the kingdom which he guarded was inaccessible to their arms, and they felt him most daring and formidable, when they fondly believed the captain and his country irrecoverably lost. Instead of confining himself to a defensive war, four years after the defeat of Warna he again penetrated into the heart of Bulgaria, and in the plain of Cossova sustained, till the third day, tom. i. p. 247, &c.) and Bohemian campaign (p. 215, &c.) of cardinal Julian. His services at Basil and Ferrara, and his unfortunate end, are occasionally related by Spononius, and the continuator of Fleury.

(Cantemir, p. 90, 91.) Callimaehus (l. iii. p. 517) more simply and probably affirms, supervenientibus janizaris, telorum multitudine, non tim confusus est, quam obrutus.

<sup>e</sup> Besides some valuable hints from Aeneas Sylvius, which are diligently collected by Spononius, our best authorities are three historians of the fifteenth century, Philippus Callimaehus, (de Rebus et Virtutibus Poloniarum atque Hungarorum Re. c. gestis, libri iii. in Bel. Script. Rerum Hungaricarum, tom. i. p. 433-518.) Bonifinus, (deed. iii. l. i. p. 460-467) and Chalcondyles, (l. vii. p. 165-179.) The two first were Italians, but they passed their lives in Poland and Hungary. (Fabrici Bibliot. Latin. med. et infimae Aetatis, tom. i. p. 324.) Vossius de Hist. Latin. l. iii. c. 8. l. Bayle, Dictionnaire, BONIFINUS.) A small tract of Felix Petreus, Chancellor of Segni (ad calcem Cuspinian de Cæsariis, p. 716-722) represents the theatre of the war in the fifteenth century.

<sup>f</sup> M. Lefant has described the origin (Hist. du Concile de Basle, 4. l. 2.)

<sup>g</sup> Syropulus immortally praises the talents of an enemy (p. 117) τοιαυτα τινα ειπεν ο Ιουλιανος πεπλευσμενος αγαν και λογικως, και μετ επισημης και δεινοτητας Ήτορικης.

<sup>h</sup> See Bonifinus, deed. iii. l. iv. p. 423. Could the Italian historian pronounce, or the king of Hungary lie, without a blush, the absurd flattery which ennobled the name of a Walachian village with the casual, though glorious, epithet of a single branch of the Valerian family at Rome?

<sup>i</sup> Philip de Comines (Memoires l. vi. c. 13) from the tradition of the times, mentions him with high encomiums but under the whimsical name of the Chevalier Blanc de Valachie (Valachia.) The Greek Chalcondyles, and the Turkish annals of Leunclavius, presume to accuse his fidelity or valour.

the shock of the Ottoman army, four times more numerous than his own. As he fled alone through the woods of Walachia, the hero was surprised by two robbers, but while they disputed a gold chain that hung at his neck, he recovered his sword, slew the one, terrified the other, and, after new perils of captivity or death, consoled by his presence an afflicted kingdom. But the last and most glorious

His defence of Belgrade, and death

A D 1456
July 22
Sept. 4

action of his life was the defence of Belgrade against the powers of Mahomet the second in person. After a siege of forty days, the Turks, who had already entered the town, were compelled to retreat, and the joyful nations celebrated Huniades and Belgrade as the bulwarks of Christendom.<sup>k</sup> About a month after this great deliverance, the champion expired, and his most splendid epitaph is the regret of the Ottoman prince, who sighed that he could no longer hope for revenge against the single antagonist who had triumphed over his arms. On the first vacancy of the throne Matthias Corvinus, a youth of eighteen years of age, was elected and crowned by the grateful Hungarians. His reign was prosperous and long. Matthias aspired to the glory of a conqueror and a saint, but his purest merit is the encouragement of learning, and the Latin orators and historians, who were invited from Italy by the son, have shed the lustre of their eloquence on the father's character.<sup>l</sup>

Birth and education of Scanderbeg, prince of Albania,

A D
1404—1413, &c

In the list of heroes, John Huniades and Scanderbeg are commonly associated<sup>m</sup> and they are both entitled to our notice, since their occupation of the Ottoman arms delayed the ruin of the Greek empire. John Castriot, the father of Scanderbeg,<sup>n</sup> was the hereditary prince of a small district of Epirus and Albania, between the mountains and the Adriatic sea. Unable to contend with the sultan's power, Castriot submitted to the hard conditions of peace and tribute, he delivered his four sons as the pledges of his fidelity, and the christian youths, after receiving the mark of circumcision, were instructed in the Mahometan religion, and trained in the arms and arts of Turkish policy.<sup>o</sup> The three elder brothers were confounded in the crowd of slaves, and the poison to which their deaths are ascribed, cannot be verified or disproved by any positive evidence. Yet the suspicion is in a great measure removed by the kind and paternal treatment of George Castriot, the fourth brother, who, from his tender youth, displayed the strength and spirit of a soldier. The successive overthrow of a Tartar and two Persians, who carried a proud defiance to the Turkish court, recommended him to the favour of Amurath, and his Turkish appellation of Scanderbeg, (Iskender beg), or the lord Alexander, is an indelible memorial of his glory and servitude. His father's principality was reduced into a province, but the loss was compensated by the rank and title of Sanjak, a command of five thousand horse, and the prospect of the first dignities of the empire. He served with honour in the wars of Europe and Asia, and we may smile at the art or credulity of the historian, who supposes, that in every encounter he spared the christians, while he fell with a thundering arm on his mussulman foes. The glory of Huniades is without reproach, he fought in the defence of his religion and country, but the enemies who applaud the patriot, have branded his rival with the name of traitor and apostate. In the eyes of the christians, the rebellion of Scanderbeg is justified by his father's wrongs, the ambiguous death of his three brothers, his own degradation, and the slavery of his country, and they adore the generous, though tardy, zeal, with which he asserted the faith and independence of his ancestors. But he had imbibed from his ninth year the doctrines of the Koran, he was ignorant of the gospel, the religion of a soldier is determined by authority and habit, nor is it easy to conceive what new illumination at the age of forty<sup>p</sup> could be poured into his soul. His motives would be less exposed to the suspicion of interest or revenge, had he broken his chain from the moment that he was sensible of its weight. but a long oblivion had surely impaired his original right, and every year of obedience and reward had cemented the mutual bond of the sultan and his subject. If Scanderbeg had long harboured the belief of christianity and the intention of revolt, a worthy mind must condemn the base dissimulation, that could serve only to betray, that could promise only to be forsworn, that could actively join in the temporal and spiritual perdition of so many thousands of his unhappy brethren. Shall we praise a secret correspondence with Huniades, while he commanded the vanguard of the Turkish army? shall we excuse the desertion of his standard, a treacherous desertion, which abandoned the victory to the enemies of his benefactor? In the confusion of a defeat, the eye of Scanderbeg was fixed on the Reis Effendi or principal secretary with

His revolt from the Turks
A D 1443
Nov 28

<sup>k</sup> See Bonfinius deca iii l viii p 492. and Spondanus (A D 1456 No 1—7) Huniades shared the glory of the defence of Belgrade with Capistran a Franciscan friar, and in their respective narratives, neither the saint nor the hero condescend to take notice of his rival's merit.

<sup>l</sup> See Bonfinius deca iii l viii—deca iv l viii. The observations of Spondanus on the life and character of Matthias Corvinus are curious and critical (A D 1464 No 1 1475, No 6 1476 No 14—16 1490 No 4, 5) Italian fame was the object of his vanity. His actions are celebrated in the Epitome Rerum Hungaricarum (p 322—412) of Peter Ranzanus a Sicilian. His wise and facetious sayings are registered by Galeus Martius of Narvi (528—568) and we have a particular narrative of his wedding and coronation. These three traits are all contained in the 1st vol of Bel's Scriptores Rerum Hungaricarum.
<sup>m</sup> They are ranked by Sir William Temple, in his pleasing Essay on Heroic Virtue, (Works, vol. iii p 365) among the seven chiefs who have deserved without wearing a royal crown. Belisarius Narses Gonsalvo of Cordova, William first prince of Orange Alexander duke of Parma John Huniades and George Castriot or Scanderbeg.

<sup>n</sup> I could wish for some simple authentic memoirs of a friend of Scanderbeg which would introduce me to the man the time, and the place. In the old and national history of Marinus Barletius a priest of Scodra, (de Vita, Moribus et Rebus gestis Georgii Castrioti, &c libri xiii p 367 Argentorat 1537, in fol) his gaudy and cumbersome robes are stuck with many false jewels. See likewise Clalcondyles, l vii p 185 l viii p 229.

<sup>o</sup> His circumcision, education &c are marked by Marinus with brevity and reluctance (l i p 6 7).

<sup>p</sup> Since Scanderbeg, died A D 1466 in the sixty third year of his age, (Marinus l xiii p 370) he was born in 1403, since he was torn from his parents by the Turks when he was novenatus, (Marinus l i p 1 6) that event must have happened in 1412, nine years before the dress, when they wore any, was nothing more than a loose mantle. A variety of colours was the only ornament of their wooden or osier shields. Few of the chiefs were distinguished by cuirasses, scarce any by helmets. Though the horses of Germany were neither beautiful, swift, or practised in the skilful evolutions of the Roman menage, several of the nations obtained renown by their cavalry, but, in general, the principal strength of the Germans consisted in their infantry,<sup>d</sup> which was drawn up in several deep columns, according to the distinction and of deep line of tribes and families. Impatient of fatigue or delay, these half-armed warriors rushed to battle with dissonant shouts and disordered ranks, and sometimes, by the effort of native valour, prevailed over the constrained and more artificial bravery of the Roman mercenaries. But as the barbarians poured forth their whole souls on the first onset, they knew not how to rally or to retire. A repulse was a sure defeat, and a defeat was most commonly total destruction. When we recollect the complete armour of the Roman soldiers, their discipline, exercises, evolutions, fortified camps, and military engines, it appears a just matter of surprise, how the naked and unassisted valour of the barbarians could dare to encounter in the field the strength of the legions, and the various troops of the auxiliaries, which seconded their operations. The contest was too unequal, till the introduction of luxury had enervated the vigour, and a spirit of disobedience and sedition had relaxed the discipline, of the Roman armies. The introduction of barbarian auxiliaries into those armies, was a measure attended with very obvious dangers, as it might gradually instruct the Germans in the arts of war and of policy. Although they were admitted in small numbers, and with the strictest precaution, the example of Civilis was proper to convince the Romans, that the danger was not imaginary, and that their precautions were not always sufficient.<sup>e</sup> During the civil wars that followed the death of Nero, that artful and intrepid Batavian, whom his enemies condescended to compare with Hannibal and Sertorius,<sup>f</sup> formed a great design of freedom and ambition. Eight Batavian cohorts, renowned in the wars of Britain and Italy, repaired to his standard. He introduced an army of Germans into Gaul, prevailed on the powerful cities of Treves and Langres to embrace his cause, defeated the legions, destroyed their fortified camps, and employed against the Romans the military knowledge which he had acquired in their service. When at length, after an obstinate struggle, he yielded to the power of the empire, Civilis secured himself and his country by an honourable treaty

<sup>d</sup> It was their principal distinction from the Sarmatians, who generally fought on horseback.

<sup>e</sup> The relation of this enterprise occupies a great part of the fourth and fifth books of the history of Tacitus, and is more remarkable for its eloquence than perspicuity. Sir Henry Saville has observed several inaccuracies.

<sup>f</sup> Tacit. Hist. iv. 13. Like them he had lost an eye.

<sup>g</sup> It was continued between the two branches of the old Rhine, as they subsisted before the face of the country was changed by art and nature. See Cluver German. Antiq. i. iii. c. 30, 37.

The Batavians still continued to occupy the islands of the Rhine;<sup>h</sup> the allies, not the servants, of the Roman monarchy.

II The strength of ancient Germany Civil dissensions of Germany, appears formidable, when we consider the effects that might have been produced by its united effort. The wide extent of country might very possibly contain a million of warriors, as all who were of age to bear arms were of a temper to use them. But this fierce multitude, incapable of concerting or executing any plan of national greatness, was agitated by various and often hostile intentions. Germany was divided into more than forty independent states, and, even in each state, the union of the several tribes was extremely loose and precarious. The barbarians were easily provoked, they knew not how to forgive an injury, much less an insult, their resentments were bloody and implacable. The casual disputes that so frequently happened in their tumultuous parties of hunting or drinking, were sufficient to inflame the minds of whole nations, the private feud of any considerable chieftains diffused itself among their followers and allies. To chastise the insolent, or to plunder the defenceless, were alike causes of war. The most formidable states of Germany affected to encompass their territories with a wide frontier of solitude and devastation. The awful distance preserved by their neighbours, attested the terror of their arms, and in some measure defended them from the danger of unexpected incursions.<sup>i</sup>

“The Bructeri (it is Tacitus who fomented by the now speaks) were totally exterminated policy of Rome by the neighbouring tribes,<sup>j</sup> provoked by their insolence, allured by the hopes of spoil, and perhaps inspired by the tutelar deities of the empire. Above sixty thousand barbarians were destroyed, not by the Roman arms, but in our sight, and for our entertainment. May the nations, enemies of Rome, ever preserve this enmity to each other! We have now attained the utmost verge of prosperity,<sup>k</sup> and have nothing left to demand of fortune, except the discord of these barbarians.”—These sentiments, less worthy of the humanity than of the patriotism of Tacitus, express the invariable maxims of the policy of his countrymen. They deemed it a much safer expedient to divide than to combat the barbarians, from whose defeat they could derive neither honour nor advantage. The money and negotiations of Rome insinuated themselves into the heart of Germany, and every art of seduction was used with dignity, to conciliate those nations whom their proximity to the Rhine or Danube might render the most useful friends, as well as the most troublesome enemies. Chiefs of renown and power were flat-

<sup>h</sup> Cesar de Bell. Gall. i. vi. 23.

<sup>i</sup> They are mentioned, however, in the fourth and fifth centuries by Nazarius, Ammianus, Claudian, &c. as a tribe of Franks. See Cluver German. Antiq. i. iii. c. 13.

<sup>j</sup> Ugentibus is the common reading, but good sense Lipsius, and some MSS. declare for Vergentibus.

<sup>k</sup> Tacit. Germania, c. 33. The pious Abbé de la Bletterie is very angry with Tacitus, talks of the devil who was a murderer from the beginning, &c. &c.

a dagger at his breast, he extorted a firman or patent for the government of Albania, and the murder of the guiltless scribe and his train prevented the consequences of an immediate discovery. With some bold companions, to whom he had revealed his design, he escaped in the night, by rapid marches, from the field of battle to his paternal mountains. The gates of Croya were opened to the royal mandate, and no sooner did he command the fortress, than George Castriot dropt the mask of dissimulation, abjured the prophet and the sultan, and proclaimed himself the avenger of his family and country. The names of religion and liberty provoked a general revolt. The Albanians, a martial race, were unanimous to live and die with their hereditary prince, and the Ottoman garrisons were indulged in the choice of martyrdom or baptism. In the assembly of the states of Epirus, Scanderbeg was elected general of the Turkish war, and each of the allies engaged to furnish his respective proportion of men and money. From these contributions, from his patrimonial estate, and from the valuable salt-pits of Selina, he drew an annual revenue of two hundred thousand ducats,<sup>a</sup> and the entire sum exempt from the demands of luxury was strictly appropriated to the public use. His manners were popular, but his discipline was severe, and every superfluous vice was banished from his camp. His example strengthened his command, and under his conduct the Albanians were invincible in their own opinion and that of their enemies.

The bravest adventurers of France and Germany were allured by his fame and retained in his service. His standing militia consisted of eight thousand horse and seven thousand foot, the horses were small, the men were active but he viewed with a discerning eye the difficulties and resources of the mountains, and, at the blaze of the beacons, the whole nation was distributed in the strongest posts. With such unequal arms Scanderbeg resisted twenty-three years the powers of the Ottoman empire, and two conquerors, Amurath the second, and his greater son, were repeatedly baffled by a rebel, whom they pursued with seeming contempt and implacable resentment. At the head of sixty thousand horse and forty thousand janizaries, Amurath entered Albania, he might ravage the open country, occupy the defenceless towns, convert the churches into moschs, circumcise the christian youths, and punish with death his adult and obstinate captives, but the conquests of the sultan were confined to the petty fortress of Sfetgrade, and the garrison, invincible to his arms, was oppressed by a paltry artifice and a superstitious scruple.<sup>c</sup> Amurath retired with shame and loss from the walls of Croya, the castle and residence of the Castriots, the march, the siege, the retreat, were harassed by a vexatious, and almost invisible, adversary,<sup>d</sup> and the disappointment might tend to embitter, perhaps to shorten, the last days of the sultan.<sup>e</sup> In the fulness of conquest, Mahomet the second still felt at his bosom this domestic thorn. His lieutenants were permitted to negotiate a truce, and the Albanian prince may justly be praised as a firm and able champion of his national independence. The enthusiasm of chivalry and religion has ranked him with the names of Alexander and Pyrrhus, nor would they blush to acknowledge their intrepid countryman but his narrow dominion and slender powers must leave him at an humble distance below the heroes of antiquity, who triumphed over the east and the Roman legions. His splendid achievements, the bashas whom he encountered, the armies that he discomfited, and the three thousand Turks who were slain by his single hand, must be weighed in the scales of suspicious criticism. Against an illiterate enemy, and in the dark solitude of Epirus, his partial biographers may safely indulge the latitude of romance but their fictions are exposed by the light of Italian history, and they afford a strong presumption against their own truth, by a fabulous tale of his exploits, when he passed the Adriatic with eight hundred horse to the succour of the king of Naples.<sup>f</sup> Without disparagement to his fame, they might have owned, that he was finally oppressed by the Ottoman powers. In his extreme danger he applied to pope Pius the second for a refuge in the ecclesiastical state, and his resources were almost exhausted, since Scanderbeg died a fugitive at Lissus, on the Venetian territory.<sup>g</sup> His sepulchre was soon violated by the Turkish conqueror but the janizaries, who wore his bones enchased in a bracelet, declared by this superstitious amulet their involuntary reverence for his valour. The instant ruin of his country may redound to the hero's glory, yet, had he balanced the consequences of submission and resistance, a patriot perhaps would have declined the unequal contest which must depend on the life and genius of one man. Scanderbeg might indeed be supported by the rational, though fallacious, hope, that the pope, the king of Naples, and the Venetian republic, would join in the defence of a free and christian accession of Amurath II who must have inherited, not acquired the Albanian slave. Spondanus has remarked this inconsistency, A D 1431 No 31 1443 No 14.

<sup>a</sup> His revenue and forces are luckily given by Marinus (l. ii p. 44). There were two Dibras the upper and lower, the Bulgarian and Albanian the former, 70 miles from Croya, (l. i p. 17) was contiguous to the fortress of Sfetigrade, whose inhabitants refused to drink from a well into which a dead dog had traitorously been cast, (l. v p. 139, 140) We want a good map of Epirus.

<sup>b</sup> Compare the Turkish narrative of Cantemir (p. 92.) with the pompous and prolix declamation in the fourth, fifth and sixth books of the Albanian priest, who has been copied by the tribe of stran, ers and moderns.

<sup>c</sup> In honour of his hero, Barletius (l. vi p. 188—192) kills the sultan, by disease indeed, under the walls of Croya. But this audacious fiction is disproved by the Greeks and Turks, who agree in the time and manner of Amurath's death at Adrianople.

<sup>d</sup> See the marvels of his Calabrian expedition in the ninth and tenth books of Marinus Barletius, which may be rectified by the testimony or silence of Muratori, (Annali d'Italia, tom. xiii p. 291) and his original authors (Joh. Simonetta de Rebus Francesei Sfortie, in Muratori, Script. Rerum Ital. tom. xxi p. 728 et alior.) The Albanian cavalry, under the name of Stradiots, soon became famous in the wars of Italy (Memoires de Comines, l. viii c. 5).

<sup>e</sup> Spondanus, from the best evidence, and the most rational criticism, has reduced the giant Scanderbeg to the human size (A D 1461, No 20 1463, No 9 1465 No 12 1467, No 1) His own letter to the pope and the testimony of Piranza, (l. iii c. 28) a refugee in the neighbouring Isle of Corfu, demonstrate his last distress, which is awkwardly concealed by Marinus Barletius, (l. x) and death,

A D 1467
Jan 17

people, who guarded the sea-coast of the Adriatic, and the narrow passage from Greece to Italy. His infant son was saved from the national shipwreck, the Castriots<sup>y</sup> were invested with the Neapolitan dukedom, and their blood continues to flow in the noblest families of the realm. A colony of Albanian fugitives obtained a settlement in Calabria, and they preserve at this day the language and manners of their ancestors<sup>z</sup>.

Constantine the 1st of the Roman or Greek emperors,
A D 1448
Nov 1—
A D 1453
May 29

In the long career of the decline and fall of the Roman empire, I have reached at length the last reign of the princes of Constantinople, who so feebly sustained the name and majesty of the Cæsars. On the decease of John

Palæologus, who survived about four years the Hungarian crusade,<sup>a</sup> the royal family, by the death of Andronicus and the monastic profession of Isidore, was reduced to three princes, Constantine, Demetrius, and Thomas, the surviving sons of the emperor Manuel. Of these the first and the last were far distant in the Morea, but Demetrius, who possessed the domain of Selybria, was in the suburbs, at the head of a party. His ambition was not chilled by the public distress, and his conspiracy with the Turks and the schismatics had already disturbed the peace of his country. The funeral of the late emperor was accelerated with singular and even suspicious haste. The claim of Demetrius to the vacant throne was justified by a trite and flimsy sophism, that he was born in the purple, the eldest son of his father's reign. But the empress-mother, the senate and soldiers, the clergy and people, were unanimous in the cause of the lawful successor, and the despot Thomas, who, ignorant of the change, accidentally returned to the capital, asserted with becoming zeal the interest of his absent brother. An ambassador, the historian Phranza, was immediately despatched to the court of Adrianople. Amurath received him with honour and dismissed him with gifts, but the gracious approbation of the Turkish sultan announced his supremacy, and the approaching downfall of the eastern empire. By the hands of two illustrious deputies, the imperial crown was placed at Sparta on the head of Constantine. In the spring he sailed from the Morea, escaped the encounter of a Turkish squadron, enjoyed the acclamations of his subjects, celebrated the festival of a new reign, and exhausted by his donations the treasure, or rather the indigence, of the state. The emperor immediately resigned to his brothers the possession of the Morea, and the brittle friendship of the two princes, Demetrius and Thomas, was confirmed in their mother's presence by the frail security of oaths and embraces. His next occupation was the choice of a consort. A daughter of the doge of Venice had been proposed, but the Byzantine nobles objected the distance between an hereditary monarch and an elective magistrate, and in their subsequent distress, the chief of that powerful republic was not unmindful of the affront. Constantine afterwards hesitated between the royal families of Trebizond and Georgia, and the embassy of Phranza represents in his public and private life the last days of the Byzantine empire.<sup>b</sup>

The protovestiare, or great chamberlain, Phranza, sailed from Constantinople as the minister of a bridegroom, and the relics of wealth and luxury were applied to his pompous appearance. His numerous retinue consisted of nobles and guards, of physicians and monks: he was attended by a band of music, and the term of his costly embassy was protracted above two years. On his arrival in Georgia or Iberia, the natives from the towns and villages flocked around the strangers, and such was their simplicity, that they were delighted with the effects, without understanding the cause, of musical harmony. Among the crowd was an old man, above a hundred years of age, who had formerly been carried away a captive by the barbarians,<sup>c</sup> and who amused his hearers with a tale of the wonders of India,<sup>d</sup> from whence he had returned to Portugal by an unknown sea.<sup>e</sup> From this hospitable land, Phranza proceeded to the court of Trebizond, where he was informed by the Greek prince of the recent decease of Amurath. Instead of rejoicing in the deliverance, the experienced statesman expressed his apprehension, that an ambitious youth would not long adhere to the sage and pacific system of his father. After the sultan's decease, his christian wife, Maria,<sup>f</sup> the daughter of the Servian despot, had been honourably restored to her parents: on the fame of her beauty and merit, she was recommended by the ambassador as the most worthy object of the royal choice, and Phranza recapitulates and refutes the specious objections that might be raised against the proposal. The majesty of the purple would ennoble an unequal alliance, the bar of affinity might be removed by liberal alms and the dispensation of the church, the disgrace of Turkish nuptials had been repeatedly overlooked, and, though the fair Maria was near fifty years of age, she might yet hope to give an heir to the empire. Constantine

Embassies of Phranza,
A D 1450—1452.

<sup>y</sup> See the family of the Castriots, in Ducange (Fam. Dalmatien., &c. xviii. p. 348—350).

<sup>z</sup> This colony of Albanese is mentioned by Mr. Swaurne. (Travels into the two Sicilies, vol. i. p. 350—354).

<sup>a</sup> The chronology of Phranza is clear and authentic: but instead of four years and seven months, Spondanus (A. D. 1445. No. 7) assigns seven or eight years to the reign of the last Constantine, which he deduces from a spurious epistle of Eugenius IV. to the King of Ethiopia.

<sup>b</sup> Phranza (l. iii. c. 1—6) deserves credit and esteem.

<sup>c</sup> Suppose him to have been captured in 1394 in Timur's first war in Georgia (Shereffeddin, l. iii. c. 50) he might follow his Tartar master into Hindostan in 1398 and from thence sail to the spice islands.

<sup>d</sup> The happy and pious Indians lived an hundred and fifty years and enjoyed the most perfect productions of the vegetable and mineral kingdoms. The animals were on a large scale: dragons seventy cubits, ants (the formica Indica) nine inches long, sheep like elephants, elephants like sheep. Quidlibet audiendi, &c.

<sup>e</sup> He sailed in a country vessel from the spice islands to one of the ports of the exterior India: invenique novem gradum Ibericam quâ in Portugalliam est delatus. This passage, composed in 1477 (Phranza l. iii. c. 30) twenty years before the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope, is spurious or wonderful. But this new geography is sullied by the old and incompatible error which places the source of the Nile in India.

<sup>f</sup> Cantemir (p. 83) who styles her the daughter of Lazarus Ogh and the Helen of the Servians, places her marriage with Amurath in the year 1424. It will not easily be believed, that in six and twenty years' cohabitation, the sultan corpus ejus non tetigit. After the taking of Constantinople, she fled to Malomet II. (Phranza, l. iii. c. 22.)

listened to the advice, which was transmitted in the first ship that sailed from Trebizond, but the factions of the court opposed his marriage, and it was finally prevented by the pious vow of the sultana, who ended her days in the monastic profession. Reduced to the first alternative, the choice of Phranza was decided in favour of a Georgian princess, and the vanity of her father was dazzled by the glorious alliance. Instead of demanding, according to the primitive and national custom, a price for his daughter,<sup>g</sup> he offered a portion of fifty-six thousand, with an annual pension of five thousand ducats, and the services of the ambassador were repaid by an assurance, that, as his son had been adopted in baptism by the emperor, the establishment of his daughter should be the peculiar care of the empress of Constantinople. On the return of Phranza, the treaty was ratified by the Greek monarch, who with his own hand impressed three vermilion crosses on the golden bull, and assured the Georgian envoy, that in the spring his galleys should conduct the bride to her imperial palace. But Constantine embraced his faithful servant, not with the cold approbation of a sovereign, but with the warm confidence of a friend, who, after a long absence, is impatient to pour his secrets into the bosom of his friend. "Since the death of my mother and of Cantacuzene, who alone advised me without interest or passion,<sup>h</sup> I am surrounded," said the emperor, "by men whom I can neither love, nor trust, nor esteem. You are not a stranger to Lucas Notaras, the great admiral, obstinately attached to his own sentiments, he declares, both in private and public, that his sentiments are the absolute measure of my thoughts and actions. The rest of the courtiers are swayed by their personal or factious views, and how can I consult the monks on questions of policy and marriage? I have yet much employment for your diligence and fidelity. In the spring you shall engage one of my brothers to solicit the succour of the western powers, from the Morea you shall sail to Cyprus on a particular commission, and from thence proceed to Georgia to receive and conduct the future empress." "Your commands," replied Phranza, "are irresistible, but deign, great sir," he added, with a serious smile, "to consider, that if I am thus perpetually absent from my family, my wife may be tempted either to seek another husband, or to throw herself into a monastery." After laughing at his apprehensions, the emperor more gravely consoled him by the pleasing assurance that this would be his last service abroad, and that he destined for his son a wealthy and noble heiress, for himself, the important office of great logothete, or principal minister of state. The marriage was immediately stipulated, but the office, however incompatible with his own, had been usurped by the ambition of the admiral. Some delay was requisite to negotiate a consent and an equivalent, and the nomination of Phranza was half declared, and half suppressed, lest it might be displeasing to an insolent and powerful favourite. The winter was spent in the preparations of his embassy, and Phranza had resolved, that the youth his son should embrace this opportunity of foreign travel, and be left on the appearance of danger, with his maternal kindred of the Morea. Such were the private and public designs, which were interrupted by a Turkish war, and finally buried in the ruins of the empire.

State of the Byzantine court

<sup>g</sup> The classical reader will recollect the offers of Agamemnon, (Iliad, l. v. 144) and the general practice of antiquity.

<sup>h</sup> Cantacuzene (I am ignorant of his relation to the emperor of that name) was great domestic, a firm asserter of the Greek creed, and a brother of the queen of Servia, whom he visited with the character of ambassador (Syropulus, p. 37, 38, 45).

<sup>a</sup> For the character of Mahomet II. it is dangerous to trust either the Turks or the Christians. The most moderate picture appears to be drawn by Phranza, (l. i. c. 32) whose resentment had cooled in age and solitude, see likewise Spondanus, (A. D. 1451, No. 11) and the

CHAP LXVIII.

Reign and character of Mahomet the second — Siege, assault, and final conquest, of Constantinople by the Turks — Death of Constantine Palæologus — Servitude of the Greeks — Extinction of the Roman empire in the east — Consternation of Europe — conquests and death of Mahomet the second

THE siege of Constantinople by the Turks attracts our first attention to the person and character of the great destroyer Mahomet the second<sup>a</sup> was the son of the second Amurath and though his mother has been decorated with the titles of christian and princess, she is more probably confounded with the numerous concubines who peopled from every climate the harem of the sultan. His first education and sentiments were those of a devout mussulman, and as often as he conversed with an infidel, he purified his hands and face by the legal rites of ablution. Age and empire appear to have relaxed this narrow bigotry: his aspiring genius disdained to acknowledge a power above his own, and in his looser hours he presumed (it is said) to brand the prophet of Mecca as a robber and impostor. Yet the sultan persevered in a decent reverence for the doctrine and discipline of the Koran<sup>b</sup> his private indiscretion must have been sacred from the vulgar ear, and we should suspect the credulity of strangers and sectaries, so prone to believe that a mind which is hardened against truth, must be armed with superior contempt for absurdity and error. Under the tuition of the most skilful masters, Mahomet advanced with an early and rapid progress in the paths of knowledge, and besides his native tongue, it is affirmed that he spoke or understood five languages,<sup>c</sup> the Arabic, the Persian, the Chaldean or Hebrew, the Latin, and the Greek. The Persian might indeed contribute to his amusement, and the Arabic confidant of Fleury, (tom. xxii. p. 552.) the Elogia of Paulus Jovius, (l. iii. p. 164—166) and the Dictionnaire de Bayle, (tom. iii. p. 272—279).

<sup>b</sup> Cantemir, (p. 115) and the moschis which he founded, attest his public regard for religion. Mahomet freely disputed with the patriarch Genadius on the two religions. (Spond. A. D. 1453, No. 22.)

<sup>c</sup> Quinque linguas præter suam noverat Græcam, Latinam, Chaldeam, Persicam. The Latin translator of Phranza has dropt the Arabic, which the Koran must recommend to every mussulman.

to his edification, and such studies are familiar to the oriental youth. In the intercourse of the Greeks and Turks, a conqueror might wish to converse with the people over whom he was ambitious to reign, his own praises in Latin poetry<sup>d</sup> or prose<sup>e</sup> might find a passage to the royal ear, but what use or merit could recommend to the statesman or the scholar the uncouth dialect of his Hebrew slaves? The history and geography of the world were familiar to his memory: the lives of the heroes of the east, perhaps of the west,<sup>f</sup> excited his emulation: his skill in astrology is excused by the folly of the times, and supposes some rudiments of mathematical science, and a profane taste for the arts is betrayed in his liberal invitation and reward of the painters of Italy.<sup>g</sup> But the influence of religion and learning were employed without effect on his savage and licentious nature. I will not transcribe, nor do I firmly believe, the stories of his fourteen pages, whose bellies were ripped open in search of a stolen melon, or of the beautiful slave, whose head he severed from her body, to convince the janizaries that their master was not the votary of love. His sobriety is attested by the silence of the Turkish annals, which accuse three, and three only, of the Ottoman line of the vice of drunkenness.<sup>h</sup> But it cannot be denied that his passions were at once furious and inexorable, that in the palace, as in the field, a torrent of blood was spilt on the slightest provocation, and that the noblest of the captive youth were often dishonoured by his unnatural lust. In the Albanian war, he studied the lessons, and soon surpassed the example, of his father, and the conquest of two empires, twelve kingdoms, and two hundred cities, a vain and flattering account, is ascribed to his invincible sword. He was doubtless a soldier, and possibly a general, Constantinople has sealed his glory, but if we compare the means, the obstacles, and the achievements, Mahomet the second must blush to sustain a parallel with Alexander or Timour. Under his command, the Ottoman forces were always more numerous than their enemies, yet their progress was bounded by the Euphrates and the Adriatic, and his arms were checked by Humades and Scanderbeg, by the Rhodian knights and by the Persian king.

In the reign of Amurath, he twice tasted of royalty, and twice descended from the throne: his tender age was incapable of opposing his father's restoration, but never could he forgive the viziers who had recommended that salutary measure. His nuptials were celebrated with the daughter of a Turkman emir, and, after a festival of two months, he departed from Adrianople with his bride, to reside in the government of Magnesia. Before the end of six weeks he was recalled by a sudden message from the divan, which announced the decease of Amurath, and the mutinous spirit of the janizaries. His speed and vigour commanded their obedience: he passed the Hellespont with a chosen guard, and at the distance of a mile from Adrianople, the viziers and emirs, the imams and cadhis, the soldiers and the people, fell prostrate before the new sultan. They affected to weep, they affected to rejoice, he ascended the throne at the age of twenty-one years, and removed the cause of sedition by the death, the inevitable death, of his infant brothers.<sup>i</sup> The ambassadors of Europe and Asia soon appeared to congratulate his accession and solicit his friendship, and to all he spoke the language of moderation and peace. The confidence of the Greek emperor was revived by the solemn oaths and fair assurances with which he sealed the ratification of the treaty, and a rich domain on the banks of the Strymon was assigned for the annual payment of three hundred thousand aspers, the pension of an Ottoman prince, who was detained at his request in the Byzantine court. Yet the neighbours of Mahomet might tremble at the severity with which a youthful monarch reformed the pomp of his father's household: the expenses of luxury were applied to those of ambition, and an useless train of seven thousand falconers was either dismissed from his service, or enlisted in his troops. In the first summer of his reign, he visited with an army the Asiatic provinces, but after humbling the pride, Mahomet accepted the submission, of the Caramanian, that he might not be diverted by the smallest obstacle from the execution of his great design.<sup>k</sup>

The Mahometan, and more especially the Turkish, casuists, have pronounced that no promise can bind the faithful against the interest and duty of their religion, and that the sultan may abrogate his own treaties and those of his predecessors. The justice and magnanimity of Amurath had scorned this immoral privilege, but his son, though the proudest of men, could stoop from ambition to the basest arts of dissimulation and deceit. Peace was on his lips, while war was in his heart: he incessantly sighed for the possession of Constantinople, and the

Hostile intentions of Mahomet, A.D. 1451

<sup>d</sup> Philéppus by a Latin ode, requested and obtained the liberty of his wife's mother and sisters from the conqueror of Constantinople. It was delivered into the sultan's hands by the envoys of the duke of Milan. Philéppus himself was suspected of a design of retiring to Constantinople: yet the orator often sounded the trumpet of holy war (See his life by M. Launcelot in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions tom. x. p. 718, 724 &c.)

<sup>e</sup> Robert Vallart published at Verona in 1483, his twelve books de Re Militari in which he first mentions the use of bombs. By his patron Sigismund Malatesta, prince of Rimini: it had been addressed with a Latin epistle to Mahomet II.

<sup>f</sup> According to Piranza he assiduously studied the lives and actions of Alexander, Augustus, Constantine and Theodosius. I have read somewhere that Plutarch's Lives were translated by his orders into the Turkish language. If the sultan himself understood Greek, it must have been for the benefit of his subjects. Yet these lives are a school of freedom as well as of valour.

<sup>g</sup> The famous Gentile Bellino whom he had invited from Venice, was dismissed with a chain and collar of gold and a purse of 3000 ducats. With Voltaire I laugh at the foolish story of a slave purposely belaboured to instruct the painter in the action of the muscles.

<sup>h</sup> These imperial drunkards were Soliman I. Selim II. and Amurath IV. (Cantemir, p. 61.) The sultan of Persia can produce a more regular succession, and in the last age our European travellers were the witnesses and companions of their revels.

<sup>i</sup> Calapin one of these royal infants, was saved from his cruel brother and baptized at Rome under the name of Callistus Othomanus. The emperor Frederic III. presented him with an estate in Austria where he ended his life and Cuspinian who in his youth conversed with the aged prince at Vienna, applauds his piety and wisdom (de Cæsari bus p. 672, 673.)

<sup>k</sup> See the accession of Mahomet II. in Ducis (c. 33.) Piranza (l. i. c. 33. l. iii. c. 2.) Chalcondyles, (l. vii. p. 139.) and Cantemir, (p. 96.)

Greeks, by their own indiscretion, afforded the first pretence of the fatal rupture<sup>1</sup> Instead of labouring to be forgotten, their ambassadors pursued his camp, to demand the payment, and even the increase, of their annual stipend: the divan was importuned by their complaints, and the vizir, a secret friend of the christians, was constrained to deliver the sense of his brethren "Ye foolish and miserable Romans," said Calil, "we know your devices, and ye are ignorant of your own danger, the scrupulous Amurath is no more, his throne is occupied by a young conqueror, whom no laws can bind, and no obstacles can resist and if you escape from his hands, give praise to the divine clemency, which yet delays the chastisement of your sins Why do ye seek to affright us by vain and indirect menaces? Release the fugitive Orchan, crown him sultan of Romania, call the Hungarians from beyond the Danube, arm against us the nations of the west, and be assured, that you will only provoke and precipitate your ruin" But if the fears of the ambassadors were alarmed by the stern language of the vizir, they were soothed by the courteous audience and friendly speeches of the Ottoman prince, and Mahomet assured them that on his return to Adrianople, he would redress the grievances, and consult the true interests, of the Greeks No sooner had he repassed the Hellespont, than he issued a mandate to suppress their pension, and to expel their officers from the banks of the Strymon in this measure he betrayed an hostile mind, and the second order announced, and in some degree commenced, the siege of Constantinople In the narrow pass of the Bosphorus, an Asiatic fortress had formerly been raised by his grandfather in the opposite situation, on the European side, he resolved to erect a more formidable castle, and a thousand masons were commanded to assemble in the spring on a spot named Asomaton, about five miles from the Greek metropolis<sup>m</sup> Persuasion is the resource of the feeble, and the feeble can seldom persuade the ambassadors of the emperor attempted, without success, to divert Mahomet from the execution of his design They represented, that his grandfather had solicited the permission of Manuel to build a castle on his own territories, but that this double fortification, which would command the strait, could only tend to violate the alliance of the nations, to intercept the Latins who traded in the Black sea, and perhaps to annihilate the subsistence of the city "I form no enterprise," replied the perfidious sultan, "against the city, but the empire of Constantinople is measured by her walls Have you forgot the distress to which my father was reduced, when you formed a league with the Hungarians, when they invaded our country by land, and the Hellespont was occupied by the French galleys? Amurath was compelled to force the passage of the Bosphorus, and your strength was not equal to your malevolence I was then a child at Adrianople, the Moslems trembled, and for a while the Gabours<sup>n</sup> insulted our disgrace But when my father had triumphed in the field of Warna, he vowed to erect a fort on the western shore, and that vow it is my duty to accomplish Have ye the right, have ye the power, to control my actions on my own ground? For that ground is my own as far as the shores of the Bosphorus, Asia is inhabited by the Turks, and Europe is deserted by the Romans Return, and inform your king, that the present Ottoman is far different from his predecessors, that his resolutions surpass their wishes, and that he performs more than they could resolve Return in safety—but the next who delivers a similar message may expect to be flayed alive" After this declaration, Constantine, the first of the Greeks in spirit as in rank,<sup>o</sup> had determined to unsheath the sword, and to resist the approach and establishment of the Turks on the Bosphorus He was disarmed by the advice of his civil and ecclesiastical ministers, who recommended a system less generous, and even less prudent, than his own, to approve their patience and long-suffering, to brand the Ottoman with the name and guilt of an aggressor, and to depend on chance and time for their own safety, and the destruction of a fort which could not long be maintained in the neighbourhood of a great and populous city Amidst hope and fear, the fears of the wise, and the hopes of the credulous, the winter rolled away, the proper business of each man, and each hour, was postponed, and the Greeks shut their eyes against the impending danger, till the arrival of the spring and the sultan decided the assurance of their ruin

Of a master who never forgives, the orders are seldom disobeyed On the twenty-sixth of March, the appointed spot of Asomaton was covered with an

He builds a fortress on the Bosphorus, A D 1452 March

<sup>1</sup> Before I enter on the siege of Constantinople I shall observe, that except the short hints of Cantemir and Leunclavius, I have not been able to obtain any Turkish account of this conquest such an account as we possess of the siege of Rhodes by Soliman II (Memoires de l'Academie des Inscriptions, tom xxvi p 723-769) I must therefore depend on the Greeks, whose prejudices, in some degree, are subdued by their distress Our standard texts are those of Ducas, (c 34-42) Phiranza (l iii c 7-20) Chaleondyles (l viii p 201-214) and Leonardus Chiensis (Historia C P a Turco expulsa, Norimbergae, 1544, in 4to 20 leaves) The last of these narratives is the earliest in date, since it was composed in the isle of Chios, the 16th of August, 1453, only seventy nine days after the loss of the city and in the first confusion of ideas and passion Some hints may be added from an epistle of cardinal Isidore (in Farragine Rerum Turcicarum ad caltem Chilandyl Clauseri, Basil 1556) to pope Nicholas V and a tract of Theodosius Zygonaris, which he addressed in the year 1581 to Martin Cranus (Turco Graeci, l i p 74-98 Basil, 1584) The various facts and materials are briefly though critically reviewed by Spondanus (A D 1453, No 1-27) The hearsay relations of Monstrelet and the distant

<sup>m</sup> The situation of the fortress, and the topography of the Bosphorus, are best learned from Peter Gyllius (de Bosphoro Thracio, l ii c 13) Leunclavius, (Pandect p 445) and Tournefort, (Voyage dans le Levant, tom ii lettre xv p 443 444) but I must regret the map or plan which Tournefort sent to the French minister of the marine The reader may turn back to ch xvii of this history

<sup>n</sup> The opprobrious name which the Turks bestow on the infidels, is expressed kafoop by Ducas and Giaour by Leunclavius and the moderns The former term is derived by Ducange (Gloss Graec tom i p 530) from kafoi pov, in vulgar Greek, a tortoise, as denoting a retrograde motion from the faith But, alas! Gabour is no more than Gheber, which was transferred from the Persian to the Turkish language, from the worshippers of fire to those of the crucifix (D Herbelot Bibliot Orient p 375)

<sup>o</sup> Phiranza does justice to his master's sense and courage Calliditas hominis non ignorans imperator prior arma movere constituit, and stigmatizes the folly of the cum sacri tum profani proceres, which he had heard, amentes spe vanâ pavâ Ducas was not a privy counsellor

active swarm of Turkish artificers, and the materials by sea and land were diligently transported from Europe and Asia. The lime had been burnt in Cataphrygia, the timber was cut down in the woods of Heraclea and Nicomedia, and the stones were dug from the Anatolian quarries. Each of the thousand masons was assisted by two workmen, and a measure of two cubits was marked for their daily task. The fortress was built in a triangular form, each angle was flanked by a strong and massy tower, one on the declivity of the hill, two along the seashore: a thickness of twenty-two feet was assigned for the walls, thirty for the towers, and the whole building was covered with a solid platform of lead. Mahomet himself pressed and directed the work with indefatigable ardour: his three vizirs claimed the honour of finishing their respective towers, the zeal of the eadhis emulated that of the janizaries, the meanest labour was ennobled by the service of God and the sultan, and the diligence of the multitude was quickened by the eye of a despot, whose smile was the hope of fortune, and whose frown was the messenger of death. The Greek emperor beheld with terror the irresistible progress of the work, and vainly strove, by flattery and gifts, to assuage an implacable foe, who sought, and secretly fomented, the slightest occasion of a quarrel. Such occasions must soon and inevitably be found. The ruins of stately churches, and even the marble columns which had been consecrated to Saint Michael the archangel, were employed without scruple by the profane and rapacious Moslems, and some christians, who presumed to oppose the removal, received from their hands the crown of martyrdom. Constantine had solicited a Turkish guard to protect the fields and harvests of his subjects: the guard was fixed, but their first order was to allow free pasture to the mules and horses of the camp, and to defend their brethren if they should be molested by the natives. The retinue of an Ottoman chief had left their horses to pass the night among the ripe corn: the damage was felt, the insult was resented, and several of both nations were slain in a tumultuous conflict. Mahomet listened with joy to the complaint, and a detachment was commanded to exterminate the guilty village: the guilty had fled, but forty innocent and unsuspecting reapers were massacred by the soldiers. Till this provocation, Constantinople had been open to the visits of commerce and curiosity: on the first alarm the gates were shut, but the emperor, still anxious for peace, released on the third day his Turkish captives, and expressed, in a last message, the firm resignation of a christian and a soldier. "Since neither oaths, nor treaty, nor submission, can secure peace, pursue," said he to Mahomet, "your impious warfare. My trust is in God alone: if it should please him to mollify your heart, I shall rejoice in the happy change, if he delivers the city into your hands, I submit without a murmur to his holy will. But until the Judge of the earth shall pronounce between us, it is my duty to live and die in the defence of my people." The sultan's answer was hostile and decisive: his fortifications were completed, and before Sept 1 his departure for Adrianople, he stationed a vigilant Aga and four hundred janizaries, to levy a tribute of the ships of every nation that should pass within the reach of their cannon. A Venetian vessel, refusing obedience to the new lords of the Bosphorus, was sunk with a single bullet. The master and thirty sailors escaped in the boat, but they were dragged in chains to the Porte, the chief was impaled, his companions were beheaded, and the historian Ducas<sup>a</sup> beheld, at Demotica, their bodies exposed to the wild beasts. The siege of Constantinople was deferred till the ensuing spring, but an Ottoman army marched into the Morea to divert the force of the brothers of Constantine. At this era of calamity, one of these princes, the despot Thomas, was blessed or afflicted with the birth of a son, "the last heir," says the plaintive Phranza, "of the last spark of the Roman empire."

The Greeks and the Turks passed an anxious and sleepless winter: the former were kept awake by their fears, the latter by their hopes, both by the preparations of defence and attack, and the two emperors, who had the most to lose or to gain, were the most deeply affected by the national sentiment. In Mahomet, that sentiment was inflamed by the ardour of his youth and temper: he amused his leisure with building at Adrianople<sup>b</sup> the lofty palace of Jehan Numa, (the watch-tower of the world,) but his serious thoughts were irrevocably bent on the conquest of the city of Cæsar. At the dead of night, about the second watch, he started from his bed, and commanded the instant attendance of his prime vizir. The message, the hour, the prince, and his own situation, alarmed the guilty conscience of Cahil Basha, who had possessed the confidence, and advised the restoration, of Amurath. On the accession of the son, the vizir was confirmed in his office and the appearances of favour, but the veteran statesman was not insensible that he trod on a thin and slippery ice, which might break under his footsteps, and plunge him in the abyss. His friendship for the christians, which might be innocent under the late reign, had stigma-

Sept 1

A D 1453
Jan 17Preparations for the siege of Constantinople
A D 1452
September —
A D 1453
April

<sup>p</sup> Instead of this clear and consistent account, the Turkish annals, (Cantemir, p. 97) repeat the foolish tale of the ox's hide and Dido's stratagem in the foundation of Carthage. These annals (unless we are swayed by an anti-christian prejudice) are far less valuable than the Greek historians.

<sup>q</sup> In the dimensions of this fortress the old castle of Europe. Phranza does not exactly agree with Chalcondyles, whose description has been verified on the spot by his editor Lennelavus.

<sup>r</sup> Amos, these were some pages of Mahomet, so conscious of his in-exorable rigour that they begged to lose their heads in the city unless they could return before sunset.

<sup>a</sup> Ducas, c. 35. Phranza (l. iii c. 3) who had sailed in his vessel, commemorates the Venetian pilot as a martyr.

<sup>b</sup> Auctum est Palæologorum genus, et imperii successor parvæque Romanorum scintillæ heredes natus, Andreas, &c. (Phranza l. iii c. 7). The strong expression was inspired by his feelings.

<sup>c</sup> Cantemir, p. 97, 98. The sultan was either doubtful of his conquest, or ignorant of the superior merits of Constantinople. A city or a

tized him with the name of Gabour Ortachi, or foster-brother of the infidels,* and his avarice entertained a venal and treasonable correspondence, which was detected and punished after the conclusion of the war. On receiving the royal mandate, he embraced, perhaps for the last time, his wife and children, filled a cup with pieces of gold, hastened to the palace, adored the sultan, and offered, according to the oriental custom, the slight tribute of his duty and gratitude. "It is not my wish," said Mahomet, "to resume my gifts, but rather to heap and multiply them on thy head. In my turn I ask a present far more valuable and important,—Constantinople." As soon as the vizir had recovered from his surprise, "The same God," said he, "who has already given thee so large a portion of the Roman empire, will not deny the remnant, and the capital. His providence, and thy power, assure thy success, and myself, with the rest of thy faithful slaves, will sacrifice our lives and fortunes." "Lala,"† (or preceptor,) continued the sultan, "do you see this pillow? all the night, in my agitation, I have pulled it on one side and on the other, I have risen from my bed, again have I lain down, yet sleep has not visited these weary eyes. Beware of the gold and silver of the Romans: in arms we are superior, and with the aid of God, and the prayers of the prophet, we shall speedily become masters of Constantinople." To sound the disposition of his soldiers, he often wandered through the streets alone, and in disguise, and it was fatal to discover the sultan, when he wished to escape from the vulgar eye. His hours were spent in delineating the plan of the hostile city, in debating, with his generals and engineers, on what spot he should erect his batteries, on which side he should assault the walls, where he should spring his mines, to what place he should apply his scaling-ladders, and the exercises of the day repeated and proved the lucubrations of the night.

The great cannon of Mahomet. Among the implements of destruction, he studied with peculiar care the recent and tremendous discovery of the Latins, and his artillery surpassed whatever had yet appeared in the world. A founder of cannon, a Dane or Hungarian, who had been almost starved in the Greek service, deserted to the Moslems, and was liberally entertained by the Turkish sultan. Mahomet was satisfied with the answer to his first question, which he eagerly pressed on the artist: "Am I able to cast a cannon capable of throwing a ball or stone of sufficient size to batter the walls of Constantinople?" "I am not ignorant of their strength, kingdom may sometimes be ruined by the imperial fortune of their sovereign.

* Συμφορος, by the president Cousin, is translated pere nourricier, most correctly indeed from the Latin version; but in his haste he has overlooked the note by which Ismael Boitard (ad Ducam, c. 35) acknowledges and rectifies his own error.

† The oriental custom of never appearing without gifts before a sovereign or a superior, is of high antiquity, and seems analogous with the idea of sacrifice, still more ancient and universal. See the examples of such Persian gifts, Asian Hist. Var. l. i. c. 31, 32, 33.

* The Iala of the Turks (Cantemir, p. 34) and the Tata of the Greeks (Ducas, c. 35) are derived from the natural language of children, and it may be observed, that all such primitive words which debut were they more solid than those of Babylon, I could oppose an engine of superior power: the position and management of that engine must be left to your engineers." On this assurance, a foundry was established at Adrianople: the metal was prepared, and at the end of three months, Urban produced a piece of brass ordnance of stupendous, and almost incredible, magnitude; a measure of twelve palms is assigned to the bore, and the stone bullet weighed above six hundred pounds.<sup>a</sup> A vacant place before the new palace was chosen for the first experiment, but, to prevent the sudden and mischievous effects of astonishment and fear, a proclamation was issued, that the cannon would be discharged the ensuing day. The explosion was felt or heard in a circuit of an hundred furlongs: the ball, by the force of gunpowder, was driven above a mile, and on the spot where it fell, it buried itself a fathom deep in the ground. For the conveyance of this destructive engine, a frame or carriage of thirty waggons was linked together and drawn along by a team of sixty oxen: two hundred men on both sides were stationed to poise or support the rolling weight, two hundred and fifty workmen marched before to smooth the way and repair the bridges, and near two months were employed in a laborious journey of one hundred and fifty miles. A lively philosopher<sup>b</sup> derides on this occasion the credulity of the Greeks, and observes, with much reason, that we should always distrust the exaggerations of a vanquished people. He calculates, that a ball, even of two hundred pounds, would require a charge of one hundred and fifty pounds of powder, and that the stroke would be feeble and impotent, since not a fifteenth part of the mass could be inflamed at the same moment. A stranger as I am to the art of destruction, I can discern that the modern improvements of artillery prefer the number of pieces to the weight of metal, the quickness of the fire to the sound, or even the consequence, of a single explosion. Yet I dare not reject the positive and unanimous evidence of contemporary writers, nor can it seem improbable, that the first artists, in their rude and ambitious efforts, should have transgressed the standard of moderation. A Turkish cannon, more enormous than that of Mahomet, still guards the entrance of the Dardanelles, and if the use be inconvenient, it has been found on a late trial that the effect was far from contemptible. A stone bullet of eleven hundred pounds' weight was once discharged with three hundred and thirty pounds of powder, at the distance of six hundred yards it shivered into three note their parents, are the simple repetition of one syllable composed of a labial or a dental consonant and an open vowel, (des Brosses, Mécanisme des Langues, tom. i. p. 231—247.)

<sup>a</sup> The Attic talent weighed about sixty minæ, or avoirdupois pounds, (see Hooper on ancient Weights, Measures, &c., but among the modern Greeks, that elastic appellation was extended to a weight of one hundred, or one hundred and twenty five, pounds. (Ducange, ταλαντον.) Leonardus Chiensis measured the ball or stone of the second cannon. Lapidem qui palmis undecim ex meis ambabat in gyro.

<sup>b</sup> See Voltaire (Hist. Générale c. xci. p. 294, 295.) He was ambitious of universal monarchy, and the poet frequently aspires to the name and style of an astronomer, a chemist, &c.

rocky fragments, traversed the strait, and, leaving the waters in a foam, again rose and bounded against the opposite hill<sup>c</sup>

Mahomet II
forms the siege of Constantinople
A D 1453
April 6

While Mahomet threatened the capital of the east, the Greek emperor implored with fervent prayers the assistance of earth and heaven. But the invisible powers were deaf to his supplications, and Christendom beheld with indifference the fall of Constantinople, while she derived at least some promise of supply from the jealous and temporal policy of the sultan of Egypt. Some states were too weak, and others too remote, by some the danger was considered as imaginary, by others as inevitable: the western princes were involved in their endless and domestic quarrels, and the Roman pontiff was exasperated by the falsehood or obstinacy of the Greeks. Instead of employing in their favour the arms and treasures of Italy, Nicholas the fifth had foretold their approaching ruin, and his honour was engaged in the accomplishment of his prophecy. Perhaps he was softened by the last extremity of their distress, but his compassion was tardy, his efforts were faint and unavailing, and Constantinople had fallen, before the squadrons of Genoa and Venice could sail from their harbours<sup>d</sup>. Even the princes of the Morea and of the Greek islands affected a cold neutrality, the Genoese colony of Galata negotiated a private treaty, and the sultan indulged them in the delusive hope, that by his clemency they might survive the ruin of the empire. A plebeian crowd, and some Byzantine nobles, basely withdrew from the danger of their country, and the avarice of the rich denied the emperor, and reserved for the Turks, the secret treasures which might have raised in their defence whole armies of mercenaries<sup>e</sup>. The indigent and solitary prince prepared however to sustain his formidable adversary, but if his courage were equal to the peril, his strength was inadequate to the contest. In the beginning of the spring, the Turkish vanguard swept the towns and villages as far as the gates of Constantinople: submission was spared and protected, whatever presumed to resist was exterminated with fire and sword. The Greek places on the Hellespont sea, Mesembria, Acheloum, and Bizon, surrendered on the first summons, Selybria alone deserved the honours of a siege or blockade, and the bold inhabitants, while they were invested by land, launched their boats, pillaged the opposite coast of Cyzicus, and sold their captives in the public market. But on the approach of Mahomet himself all was silent and prostrate: he first halted at the distance of five miles, and from thence advancing in battle array, planted before the gate of St. Romanus the imperial standard, and, on the sixth day of April, formed the memorable siege of Constantinople.

The troops of Asia and Europe extended on the right and left from the Propontis to the harbour: the janizaries in the front were stationed before the sultan's tent, the Ottoman line was covered by a deep intrenchment, and a subordinate army enclosed the suburb of Galata, and watched the doubtful faith of the Genoese. The inquisitive Philéplhus, who resided in Greece about thirty years before the siege, is confident, that all the Turkish forces, of any name or value, could not exceed the number of sixty thousand horse and twenty thousand foot, and he upbraids the pusillanimity of the nations, who had tamely yielded to an handful of barbarians. Such indeed might be the regular establishment of the Capiculi,<sup>f</sup> the troops of the Porte, who marched with the prince, and were paid from his royal treasury. But the bashaws, in their respective governments, maintained or levied a provincial militia, many lands were held by a military tenure, many volunteers were attracted by the hope of spoil, and the sound of the holy trumpet invited a swarm of hungry and fearless fanatics, who might contribute at least to multiply the terrors, and in a first attack to blunt the swords, of the christians. The whole mass of the Turkish powers is magnified by Ducas, Chaleondyles, and Leonard of Chios, to the amount of three or four hundred thousand men, but Phranza was a less remote and more accurate judge, and his precise definition of two hundred and fifty-eight thousand does not exceed the measure of experience and probability<sup>g</sup>. The navy of the besiegers was less formidable: the Propontis was overspread with three hundred and twenty sail, but of these no more than eighteen could be rated as galleys of war, and the far greater part must be degraded to the condition of storeships and transports, which poured into the camp fresh supplies of men, ammunition, and provisions. In her last decay, Constantinople was still peopled with more than an hundred thousand inhabitants, but these numbers are found in the accounts, not of war, but of captivity, and they mostly consisted of mechanics, of priests, of women, and of men devoid of that spirit which even women have sometimes exerted for the common safety. I can suppose, I could almost excuse, the reluctance of subjects to serve on a distant frontier, at the will of a tyrant, but the man

<sup>c</sup> The Baron de Tott, (tom. iii. p. 85-89) who fortified the Dardanelles against the Russians, describes in a lively and even comic strain his own progress and the consternation of the Turks. But that adventurous traveller does not possess the art of gaining our confidence.

<sup>d</sup> Nim auduit indolentem ducem, says the honest Antimachus: but as the Roman emperor was afterwards grieved and ashamed we find the more courtly expressions of Plinius in animo fuisse pusilliter juvare Grecos, and the positive assertion of Aeneas Sylvius, struelam elassem, &c. (Spoud. A. D. 1453 No. 3).

<sup>e</sup> Antimachus in Proem.—Epist. cardinali Isidoro apud Bontonium, and Dr. Johnson in the tragedy of Ircus has happily seized this characteristic circumstance.

The groaning Greeks dig up the golden caverns.

The accumulated wealth of hoarding ages, That wealth which granted to their weeping prince, Had ranged embattled nations at their gates.

<sup>f</sup> The palatine troops are styled Capiculi, the provincials, Seraticuli, and most of the names and institutions of the Turkish militia existed before the Canon Narzeh of Soliman II. from which, and his own experience count Marigni has composed his military state of the Ottoman empire.

<sup>g</sup> The observation of Philéplhus is approved by Cuspinian in the year 1508 (de Caesaribus, in Epilog. de Militia Turcica p. 697) Marigni proves that the effective armies of the Turks are much less numerous than they appear. In the army that besieged Constantinople, Leonardus Chiensis reckons no more than 15,000 janizaries.

who dares not expose his life in the defence of his children and his property has lost in society the first and most active energies of nature By the emperor's command, a particular inquiry had been made through the streets and houses, how many of the citizens, or even of the monks, were able and willing to bear arms for their country The lists were intrusted to Phranza,<sup>h</sup> and, after a diligent addition, he informed his master, with grief and surprise, that the national defence was reduced to four thousand nine hundred and seventy Romans Between Constantine and his faithful minister, this comfortless secret was preserved, and a sufficient proportion of shields, cross-bows, and muskets, was distributed from the arsenal to the city bands They derived some accession from a body of two thousand strangers, under the command of John Justiniani, a noble Genoese, a liberal donative was advanced to these auxiliaries, and a princely recompence, the isle of Lemnos, was promised to the valour and victory of their chief A strong chain was drawn across the mouth of the harbour it was supported by some Greek and Italian vessels of war and merchandise, and the ships of every christian nation, that successively arrived from Candia and the Black sea, were detained for the public service Against the powers of the Ottoman empire, a city of the extent of thirteen, perhaps of sixteen, miles was defended by a scanty garrison of seven or eight thousand soldiers Europe and Asia were open to the besiegers, but the strength and provisions of the Greeks must sustain a daily decrease, nor could they indulge the expectation of any foreign succour or supply

<sup>False union of the two empires, A D 1452. Dec 12</sup> The primitive Romans would have drawn their swords in the resolution of death or conquest The primitive christians might have embraced each other, and awaited in patience and charity the stroke of martyrdom But the Greeks of Constantinople were animated only by the spirit of religion, and that spirit was productive only of animosity and discord Before his death, the emperor John Palæologus had renounced the unpopular measure of an union with the Latins, nor was the idea revived, till the distress of his brother Constantine imposed a last trial of flattery and dissimulation<sup>i</sup> With the demand of temporal aid, his ambassadors were instructed to mingle the assurance of spiritual obedience his neglect of the church was excused by the ardent cares of the state, and his orthodox wishes solicited the presence of a Roman legate The Vatican had been too often deluded, yet the signs of repentance could not decently be overlooked, a legate was more easily granted than an army, and about six months before

<sup>h</sup> Ego eidem (Imp) tabellas exhibui non absque dolore et molestia minisque apud nos duos aliis oculis numerus (Phranza, l iii c 8) With some indulgence for national prejudices, we cannot desire a more authentic witness, not only of public facts, but of private counsels.

<sup>i</sup> In Spoudanus the narrative of the union is not only partial, but imperfect The bishop of Pamiers died in 1642, and the history of Ducas, which represents these scenes (c 36, 37) with such truth and spirit was not printed till the year 1649

<sup>k</sup> Phranza, one of the conforming Greeks, acknowledges that the measure was adopted only propter spem auxilii, he affirms with the final destruction, the cardinal Isidore of Russia appeared in that character with a retinue of priests and soldiers The emperor saluted him as a friend and father, respectfully listened to his public and private sermons, and with the most obsequious of the clergy and laymen subscribed the act of union, as it had been ratified in the council of Florence On the twelfth of December, the two nations, in the church of St Sophia, joined in the communion of sacrifice and prayer, and the names of the two pontiffs were solemnly commemorated, the names of Nicholas the fifth, the vicar of Christ, and of the patriarch Gregory who had been driven into exile by a rebellious people

But the dress and language of the Latin priest who officiated at the altar, <sup>Obstinacy and fanaticism of the Greeks</sup> were an object of scandal, and it was observed with horror, that he consecrated a cake or wafer of unleavened bread, and poured cold water into the cup of the sacrament A national historian acknowledges with a blush, that none of his countrymen, not the emperor himself, were sincere, in this occasional conformity<sup>k</sup> Their hasty and unconditional submission was palliated by a promise of future revisal, but the best, or the worst, of their excuses was the confession of their perjury When they were pressed by the reproaches of their honest brethren, "Have patience," they whispered, "have patience till God shall have delivered the city from the great dragon who seeks to devour us You shall then perceive whether we are truly reconciled with the Azymites" But patience is not the attribute of zeal, nor can the arts of a court be adapted to the freedom and violence of popular enthusiasm From the dome of St Sophia, the inhabitants of either sex, and of every degree, rushed in crowds to the cell of the monk Gennadius,<sup>l</sup> to consult the oracle of the church The holy man was invisible, entranced, as it should seem, in deep meditation, or divine rapture but he had exposed on the door of his cell a speaking tablet, and they successively withdrew, after reading these tremendous words "O miserable Romans, why will ye abandon the truth, and why, instead of confiding in God, will ye put your trust in the Italians? In losing your faith, you will lose your city Have mercy on me, O Lord! I protest in thy presence, that I am innocent of the crime O miserable Romans, consider, pause, and repent At the same moment that you renounce the religion of your fathers, by embracing impiety, you submit to a foreign servitude" According to the advice of Gennadius, the religious virgins, as pure as angels, and as proud as dæmons, rejected the act of union, and abjured all communion with the present and future associates of the Latins, and their pleasure, that those who refused to perform their devotions in St Sophia, extra culpam et in pace essent, (l iii c 20)

<sup>l</sup> His primitive and secular name was George Scholarius, which he changed for that of Gennadius, either when he became a monk or a patriarch His defence, at Florence, of the same union which he so furiously attacked at Constantinople, has tempted Leo Allatius (Diatribæ de Georgio, in Fabric Bibliot Græc tom x p 769—786) to divide him into two men but Renaudot (p 343—383) has restored the identity of his person and the duplicity of his character

example was applauded and imitated by the greatest part of the clergy and people. From the monastery, the devout Greeks dispersed themselves in the taverns, drank confusion to the slaves of the pope, emptied their glasses in honour of the image of the holy Virgin, and besought her to defend against Mahomet the city which she had formerly saved from Choros and the Chagan. In the double intoxication of zeal and wine, they valiantly exclaimed, "What occasion have we for succour, or union, or Latins? far from us be the worship of the Azymites!" During the winter that preceded the Turkish conquest, the nation was distracted by this epidemical frenzy, and the season of Lent, the approach of Easter, instead of breathing charity and love, served only to fortify the obstinacy and influence of the zealots. The confessors scrutinized and alarmed the conscience of their votaries, and a rigorous penance was imposed on those, who had received the communion from a priest, who had given an express or tacit consent to the union. His service at the altar propagated the infection to the mute and simple spectators of the ceremony: they forfeited, by the impure spectacle, the virtue of the sacerdotal character, nor was it lawful, even in danger of sudden death, to invoke the assistance of their prayers or absolution. No sooner had the church of St Sophia been polluted by the Latin sacrifice, than it was deserted as a Jewish synagogue, or an heathen temple, by the clergy and people: and a vast and gloomy silence prevailed in that venerable dome, which had so often smoked with a cloud of incense, blazed with innumerable lights, and resounded with the voice of prayer and thanksgiving. The Latins were the most odious of heretics and infidels, and the first minister of the empire, the great duke, was heard to declare, that he had rather behold in Constantinople the turban of Mahomet, than the pope's tiara or a cardinal's hat.<sup>m</sup> A sentiment so unworthy of christians and patriots, was familiar and fatal to the Greeks: the emperor was deprived of the affection and support of his subjects, and their native cowardice was sanctified by resignation to the divine decree, or the visionary hope of a miraculous deliverance.

Of the triangle which composes the figure of Constantinople, the two sides along the sea were made inaccessible to an enemy, the Propontis by nature, and the harbour by art. Between the two waters, the basis of the triangle, the land side was protected by a double wall, and a deep ditch of the depth of one hundred feet. Against this line of fortification, which Piranza, an eye-witness, prolongs to the measure of six miles,<sup>n</sup> the Ottomans directed their principal attack, and the emperor, after distributing the service and command of the most perilous stations, undertook the defence of the external wall. In the first days of the siege, the Greek soldiers descended into the ditch, or sallied into the field, but they soon discovered, that, in the proportion of their numbers, one christian was of more value than twenty Turks: and, after these bold preludes, they were prudently content to maintain the rampart with their missile weapons. Nor should this prudence be accused of pusillanimity. The nation was indeed pusillanimous and base, but the last Constantine deserves the name of an hero, his noble band of volunteers was inspired with Roman virtue, and the foreign auxiliaries supported the honour of the western chivalry. The incessant volleys of lances and arrows were accompanied with the smoke, the sound, and the fire, of musketry and cannon. Their small arms discharged at the same time either five, or even ten, balls of lead, of the size of a walnut, and, according to the closeness of the ranks and the force of the powder, several breast-plates and bodies were transpierced by the same shot. But the Turkish approaches were soon sunk in trenches, or covered with ruins. Each day added to the science of the christians, but their inadequate stock of gunpowder was wasted in the operations of each day. Their ordnance was not powerful, either in size or number, and if they possessed some heavy cannon, they feared to plant them on the walls, lest the aged structure should be shaken and overthrown by the explosion.<sup>o</sup> The same destructive secret had been revealed to the Moslems, by whom it was employed with the superior energy of zeal, riches, and despotism. The great cannon of Mahomet has been separately noticed, an important and visible object in the history of the times: but that enormous engine was flanked by two fellows almost of equal magnitude.<sup>p</sup> The long order of the Turkish artillery was pointed against the walls, fourteen batteries thundered at once on the most accessible places, and of one of these it is ambiguously expressed, that it was mounted with one hundred and thirty guns, or that it discharged one hundred and thirty bullets. Yet, in the power and activity of the sultan, we may discern the infancy of the new science. Under a master who counted the moments, the great cannon could be loaded and fired no more than seven times in one day.<sup>q</sup> The heated metal unfortunately burst, several workmen were destroyed, and the skill of an artist was admired who bethought himself of preventing the danger and accident, by pouring oil, after each explosion, into the mouth of the cannon.

The first random shots were productive of more sound than effect, and it

Attack and defence

<sup>m</sup> ἡ βασιλικὴ καλὴ πύλη, may be fairly translated a cardinal's hat. The difference of the Greek and Latin habits imbibed the schism.

<sup>n</sup> We are obliged to reduce the Greek miles to the smallest measure which is preserved in the works of Russia, 547 French fathoms and of 1042 to a degree. The six miles of Piranza do not exceed four English miles. (D'Auvill. Mémoires Historiques p. 61, 123 &c.)

<sup>o</sup> At twelve doctores nostri facti paravere contra hostes machinamenta quæ iam avaræ dahantur. Pulvis erat citri modica exigua. Ista modica, bombardæ si aderant incommoditate loci primum hostes offendere macterebus alveisque tectos non puterant.

<sup>p</sup> Nam si quæ magnæ erant ne murus cœheretur nosse, quiescebant. This passage of Leonardus Chilensis is curious and important.

<sup>q</sup> According to Chalcondyles and Piranza, the great cannon burst, an accident which, according to Ducas was prevented by the artist's skill. It is evident that they do not speak of the same gun.

<sup>r</sup> Near a hundred years after the siege of Constantinople the French and English fleets in the Channel were proud of firing 300 shot in an engagement of two hours. (Mémoires de Marlin du Bellay, l. x. in the Collection Generale, tom. xxi. p. 239.)

tered by the most trifling presents, which they received either as marks of distinction, or as the instruments of luxury. In civil dissensions, the weaker faction endeavoured to strengthen its interest by entering into secret connexions with the governors of the frontier provinces. Every quarrel among the Germans was fomented by the intrigues of Rome, and every plan of union and public good was defeated by the stronger bias of private jealousy and interest.<sup>m</sup>

Transient union against Marcus Antoninus

The general conspiracy which terrified the Romans under the reign of Marcus Antoninus, comprehended almost all the nations of Germany, and even Sarmatia, from the mouth of the Rhine to that of the Danube.<sup>n</sup> It is impossible for us to determine whether this hasty confederation was formed by necessity, by reason, or by passion, but we may rest assured, that the barbarians were neither allured by the indolence, or provoked by the ambition, of the Roman monarch. This dangerous invasion required all the firmness and vigilance of Marcus. He fixed generals of ability in the several stations of attack, and assumed in person the conduct of the most important province on the Upper Danube. After a long and doubtful conflict, the spirit of the barbarians was subdued. The Quadi and the Marcomanni,<sup>o</sup> who had taken the lead in the war, were the most severely punished in its catastrophe. They were commanded to retire five miles<sup>p</sup> from their own banks of the Danube, and to deliver up the flower of the youth, who were immediately sent into Britain, a remote island, where they might be secure as hostages, and useful as soldiers.<sup>q</sup> On the frequent rebellions of the Quadi and Marcomanni, the irritated emperor resolved to reduce their country into the form of a province. His designs were disappointed by death. This formidable league, however, the only one that appears in the two first centuries of the imperial history, was entirely dissipated, without leaving any traces behind in Germany.

Distinction of the German tribes

In the course of this introductory chapter, we have confined ourselves to the general outlines of the manners of Germany, without attempting to describe or to distinguish the various tribes which filled that great country in the time of Cæsar, of Tacitus, or of Ptolemy. As the ancient, or as new tribes, successively present themselves in the series of this history, we shall concisely mention their origin, their situation, and their particular character. Modern nations are fixed and permanent societies, connected among themselves by laws and government, bound to their native soil by arts and agriculture. The German tribes were

<sup>m</sup> Many traces of this policy may be discovered in Tacitus and Dion, and many more may be inferred from the principles of human nature.
<sup>n</sup> Hist. August. p. 31. Ammian. Marcellin. l. xxvi. c. 5. Aurel. Victor. The emperor Marcus was reduced to sell the rich furniture of the palace and to enlist slaves and robbers.
<sup>o</sup> The Marcomanni a colony, who, from the banks of the Rhine, occupied Bohemia and Moravia had once erected a great and formidable monarchy under their king, Maroboduus. See Strabo, l. iii. Vell. P. ii. 105. Tacit. Annal. ii. 63.
<sup>p</sup> Mr. Wotton (Hist. of Rome p. 166) increases the prohibition

voluntary and fluctuating associations of soldiers, almost of savages. The same territory often changed its inhabitants in the tide of conquest and emigration. The same communities, uniting in a plan of defence or invasion, bestowed a new title on their new confederacy. The dissolution of an ancient confederacy restored to the independent tribes then peculiar but long-forgotten appellation. A victorious state often communicated its own name to a vanquished people. Sometimes crowds of volunteers flocked from all parts to the standard of a favourite leader, his camp became their country, and some circumstances of the enterprise soon gave a common denomination to the mixed multitude. The distinctions of the ferocious invaders were perpetually varied by themselves, and confounded by the astonished subjects of the Roman empire.<sup>r</sup>

Wars, and the administration of public affairs, are the principal subjects of history, but the number of persons interested in these busy scenes, is very different, according to the different conditions of mankind. In great monarchies, millions of obedient subjects pursue their useful occupations in peace and obscurity. The attention of the writer, as well as of the reader, is solely confined to a court, a capital, a regular army, and the districts which happen to be the occasional scene of military operations. But a state of freedom and barbarism, the season of civil commotions, or the situation of petty republics,<sup>s</sup> raises almost every member of the community into action, and consequently into notice. The irregular divisions and the restless motions of the people of Germany, dazzle our imagination, and seem to multiply their numbers. The profuse enumeration of kings and warriors, of armies and nations, inclines us to forget that the same objects are continually repeated under a variety of appellations, and that the most splendid appellations have been frequently lavished on the most inconsiderable objects.

CHAP X

The emperors Decius, Gallus, Emilianus, Valerian, and Gallienus—The general irruption of the barbarians—The thirty tyrants

FROM the great secular games celebrated by Philip, to the death of the emperor Gallienus, there elapsed twenty years of shame and misfortune. During that calamitous period, every instant of time was marked, every province of the Roman world was afflicted, by barbarous invaders and military tyrants, and the

The nature of the subject,
A D 248—268

to ten times the distance. His reasoning is specious but not conclusive. Five miles were sufficient for a fortified barrier.
<sup>q</sup> Dion, l. lxxi. and lxxii.

<sup>r</sup> See an excellent dissertation on the origin and migrations of nations in the Memoires de l'Academie des Inscriptions, tom. xviii. p. 48—71. It is seldom that the antiquarian and the philosopher are so happily blended.

<sup>s</sup> Should we suspect that Athens contained only 21,000 citizens, and Sparta no more than 39,000? See Hume and Warburton on the number of mankind in ancient and modern times.

was by the advice of a christian, that the engineers were taught to level their aim against the two opposite sides of the salient angles of a bastion. However imperfect, the weight and repetition of the fire made some impression on the walls, and the Turks, pushing their approaches to the edge of the ditch, attempted to fill the enormous chasm, and to build a road to the assault. Innumerable fascines, and hogsheads, and trunks of trees, were heaped on each other, and such was the impetuosity of the throng, that the foremost and the weakest were pushed headlong down the precipice, and instantly burned under the accumulated mass. To fill the ditch, was the toil of the besiegers, to clear away the rubbish, was the safety of the besieged, and, after a long and bloody conflict, the web that had been woven in the day was still unravelled in the night. The next resource of Mahomet was the practice of mines, but the soil was rocky, in every attempt he was stopped and undermined by the christian engineers, nor had the art been yet invented of replenishing those subterraneous passages with gunpowder, and blowing whole towers and cities into the air. A circumstance that distinguishes the siege of Constantinople, is the re-union of the ancient and modern artillery. The cannon were intermingled with the mechanical engines for casting stones and darts, the bullet and the battering-ram were directed against the same walls, nor had the discovery of gunpowder superseded the use of the liquid and unextinguishable fire. A wooden turret of the largest size was advanced on rollers, this portable magazine of ammunition and fascines was protected by a threefold covering of bulls' hides, incessant volleys were securely discharged from the loop-holes, in the front, three doors were contrived for the alternate sally and retreat of the soldiers and workmen. They ascended by a stair-case to the upper platform, and, as high as the level of that platform, a scaling-ladder could be raised by pulleys to form a bridge, and grapple with the adverse rampart. By these various arts of annoyance, some as new as they were pernicious to the Greeks, the tower of St Romanus was at length overturned, after a severe struggle the Turks were repulsed from the breach, and interrupted by darkness, but they trusted, that with the return of light they should renew the attack with fresh vigour and decisive success. Of this pause of action, this interval of hope, each moment was improved by the activity of the emperor and Justinian, who passed the night on the spot, and urged the labours which involved the safety of the church and city. At the dawn of day, the impatient sultan perceived, with astonishment and grief, that his wooden turret had been reduced to ashes the ditch was cleared and restored, and the tower of St Romanus was again strong and entire. He deplored the failure of his design, and uttered a profane exclamation, that the word of the thirty-seven thousand prophets should not have compelled him to believe that such a work, in so short a time, could have been accomplished by the infidels.

The generosity of the christian princes was cold and tardy, but in <sup>Succour and victory of four ships</sup> the first apprehension of a siege, Constantine had negotiated, in the isles of the Archipelago, the Morca, and Sicily, the most indispensable supplies. As early as the beginning of April, five great ships, equipped for merchandize and war, would have sailed from the harbour of Chios, had not the wind blown obstinately from the north. One of these ships bore the imperial flag, the remaining four belonged to the Genoese, and they were laden with wheat and barley, with wine, oil, and vegetables, and, above all, with soldiers and mariners, for the service of the capital. After a tedious delay, a gentle breeze, and on the second day, a strong gale from the south, carried them through the Hellespont and the Propontis but the city was already invested by sea and land, and the Turkish fleet, at the entrance of the Bosphorus, was stretched from shore to shore, in the form of a crescent, to intercept, or at least to repel, these bold auxiliaries. The reader who has present to his mind the geographical picture of Constantinople, will conceive and admire the greatness of the spectacle. The five christian ships continued to advance with joyful shouts, and a full press both of sails and oars, against an hostile fleet of three hundred vessels, and the rampart, the camp, the coasts of Europe and Asia, were lined with innumerable spectators, who anxiously awaited the event of this momentous succour. At the first view that event could not appear doubtful; the superiority of the Moslems was beyond all measure or account, and in a calm, their numbers and valour must inevitably have prevailed. But their hasty and imperfect navy had been created, not by the genius of the people, but by the will of the sultan in the height of their prosperity, the Turks have acknowledged, that if God had given them the earth, he had left the sea to the infidels,* and a series of defeats, a rapid progress of decay, has established the truth of their modest confession. Except eighteen galleys of some force, the rest of their fleet consisted of open boats, rudely constructed and awkwardly managed, crowded with troops and destitute of cannon,

* I have selected some curious facts, without striving to emulate the bloody and obtrusive eloquence of the Abbé de Vertot, in his prolix descriptions of the sieges of Rhodes, Malta, &c. But that agreeable historian had a turn for romance, and as he wrote to please the order, he has adopted the same spirit of enthusiasm and chivalry.

* The first theory of mines with gunpowder appears in 1450, in a MS of George of Sienna (Tiribocchi, tom vi p 1 p 324). They were first practised at Sarzanella, in 1487, but the honour and improvement in 1503 is ascribed to Peler of Navarre, who used them with success in the wars of Italy (Hist. del' Ligue de Cambray, tom ii p 97-98).

* It is singular that the Greeks should not agree in the number of these illustrious vessels, the five of Ducas, the four of Phranza and Leonardus, and the two of Chalcondyles must be extended to the smaller, or confined to the larger size. Voltaire, in giving one of these ships to Frederic III confounds the emperor of the east and west.

* In bold defiance, or rather in gross ignorance, of language and geography, the president Cousin detains them at Chios with a south, and waits them to Constantinople with a north wind.

* The perpetual decay and weakness of the Turkish navy may be observed in Rycart, (State of the Ottoman Empire, p 372-378). Thevenot (Voyages p 1 p 229-242) and Tott, (Mémoires, tom iii) the last of whom is always solicitous to amuse and amaze his reader.

and since courage arises in a great measure from the consciousness of strength, the bravest of the janizaries might tremble on a new element. In the christian squadron, five stout and lofty ships were guided by skilful pilots, and manned with the veterans of Italy and Greece, long practised in the arts and perils of the sea. Their weight was directed to sink or scatter the weak obstacles that impeded their passage, their artillery swept the waters, their liquid fire was poured on the heads of their adversaries, who, with the design of boarding, presumed to approach them, and the winds and waves are always on the side of the ablest navigators. In this conflict, the imperial vessel, which had been almost overpowered, was rescued by the Genoese; but the Turks, in a distant and closer attack, were twice repulsed with considerable loss. Mahomet himself sat on horseback on the beach, to encourage their valour by his voice and presence, by the promise of reward, and by fear, more potent than the fear of the enemy. The passions of his soul, and even the gestures of his body,<sup>1</sup> seemed to imitate the actions of the combatants, and, as if he had been the lord of nature, he spurred his horse with a fearless and impotent effort into the sea. His loud reproaches, and the clamours of the camp, urged the Ottomans to a third attack, more fatal and bloody than the two former, and I must repeat, though I cannot credit, the evidence of Phranza, who affirms, from their own mouth, that they lost above twelve thousand men in the slaughter of the day. They fled in disorder to the shores of Europe and Asia, while the christian squadron, triumphant and unhurt, steered along the Bosphorus, and securely anchored within the chain of the harbour. In the confidence of victory, they boasted that the whole Turkish power must have yielded to their arms, but the admiral, or captain bashaw, found some consolation for a painful wound in his eye, by representing that accident as the cause of his defeat. Baltba Ogh was a renegade of the race of the Bulgarian princes; his military character was tainted with the unpopular vice of avarice, and under the despotism of the prince or people, misfortune is a sufficient evidence of guilt. His rank and services were annihilated by the displeasure of Mahomet. In the royal presence, the captain bashaw was extended on the ground by four slaves, and received one hundred strokes with a golden rod;<sup>2</sup> his death had been pronounced, and he adored the clemency of the sultan, who was satisfied with the milder punishment of confiscation and exile. The introduction of this supply revived the hopes of the Greeks and accused the supineness of their western allies. Amidst the deserts of Anatolia and the rocks of Palestine, the millions of the crusades had buried themselves in a voluntary and inevitable grave, but the situation of the imperial city was strong against her enemies, and accessible to her friends, and a rational and moderate armament of the maritime states might have saved the relics of the Roman name, and maintained a christian fortress in the heart of the Ottoman empire. Yet this was the sole and feeble attempt for the deliverance of Constantinople, the more distant powers were insensible of its danger, and the ambassador of Hungary, or at least of Huniades, resided in the Turkish camp, to remove the fears, and to direct the operations, of the sultan.<sup>3</sup>

It was difficult for the Greeks to penetrate the secret of the divan, yet the Greeks are persuaded, that a resistance, so obstinate and surprising, had fatigued the perseverance of Mahomet. He began to meditate a retreat, and the siege would have been speedily raised, if the ambition and jealousy of the second vizir had not opposed the perfidious advice of Calil Bashaw, who still maintained a secret correspondence with the Byzantine court. The reduction of the city appeared to be hopeless, unless a double attack could be made from the harbour as well as from the land; but the harbour was inaccessible, an impenetrable chain was now defended by eight large ships, more than twenty of a smaller size, with several galleys and sloops, and, instead of forcing this barrier, the Turks might apprehend a naval sally, and a second encounter in the open sea. In this perplexity, the genius of Mahomet conceived and executed a plan of a bold and marvellous east, of transporting by land his lighter vessels and military stores from the Bosphorus into the higher part of the harbour. The distance is about ten miles, the ground is uneven, and was overspread with thickets, and, as the road must be opened behind the suburb of Galata, their free passage or total destruction must depend on the option of the Genoese. But these selfish merchants were ambitious of the favour of being the last devoured, and the deficiency of art was supplied by the strength of obedient myriads. A level way was covered with a broad platform of strong and solid planks, and to render them more slippery and smooth, they were anointed with the fat of sheep and oxen. Four score light galleys and brigantines of fifty and thirty oars, were disembarked on the Bosphorus shore, arranged successively on rollers, and drawn forwards by the power of men and pulleys. Two guides or pilots were stationed at the helm, and the prow, of each vessel, the sails were unfurled to the winds, and the labour was cheered by song and acclamation. In the course of a single night, this Turkish fleet painfully climbed the hill, steered over the plain, and was launched from the declivity into the shallow waters of the harbour, far

Mahomet transports his navy over land

<sup>1</sup> I must confess, that I have before my eyes the living picture which Thueydidēs (I. vii. c. 71) has drawn of the passions and gestures of the Athenians in a naval engagement in the great harbour of Syracuse.
<sup>2</sup> According to the exaggeration or corrupt text of Ducas (c. 38) this golden bar was of the enormous and incredible weight of 500 livres or pounds. Bouilland's reading of 500 drachms, or five pounds, is sufficient to exercise the arm of Mahomet, and bruise the back of his admiral.

<sup>3</sup> A Ducas, who confesses himself ill informed of the affairs of Hungary, assigns a motive of superstition, a false belief that Constantinople would be the term of the Turkish conquests. See Phranza (I. iii. c. 20) and Spondanus.

above the molestation of the deeper vessels of the Greeks. The real importance of this operation was magnified by the consternation and confidence which it inspired, but the notorious, unquestionable fact was displayed before the eyes, and is recorded by the pens, of the two nations.<sup>b</sup> A similar stratagem had been repeatedly practised by the ancients;<sup>c</sup> the Ottoman galleys (I must again repeat) should be considered as large boats, and, if we compare the magnitude and the distance, the obstacles and the means, the boasted miracle<sup>d</sup> has perhaps been equalled by the industry of our own times.<sup>e</sup> As soon as Mahomet had occupied the upper harbour with a fleet and army, he constructed, in the narrowest part, a bridge, or rather mole, of fifty cubits in breadth, and one hundred in length. It was formed of casks and hogsheads, joined with rafters, linked with iron, and covered with a solid floor. On this floating battery, he planted one of his largest cannon, while the fourscore galleys, with troops and scaling-ladders, approached the most accessible side, which had formerly been stormed by the Latin conquerors. The indolence of the christians has been accused for not destroying these unfinished works, but their fire, by a superior fire, was controlled and silenced, nor were they wanting in a nocturnal attempt to burn the vessels as well as the bridge of the sultan. His vigilance prevented their approach, their foremost gallies were sunk or taken, forty youths, the bravest of Italy and Greece, were inhumanly massacred at his command, nor could the emperor's grief be assuaged by the just though cruel retaliation, of exposing from the walls the heads of two hundred and sixty mussulman cap-

Distress of the city After a siege of forty days, the fate of Constantinople could no longer be averted. The diminutive garrison was exhausted by a double attack. The fortifications, which had stood for ages against hostile violence, were dismantled on all sides by the Ottoman cannon. Many breaches were opened, and near the gate of St. Romanus, four towers had been levelled with the ground. For the payment of his feeble and mutinous troops, Constantine was compelled to despoil the churches with the promise of a fourfold restitution, and his sacrilege offered a new reproach to the enemies of the union. A spirit of discord impaired the remnant of the christian strength. The Genoese and Venetian auxiliaries asserted the pre-eminence of their respective service, and Justinian and the great duke, whose ambition was not extinguished by the common danger, accused each other of treachery and cowardice.

During the siege of Constantinople, the words of peace and capitulation had been sometimes pronounced, and several embassies had passed between the camp and the city.<sup>f</sup> The Greek emperor was humbled by adversity, and would have yielded to any terms compatible with religion and loyalty. The Turkish sultan was desirous of sparing the blood of his soldiers, still more desirous of securing for his own use the Byzantine treasures, and he accomplished a sacred duty in presenting to the gambours the choice of circumcision, of tribute, or of death. The avarice of Mahomet might have been satisfied with an annual sum of one hundred thousand ducats, but his ambition grasped the capital of the east. To the prince he offered a rich equivalent, to the people a free toleration, or a safe departure. But after some fruitless treaty, he declared his resolution of finding either a throne, or a grave, under the walls of Constantinople. A sense of honour, and the fear of universal reproach, forbade Palæologus to resign the city into the hands of the Ottomans, and he determined to abide the last extremities of war. Several days were employed by the sultan in the preparations for the assault, and a respite was granted by his favourite science of astrology, which had fixed on the twenty-ninth of May, as the fortunate and fatal hour. On the evening of the twenty-seventh, he issued his final orders, assembled in his presence the military chiefs, and dispersed his heralds through the camp to proclaim the duty, and the motives, of the perilous enterprise. Fear is the first principle of a despotic government, and his menaces were expressed in the oriental style, that the fugitives and deserters, had they the wings of a bird,<sup>g</sup> should not escape from his inexorable justice. The greatest part of his bashaws and janizaries were the offspring of christian parents, but the glories of the Turkish name were perpetuated by successive adoption, and in the gradual change of individuals, the spirit of a legion, a regiment, or an oda, is kept alive by imitation and discipline. In this holy warfare, the Moslems were exhorted to purify their minds with prayer, their bodies with seven ablutions, and to abstain from food till the close of the ensuing day. A crowd of dervishes visited the tents, to instil the desire of oriental figure. But in the tragedy of Irene, Mahomet's passion soars above sense and reason.

Preparations of the Turks for the general assault, May 26

Should the fierce north, upon his frozen wings,
Bear him aloft above the wondering clouds,
And seat him in the Pleiads' golden chariot—

Thence should my fury drag him down to tortures.

Besides the extravagance of the rant I must observe, 1 That the operation of the winds must be confined to the lower regions of the air. 2 That the name, etymology, and the fable, of the Pleiades are purely Greek, (Scholiast ad Homer 2 686 Eudocia in Ionia p 399 Apollodor 1 iii c 10 Heyne, p 229 Not. 682) and had no affinity to the astronomy of the east, (Hyde ad Ulugbeg, Tabul in Syntagma Dissert tom 1 p 40 42 Gogues Origine des Arts &c tom vi p 73—78 Gehelin, Hist du Calendrier, p 73) which Mahomet had studied. 3 The golden chariot does not exist either in science or fiction, but I much fear that Dr Johnson has confounded the Pleiades with the great bear or wagon, the zodiac with a northern constellation.

Ἀρκτον θ' ἦν καὶ ἀμαζαν ἐπικλησὶν καλεοῦσι

<sup>b</sup> The unanimous testimony of the four Greeks is confirmed by Canemir, (p 96) from the Turkish annals. But I could wish to contract the distance of ten miles, and to prolong the term of one night.

<sup>c</sup> Piranza relates two examples of a similar transportation over the six miles of the Isthmus of Corinth, the one fabulous of Augustus, after the battle of Actium, the other true of Nicetas, a Greek General in the tenth century. To these he might have added a bold enterprise of Hannibal, to introduce his vessels into the harbour of Tarentum (Polybius 1 viii p 749 edit Gronov).

<sup>d</sup> A Greek of Candia, who had served the Venetians in a similar undertaking, (Spoud A D 1433, No 37) might possibly be the adviser and agent of Mahomet.

<sup>e</sup> I particularly allude to our own embarkations on the lakes of Canada in the years 1776 and 1777, so great in the labour, so fruitless in the event.

<sup>f</sup> Chalcondyles and Ducas differ in the time and circumstances of the negotiation, and as it was neither glorious nor salutary, the faithful Piranza spurs his prince even to the thought of a surrender.

<sup>g</sup> These wings (Chalcondyles, 1 viii p 200) are no more than an

martyrdom, and the assurance of spending an immortal youth amidst the rivers and gardens of paradise, and in the embraces of the black-eyed virgins. Yet Mahomet principally trusted to the efficacy of temporal and visible rewards. A double pay was promised to the victorious troops, "The city and the buildings," said Mahomet, "are mine, but I resign to your valour the captives and the spoil, the treasures of gold and beauty, be rich and be happy. Many are the provinces of my empire, the intrepid soldier who first ascends the walls of Constantinople, shall be rewarded with the government of the fairest and most wealthy, and my gratitude shall accumulate his honours and fortunes above the measure of his own hopes." Such various and potent motives diffused among the Turks a general ardour, regardless of life and impatient for action. The camp re-echoed with the Moslem shouts of "God is God, there is but one God, and Mahomet is the apostle of God,"<sup>h</sup> and the sea and land, from Galata to the seven towers, were illuminated by the blaze of their nocturnal fires.

Far different was the state of the christians, who, with loud and impotent complaints, deplored the guilt, or the punishment, of their sins. The celestial image of the Virgin had been exposed in solemn procession, but their divine patroness was deaf to their entreaties, they accused the obstinacy of the emperor for refusing a timely surrender, anticipated the horrors of their fate, and sighed for the repose and security of Turkish servitude. The noblest of the Greeks, and the bravest of the allies, were summoned to the palace, to prepare them, on the evening of the twenty-eighth, for the duties and dangers of the general assault. The last speech of Palæologus was the funeral oration of the Roman empire.<sup>i</sup> He promised, he conjured, and he vainly attempted to infuse the hope which was extinguished in his own mind. In this world all was comfortless and gloomy, and neither the gospel nor the church have proposed any conspicuous recompence to the heroes who fall in the service of their country. But the example of their prince, and the confinement of a siege, had armed these warriors with the courage of despair, and the pathetic scene is described by the feelings of the historian Phranza, who was himself present at this mournful assembly. They wept, they embraced, regardless of their families and fortunes, they devoted their lives, and each commander, departing to his station, maintained all night a vigilant and anxious watch on the rampart. The emperor, and some faithful companions, entered the dome of St Sophia, which in a few hours was to be converted into a mosch, and devoutly received, with tears and prayers, the sacrament of the holy communion. He reposed some moments in the palace, which resounded with cries and lamentations solicited the pardon of all whom he might have injured,<sup>k</sup> and mounted on horseback to visit the guards, and explore the motions of the enemy. The distress and fall of the last Constantine are more glorious than the long prosperity of the Byzantine Cæsars.

In the confusion of darkness an as-<sup>The general assault, May 29</sup> sailant may sometimes succeed, but in this great and general attack, the military judgment and astrological knowledge of Mahomet advised him to expect the morning, the memorable twenty-ninth of May, in the fourteen hundred and fifty-third year of the christian æra. The preceding night had been strenuously employed the troops, the cannon, and the fascines, were advanced to the edge of the ditch, which in many parts presented a smooth and level passage to the breach, and his fourscore galleys almost touched, with the prows and their scaling ladders, the less defensible walls of the harbour. Under pain of death, silence was enjoined but the physical laws of motion and sound are not obedient to discipline or fear, each individual might suppress his voice and measure his footsteps, but the march and labour of thousands must inevitably produce a strange confusion of dissonant clamours, which reached the ears of the watchmen of the towers. At day-break, without the customary signal of the morning gun, the Turks assaulted the city by sea and land, and the similitude of a twined or twisted thread has been applied to the closeness and continuity of their line of attack.<sup>l</sup> The foremost ranks consisted of the refuse of the host, a voluntary crowd who fought without order or command, of the feebleness of age or childhood, of peasants and vngnants, and of all who had joined the camp in the blind hope of plunder and martyrdom. The common impulse drove them onwards to the wall the most audacious to climb were instantly precipitated, and not a dart, not a bullet, of the christians was idly wasted on the accumulated throng. But their strength and ammunition were exhausted in this laborious defence the ditch was filled with the bodies of the slain, they supported the footsteps of their companions, and of this devoted vanguard, the death was more serviceable than the life. Under their respective bashaws and sanjaks, the troops of Anatolia and Romania were successively led to the charge their progress was various and doubtful, but, after a conflict of two hours, the Greeks still maintained, and improved, their advantage, and the voice of the emperor was heard, encouraging his soldiers to achieve, by a last effort, the deliverance of their country. In that fatal moment, the janizaries arose, fresh, vigorous, <sup>i</sup> I am afraid that this discourse was composed by Phranza himself and it smells so grossly of the sermon and the convent, that I almost doubt whether it was pronounced by Constantine. Leonardus assigns him another speech in which he addresses himself more respectfully to the Latin auxiliaries.

<sup>h</sup> Phranza quarrels with these Moslem acclamations, not for the name of God, but for that of the prophet the pious zeal of Voltire is excessive, and even ridiculous.

<sup>k</sup> This abasement, which devotion has sometimes extorted from dying princes is an improvement of the gospel doctrine of the forgiveness of injuries it is more easy to forgive 49 times, than to once ask pardon of an infernal.

<sup>l</sup> Besides the 10,000 guards, and the sailors and the marines, Du Cass numbers in this general assault 250,000 Turks, both horse and foot.

and invincible The sultan himself on horseback, with an iron mace in his hand, was the spectator and judge of their valour he was surrounded by ten thousand of his domestic troops, whom he reserved for the decisive occasions, and the tide of battle was directed and impelled by his voice and eye His numerous ministers of justice were posted behind the line, to urge, to restrain, and to punish and if danger was in the front, shame and inevitable death were in the rear, of the fugitives The cries of fear and of pain were drowned in the martial music of drums, trumpets, and atabals, and experience has proved, that the mechanical operation of sounds, by quickening the circulation of the blood and spirits, will act on the human machine more forcibly than the eloquence of reason and honour From the lines, the galleys, and the bridge, the Ottoman artillery thundered on all sides, and the camp and city, the Greeks and the Turks, were involved in a cloud of smoke, which could only be dispelled by the final deliverance or destruction of the Roman empire The single combats of the heroes of history or fable amuse our fancy and engage our affections, the skilful evolutions of war may inform the mind, and improve a necessary, though pernicious, science But in the uniform and odious pictures of a general assault, all is blood, and horror, and confusion, nor shall I strive, at the distance of three centuries and a thousand miles, to delineate a scene of which there could be no spectators, and of which the actors themselves were incapable of forming any just or adequate idea

The immediate loss of Constantinople may be ascribed to the bullet, or arrow, which pierced the gauntlet of John Justiniani The sight of his blood, and the exquisite pain, appalled the courage of the chief, whose arms and counsels were the firmest rampart of the city As he withdrew from his station in quest of a surgeon, his flight was perceived and stopped by the indefatigable emperor "Your wound," exclaimed Palæologus, "is slight, the danger is pressing, your presence is necessary, and whither will you retire?" "I will retire," said the trembling Genoese, "by the same road which God has opened to the Turks," and at these words he hastily passed through one of the breaches of the inner wall By this pusillanimous act, he stained the honours of a military life, and the few days which he survived in Galata, or the isle of Chios, were embittered by his own and the public reproach<sup>m</sup> His example was imitated by the greatest part of the Latin auxiliaries, and the defence began to slacken when the attack was pressed with redoubled vigour The number of the Ottomans was fifty, perhaps a hundred, times superior to that of the christians, the double walls were reduced by the cannon to a heap of ruins in a circuit of several miles, some places must be found more easy of access, or more feebly guarded, and if the besiegers could penetrate in a single point, the whole city was irrecoverably lost The first who deserved the sultan's reward was Hassan the janizary, of gigantic stature and strength With his scymitar in one hand and his buckler in the other, he ascended the outward fortification of the thirty janizaries, who were emulous of his valour, eighteen perished in the bold adventure Hassan and his twelve companions had reached the summit, the giant was precipitated from the rampart, he rose on one knee, and was again oppressed by a shower of darts and stones But his success had proved that the achievement was possible the walls and towers were instantly covered with a swarm of Turks, and the Greeks, now driven from the vantage ground, were overwhelmed by increasing multitudes Amidst these multitudes, the emperor,<sup>n</sup> who accomplished all the duties of a general and a soldier, was long seen, and finally lost The nobles, who fought round his person, sustained, till their last breath, the honourable names of Palæologus and Cantacuzene. his mournful exclamation was heard, "Cannot there be found a christian to cut off my head?"<sup>o</sup> and his last fear was that of falling alive into the hands of the infidels<sup>p</sup> The prudent despair of Constantine cast away the purple amidst the tumult he fell by an unknown hand, and his body was buried under a mountain of the slain After his death, resistance and order were no more the Greeks fled towards the city, and many were pressed and stifled in the narrow pass of the gate of St Romanus The victorious Turks rushed through the breaches of the inner wall, and as they advanced into the streets, they were soon joined by their brethren, who had forced the gate Phenar on the side of the harbour<sup>q</sup> In the first heat of the pursuit, about two thousand christians were put to the sword, but avarice soon prevailed over cruelty, and the victors acknowledged, that they should immediately have given quarter if the valour of the emperor and his chosen bands had not prepared them for a similar opposition in every part of the capital It was thus, after a siege of fifty-three days, that Constantinople, which had defied the power of Chosroes, the Chagan, and the caliphs, was irretrievably subdued by the arms of Mahomet the second Her Death of the emperor Constantine Palæologus.

Loss of the city and empire

<sup>m</sup> In the severe censure of the flight of Justiniani, Phranza expresses his own feelings and those of the public For some private reasons he is treated with more lenity and respect by Ducas but the words of Leonardus Chiensis express his strong and recent indignation, gloriam salutis sive obliu In the whole series of their eastern policy, his countrymen, the Genoese, were always suspected, and often guilty

<sup>n</sup> Ducas kills him with two blows of Turkish soldiers Chalcondyles wounds him in the shoulder, and then tramples him in the gate The grief of Phranza carrying him among the enemy, escapes from the precise image of his death, but we may, without flattery, apply these noble lines of Dryden

As in Sebastian, let them search the field,
And where they find a mountain of the slain,

Send one to climb, and looking down beneath,
There they will find him at his manly length,
With his face up to heaven in that red monument
Which his good sword had digged

<sup>o</sup> Spondanus, (A D 1453 No 10) who has hopes of his salvation, wishes to absolve his demand from the guilt of suicide

<sup>p</sup> Leonardus Chiensis very properly observes, that the Turks, had they known the emperor, would have laboured to save and secure a captive so acceptable to the sultan

<sup>q</sup> Cantemir, p 96 The christian ships in the mouth of the harbour had flanked and retarded this naval attack

empire only had been subverted by the Latins her religion was trampled in the dust by the Moslem conquerors *

The Turks enter and pillage Constantinople

The tidings of misfortune fly with a rapid wing, yet such was the extent of Constantinople, that the more distant quarters might prolong, some moments, the happy ignorance of their ruin *. But in the general consternation, in the feelings of selfish or social anxiety, in the tumult and thunder of the assault, a sleepless night and morning must have elapsed, nor can I believe that many Grecian ladies were awakened by the janizaries from a sound and tranquil slumber. On the assurance of the public calamity, the houses and convents were instantly deserted, and the trembling inhabitants flocked together in the streets, like a herd of timid animals, as if accumulated weakness could be productive of strength, or in the vain hope, that amid the crowd each individual might be safe and invisible. From every part of the capital, they flowed into the church of St Sophia in the space of an hour, the sanctuary, the choir, the nave, the upper and lower galleries, were filled with the multitude of fathers and husbands, of women and children, of priests, monks, and religious virgins the doors were barred on the inside, and they sought protection from the sacred dome, which they had so lately abhorred as a profane and polluted edifice. Their confidence was founded on the prophecy of an enthusiast or impostor, that one day the Turks should enter Constantinople, and pursue the Romans as far as the column of Constantine in the square before St Sophia but that this would be the term of their calamities that an angel would descend from heaven, with a sword in his hand, and would deliver the empire, with that celestial weapon, to a poor man seated at the foot of the column "Take this sword," would he say, "and avenge the people of the Lord" At these animating words, the Turks would instantly fly, and the victorious Romans would drive them from the west and from all Anatolia, as far as the frontiers of Persia. It is on this occasion, that Ducas, with some fancy and much truth, upbraids the discord and obstinacy of the Greeks "Had that angel appeared," exclaims the historian, "had he offered to exterminate your foes if you would consent to the union of the church, even then, in that fatal moment, you would have rejected your safety, or have deceived your God."

Captivity of the Greeks

While they expected the descent of the tardy angel, the doors were broken with axes, and as the Turks encountered no resistance, their bloodless hands were employed * Chalcondyles most absurdly supposes that Constantinople was sacked by the Asiatics in revenge for the ancient calumnies of Troy, and the grammarians of the fifteenth century are happy to melt down the uncouth appellation of Turks into the more classic name of Tæuri.

* When Cyrus surprised Babylon during the celebration of a festival, so vast was the city, and so careless were the inhabitants that much time elapsed before the distant quarters knew that they were captives. Herodotus, (l. i. c. 191) and Usher (Annal. p. 78) who has quoted from the prophet Jeremiah a passage of similar import.

* This lively description is extracted from Ducas (c. 39) who two years afterwards was sent ambassador from the prince of Lesbos to the sultan, (c. 44) Till Lesbos was subdued in 1463, (Phranza l. iii. c. 27)

in selecting and securing the multitude of their prisoners. Youth, beauty, and the appearance of wealth, attracted their choice, and the right of property was decided among themselves by a prior seizure, by personal strength, and by the authority of command. In the space of an hour, the male captives were bound with cords, the females with their veils and girdles. The senators were linked with their slaves, the prelates, with the porters, of the church, and young men of a plebeian class, with noble maids, whose faces had been invisible to the sun and their nearest kindred. In this common captivity, the ranks of society were confounded, the ties of nature were cut asunder, and the inexorable soldier was careless of the father's groans, the tears of the mother, and the lamentations of the children. The loudest in their wailings were the nuns, who were torn from the altar with naked bosoms, outstretched hands, and dishevelled hair, and we should piously believe that few could be tempted to prefer the vigils of the haram to those of the monastery. Of these unfortunate Greeks, of these domestic animals, whole strings were rudely driven through the streets, and as the conquerors were eager to return for more prey, their trembling pace was quickened with menaces and blows. At the same hour, a similar rapine was exercised in all the churches and monasteries, in all the palaces and habitations of the capital, nor could any palace, however sacred or sequestered, protect the persons or the property of the Greeks. Above sixty thousand of this devoted people were transported from the city to the camp and fleet, exchanged or sold according to the caprice or interest of their masters, and dispersed in remote servitude through the provinces of the Ottoman empire. Among these we may notice some remarkable characters. The historian Phranza, first chamberlain and principal secretary, was involved with his family in the common lot. After suffering four months the hardships of slavery, he recovered his freedom, in the ensuing winter he ventured to Adrianople, and ransomed his wife from the mu bashi or master of horse, but his two children, in the flower of youth and beauty, had been seized for the use of Mahomet himself. The daughter of Phranza died in the seraglio, perhaps a virgin, his son, in the fifteenth year of his age, preferred death to infamy, and was stabbed by the hand of the royal lover. A deed thus inhuman cannot surely be expiated by the taste and liberality with which he released a Grecian matron and her two daughters, on receiving a Latin ode from Philéphus, who had chosen a wife in that noble family *. The pride or cruelty of Ma-that island must have been full of the survivors of Constantinople, who delighted to repeat, perhaps to adorn the tale of their misery.

* See Phranza l. iii. c. 20, 21. His expressions are positive. Ameras sua manū jugularit volebat enim eo turpius et nefarie abuti. Me miserum et infelicem. Yet he could only learn from report the bloody or impure scenes that were acted in the dark recesses of the seraglio.

* See Tiraboschi (tom. vi. p. 1. p. 290) and Lancelot (Mem. de l'Académie des Inscriptions tom. x. p. 718). I should be curious to learn how he could praise the public enemy, whom he so often reviles as the most corrupt and inhuman of tyrants.

homet would have been most sensibly gratified by the capture of a Roman legate, but the dexterity of cardinal Isidore eluded the search, and he escaped from Galata in a plebeian habit.<sup>y</sup> The chain and entrance of the outward harbour was still occupied by the Italian ships of merchandise and war. They had signalized their valour in the siege, they embraced the moment of retreat, while the Turkish mariners were dissipated in the pillage of the city. When they hoisted sail, the beach was covered with a suppliant and lamentable crowd, but the means of transportation were scanty. The Venetians and Genoese selected their countrymen, and notwithstanding the fairest promises of the sultan, the inhabitants of Galata evacuated their houses, and embarked with their most precious effects.

In the fall and the sack of great cities, an historian is condemned to repeat the tale of uniform calamity: the same effects must be produced by the same passions, and when those passions may be indulged without control, small, alas! is the difference between civilized and savage man. Amidst the vague exclamations of bigotry and hatred, the Turks are not accused of a wanton or immoderate effusion of christian blood; but according to their maxims, (the maxims of antiquity,) the lives of the vanquished were forfeited, and the legitimate reward of the conqueror was derived from the service, the sale, or the ransom, of his captives of both sexes.<sup>z</sup> The wealth of Constantinople had been granted by the sultan to his victorious troops, and the rapine of an hour is more productive than the industry of years. But as no regular division was attempted of the spoil, the respective shares were not determined by merit, and the rewards of valour were stolen away by the followers of the camp, who had declined the toil and danger of the battle. The narrative of their depredations could not afford either amusement or instruction: the total amount, in the last poverty of the empire, has been valued at four millions of ducats,<sup>a</sup> and of this sum a small part was the property of the Venetians, the Genoese, the Florentines, and the merchants of Ancona. Of these foreigners, the stock was improved in quick and perpetual circulation; but the riches of the Greeks were displayed in the idle ostentation of palaces and wardrobes, or deeply buried in treasures of ingots and old coin, lest it should be demanded at their hands for the defence of their country. The profanation and plunder of the monasteries and churches, excited the most tragic complaints. The dome of St Sophia itself, the earthly heaven, the second firmament, the vehicle of the cherubim, the throne of the glory of God,<sup>b</sup> was despoiled of the oblations of ages, and the gold and silver, the pearls and jewels, the vases and sacerdotal ornaments, were most wickedly converted to the service of mankind. After the divine images had been stripped of all that could be valuable to a profane eye, the canvass, or the wood, was torn, or broken, or burnt, or trod under foot, or applied, in the stables or the kitchen, to the vilest uses. The example of sacrilege was imitated, however, from the Latin conquerors of Constantinople, and the treatment which Christ, the Virgin, and the saints, had sustained from the guilty catholic, might be inflicted by the zealous mussulman on the monuments of idolatry. Perhaps, instead of joining the public clamour, a philosopher will observe, that in the decline of the arts, the workmanship could not be more valuable than the work, and that a fresh supply of visions and miracles would speedily be renewed by the craft of the priest and the credulity of the people. He will more seriously deplore the loss of the Byzantine libraries, which were destroyed or scattered in the general confusion: one hundred and twenty thousand manuscripts are said to have disappeared,<sup>c</sup> ten volumes might be purchased for a single ducat, and the same ignominious price, too high perhaps for a shelf of theology, included the whole works of Aristotle and Homer, the noblest productions of the science and literature of ancient Greece. We may reflect with pleasure, that an inestimable portion of our classic treasures was safely deposited in Italy, and that the mechanics of a German town had invented an art which derides the havoc of time and barbarism.

From the first hour<sup>d</sup> of the memorable twenty-ninth of May, disorder and rapine prevailed in Constantinople, till the eighth hour of the same day, when the sultan himself passed in triumph through the gate of St Romanus. He was attended by his vizirs, bashaws, and guards, each of whom (says a Byzantine historian) was robust as Hercules, dexterous as Apollo, and equal in battle to any ten of the race of ordinary mortals. The conqueror<sup>e</sup> gazed with satisfaction and wonder on the strange though splendid appearance of the domes and palaces, so dissimilar from the style of oriental architecture. In the hippodrome, or atmeidan, his eye was attracted by the twisted column of the three serpents, and, as a trial of his strength, he shattered with his iron mace or battle-axe the under jaw of one of these monsters,<sup>f</sup> which in the eye of the Turks were the idols or talismans of the city. At the principal door visits the city.

Mahomet II
St Sophia the palace, &c

been dropt. Even with the restitution, the foreign property would scarcely exceed one fourth.

<sup>b</sup> See the enthusiastic praises and lamentations of Phranza l iii c 17.

<sup>c</sup> See Ducas (c 43) and an epistle, July 15th, 1453, from I. virus Quirinus to pope Nicholas V (Hody de Graecis, p 192 from a MS in the Cotton library.)

<sup>d</sup> The Julian calendar, which reckons the days and hours from mid night, was used at Constantinople. But Ducas seems to understand the natural hours from sun rise.

<sup>e</sup> See the Turkish Annals, p 329 and the Pandeets of Leunclavius, p 448.

<sup>f</sup> I have had occasion (p 238) to mention this curious relic of Grecian antiquity.

<sup>y</sup> The commentaries of Pius II suppose that he craftily placed his cardinal's hat on the head of a corpse which was cut off and exposed in triumph, while the legate himself was bought and delivered as a captive of no value. The great Belgic Chronicle adorns his escape with new adventures, which he suppressed (says Spondanus, A D 1453 No 15) in his own letters, lest he should lose the merit and reward of suffering for Christ.

<sup>z</sup> Bisbequius expatiates with pleasure and applause on the rights of war and the use of slavery, among the ancients and the Turks, (de Legat. Turcicis, epist iii p 161.)

<sup>a</sup> This sum is specified in a marginal note of Leunclavius, (Chalcondyles, l viii p 211) but in the distribution to Venice, Genoa, Florence, and Ancona, of 50, 20, 20, and 15,000 ducats, I suspect that a figure has

of St Sophia, he alighted from his horse, and entered the dome, and such was his jealous regard for that monument of his glory, that on observing a zealous mussulman in the act of breaking the marble pavement, he admonished him with his scymitar, that, if the spoil and captives were granted to the soldiers, the public and private buildings had been reserved for the prince. By his command the metropolis of the eastern church was transformed into a mosch: the rich and portable instruments of superstition had been removed, the crosses were thrown down, and the walls, which were covered with images and mosaics, were washed and purified, and restored to a state of naked simplicity. On the same day, or on the ensuing Friday, the muezzin, or crier, ascended the most lofty turret, and proclaimed the ezan, or public invitation in the name of God and his prophet, the imam preached, and Mahomet the second performed the namaz of prayer and thanksgiving on the great altar, where the christian mysteries had so lately been celebrated before the last of the Cæsars. From St Sophia he proceeded to the august, but desolate, mansion, of a hundred successors of the great Constantine, but which in a few hours had been stripped of the pomp of royalty. A melancholy reflection on the vicissitudes of human greatness forced itself on his mind, and he repeated an elegant distich of Persian poetry: "The spider has wove his web in the imperial palace, and the owl hath sung her watch-song on the towers of Afrasiab."<sup>a</sup>

His belief in our lo-
the Greeks

Yet his mind was not satisfied, nor did the victory seem complete, till he was informed of the fate of Constantine, whether he had escaped, or been made prisoner, or had fallen in the battle. Two janizaries claimed the honour and reward of his death: the body, under a heap of slain, was discovered by the golden eagles embroidered on his shoes; the Greeks acknowledged with tears the head of their late emperor, and, after exposing the bloody trophy, Mahomet bestowed on his rival the honours of a decent funeral. After his decease, Lucas Notaras, great duke,<sup>k</sup> and first minister of the empire, was the most important prisoner. When he offered his person and his treasures at the foot of the throne, "And why," said the indignant sultan, "did you not employ these treasures in the defence of your prince and country?" "They were yours," answered the slave, "God had reserved them for your hands." "If he reserved them for me," replied the despot, "how have you presumed to withhold them so long by a fruitless and fatal resistance?" The great duke alleged the obstinacy of the strangers, and some secret encouagement from the Turkish vizir, and from this perilous interview, he was at length dismissed with the assurance of pardon and protection. Mahomet condescended to visit his wife, a venerable princess oppressed with sickness and grief, and his consolation for her misfortunes was in the most tender strain of humanity and filial reverence. A similar clemency was extended to the principal officers of state, of whom several were ransomed at his expense, and during some days he declared himself the friend and father of the vanquished people. But the scene was soon changed, and before his departure, the hippodrome streamed with the blood of his noblest captives. His perfidious cruelty is execrated by the christians, they adorn with the colours of heroic martyrdom the execution of the great duke and his two sons, and his death is ascribed to the generous refusal of delivering his children to the tyrant's lust. Yet a Byzantine historian has dropt an unguarded word of conspiracy, deliverance, and Italian succour: such treason may be glorious, but the rebel who bravely ventures, has justly forfeited, his life, nor should we blame a conqueror for destroying the enemies whom he can no longer trust. On the eighteenth of June, the victorious sultan returned to Adrianople, and smiled at the base and hollow embassies of the christian princes, who viewed their approaching ruin in the fall of the eastern empire.

Constantinople had been left naked and desolate, without a prince or <sup>Here peoples and a adorns Constantinople</sup> people. But she could not be despoiled of the incomparable situation which marks her for the metropolis of a great empire, and the genius of the place will ever triumph over the accidents of time and fortune. Boursa and Adrianople, the ancient seats of the Ottomans, sunk into provincial towns, and Mahomet the second established his own residence, and that of his successors, on the same commanding spot which had been chosen by Constantine.<sup>1</sup> The fortifications of Galata, which might afford a shelter to the Latins, were prudently destroyed, but the damage of the Turkish cannon was soon repaired, and before the month of August, great quantities of lime had been burnt for the restoration of the walls of the capital. As the entire property of the soil and buildings, whether public or private, or profane or sacred, was now transferred to the conqueror, he first separated a space of eight furlongs from the point of the triangle for the establishment of his seraglio or palace. It is here, in the bosom of luxury, that the grand signior (as he has been emphatically named by the Italians) appears to reign over Europe and Asia, but his person on <sup>e</sup> We are obliged to Cantemir (p. 102) for the Turkish account of the conversion of St Sophia, so bitterly deplored by Phranza and Ducas. It is amusing enough to observe, in what opposite lights the same object appears to a mussulman and a christian eye.

<sup>h</sup> This distich, which Cantemir gives in the original, derives new beauties from the application. It was thus that Scipio repeated, in the sack of Carthage, the famous prophecy of Homer. The same generous feeling, carried the mind of the conqueror to the past or the future.

<sup>i</sup> I cannot believe with Ducas (see Spandanus A. D. 1453, No. 13) that Mahomet sent round Persia Arabia &c. the head of the Greek emperor: he would surely content himself with a trophy less inhuman.

<sup>k</sup> Phranza was the personal enemy of the great duke, nor could

lime, or death, or his own retreat to a monastery, excite a feeling of sympathy or forgiveness. Ducas is inclined to praise and pity the martyr, Chreondyles is neutral, but we are indebted to him for the hint of the Greek conspiracy.

<sup>1</sup> For the restitution of Constantinople and the Turkish foundations, see Cantemir (p. 102-109) Ducas (c. 42) with Thevenot, Tournefort, and the rest of our modern travellers. From a gigantic picture of the greatness, population &c. of Constantinople and the Ottoman empire (Abregé de l'Histoire Ottomane, tom. 1 p. 16-21) we may learn, that in the year 1586 the Mussulmans were less numerous in the capital than the christians, or even the Jews.

the shores of the Bosphorus may not always be secure from the insults of a hostile navy. In the new character of a mosque, the cathedral of St Sophia was endowed with an ample revenue, crowned with lofty minarets, and surrounded with groves and fountains, for the devotion and refreshment of the Moslems. The same model was imitated in the jami or royal mosques, and the first of these was built, by Mahomet himself, on the ruins of the church of the holy apostles, and the tombs of the Greek emperors. On the third day after the conquest, the grave of Abu Ayub, or Job, who had fallen in the first siege of the Arabs, was revealed in a vision, and it is before the sepulchre of the martyr, that the new sultans are girded with the sword of empire<sup>m</sup>. Constantinople no longer appertains to the Roman historian, nor shall I enumerate the civil and religious edifices that were profaned or erected by its Turkish masters: the population was speedily renewed, and before the end of September, five thousand families of Anatolia and Romania had obeyed the royal mandate, which enjoined them, under pain of death, to occupy their new habitations in the capital. The throne of Mahomet was guarded by the numbers and fidelity of his Moslem subjects, but his rational policy aspired to collect the remnant of the Greeks, and they returned in crowds, as soon as they were assured of their lives, their liberties, and the free exercise of their religion. In the election and investiture of a patriarch, the ceremonial of the Byzantine court was revived and imitated. With a mixture of satisfaction and horror, they beheld the sultan on his throne, who delivered into the hands of Gennadius the crosier or pastoral staff, the symbol of his ecclesiastical office, who conducted the patriarch to the gate of the seraglio, presented him with a horse richly caparisoned, and directed the vizirs and bashaws to lead him to the palace which had been allotted for his residence<sup>n</sup>. The churches of Constantinople were shared between the two religions: their limits were marked, and, till it was infringed by Selim, the grandson of Mahomet, the Greeks<sup>o</sup> enjoyed above sixty years the benefit of this equal partition. Encouraged by the ministers of the divan, who wished to elude the fanaticism of the sultan, the christian advocates presumed to allege that this division had been an act, not of generosity, but of justice, not a concession, but a compact, and that if one half of the city had been taken by storm, the other moiety had surrendered on the faith of a sacred capitulation. The original grant had indeed been consumed by fire, but the loss was supplied by the testimony of three aged janizaries who remembered the transaction, and their venal oaths are of more weight in the opinion of Cantemir, than the positive and unanimous consent of the history of the times<sup>p</sup>.

The remaining fragments of the <sup>Extinction of the imperial families of Comnenus and Palæologus</sup> Greek kingdom in Europe and Asia I shall abandon to the Turkish arms, but the final extinction of the two last dynasties<sup>q</sup> which have reigned in Constantinople, should terminate the decline and fall of the Roman empire in the east. The despots of the Morea, Demetrius and Thomas,<sup>r</sup> the two surviving brothers of the name of PALAEOLOGUS, were astonished by the death of the emperor Constantine, and the ruin of the monarchy. Hopeless of defence, they prepared, with the noble Greeks who adhered to their fortune, to seek a refuge in Italy, beyond the reach of the Ottoman thunder. Their first apprehensions were dispelled by the victorious sultan, who contented himself with a tribute of twelve thousand ducats, and while his ambition explored the continent and the islands in search of prey, he indulged the Morea in a respite of seven years. But this respite was a period of grief, discord, and misery. The heramilion, the rampart of the isthmus, so often raised and so often subverted, could not long be defended by three hundred Italian archers: the keys of Corinth were seized by the Turks, they returned from their summer excursions with a train of captives and spoil, and the complaints of the injured Greeks were heard with indifference and disdain. The Albanians, a vagrant tribe of shepherds and robbers, filled the peninsula with rapine and murder: the two despots implored the dangerous and humiliating aid of a neighbouring bashaw, and when he had quelled the revolt, his lessons inculcated the rule of their future conduct. Neither the ties of blood, nor the oaths which they repeatedly pledged in the communion and before the altar, nor the stronger pressure of necessity, could reconcile or suspend their domestic quarrels. They ravaged each other's patrimony with fire and sword, the alms and succours of the west were consumed in civil hostility, and their power was only exerted in savage and arbitrary executions. The distress and revenge of the weaker rival invoked their supreme

<sup>m</sup> The Turbe, or sepulchral monument of Abu Aynub, is described and engraved in the Tableau General de l'Empire Ottoman, (Paris, 1787 in large folio,) a work of less use, perhaps, than magnificence, (tom. i. p. 303, 306.)

<sup>n</sup> Phiranza (l. iii. c. 19) relates the ceremony, which has possibly been adorning in the Greek reports to each other and to the Latins. The fact is confirmed by Emmanuel Malaxus, who wrote, in vulgar Greek, the History of the Patriarchs after the taking of Constantinople, inserted in the Turco Græci of Crusius, (l. i. p. 106—181.) But the most patient reader will not believe that Mahomet adopted the catholic form. "Sancta Trinitas quæ nihil donavit imperium te in patriarcham novæ Romæ deligit."

<sup>o</sup> From the Turco Græci of Crusius, &c. Spondanus (A. D. 1453, No. 21 1458 No. 16) describes the slavery and domestic quarrels of the Greek church. The patriarch who succeeded Gennadius, threw himself in despair into a well.

<sup>p</sup> Cantemir, (p. 101—105) insists on the unanimous consent of the Turkish historians, ancient as well as modern, and argues, that they would not have violated the truth to diminish their national glory, since it is esteemed more honourable to take a city by force than by composition. But I doubt this consent since he quotes no particular historian and the Turkish Annals of Leunclavius affirm, without exception, that Mahomet took Constantinople per vim, (p. 329.) 2 The same argument may be turned in favour of the Greeks of the times, who would not have forgotten this honourable and salutary treaty Voltaire as usual, prefers the Turks to the christians.

<sup>q</sup> For the genealogy and fall of the Comneni of Trebizond, see Du Cange, (Arm. Byzant. p. 195) for the last Palæologus the same accurate antiquarian (p. 241 247, 248) The Palæologi of Montferriat were not extinct till the next century, but they had forgotten their Greek origin and kindred.

<sup>r</sup> In the worthless story of the disputes and misfortunes of the two brothers Phiranza (l. iii. c. 21—30) is too partial on the side of Thomas, Ducis (c. 44, 45) is too brief and Chalcondyles (l. vii. ix. x) too diffuse and digressive.

lord, and, in the season of maturity and revenge, Mahomet declared himself the friend of Demetrius, and marched into the Morea with an irresistible force. When he had taken possession of Sparta, "You are too weak," said the sultan, "to control this turbulent province. I will take your daughter to my bed, and you shall pass the remainder of your life in security and honour." Demetrius sighed and obeyed, surrendered his daughter and his castles, followed to Adrianople his sovereign and son, and received for his own maintenance, and that of his followers, a city in Thrace, and the adjacent isles of Imbros, Lemnos, and Samothrace. He was joined the next year by a companion of misfortune, the last of the COMNENIAN race, who, after the taking of Constantinople by the Latins, had founded a new empire on the coast of the Black sea. In the progress of his Anatolian conquests, Mahomet invested with a fleet and army the capital of David, who presumed to style himself emperor of Trebizond, and the negotiation was comprized in a short and peremptory question, "Will you secure your life and treasures by resigning your kingdom? or had you rather forfeit your kingdom, your treasures, and your life?" The feeble Comnenus was subdued by his own fears, and the example of a mussulman neighbour, the prince of Sinope,<sup>a</sup> who, on a similar summons, had yielded a fortified city with four hundred cannon and ten or twelve thousand soldiers. The capitulation of Trebizond, A D 1461, Trebizond was faithfully performed, and the emperor, with his family, was transported to a castle in Romania, but on a slight suspicion of corresponding with the Persian king, David, and the whole Comnenian race, were sacrificed to the jealousy or avarice of the conqueror. Nor could the name of father long protect the unfortunate Demetrius from exile and confiscation, his abject submission moved the pity and contempt of the sultan, his followers were transplanted to Constantinople, and his poverty was alleviated by a pension of fifty thousand aspers, till a monastic habit and a tardy death released Palæologus from an earthly master. It is not easy to pronounce whether the servitude of Demetrius, or the exile of his brother Thomas,<sup>b</sup> be the most inglorious. On the conquest of the Morea, the despot escaped to Corfu, and from thence to Italy, with some naked adherents his name, his sufferings, and the head of the apostle

St Andrew, entitled him to the hospitality of the Vatican, and his misery was prolonged by a pension of six thousand ducats from the pope and cardinals. His two sons, Andrew and Manuel, were educated in Italy, but the eldest, contemptible to his enemies and burthensome to his friends, was degraded by the baseness of his life and marriage. A title was his sole inheritance, and that inheritance he successively sold to the kings of France and Arragon.<sup>c</sup> During this transient prosperity, Charles the eighth was ambitious of joining the empire of the east with the kingdom of Naples. In a public festival, he assumed the appellation and the purple of Augustus. The Greeks rejoiced, and the Ottoman already trembled at the approach of the French chivalry.<sup>d</sup> Manuel Palæologus, the second son, was tempted to revisit his native country. His return might be grateful, and could not be dangerous, to the Porte. He was maintained at Constantinople in safety and ease, and an honourable train of christians and Moslems attended him to the grave. If there be some animals of so generous a nature that they refuse to propagate in a domestic state, the last of the imperial race must be ascribed to an inferior kind. He accepted from the sultan's liberality two beautiful females, and his surviving son was lost in the habit and religion of a Turkish slave.

The importance of Constantinople was felt and magnified in its loss. The pontificate of Nicholas the fifth, however peaceful and prosperous, was dishonoured by the fall of the eastern empire, and the grief and terror of the Latins revived, or seemed to revive, the old enthusiasm of the crusades. In one of the most distant countries of the west, Philip duke of Burgundy entertained, at Lisle in Flanders, an assembly of his nobles, and the pompous pageants of the feast were skilfully adapted to their fancy and feelings.<sup>e</sup> In the midst of the banquet, a gigantic Saracen entered the hall, leading a fictitious elephant, with a castle on his back, a matron in a mourning robe, the symbol of religion, was seen to issue from the castle. She deplored her oppression, and accused the slowness of her champions, the principal herald advanced, bearing on his fist a live pheasant, which, according to the rites of chivalry, he presented to the duke. At this extraordinary summons, Philip, a wise and aged prince, engaged his person and powers in the holy war against the

<sup>a</sup> See the loss or conquest of Trebizond in Chalcondyles, (l. ix. p. 263—266) Ducas (c. 45.) Phranza, (l. iii. c. 27.) and Cantemir, (p. 107.)
<sup>b</sup> Though Tournefort (tom. iii. lettre xvii. p. 179) speaks of Trebizond as a real people, Peyssonel the latest and most accurate observer, can find 100 000 inhabitants (Commerce de la Mer Noire tom. ii. p. 72. and for the province p. 63—90.) Its prosperity and trade are perpetually disturbed by the furious quarrels of two orders of janizaries, in one of which 30 000 Lazis are commonly enrolled (Mémoires de Tott tom. iii. p. 16 17.)

<sup>c</sup> Ismael Beg, prince of Sinope or Sinople, was possessed (chiefly from his copper mines) of a revenue of 200 000 ducats (Chalcond. l. ix. p. 258 259.) Peyssonel (Commerce de la Mer Noire, tom. ii. p. 100.) ascribes to the modern city 60 000 inhabitants. This account seems enormous. Yet it is by trading, with a people that we become acquainted with their wealth and numbers.

<sup>d</sup> Spondanus (from Gobelin Comment. Pii II. l. v.) relates the arrival and reception of the despot Thomas at Rome, (A D 1461 No. 3.)

<sup>e</sup> By an act dated A D 1494 Sept. 6 and lately transmitted from the archives of the Capitol to the royal library of Paris, the despot Andrew Palæologus, reserving the Morea, and stipulating some private advantages, conveys to Charles VIII. king of France, the empires of Constantinople and Trebizond (Spondanus A D 1495 No. 2.) M. de Fontenayne (Mém. de l'Académie des Inscriptions tom. xvii. p. 539—578.) has bestowed a dissertation on this national title of which he had obtained a copy from Rome.

<sup>f</sup> See Philippe de Comines, (l. vii. c. 14.) who reckons with pleasure the number of Greeks who were prepared to rise 60 miles of an easy navigation eighteen days' journey from Valona to Constantinople, &c. On this occasion the Turkish empire was saved by the policy of Venice.
<sup>g</sup> See the original fest in Oliver de la Marche, (Mémoires p. i. c. 29 30.) with the abstract and observations of M. de Ste. Palaye (Mémoires sur la Chevalerie, tom. i. p. iii. p. 182—185.) The peacock and the pheasant were distinguished as royal birds.

ruined empire seemed to approach the last and fatal moment of its dissolution. The confusion of the times, and the scarcity of authentic memorials, oppose equal difficulties to the historian, who attempts to preserve a clear and unbroken thread of narration. Surrounded with imperfect fragments, always concise, often obscure, and sometimes contradictory, he is reduced to collect, to compare, and to conjecture: and though he ought never to place his conjectures in the rank of facts, yet the knowledge of human nature, and of the sure operation of its fierce and unestrained passions, might, on some occasions, supply the want of historical materials.

The emperor Philip
There is not, for instance, any difficulty in conceiving, that the successive murders of so many emperors had loosened all the ties of allegiance between the prince and people, that all the generals of Philip were disposed to imitate the example of their master, and that the caprice of armies, long since habituated to frequent and violent revolutions, might every day raise to the throne the most obscure of their fellow-soldiers. History can only add, that the rebellion against the emperor Philip broke out in the summer of the year two hundred and forty-nine, among the legions of Mæsia, and that a subaltern officer, named Marinus, was the object of their seditious choice. Philip was alarmed. He dreaded lest the treason of the Mæsiæ army should prove the first spark of a general conflagration. Distracted with the consciousness of his guilt and of his danger, he communicated the intelligence to the senate. A gloomy silence prevailed, the effect of fear, and perhaps of disaffection: till at length Decius, one of the assembly, assuming a spirit worthy of his noble extraction, ventured to discover more intrepidity than the emperor seemed to possess. He treated the whole business with contempt, as a hasty and inconsiderate tumult, and Philip's rival as a phantom of royalty, who in a very few days would be destroyed by the same inconstancy that had created him. The speedy completion of the prophecy inspired Philip with a just esteem for so able a counsellor, and Decius appeared to him the only person capable of restoring peace and discipline to an army, whose tumultuous spirit did not immediately subside after the murder of Marinus. Decius, who long resisted his own nomination, seems to have insinuated the danger of presenting a leader of merit, to the angry and apprehensive minds of the soldiers, and his prediction was again confirmed by the event. The legions of Mæsia forced their judge to become their accomplice. They left him only the alternative of death or the purple. His subsequent conduct, after

Services, revolt, victory, and restoration of the emperor
Decius

A D 249

He marches against the Goths,
A D 250

Origin of the Goths from Scandinavia

that decisive measure, was unavoidable. He conducted, or followed, his army to the confines of Italy, whither Philip, collecting all his force to repel the formidable competitor whom he had raised up, advanced to meet him. The imperial troops were superior in number,<sup>b</sup> but the rebels formed an army of veterans, commanded by an able and experienced leader. Philip was either killed in the battle, or put to death a few days afterwards at Verona. His son and associate in the empire was massacred at Rome by the prætorian guards, and the victorious Decius, with more favourable circumstances than the ambition of that age can usually plead, was universally acknowledged by the senate and provinces. It is reported, that, immediately after his reluctant acceptance of the title of Augustus, he had assured Philip by a private message, of his innocence and loyalty, solemnly protesting, that, on his arrival in Italy, he would resign the imperial ornaments, and return to the condition of an obedient subject. His professions might be sincere. But in the situation where fortune had placed him, it was scarcely possible that he could either forgive or be forgiven.<sup>c</sup>

The emperor Decius had employed a few months in the works of peace and the administration of justice, when he was summoned to the banks of the Danube by the invasion of the Goths. This is the first considerable occasion in which history mentions that great people, who afterwards broke the Roman power, sacked the capital, and reigned in Gaul, Spain, and Italy. So memorable was the part which they acted in the subversion of the Western empire, that the name of Goths is frequently but improperly used as a general appellation of rude and warlike barbarism.

In the beginning of the sixth century, and after the conquest of Italy, the Goths, in possession of present greatness, very naturally indulged themselves in the prospect of past and of future glory. They wished to preserve the memory of their ancestors, and to transmit to posterity their own achievements. The principal minister of the court of Ravenna, the learned Cassiodorus, gratified the inclination of the conquerors in a Gothic history, which consisted of twelve books, now reduced to the imperfect abridgment of Jornandes.<sup>d</sup> These writers passed with the most artful conciseness over the misfortunes of the nation, celebrated its successful valour, and adorned the triumph with many Asiatic trophies, that more properly belonged to the people of Scythia. On the faith of ancient songs, the uncertain, but the only, memorials of barbarians, they deduced the first origin of the Goths from the vast island, on

<sup>a</sup> The expression used by Zosimus and Zonaras may signify that Marinus commanded a century, a cohort, or a legion.

<sup>b</sup> His birth at Babilis, a little village in Pannonia, (Entrop. ix. Victor in Cesarib. et Epitom.) seems to contradict, unless it was merely accidental, his supposed descent from the Decei. Six hundred years had bestowed nobility on the Decei: but at the commencement of that period, they were only plebeians of merit, and among the first who shared the consulship with the humanity Patricians. Plebeian Deciorum annis, &c. Juvenal Sat. ii. 254. See the spirited speech of Decius, in Liv. x. 9. 10.

<sup>c</sup> Zosimus l. i. p. 20. Zonaras, l. vi. p. 621. Edit. Montre.
<sup>d</sup> See the preface of Cassiodorus and Jornandes. It is surprising that the latter should be omitted in the excellent edition published by Grotius of the Gothic writers.

Turks his example was imitated by the barons and knights of the assembly, they swore to God, the Virgin, the ladies, and the pheasant, and their particular vows were not less extravagant than the general sanction of their oath. But the performance was made to depend on some future and foreign contingency, and during twelve years, till the last hour of his life, the duke of Burgundy might be scrupulously, and perhaps sincerely, on the eve of his departure. Had every breast glowed with the same ardour, had the union of the christians corresponded with their bravery, had every country, from Sweden<sup>b</sup> to Naples, supplied a just proportion of cavalry and infantry, of men and money, it is indeed probable that Constantinople would have been delivered, and that the Turks might have been chased beyond the Hellespont or the Euphrates. But the secretary of the emperor, who composed every epistle, and attended every meeting, Æneas Sylvius,<sup>c</sup> a statesman and orator, describes from his own experience the repugnant state and spirit of Christendom. "It is a body," says he, "without a head, a republic without laws or magistrates. The pope and the emperor may shine as lofty titles, as splendid images; but they are unable to command, and none are willing to obey. Every state has a separate prince, and every prince has a separate interest. What eloquence could unite so many discordant and hostile powers under the same standard? Could they be assembled in arms, who would dare to assume the office of general? What order could be maintained?—what military discipline? Who would undertake to feed such an enormous multitude? Who would understand their various languages, or direct their strange and incompatible manners? What mortal could reconcile the English with the French, Genoa with Arragon, the Germans with the natives of Hungary and Bohemia? If a small number enlisted in the holy war, they must be overthrown by the infidels, if many, by their own weight and confusion." Yet the same Æneas, when he was raised to the papal throne, under the name of Pius the second, devoted his life to the prosecution of the Turkish war. In the council of Mantua he excited some sparks of a false or feeble enthusiasm, but when the pontiff appeared at Ancona, to embark in person with the troops, engagements vanished in excuses, a precise day was adjourned to an indefinite term, and his effective army consisted of some German pilgrims, whom he was obliged to disband with indulgences and alms. Regardless of futurity, his successors and the powers of Italy were involved in the schemes of present and domestic ambition, and the distance or proximity of each object determined, in their eyes, its apparent magnitude. A more enlarged view of their interest would have taught them to maintain a defensive and naval war against the common enemy, and the support of Scanderbeg and his brave Albanians might have prevented the subsequent invasion of the kingdom of Naples. The siege and sack of Otranto by the Turks diffused a general consternation, and pope Sixtus was preparing to fly beyond the Alps, when the storm was instantly dispelled by the death of Mahomet the second, in the fifty-first year of his age.<sup>d</sup> His lofty genius aspired to the conquest of Italy; he was possessed of a strong city and a capacious harbour, and the same reign might have been decorated with the trophies of the New and the Ancient Rome.<sup>e</sup>

Death of Mahomet II
A D 1481
May 3 or July 2

CHAP LXIX.

State of Rome from the twelfth century—Temporal dominion of the popes—Seditions of the city—Political heresy of Arnold of Brescia—Restoration of the republic—The senators—Pride of the Romans—Their wars—They are deprived of the election and presence of the popes, who retire to Avignon—The jubilee—Noble families of Rome—Fall of the Colonna and Ursini

In the first ages of the decline and fall of the Roman empire, our eye is invariably fixed on the royal city, which had given laws to the fairest portion of the globe. We contemplate her fortunes, at first with admiration, at length with pity, always with attention, and when that attention is diverted from the capital to the provinces, they are considered as so many branches which have been successively severed from the imperial trunk. The foundation of a second Rome on the shores of the Bosphorus, has compelled the historian to follow the successors of Constantine, and our curiosity has been tempted to visit the most remote countries of Europe and Asia, to explore the causes and the authors of the long decay of the Byzantine monarchy. By the conquest of Justi-

State and revolutions of Rome,
A D 1100—1500

<sup>b</sup> It was found by an actual enumeration, that Sweden, Gothland, and Finland, contained 1,800,000 fighting men, and consequently were far more populous than at present.

<sup>c</sup> In the year 1454 Spondanus has given, from Æneas Sylvius a view of the state of Europe enriched with his own observations. That valuable annalist, and the Italian Muratori will continue the series of events from the year 1453 to 1481, the end of Mahomet's life, and of this chapter.

<sup>d</sup> Besides the two annalists, the reader may consult Giannone (Istoria Civile, tom. iii. p. 449—455) for the Turkish invasion of the kingdom of Naples. For the reign and conquests of Mahomet II. I have occasionally used the Memorie storiche de Monarchia Ottomana di Giovanni Sagredo (Venezia 1677, iii. 4to.) In peace and war the Turks have ever engaged the attention of the republic of Venice. All her despatches and relations were open to a procurator of St. Mark and Sagredo is not contemptible either in sense or style. Yet he too bitterly lates the infidels: he is ignorant of their language and manners, and his narrative, which allows only seventy pages to Mahomet II. (p. 69—140) becomes more copious and authentic as he approaches the years 1640 and 1644, the term of the historic labours of John Sagredo.

<sup>e</sup> As I am now taking an everlasting farewell of the Greek empire, I shall briefly mention the great collection of Byzantine writers, whose names and testimonies have been successively repeated in this work. The Greek presses of Aldus and the Italians were confined to the classics of a better age, and the first rule editions of Procopius, Agathias, Cedrenus, Zonaras, &c. were published by the learned diligence of the Germans. The whole Byzantine series (thirty six volumes in folio) has gradually issued (A D 1648 &c.) from the royal press of the Louvre, with some collateral aid from Rome and Leipzig: but the Venetian edition, (A D 1729) though cheaper and more copious, is not less inferior in correctness than in magnificence to that of Paris. The merits of the French editors are various, but the value of Anna Comnena, Cinnamus, Villehardouin &c. is enhanced by the historical notes of Charles du Fresne du Cange. His supplemental works, the Greek Glossary, the Constantinopolis Christiana, the Familiae Byzantine, diffuse a steady light over the darkness of the Lower Empire.

nian, we have been recalled to the banks of the Tiber, to the deliverance of the ancient metropolis, but that deliverance was a change, or perhaps an aggravation, of servitude. Rome had been already stripped of her trophies, her gods, and her Cæsars; nor was the Gothic dominion more inglorious and oppressive than the tyranny of the Greeks. In the eighth century of the christian æra, a religious quarrel, the worship of images, provoked the Romans to assert their independence: their bishop became the temporal, as well as the spiritual, father of a free people, and of the western empire, which was restored by Charlemagne, the title and image still decorate the singular constitution of modern Germany. The name of Rome must yet command our involuntary respect, the climate (whatsoever may be its influence) was no longer the same: the purity of blood had been contaminated through a thousand channels, but the venerable aspect of her ruins, and the memory of past greatness, rekindled a spark of the national character. The darkness of the middle ages exhibits some scenes not unworthy of our notice. Nor shall I dismiss the present work till I have reviewed the state and revolutions of the ROMAN CITY, which acquiesced under the absolute dominion of the popes, about the same time that Constantinople was enslaved by the Turkish arms.

The French and German emperors of Rome, A.D. 1000–1100. In the beginning of the twelfth century,<sup>a</sup> the æra of the first crusade, Rome was revered by the Latins, as the metropolis of the world, as the throne of the pope and the emperor, who, from the eternal city, derived their title, their honours, and the right or exercise of temporal dominion. After so long an interruption, it may not be useless to repeat that the successors of Charlemagne and the Othos were chosen beyond the Rhine in a national diet, but that these princes were content with the humble names of kings of Germany and Italy, till they had passed the Alps and the Apennine, to seek their imperial crown on the banks of the Tiber.<sup>c</sup> At some distance from the city, their approach was saluted by a long procession of the clergy and people with palms and crosses, and the terrific emblems of wolves and lions, of dragons and eagles, that floated in the military banners, represented the departed legions and cohorts of the republic. The royal oath to maintain the liberties of Rome was thrice reiterated, at the bridge, the gate, and on the stairs, of the Vatican, and the distribution of a customary donative feebly imitated the magnificence of the first Cæsars. In the church of St. Peter, the coronation was performed by his successor: the voice of God was confounded with that of the people, and the public consent was declared in the acclamations of, "Long life and victory to our lord the pope! long life and victory to our lord the emperor! long life and victory to the Roman and Teutonic armies!"<sup>d</sup> The names of Cæsar and Augustus, the laws of Constantine and Justinian, the example of Charlemagne and Otho, established the supreme dominion of the emperors, their title and image was engraved on the papal coins,<sup>e</sup> and their jurisdiction was marked by the sword of justice, which they delivered to the præfect of the city. But every Roman prejudice was awakened by the name, the language, and the manners of a barbarian lord. The Cæsars of Saxony or Franconia were the chiefs of a feudal aristocracy, nor could they exercise the discipline of civil and military power, which alone secures the obedience of a distant people, impatient of servitude, though perhaps incapable of freedom. Once, and once only, in his life, each emperor, with an army of Teutonic vassals, descended from the Alps. I have described the peaceful order of his entry and coronation, but that order was commonly disturbed by the clamour and sedition of the Romans, who encountered their sovereign as a foreign invader. His departure was always speedy, and often shameful, and, in the absence of a long reign, his authority was insulted, and his name was forgotten. The progress of independence in Germany and Italy undermined the foundations of the imperial sovereignty, and the triumph of the popes was the deliverance of Rome.

Of her two sovereigns, the emperor had precariously reigned by the right of conquest, but the authority of the popes was founded on the soft, though more solid, basis of opinion and habit. The removal of a foreign influence restored and endeared the shepherd to his flock. Instead of the arbitrary or venal nomination of a German court, the vicar of Christ was freely chosen by the college of cardinals, most of whom were either natives or inhabitants of the city. The applause of the magistrates and people confirmed his election, and the ecclesiastical power that was obeyed in Sweden and Britain, had been ultimately derived from the suffrage of the Romans. The same suffrage gave a prince, as well as a pontiff, to the capital. It was universally believed, that Constantine had invested the popes with the temporal dominion of Rome, and the boldest civilians, the most profane sceptics, were satisfied with disputing the right of the emperor and the validity of his gift. The truth of

<sup>a</sup> The Abbé Dubos who with less genius than his successor Montesquieu has asserted and magnified the influence of climate objects to himself the degeneracy of the Romans and Batavians. To the first of these examples he replies, 1. That the climate is less real than apparent and that the modern Romans prudently conceal in themselves the virtues of their ancestors. 2. That the air, the soil, and the climate of Rome have suffered a great and visible alteration (Reflections sur la Poesie et sur la Peinture part II. sect. 16).

<sup>b</sup> The reader has been so long absent from Rome, that I would advise him to recollect or review the forty ninth chapter of this history.

<sup>c</sup> The coronation of the German emperors at Rome, more especially in the eleventh century, is best represented from the original monuments by Muratori, (Antiquitat. Ital. medii Ævi tom. 1. dissertat. ii. p. 99 &c.) and Cenni (Monument. Domini Pontif. tom. ii. diss. vi. p. 261) the latter of whom I only know from the copious extract of Schmidt. (Hist. des Allemands, tom. iii. p. 245–266).

<sup>d</sup> Exercitum Romanum et Teutonicum. The latter was both seen and felt but the former was no more than magistri nominis umbra.

<sup>e</sup> Muratori has given the series of the papal coins (Antiquitat. tom. ii. diss. xxvii. p. 548–554). He finds only two more early than the year 800. They are still extant from Leo III. to Leo IX. with addition of the reigns of emperor. None remain of Gregory VII. or Urban II. but in those of Paschal II. he seems to have renounced this badge of dependence.

the fact, the authenticity of his donation, was deeply rooted in the ignorance and tradition of four centuries and the fabulous origin was lost in the real and permanent effects. The name of right,

dominus or lord was inscribed on the coin of the bishops their title was acknowledged by acclamations and oaths of allegiance, and with the free, or reluctant, consent of the German Cæsars, they had long exercised a supreme or subordinate jurisdiction over the city and patrimony of St Peter. The reign of the popes, which gratified the prejudices, was not incompatible with the liberties, of Rome, and a more critical inquiry would have revealed a still nobler source of their power, the gratitude of a nation, whom they had rescued from the heresy and oppression of the Greek tyrant. In an age of superstition, it should seem that the union of the royal and sacerdotal characters would mutually fortify each other, and that the keys of paradise would be the surest pledge of earthly obedience. The sanctity of the office might indeed be degraded by the personal vices of the virtue,

man, but the scandals of the tenth century were obliterated by the austere and more dangerous virtues of Gregory the seventh and his successors, and in the ambitious contests which they maintained for the rights of the church, their sufferings or their success must equally tend to increase the popular veneration. They sometimes wandered in poverty and exile, the victims of persecution, and the apostolic zeal with which they offered themselves to martyrdom, must engage the favour and sympathy of every catholic breast. And sometimes, thundering from the Vatican, they created, judged, and deposed the kings of the world nor could the proudest Roman be disgraced by submitting to a priest, whose feet were kissed, and whose stirrup was held, by the successors of Charlemagne. Even the temporal interest of the city should have protected in peace and honour the residence of the popes, from whence a vain and lazy people derived the greatest part of their subsistence and riches. The fixed revenue of the popes was probably impaired many of the old patrimonial estates, both in Italy and the provinces, had been invaded by sacrilegious hands, nor could the loss be compensated by the claim, rather than the possession, of the more ample gifts of Pepin and his descendants. But the Vatican and Capitol were nourished by the incessant and increasing swarms of pilgrims and suppliants the pale of christianity was enlarged, and the pope and cardinals were overwhelmed by the judgment of ecclesiastical and secular causes. A new jurisprudence had established in the Latin church the right and practice of appeals,<sup>f</sup> and from the north and west, the bishops and abbots were invited or summoned to solicit, to complain, to accuse, or to justify, before the threshold of the apostles. A rare prodigy is once recorded, that two horses, belonging to the archbishops of Mentz and Cologne, repassed the Alps, yet laden with gold and silver<sup>h</sup> but it was soon understood, that the success, both of the pilgrims and clients, depended much less on the justice of their cause than on the value of their offering. The wealth and piety of these strangers were ostentatiously displayed, and their expenses, sacred or profane, circulated in various channels for the emolument of the Romans.

benefits

Such powerful motives should have <sup>Inconstancy of</sup> firmly attached the voluntary and <sup>superstition</sup> pious obedience of the Roman people to their spiritual and temporal father. But the operation of prejudice and interest is often disturbed by the sallies of ungovernable passion. The Indian who fells the tree, that he may gather the fruit, and the Arab who plunders the caravans of commerce, are actuated by the same impulse of savage nature, which overlooks the future in the present, and relinquishes for momentary rapine the long and secure possession of the most important blessings. And it was thus, that the shrine of St Peter was profaned by the thoughtless Romans, who pillaged the offerings, and wounded the pilgrims, without computing the number and value of similar visits, which they prevented by their inhospitable sacrilege. Even the influence of superstition is fluctuating and precarious and the slave, whose reason is subdued, will often be delivered by his avarice or pride. A credulous devotion for the fables and oracles of the priesthood, most powerfully acts on the mind of a barbarian yet such a mind is the least capable of preferring imagination to sense, of sacrificing to a distant motive, to an invisible, perhaps an ideal, object, the appetites and interests of the present world. In the vigour of health and youth, his practice will perpetually contradict his belief, till the pressure of age, or sickness, or calamity, awakens his terrors, and compels him to satisfy the double debt of piety and remorse. I have already observed, that the modern times of religious indifference are the most favourable to the peace and security of the clergy. Under the reign of superstition, they had much to hope from the ignorance, and much to fear from the violence, of mankind. The wealth, whose constant increase must have rendered them the sole proprietors of the earth, was alternately bestowed by the repentant father and the more enlightened historian investigates the origin, and rejects the principles of this new jurisprudence.

<sup>f</sup> See Ducange Gloss. mediæ et infimæ Latinitat. tom. vi. p. 364. STAFFA. This homage was paid by kings to archbishops, and by vassals to their lords (Schmidt, tom. iii. p. 262.) and it was the nicest policy of Rome, to confound the marks of filial and of feudal subjection.

<sup>g</sup> The appeals from all the churches to the Roman pontiff are deplored by the zeal of St Bernard (de Consideratione l. iii. tom. ii. p. 431—442. edit. Mabillon Venet. 1750.) and the judgment of Fleury (Discours sur l'Hist. Ecclesiastique, iv. & v.) But the saint, who believed in the false decretals, condemns only the abuse of these appeals,

<sup>h</sup> Germanici summari non levibus sarcinis onus, nihilominus repaſcuntur in illis. Nova res! quando hæcenus rerum Romæ refudii? Et nunc Romanorum consilio id usurpatum non credimus (Bernard de Consideratione l. iii. c. 3 p. 437.) The first words of the passage are obscure, and probably corrupt.

<sup>i</sup> Quand les sauvages de la Louisiane veulent avoir du fruit, ils coupent l'arbre au pied et cueillent le fruit. Voilà le gouvernement despotique (Esprit des Loix, l. v. c. 13.) and passion and ignorance are always despotic.

plundered by the rapacious son their persons were adored or violated, and the same idol, by the hands of the same votaries, was placed on the altar, or trampled in the dust. In the feudal system of Europe, arms were the title of distinction and the measure of allegiance, and amidst their tumult, the still voice of law and reason was seldom heard or obeyed. The turbulent Romans disdained the yoke, and insulted the impotence, of their bishop,* nor would his education or character allow him to exercise, with decency or effect, the power of the sword. The motives of his election and the frailties of his life were exposed to their familiar observation, and proximity must diminish the reverence, which his name and his decrees impressed on a barbarous world. This difference has not escaped the notice of our philosophic historian. "Though the name and authority of the court of Rome were so terrible in the remote countries of Europe, which were sunk in profound ignorance, and were entirely unacquainted with its character and conduct, the pope was so little revered at home, that his inveterate enemies surrounded the gates of Rome itself, and even controlled his government in that city, and the ambassadors, who, from a distant extremity of Europe, carried to him the humble, or rather abject, submissions of the greatest potentate of the age, found the utmost difficulty to make their way to him, and to throw themselves at his feet."<sup>m</sup>

Since the primitive times, the wealth of the popes was exposed to envy, their power to opposition, and their persons to violence. But the long hostility of the mitre and the crown increased the numbers, and inflamed the passions, of their enemies. The deadly factions of the Guelphs and Ghibelines, so fatal to Italy, could never be embraced with truth or constancy by the Romans, the subjects and adversaries both of the bishop and emperor, but their support was solicited by both parties, and they alternately displayed in their banners the keys of St Peter and the German eagle. Gregory the seventh, who may be adored or detested as the founder of the papal monarchy, was driven from Rome, and died in exile at Salerno. Six and thirty of his successors,<sup>n</sup> till their retreat to Avignon, maintained an unequal contest with the Romans: their age and dignity were often violated, and the churches, in the solemn rites of religion, were polluted with sedition and murder. A repetition<sup>n</sup> of such capricious brutality, without connexion or design, would be tedious and disgusting, and I shall content myself with some events of the twelfth century, which represent the state of the popes and the city. On holy Thursday, while Paschal officiated before the altar, he was interrupted by the clamours of the multitude, who imperiously demanded the confirmation of a favourite magistrate. His silence exasperated their fury: his pious refusal to mingle the affairs of earth and heaven was encountered with menaces and oaths, that he should be the cause and the witness of the public ruin. During the festival of Easter, while the bishop and the clergy, barefoot and in procession, visited the tombs of the martyrs, they were twice assaulted, at the bridge of St Angelo, and before the capitol, with volleys of stones and darts. The houses of his adherents were levelled with the ground. Paschal escaped with difficulty and danger: he levied an army in the patrimony of St Peter, and his last days were embittered by suffering and inflicting the calamities of civil war. The scenes that followed the election of his successor Gelasius the second were still more scandalous to the church and city. Cencio Frangipani,<sup>o</sup> a potent and factious baron, burst into the assembly furious and in arms: the cardinals were stripped, beaten, and trampled under foot, and he seized, without pity or respect, the vicar of Christ by the throat. Gelasius was dragged by his hair along the ground, buffeted with blows, wounded with spurs, and bound with an iron chain in the house of his brutal tyrant. An insurrection of the people delivered their bishop: the rival families opposed the violence of the Frangipani, and Cencio, who sued for pardon, repented of the failure, rather than of the guilt, of his enterprise. Not many days had elapsed, when the pope was again assaulted at the altar. While his friends and enemies were engaged in a bloody contest, he escaped in his sacerdotal garments. In this unworthy flight, which excited the compassion of the Roman matrons, his attendants were scattered or unhoused, and, in the fields behind the church of St Peter, his successor was found alone and half-dead with fear and fatigue. Shaking the dust from his feet, the apostle withdrew from a city in which his dignity was insulted and his person was

* In a free conversation with his countryman Adrian IV John of Salisbury accuses the avarice of the pope and clergy. Provinciarum diripiunt spolia ac si thesauros Cressi student reparare. Sed recte cum eis agit Alissimus quoniam et ipsi olus et sepe vilissimus hominibus doli sunt in direptionem (de Nugis Curialium, l. vi. c. 24. p. 387.) To the next page he blames the rashness and infidelity of the Romans, whom their bishops vainly strove to conciliate by gifts, in stead of virtues. It is a pity that this miscellaneous writer has not given us less morality and erudition and more pictures of himself and the times.

<sup>l</sup> Hume's History of England, vol. i. p. 419. The same writer has given us from Fitz Stephen, a singular net of cruelty perpetrated on the clergy by Geoffrey, the father of Henry II. When he was master of Normandy the chapter of Sees presumed, without his consent, to proceed to the election of a bishop upon which he ordered all of them with the bishop elect, to be castrated and made all their testicles be brought him to a platter. Of the pain and danger they might justly complain yet since they had vowed chastity, he deprived them of a superfluous treasure.

<sup>m</sup> From Leo IX. and Gregory VII. an authentic and contemporary series of the lives of the popes by the cardinal of Arragon, Pandolphus Pisanus Bernard Guidon &c. is inserted in the Italian Historians of Miratori, (tom. iii. p. i. p. 277—685) and has been always before my eyes.

<sup>n</sup> The dates of years in the margin may throughout this chapter be understood as local references to the Avars of Miratori: my ordinary and excellent guide. He uses, and indeed quotes with the freedom of a master, the great Collection of the Italian Historians in twenty eight volumes, and as that treasure is in my library I have thought it an amusement, if not a duty, to consult the original.

<sup>o</sup> I cannot refrain from transcribing the high coloured words of Pandolphus Pisanus (p. 384). Hoc audens nimicus pacis algue turbator jam salus Centius Praxipane. Hoc draconis immanissimi sibilans et ab imis pectoribus trahens longa suspiria, occinctus retro gladio sine morâ euectur valvas ac fores contré, it Eccecam furibundus intravit, inde custodie remoto papam per gulam accepit, dislaxavit, pugnis caletibus percussit et triumphum brutum rñmial intra ilmen ecclesie a crater calcariibus cruentavit, et lauro lantum dominum per capillos et brachia Jesu bono inlerim dormiente, delraxit, ad domum usque deduxit, imbi catenavit et inclavit.

endangered, and the vanity of sacerdotal ambition is revealed in the involuntary confession, that one emperor was more tolerable than twenty.<sup>p</sup> These examples might suffice, but I cannot forget the sufferings of two pontiffs of the same age, the second and third of the name of Lucius.

LUCIUS II
A D 1144, 1145

LUCIUS III
A D
1181—1185

The former, as he ascended in battle array to assault the capitol, was struck on the temple by a stone, and expired in a few days. The latter was severely wounded in the persons of his servants. In a civil commotion, several of his priests had been made prisoners, and the inhuman Romans, reserving one as a guide for his brethren, put out their eyes, crowned them with ludicrous mitres, mounted them on asses with their faces to the tail, and extorted an oath, that, in this wretched condition, they should offer themselves as a lesson to the head of the church. Hope or fear, lassitude or remorse, the characters of the men, and the circumstances of the times, might sometimes obtain an interval of peace and obedience, and the pope was restored with joyful acclamations to the Lateran or Vatican, from whence he had been driven with threats and violence. But the root of mischief was deep and perennial, and a momentary calm was preceded and followed by such tempests as had almost sunk the bark of St Peter. Rome continually presented the aspect of war and discord: the churches and palaces were fortified and assailed by the factions and families, and after giving

CALISTUS II
A D 1119—1124
INNOCENT II
A D 1130—1143

peace to Europe, Calistus the second alone had resolution and power to prohibit the use of private arms in the metropolis. Among the nations who revered the apostolic throne, the tumults of Rome provoked a general indignation, and in a letter to his disciple Eugenius the third, St Bernard, with the sharpness of his wit and zeal, has stigmatized the vices of the rebellious people.<sup>q</sup>

Character of the Romans by St
Bernard

“Who is ignorant,” says the monk of Clairvaux, “of the vanity and arrogance of the Romans? a nation nursed in sedition, cruel, untractable, and scornful to obey, unless they are too feeble to resist. When they promise to serve, they aspire to reign, if they swear allegiance, they watch the opportunity of revolt, yet they vent their discontent in loud clamours if your doors or your counsels are shut against them. Dexterous in mischief, they have never learnt the science of doing good. Odious to earth and heaven, impious to God, seditious among themselves, jealous of their neighbours, inhuman to strangers, they love no one, by no one are they beloved, and while they wish to inspire fear, they live in base and continual apprehension. They will not submit, they know not how to govern, faithless to their superiors, intolerable to their equals, ungrateful to their benefactors, and alike impudent in their demands and their refusals. Lofty in promise, poor in execution, adulation and calumny, perfidy and treason, are the familiar arts of their policy.” Surely this dark portrait is not coloured by the pencil of christian charity,<sup>r</sup> yet the features, however harsh and ugly, express a lively resemblance of the Romans of the twelfth century.<sup>s</sup>

The Jews had rejected the Christ when he appeared among them in a plebeian character, and the Romans

Political heresy of Arnold of Brescia,
A D 1140

might plead their ignorance of his vicar when he assumed the pomp and pride of a temporal sovereign. In the busy age of the crusades, some sparks of curiosity and reason were rekindled in the western world: the heresy of Bulgaria, the Paulician sect, was successfully transplanted into the soil of Italy and France, the Gnostic visions were mingled with the simplicity of the gospel, and the enemies of the clergy reconciled their passions with their conscience, the desire of freedom with the profession of piety.<sup>t</sup> The trumpet of Roman liberty was first sounded by Arnold of Brescia,<sup>u</sup> whose promotion in the church was confined to the lowest rank, and who wore the monastic habit rather as a garb of poverty than as a uniform of obedience. His adversaries could not deny the wit and eloquence which they severely felt: they confess with reluctance the specious purity of his morals, and his errors were recommended to the public by a mixture of important and beneficial truths. In his theological studies, he had been the disciple of the famous and unfortunate Abelard,<sup>v</sup> who was likewise involved in the suspicion of heresy, but the lover of Eloisa was of a soft and flexible nature, and his ecclesiastic judges were edified and disarmed by the humility of his repentance. From this master, Arnold most probably imbibed some metaphysical definitions of the Trinity, repugnant to the taste of the times: his ideas of baptism and the eucharist are loosely censured, but a political heresy was the source of his fame and misfortunes. He presumed to quote the declaration of Christ, that his kingdom is not of this world: he

<sup>p</sup> Ego coram Deo et ecclesiæ dico, si unquam possibile esset, malleum unum imperatorem quam tot dominos (Vit. Gelas II p 398)

<sup>q</sup> Quid tum notum seculis quam protervia et cervicositas Romanorum! Gens iniqua, prius tumultu assuevit, gens inimicis et intracabilis usque adhuc, subditi nesciunt, nisi cum non valet resistere, (de Considerat I iv c 2. p 441) The saint takes breath and then begins again. Hi, invisi terre et celo utrique iniecerunt manus, &c (p 443)

<sup>r</sup> As a Roman citizen, Petrarch takes leave to observe, that Bernard though a saint was a man that he might be provoked by resentment, and possibly repent of his hasty passion, &c (Memoires sur la Vie de Petrarch, tom i p 330)

<sup>s</sup> Baronius in his index to the twelfth volume of his Annals has found a fur and easy excuse. He makes two heads of Roman Catholics and Schismatics: to the former he applies all the good, to the latter all the evil that is told of the city.

<sup>t</sup> The heresies of the twelfth century may be found in Mosheim, (Institut Hist Eccles p 419—427) who entertains a favourable opinion of Arnold of Brescia. In the fifty fourth chapter I have described the sect of the Pавлиans, and followed their migration from Armenia to Thrace and Bulgaria Italy and France.

<sup>u</sup> The original pictures of Arnold of Brescia are drawn by Otho, bishop of Frisingen (Chron I vii c 31 de Gestis Frederici I l i c 27 l ii c 21) and in the third book of the Ligurinus, a poem of Gunther who flourished A D 1200, in the monastery of Paris near Basil (Tabrie Biblioth Latin med et infime Aetatis tom iii p 174, 175) The long passage that relates to Arnold, is produced by Guelliman, (de Rebus Helvetiis, l iii c 5 p 108)

<sup>v</sup> The wicked wit of Byle was amused in composing, with much levity and learning, the articles of ABELARD FOULQUE'S HISTOIRE, in his Dictionnaire Critique. The dispute of Abelard and St Bernard, of scholastic and positive divinity, is well understood by Mosheim (Institut Hist Eccles p 412—415)

boldly maintained, that the sword and the sceptre were intrusted to the civil magistrate, that temporal honours and possessions were lawfully vested in secular persons, that the abbots, the bishops, and the pope himself, must renounce either their state or their salvation, and that after the loss of their reveues, the voluntary tithes and oblations of the faithful would suffice, not indeed for luxury and avarice, but for a frugal life in the exercise of spiritual labours. During a short time, the preacher was revered as a patriot, and the discontent, or revolt, of Brescia against her bishop, was the first-fruits of his dangerous lessons. But the favour of the people is less permanent than the resentment of the priest, and after the heresy of Arnold had been condemned by Innocent the second,<sup>7</sup> in the general council of the Lateran, the magistrates themselves were urged by prejudice and fear to execute the sentence of the church. Italy could no longer afford a refuge, and the disciple of Abelard escaped beyond the Alps, till he found a safe and hospitable shelter in Zurich, now the first of the Swiss cantons. From a Roman station,<sup>a</sup> a royal villa, a chapter of noble virgins, Zurich had gradually increased to a free and flourishing city, where the appeals of the Milanese were sometimes tried by the imperial commissaries.<sup>2</sup> In an age less ripe for reformation, the præcursor of Zuinglius was heard with applause: a brave and simple people imbibed and long retained the colour of his opinions and his art, or merit, seduced the bishop of Constance, and even the pope's legate, who forgot, for his sake, the interest of their master and their order. Their tardy zeal was quickened by the fierce exhortations of St Bernard,<sup>b</sup> and the enemy of the church was driven by persecution to the desperate measure of erecting his standard in Rome itself, in the face of the successor of St Peter.

He exhorts the Romans to restore the republic,

A D 1144-1154

Yet the courage of Arnold was not devoid of discretion: he was protected, and had perhaps been invited, by the nobles and people, and in the service of freedom, his eloquence thundered over the seven hills. Blending in the same discourse the texts of Livy and St Paul, uniting the motives of gospel and of classic enthusiasm, he admonished the Romans, how strangely their patience and the vices of the clergy had degenerated from the primitive times of the church and the city. He exhorted them to assert the inalienable rights of men and christians, to restore the laws and magistrates

——— *Damnatus ab illo
Præsul qui numeros ventum conlingere nostros
Nomen ab innocenti dicit laudabile vitæ*

We may apply the dexterity and correctness of Liguinus, who turns the unpoetical name of Innocent II into a compliment.

<sup>a</sup> A Roman inscription of Statio Turicensis has been found at Zurich, (D Anville, Notice de l'ancienne Gaule, p. 642-644) but it is without sufficient warrant, that the city and canton have usurped, and even monopolized the names of Tigurum and Pagus Tigurinus.

<sup>b</sup> Culliman (de Rebus Helveticis, l. iii c. 5 p. 106) recapitulates the donation (A D 833) of the emperor Lewis the Pious to his daughter the Abbess Hildegardis: Curium nostram Turegum in iunctis Alamannis in Pago Durgaugens with villages woods meadows waters, slaves, churches &c. a noble gift. Charles the Bald gave the jus monetæ the city was walled under Otto I and the line of the bishop of Frisingen.

Nobile Turegum militarium copia rerum
is repeated with pleasure by the antiquaries of Zurich.

of the republic, to respect the name of the emperor, but to confine their shepherd to the spiritual government of his flock.<sup>c</sup> Nor could his spiritual government escape the censure and control of the reformer, and the inferior clergy were taught by his lessons to resist the cardinals, who had usurped a despotic command over the twenty-eight regions or parishes of Rome.<sup>d</sup> The revolution was not accomplished without rapine and violence, the effusion of blood and the demolition of houses: the victorious faction was enriched with the spoils of the clergy and the adverse nobles. Arnold of Brescia enjoyed, or deplored, the effects of his mission: his reign continued above ten years, while two popes, Innocent the second and Anastasius the fourth, either trembled in the Vatican, or wandered as exiles in the adjacent cities. They were succeeded by a more vigorous and fortunate pontiff, Adrian the fourth,<sup>e</sup> the only Englishman who has ascended the throne of St Peter, and whose merit emerged from the mean condition of a monk, and almost a beggar, in the monastery of St Albans. On the first provocation, of a cardinal killed or wounded in the streets, he cast an interdict on the guilty people, and, from Christmas to Easter, Rome was deprived of the real or imaginary comforts of religious worship. The Romans had despised their temporal prince, they submitted with grief and terror to the censures of their spiritual father, their guilt was expiated by penance, and the banishment of the seditious preacher was the price of their absolution. But the revenge of Adrian was yet unsatisfied, and the approaching coronation of Frederic Barbarossa was fatal to the bold reformer, who had offended, though not in an equal degree, the heads of the church and state. In their interview at Viterbo, the pope represented to the emperor the furious ungovernable spirit of the Romans, the insults, the injuries, the fears, to which his person and his clergy were continually exposed, and the pernicious tendency of the heresy of Arnold, which must subvert the principles of civil, as well as ecclesiastical, subordination. Frederic was convinced by these arguments, or tempted by the desire of the imperial crown: in the balance of ambition, the innocence or life of an individual is of small account, and their common enemy was sacrificed to a moment of political concord. After his retreat from Rome, Arnold had been protected by the viscounts of Campania, from whom he was extorted by the power of Caesar: the præfect of the city pronounced

<sup>b</sup> Bernard, epistolæ exevi tom. i p. 187-190. Amidst his invectives he drops a precious acknowledgment, qui utinam quam sanæ esset doctrinæ quam districta est vitæ. He owns that Arnold would be a valuable acquisition for the church.

<sup>c</sup> He advised the Romans,

*Consilii armisque sur moleramina summa
Arbitrio tractare suo: nil juris in hunc re
Punctis summo, modicum concedere regi
Suadebat populo Sic las: stultus utraque
Mystate, reum, cernere se fecerat aule*

Nor is the poetry of Gualther different from the prose of Otho.

<sup>d</sup> See Baronius (A D 1148, No 38, 39) from the Vatican MSS. He loudly condemns Arnold (A D 1141 No 3) as the father of the political heretics whose influence then hurt him in France.

<sup>e</sup> The English reader may consult the Biographia Britannica ADRIAN IV. but our own writers have added nothing to the fame or merits of their countryman.

his execution, his sentence, the martyr of freedom
 A D 1155 was burnt alive in the presence of a careless and ungrateful people, and his ashes were cast into the Tiber, lest the heretics should collect and worship the relics of their master.<sup>f</sup> The clergy triumphed in his death with his ashes, his sect was dispersed, his memory still lived in the minds of the Romans. From his school they had probably derived a new article of faith, that the metropolis of the catholic church is exempt from the penalties of excommunication and interdict. Their bishops might argue, that the supreme jurisdiction, which they exercised over kings and nations, more especially embraced the city and diocese of the prince of the apostles. But they preached to the winds, and the same principle that weakened the effect, must temper the abuse, of the thunders of the Vatican.

The love of ancient freedom has encouraged a belief, that as early as the tenth century, in their first struggles against the Saxon Otthos, the commonwealth was vindicated and restored by the senate and people of Rome, that two consuls were annually elected among the nobles, and that ten or twelve plebeian magistrates revived the name and office of the tribunes of the commons.<sup>g</sup> But this venerable structure disappears before the light of criticism. In the darkness of the middle ages, the appellations of senators, of consuls, of the sons of consuls, may sometimes be discovered.<sup>h</sup> They were bestowed by the emperors, or assumed by the most powerful citizens, to denote their rank, their honours,<sup>i</sup> and perhaps the claim of a pure and patrician descent, but they float on the surface, without a series or a substance, the titles of men, not the orders of government,<sup>j</sup> and it is only from the year of Christ one thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the establishment of the senate is dated, as a glorious æra, in the acts of the city. A new constitution was hastily framed by private ambition or popular enthusiasm, nor could Rome, in the twelfth century, produce an antiquary to explain, or a legislator to restore, the harmony and proportions of the ancient model. The assembly of a free, of an armed people, will ever speak in loud and weighty accla-

<sup>f</sup> Besides the historian and poet already quoted, the last adventures of Arnould are related by the Biographer of Adrian IV (Muratori, Script. Rerum Ital. tom. iii. p. 1, p. 441, 442.)

<sup>g</sup> Duncinge (Gloss. Latinitatis niedrt. et infimæ Aetatis Decaretanes tom. ii. p. 726) gives me a quotation from Blondin (decad
 ii. l. ii.) Duo consules ex nobilitate quotannis fiebant, qui ad vetustum consulum exemplar summæ rerum præsestent. And in Sigonius (de Re, no. Italiae, l. vi. Opp. tom. ii. p. 400) I read of the consuls and tribunes of the tenth century. Both Blondin, and even Sigonius, too freely copied the classic method of supplying from reason or fancy the deficiency of records.

<sup>h</sup> In the panegyric of Berengarius (Muratori, Script. Rer. Ital. tom. ii.
 p. 1, p. 108) a Roman is mentioned as consul natus in the beginning of the tenth century. Muratori (dissert. v.) discovers in the years 952 and 956 Gratianus in Dei nomine consul et dux, Georgius consul et dux, and in 1015 Romanus, brother of Gregory VIII. proudly, but vaguely, styles himself consul et dux et omnium Romanorum senator.

<sup>i</sup> As late as the tenth century, the Greek emperors conferred on the dukes of Venice, Naples, Amalphi, &c. the title of vrator or consuls (see Chiron Sagorini, passim) and the successors of Charlemagne would not abridge any of their prerogative. But in general, the names of consul and senator, which may be found among the French and Germans, signify no more than count and lord (Signeur, Ducan, &c. Glossar.)
 The monkish writers are often ambitious of fine classic words.

<sup>j</sup> The most constitutional form, is a diploma of Otho III. (A D mations. But the regular distribution of the thirty-five tribes, the nice balance of the wealth and numbers of the centuries, the debates of the adverse orators, and the slow operation of votes and ballots, could not easily be adapted by a blind multitude, ignorant of the arts, and insensible of the benefits, of legal government. It was proposed by Arnould to revive and discriminate the equestrian order, but what could be the motive or measure of such distinction?<sup>k</sup> The pecuniary qualification of the knights must have been reduced to the poverty of the times: those times no longer required their civil functions of judges and farmers of the revenue, and their primitive duty, their military service on horseback, was more nobly supplied by feudal tenures and the spirit of chivalry. The jurisprudence of the republic was useless and unknown: the nations and families of Italy who lived under the Roman and barbaric laws were insensibly mingled in a common mass, and some faint tradition, some imperfect fragments, preserved the memory of the Code and Pandects of Justinian. With their liberty the Romans might doubtless have restored the appellation and office of consuls, had they not disdained a title so promiscuously adopted in the Italian cities, that it has finally settled on the humble station of the agents of commerce in a foreign land. But the rights of the tribunes, the formidable word that arrested the public counsels, suppose or must produce a legitimate democracy. The old patricians were the subjects, the modern barons the tyrants, of the state, nor would the enemies of peace and order, who insulted the vicar of Christ, have long respected the unarmed sanctity of a plebeian magistrate.<sup>m</sup>

In the revolution of the twelfth century, which gave a new existence and The Capitol æra to Rome, we may observe the real and important events that marked or confirmed her political independence. I The Capitoline hill, one of her seven eminences,<sup>n</sup> is about four hundred yards in length, and two hundred in breadth. A slight of a hundred steps led to the summit of the Tarpeian rock, and far steeper was the ascent before the de-clivities had been smoothed and the precipices filled by the ruins of fallen edifices. From the earliest ages, the Capitol had been used as a temple in 998) Consulibus sentis populique Romani, but the act is probably spurious. At the coronation of Henry I. A D 1014, the historian Dithmar (apud Muratori, dissert. xxiii.) describes him, a senatoribus duodecim vallatum, quorum sex crasi barba, alii prolixi, mystice indebant cum laenulis. The senate is mentioned in the panegyric of Berengarius (p. 406.)

<sup>k</sup> In ancient Rome, the equestrian order was not ranked with the senate and people as a third branch of the republic till the consulship of Cicero, who assumes the merit of the establishment (Plin. Hist.
 Natur. xxviii. 3. Beaufort, République Romaine, tom. i. p. 344—155.)
<sup>l</sup> The republican plan of Arnould of Brescia is thus stated by Gunther.

Quin etiam titulos urbis renovare vetustos,
 Nomine plebeio secernere nomen equestre,
 Jura tribunorum, sanæque reparare senatum,
 Et senio fessas mutasque reponere leges
 Lapsumque, et adhuc pendula muris Reddere primæva Capitolia prætoribus.

But of these reformations, some were no more than ideas, others no more than words.

<sup>m</sup> After many disputes among the antiquaries of Rome, it seems determined that the summit of the Capitoline hill next the river is strictly the Mons Tarpeius, the Arx, and that on the other summit, the church and convent of Araceli, the barefoot friars of St. Francis occupy the temple of Jupiter (Nardini, Roma Antica, l. i. c. 11—16.)

peace, a fortress in war, after the loss of the city, it maintained a siege against the victorious Gauls, and the sanctuary of empire was occupied, assaulted, and burnt, in the civil wars of Vitellius and Vespasian.<sup>o</sup> The temples of Jupiter and his kindred deities had crumbled into dust, their place was supplied by monasteries and houses, and the solid walls, the long and shelving porticoes, were decayed or ruined by the lapse of time. It was the first act of the Romans, an act of freedom, to restore the strength, though not the beauty, of the Capitol, to fortify the seat of their arms and counsels, and as often as they ascended the hill, the coldest minds must have glowed with the remembrance of their ancestors. II The first Cæsars had been invested with the exclusive coinage of the gold and silver, to the senate they abandoned the baser metal of bronze or copper.<sup>p</sup> The emblems and legends were inscribed on a more ample field by the genius of flattery, and the prince was relieved from the care of celebrating his own virtues. The successors of Diocletian despised even the flattery of the senate: their royal officers at Rome, and in the provinces, assumed the sole direction of the mint, and the same prerogative was inherited by the Gothic kings of Italy, and the long series of the Greek, the French, and the German dynasties. After an abdication of eight hundred years, the Roman senate asserted this honourable and lucrative privilege, which was tacitly renounced by the popes, from Paschal the second to the establishment of their residence beyond the Alps. Some of these republican coins of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries are shown in the cabinets of the curious. On one of these, a gold medal, Christ is depicted holding in his left hand a book with this inscription: "THE VOW OF THE ROMAN SENATE AND PEOPLE. ROME THE CAPITAL OF THE WORLD," on the reverse, St. Peter delivering a banner to a kneeling senator in his cap and gown, with the name and arms of his family impressed on his shield.<sup>q</sup> III With the empire, the præfect of the city had declined to a municipal officer, yet he still exercised in the last appeal the civil and criminal jurisdiction, and a drawn sword, which he received from the successors of Otho, was the mode of his investiture and the emblem of his functions.<sup>r</sup> The dignity was confined to the noble families of Rome: the choice of the people was ratified by the pope, but a triple oath of fidelity must have often embarrassed the præfect in the conflict of adverse duties.<sup>s</sup> A servant, in whom they possessed but a third share, was dismissed by the independent Romans: in his place they elected a patrician, but this title, which Charlemagne had not disdained, was too lofty for a citizen or a subject, and, after the first fervour of rebellion, they consented without reluctance to the restoration of the præfect. About fifty years after this event, Innocent the third, the most ambitious, or at least the most fortunate, of the pontiffs, delivered the Romans and himself from this badge of foreign dominion: he invested the præfect with a banner instead of sword, and absolved him from all dependence of oaths or service to the German emperors.<sup>t</sup> In his place an ecclesiastic, a present or future cardinal, was named by the pope to the civil government of Rome, but his jurisdiction has been reduced to a narrow compass, and in the days of freedom, the right or exercise was derived from the senate and people. IV After the revival of the senate,<sup>u</sup> the conscript fathers (if I may use the expression)

The coin

A D 1198—1216

Number and choice of the senate

were invested with the legislative and executive power, but their views seldom reached beyond the present day, and that day was most frequently disturbed by violence and tumult. In its utmost plenitude, the order or assembly consisted of fifty-six senators,<sup>x</sup> the most eminent of whom were distinguished by the title of counsellors, they were nominated, perhaps annually, by the people, and a previous choice of their electors, ten persons in each region, or parish, might afford a basis for a free and permanent constitution. The popes, who in this tempest submitted rather to bend than to break, confirmed by treaty the establishment and privileges of the senate, and expected from time, peace, and religion, the restoration of their government. The motives of public and private interest might sometimes draw from the Romans an occasional and temporary sacrifice of their claims, and they renewed their oath of allegiance to the successor of St. Peter and Constantine, the lawful head of the church and the republic.<sup>y</sup>

<sup>o</sup> Tacit Hist. iii. 69. 70.

<sup>p</sup> This partition of the noble and baser metals between the emperor and senate, must however be adopted, not as a positive fact, but as the probable opinion of the best antiquaries. (See the Science des Médailles of the Pere Joubert, tom. ii. p. 208—211 in the improved and scarce edition of the Baron de la Bastie.)

<sup>q</sup> In his twenty-seventh dissertation on the Antiquities of Italy (tom. ii. p. 559—569) Muratori exhibits a series of the senatorian coins, which bore the obscure names of Affortati, Infortiati, Provisini, Papariani. During this period all the popes, without exception Boniface VIII. abstained from the right of coinage, which was resumed by his successor Benedict XI. and regularly exercised in the court of Avignon.

<sup>r</sup> A German historian Gerard of Reichersperg, (in Baluz Miscell. tom. v. p. 64 apud Schmidt, Hist. des Allemans tom. iii. p. 265) thus describes the constitution of Rome in the eleventh century: "Graviores urbis et nobis negotia spectant ad Romanum pontificem, itemque ad Romanum imperatorem, sive illius vicarium urbis præfectum, qui de sua dignitate respicit utrumque, videlicet dominum papam cum facit hominum et dominum imperatorem a quo accipit summi potestatis insignia, sicut gladium exercitum."

<sup>s</sup> The words of a contemporary writer (Pandolph Pisan in Vite Paschal. ii. p. 357. 358) describe the election and oath of the præfect in 1118: inconsultis patribus locis præfectoria Laudes præ-

sectorum comitorum applausum juraturum populo in ambonem sublevant confirmari eum in urbe præfectum pelunt.

<sup>t</sup> Urbis præfectum ad ligum fidelitatem recepit, et per manum quod illi donavit de præfectura eum publice investivit, qui usque ad id temporis iuramento fidelitatis imperatori fuit obligatus et ab eo præfecturam tenuit hooorem (Gesta Innocent. III. in Muratori, tom. iii. p. 1. p. 487.)

<sup>u</sup> See Otto Frising. Chron. vii. 31 de Gest. Frederic. I. c. 27. <sup>x</sup> Our countryman Roger Hoveden, speaks of the single senators, of the Copuzzi family, &c. quorum temporibus melius regebatur Roma quam nunc (A. D. 1194) et temporibus lvi senatorum (Ducange, Gloss. tom. vi. p. 191 SENATORS).

<sup>y</sup> Muratori (dissert. xlii. tom. iii. p. 785—788) has published an original treaty Concordia inter D. nostrum papam Clementem III. et senatores populi Romani super regalibus et aliis dignitatibus urbis &c. anno 44<sup>to</sup> ænatu. The senate speaks and speaks with authority. Red dimitis ad prætoris labellibus dabitur presbyteria iuribusque pacem et fidelitatem &c. A elisrtula de Tenementis Tusculani dated in the 47th year of the same era, and confirmed decreto amplissimi ordinis senatus, acclamatione P. R. publice Capitolio consistent. It is there we find the difference of senators consilium and simple senators (Muratori, dissert. xlii. tom. iii. p. 787—789.)

The office of senator

The union and vigour of a public council was dissolved in a lawless city, and the Romans soon adopted a more strong and simple mode of administration. They condensed the name and authority of the senate in a single magistrate, or two colleagues, and as they were changed at the end of a year, or of six months, the greatness of the trust was compensated by the shortness of the term. But in this transient reign, the senators of Rome indulged their avarice and ambition: their justice was perverted by the interest of their family and faction, and as they punished only their enemies, they were obeyed only by their adherents. Anarchy, no longer tempered by the pastoral care of their bishop, admonished the Romans that they were incapable of governing themselves, and they sought abroad those blessings which they were hopeless of finding at home. In the same age, and from the same motives, most of the Italian republics were prompted to embrace a measure, which, however strange it may seem, was adapted to their situation, and productive of the most salutary effects.<sup>2</sup> They chose, in some foreign but friendly city, an impartial magistrate of noble birth and unblemished character, a soldier and a statesman, recommended by the voice of fame and his country, to whom they delegated for a time the supreme administration of peace and war. The compact between the governor and the governed was sealed with oaths and subscriptions, and the duration of his power, the measure of his stipend, the nature of their mutual obligations, were defined with scrupulous decision. They swore to obey him as their lawful superior, he pledged his faith to unite the indifference of a stranger with the zeal of a patriot. At his choice, four or six knights and civilians, his assessors in arms and justice, attended the Podesta,<sup>3</sup> who maintained at his own expense a decent retinue of servants and horses: his wife, his son, his brother, who might bias the affections of the judge, were left behind, during the exercise of his office he was not permitted to purchase land, to contract an alliance, or even to accept an invitation in the house of a citizen, nor could he honourably depart till he had satisfied the complaints that might be urged against his government.

It was thus, about the middle of the thirteenth century, that the Romans called from Bologna the senator Brancalione,<sup>4</sup> whose fame and merit have been rescued from oblivion by the pen of an English historian. A just anxiety for his reputation, a clear foresight of the difficulties of the task, had engaged him to refuse the honour

<sup>2</sup> Muratori (dissert. xlv. tom. iv. p. 64—92) has fully explained this mode of government, and the Oculus Pastoratus, which he has given at the end, is a treatise or sermon on the duties of these foreign magistrates.

<sup>3</sup> In the Latin writers, at least of the silver age, the title of Potestas was transferred from the office to the magistrate.
Hujus qui irribuit prætextam sumere maxis
An Fidenarum Gabiorumque esse Potestas.

<sup>4</sup> See the life and death of Brancalione in the Historia Major of Matthew Paris p. 741. 757. 792. 797. 799. 810. 823. 833. 836. 840. The multitude of pilgrims and suitors connected Rome and St. Alban's, and the resentment of the English clergy prompted them to rejoice whenever the popes were humbled and oppressed.

of their choice: the statutes of Rome were suspended, and his office prolonged to the term of three years. By the guilty and licentious he was accused as cruel, by the clergy he was suspected as partial, but the friends of peace and order applauded the firm and upright magistrate by whom those blessings were restored. No criminals were so powerful as to brave, so obscure as to elude, the justice of the senator. By his sentence two nobles of the Annibaldi family were executed on a gibbet, and he inexorably demolished, in the city and neighbourhood, one hundred and forty towers, the strong shelters of rapine and mischief. The bishop, as a simple bishop, was compelled to reside in his diocese, and the standard of Brancalione was displayed in the field with terror and effect. His services were repaid by the ingratitude of a people unworthy of the happiness which they enjoyed. By the public robbers, whom he had provoked for their sake, the Romans were excited to depose and imprison their benefactor, nor would his life have been spared, if Bologna had not possessed a pledge for his safety. Before his departure, the prudent senator had required the exchange of thirty hostages of the noblest families of Rome: on the news of his danger, and at the prayer of his wife, they were more strictly guarded, and Bologna, in the cause of honour, sustained the thunders of a papal interdict. This generous resistance allowed the Romans to compare the present with the past, and Brancalione was conducted from the prison to the capitol amidst the acclamations of a repentant people. The remainder of his government was firm and fortunate, and as soon as envy was appeased by death, his head, enclosed in a precious vase, was deposited on a lofty column of marble.<sup>5</sup>

The impotence of reason and virtue recommended in Italy a more effectual choice: instead of a private citizen, to whom they yielded a voluntary and precarious obedience, the Romans elected for their senator some prince of independent power, who could defend them from their enemies and themselves. Charles of Anjou and Provence, the most ambitious and warlike monarch of the age, accepted at the same time the kingdom of Naples from the pope, and the office of senator from the Roman people.<sup>6</sup> As he passed through the city, in his road to victory, he received their oath of allegiance, lodged in the Lateran palace, and smoothed in a short visit the harsh features of his despotic character. Yet even Charles was exposed to the inconstancy of the people, who saluted with the same acclamations the passages of his rival,

<sup>5</sup> Matthew Paris thus ends his account: Caput vero ipsius Brancalionis in vase pretioso super marmoream columnam collocatum, in signum sui valoris et probitatis, quasi reliquias, superstitione nimis et pompose veneratione fuerat enim superbiorum potentum et malefactorum urbis malleus et extirpator, et populi protector et defensor, veritatis et justitiae imitator et amator (p. 810). A biographer of Innocent IV. (Muratori Script. tom. iii. p. 591, 592) draws a less favourable portrait of this Ghibelline senator.

<sup>6</sup> The election of Charles of Anjou to the office of perpetual senator of Rome, is mentioned by the historians in the eighth volume of the Collection of Muratori, by Nicholas de Jamsilla, (p. 592.) the monk of Padua, (p. 724.) Sabas Malaspina, (l. ii. c. 9 p. 808.) and Ricordano Malespina, (c. 177 p. 699.)

the unfortunate Conradin, and a powerful avenger, who reigned in the capitol, alarmed the fears and jealousy of the popes. The absolute term of his life was interspersed by a renewal every third year, and the enmity of Nicholas the third obliged the Sicilian king to abdicate the government of Rome. In his bull, a perpetual law, the imperious pontiff asserts the truth, validity, and use, of the donation of Constantine, not less essential to the peace of the city than to the independence of the church, establishes the annual election of the senator, and formally disqualifies all emperors, kings, princes, and persons of an eminent and conspicuous rank.<sup>e</sup> This prohibitory clause was repealed in his own behalf by Martin the fourth, who humbly solicited the suffrage of the Romans. In the presence, and by the authority, of the people, two electors conferred, not on the pope, but on the noble and faithful Martin, the dignity of senator, and the supreme administration of the republic,<sup>f</sup> to hold during his natural life, and to exercise at pleasure by himself or his deputies. About fifty years afterwards, the same title was granted to the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, and the liberty of Rome was acknowledged by her two sovereigns, who accepted a municipal office in the government of their own metropolis.

In the first moments of rebellion, when Arnold of Brescia had inflamed their minds against the church, the Romans artfully laboured to conciliate the favour of the empire, and to recommend their merit and services in the cause of Cæsar. The style of their ambassadors to Conrad the third and Frederic the first, is a mixture of flattery and pride, the tradition and the ignorance of their own history.<sup>g</sup> After some complaint of his silence and neglect, they exhort the former of these princes to pass the Alps, and assume from their hands the imperial crown. "We beseech your majesty, not to disdain the humility of your sons and vassals, not to listen to the accusations of our common enemies, who calumniate the senate as hostile to your throne, who sow the seeds of discord, that they may reap the harvest of destruction. The pope and the Sicilian are united in an impious league to oppose our liberty and your coronation. With the blessing of God, our zeal and courage has hitherto defeated their attempts. Of their powerful and factious adherents, more especially the Frangipani, we have taken by assault the houses and turrets: some of these are occupied by our troops, and some are levelled with the ground. The Milvian bridge, which they had broken, is restored and fortified for your safe passage, and your army may enter the city without being annoyed from the castle of St Angelo. All that we have done, and all that we design, is for your honour and service, in the loyal hope, that you will speedily appear in person, to vindicate those rights which have been invaded by the clergy, to revive the dignity of the empire, and to surpass the fame and glory of your predecessors. May you fix your residence in Rome, the capital of the world: give laws to Italy, and the Teutonic kingdom, and imitate the example of Constantine and Justinian,<sup>h</sup> who, by the vigour of the senate and people, obtained the sceptre of the earth."<sup>i</sup> But these splendid and fallacious wishes were not cherished by Conrad the Franconian, whose eyes were fixed on the Holy Land, and who died without visiting Rome soon after his return from the Holy Land.

His nephew and successor, Frederic I. Frederic I
A D 1155 Barbarossa, was more ambitious of the imperial crown, nor had any of the successors of Otho acquired such absolute sway over the kingdom of Italy. Surrounded by his ecclesiastical and secular princes, he gave audience in his camp at Sutri to the ambassadors of Rome, who thus addressed him in a free and florid oration. "Incline your ear to the queen of cities, approach with a peaceful and friendly mind the precincts of Rome, which has cast away the yoke of the clergy, and is impatient to crown her legitimate emperor. Under your auspicious influence, may the primitive times be restored. Assert the prerogatives of the eternal city, and reduce under her monarchy the insolence of the world. You are not ignorant, that, in former ages, by the wisdom of the senate, by the valour and discipline of the equestrian order, she extended her victorious arms to the east and west, beyond the Alps, and over the islands of the ocean. By our sins, in the absence of our princes, the noble institution of the senate has sunk in oblivion: and with our prudence, our strength has likewise decreased. We have revived the senate, and the equestrian order, the counsels of the one, the arms of the other, will be devoted to your person and the service of the empire. Do you not hear the language of the Roman matron? You were a guest, I have adopted you as a citizen, a Transalpine stranger, I have elected you for my sovereign,<sup>k</sup> and given you myself, and all that is mine. Your first and most sacred duty, is to swear and subscribe, that you will shed your blood for the republic, that you will maintain in peace and justice the laws of the city and the charters of your predecessors, and that you

<sup>e</sup> The high sounding bull of Nicholas III. which founds his temporal sovereignty on the donation of Constantine, is still extant: and as it has been inserted by Boniface VIII. in the Serie of the Decretals: it must be received by the catholics, or at least by the papists as a sacred and perpetual law.

<sup>f</sup> I am indebted to Fleury (Hist. Eccles. tom. xliii. p. 306) for an extract of this Roman act, which he has taken from the Ecclesiastical Annals of Odericus Raynaldus, A D 1281, No 14 15.

<sup>g</sup> These letters and speeches are preserved by Otto bishop of Triumgen (Fabrie Piblint Lit. med. et infim. tom. v. p. 189 187) perhaps the noblest of historians: he was son of Leopold marquis of Austria, his mother, Agnes was daughter of the emperor Henry IV. and he was half brother and uncle to Conrad III. and Frederic I. He has left in seven books, a Chronicle of the Times in two the Gesta Frederici I. the last of which is inserted in the sixth volume of Muratori's historians.

<sup>h</sup> We desire (said the ignorant Romans) to restore the empire in omni status, quo fuit tempore Constantini et Justiniani qui totum orbem vi, ore senatus et populi Romanus sine fessure manebat.

<sup>i</sup> Otto Frising de Gestis Frederici I. l. i. c. 28. p. 662—664.

<sup>k</sup> Hispos erat citius feci. Advena sum: ex Transalpinis partibus p. incipem constitui.

soil for every species of grain, and the luxuriance of the vegetation all displayed the liberality of nature, and tempted the industry of man. But the Goths withstood all these temptations, and still adhered to a life of idleness, of poverty, and of rapine.

The Goths invaded the Roman provinces. The Seythian hordes, which, towards the east, bordered on the new settlements of the Goths presented nothing to their arms, except the doubtful chance of an unprofitable victory. But the prospect of the Roman territories was far more alluring, and the fields of Dacia were covered with rich harvests sown by the hands of an industrious, and exposed to be gathered by those of a warlike, people. It is probable, that the conquests of Trajan maintained by his successors less for any real advantage, than for ideal dignity, had contributed to weaken the empire on that side. The new and unsettled province of Dacia was neither strong enough to resist, nor rich enough to satiate, the rapaciousness of the barbarians. As long as the remote banks of the Niester were considered as the boundary of the Roman power, the fortifications of the Lower Danube were more carelessly guarded, and the inhabitants of Asia lived in supine security, fondly concerning themselves at an inaccessible distance from any barbarian invaders. The irruptions of the Goths, under the reign of Philip fatally convinced them of their mistake. The king, or leader, of that fierce nation traversed with contempt the province of Dacia, and passed both the Niester and the Danube without encountering any opposition capable of retarding his progress. The relaxed discipline of the Roman troops betrayed the most important posts where they were stationed, and the fear of deserved punishment induced great numbers of them to enlist under the Gothic standard. The various multitude of barbarians appeared at length under the walls of Marcianopolis a city built by Trajan in honour of his sister and at that time the capital of the second Mæsia.<sup>e</sup> The inhabitants consented to ransom their lives and property, by the payment of a large sum of money, and the invaders retreated back into their deserts, unmindful rather than satisfied, with the first success of their arms against an opulent but feeble country. Intelligence was soon transmitted to the emperor Decius, that Cniva king of the Goths, had passed the Danube a second time with more considerable forces: that his numerous detachments scattered devastation over the province of Asia whilst the main body of the army, consisting of seventy thousand Germans and Sarmatians, a force equal to the most daring achievements, required the presence of the Roman monarch, and the exertion of his military power.

Decius found the Goths engaged before Nicopolis, on the Jatruse, one of the many monuments of Trajan's victories.<sup>f</sup> On his approach they raised the siege, but with a design only of marching away to a conquest of greater importance, the siege of Philippopolis, a city of Thracia, founded by the father of Alexander, near the foot of Mount Haemus.<sup>g</sup> Decius followed them through a difficult country, and by forced marches, but when he imagined himself at a considerable distance from the rear of the Goths, Cniva turned with rapid fury on his pursuers. The camp of the Romans was surprised and pillaged, and for the first time, their emperor fled in disorder before a troop of half-armed barbarians. After a long resistance, Philippopolis, destitute of succour was taken by storm. A hundred thousand persons are reported to have been massacred in the sack of that great city. Many prisoners of consequence became a valuable accession to the spoil, and Priscus a brother of the late emperor Philip, blushed not to assume the purple under the protection of the barbarous enemies of Rome.<sup>h</sup> The time, however, consumed in that tedious siege, enabled Decius to revive the courage, restore the discipline, and recruit the numbers, of his troops. He intercepted several parties of Carpi, and other Germans, who were hastening to share the victory of their countrymen,<sup>i</sup> intrusted the passes of the mountains to officers of approved valour and fidelity,<sup>j</sup> repaired and strengthened the fortifications of the Danube and exerted his utmost vigilance to oppose either the progress or the retreat of the Goths. Encouraged by the return of fortune, he anxiously waited for an opportunity to retrieve, by a great and decisive blow, his own glory, and that of the Roman arms.<sup>k</sup>

At the same time when Decius was struggling with the violence of the tempest, his mind, calm and deliberate amidst the tumult of war, investigated the more general causes, that, since the age of the Antonines, had so impetuously urged the decline of the Roman greatness. He soon discovered that it was impossible to replace that greatness on a permanent basis without restoring public virtue, ancient principles and manners, and the oppressed majesty of the laws. To execute this noble but arduous design he first resolved to revive the obsolete office of censor, an Various events of the Gothic war A. D. 250.

Decius revives the office of censor in the person of Valerian.

<sup>e</sup> Gereziozical History of the Tartars p. 593. Mr. Bell (Vol. ii. p. 379) traversed the Ukraina in his journey from Petersburg to Constantinople. The modern face of the country is a just representation of the ancient scene, in the hands of the Cossacks it still remains in a state of nature.

<sup>f</sup> In the sixteenth chapter of Jornandes, instead of secundo Mæsiæ, we may venture to substitute arcadianam the second Mæsia, of which Marcianopolis was certainly the capital (see Hierocles de Provinciis, and Weseling ad locum p. 63. Itinerary). It is surprising how this palpable error of the scribe could escape the judicious correction of Gronovius.

<sup>g</sup> The place is still called Nicopolis. The little stream, on whose banks it stood fell into the Danube. D'Anville Geographie Ancienne tom. i. p. 37.

<sup>h</sup> Stephan Byzant. de Urbibus p. 740. Weseling Itinerary p. 136.

Zonaras, by an odd mistake ascribes the foundation of Philippopolis to the immediate predecessor of Decius.

<sup>i</sup> Ammian. xxxi. 5.

<sup>j</sup> Aurel. Victor c. 29.

<sup>k</sup> Victorius Carpica on some medals of Decius, insinuate these advantages.

<sup>l</sup> Claudius (who afterwards reigned with so much glory) was posted in the pass of Thermopylae with 2000 Sardinians, 100 heavy and 160 light horse 60 Cretan archers and 1000 well-armed recruits. See an original letter from the emperor to his officer, in the Augustan History p. 200.

<sup>m</sup> Jornandes, c. 16—18. Zonaras l. i. p. 22. In the general account of this war it is easy to discover the opposite prejudices of the Gothic and the Grecian writer. In carelessness alone they are alike.

will reward with five thousand pounds of silver, the faithful senators who shall proclaim your titles in the capitol. With the name, assume the character, of Augustus." The flowers of Latin rhetoric were not yet exhausted, but Frederic, impatient of their vanity, interrupted the orators in the high tone of royalty and conquest. "Famous indeed have been the fortitude and wisdom of the ancient Romans, but your speech is not seasoned with wisdom, and I could wish that fortitude were conspicuous in your actions. Like all sublunary things, Rome has felt the vicissitudes of time and fortune. Your noblest families were translated to the east, to the royal city of Constantine, and the remains of your strength and freedom have long since been exhausted by the Greeks and Franks. Are you desirous of beholding the ancient glory of Rome, the gravity of the senate, the spirit of the knights, the discipline of the camp, the valour of the legions? you will find them in the German republic. It is not empire, naked and alone, the ornaments and virtues of empire have likewise migrated beyond the Alps to a more deserving people.<sup>1</sup> They will be employed in your defence, but they claim your obedience. You pretend that myself or my predecessors have been invited by the Romans; you mistake the word, they were not invited, they were implored. From its foreign and domestic tyrants, the city was rescued by Charlemagne and Otho, whose ashes repose in our country, and their dominion was the price of your deliverance. Under that dominion your ancestors lived and died. I claim by the right of inheritance and possession, and who shall dare to extort you from my hands? Is the hand of the Franks<sup>m</sup> and Germans enfeebled by age? Am I vanquished? Am I a captive? Am I not encompassed with the banners of a potent and invincible army? You impose conditions on your master, you require oaths. If the conditions are just, an oath is superfluous, if unjust, it is criminal. Can you doubt my equity? It is extended to the meanest of my subjects. Will not my sword be unsheathed in the defence of the capitol? By that sword the northern kingdom of Denmark has been restored to the Roman empire. You prescribe the measure and the objects of my bounty, which flows in a copious but a voluntary stream. All will be given to patient merit, all will be denied to rude importunity."<sup>2</sup> Neither the emperor nor the senate could maintain these lofty pretensions of dominion and liberty.

<sup>1</sup> Non esset nobis nudum imperium, virtute sua amictum venit, ornamenta sua secum traxit. Penes nos sunt consules tui, &c. Cicero or. I. iv. would not have rejected these images, the eloquence of a barbarian born and educated in the Herynian forest.

<sup>2</sup> Otho of Frisingen, who surely understood the language of the court and diet of Germany, speaks of the Franks in the twelfth century as the reigning nation, (Proceres Franci equites Franci, manus Francorum,) he adds however, the epithet of Teutonici.

<sup>3</sup> Otho Frising de Gestis Frederici I. l. ii. c. 22. p. 720—723. These original and authentic acts I have translated and abridged with freedom yet with fidelity.

<sup>4</sup> From the Chronicles of Rinaldo and Francis Pepin, Muratori (dissert. xxvi. tom. ii. p. 492) has transcribed this curious fact with the doggerel verses that accompanied the gift.

Ave decus orbis ave! victis tibi destinam, ave!
Curru ubi Augusto Frederico Cesare iusto
Ve Mediolanum! jam senis speroere vanum Imperi vires proprias tibi tollere vires.

United with the pope, and suspicious of the Romans, Frederic continued his march to the Vatican. His coronation was disturbed by a sally from the capitol, and if the numbers and valour of the Germans prevailed in the bloody conflict, he could not safely encamp in the presence of a city of which he styled himself the sovereign. About twelve years afterwards, he besieged Rome, to seat an antipope in the chair of St. Peter, and twelve Pisan galleys were introduced into the Tiber, but the senate and people were saved by the arts of negotiation and the progress of disease, nor did Frederic or his successors reiterate the hostile attempt. Their laborious reigns were exercised by the popes, the crusades, and the independence of Lombardy and Germany, they courted the alliance of the Romans, and Frederic the second offered in the capitol the great standard, the Caraccio of Milan.<sup>o</sup> After the extinction of the house of Swabia, they were banished beyond the Alps, and their last coronations betrayed the impotence and poverty of the Teutonic Cæsars.<sup>p</sup>

Under the reign of Adrian, when the empire extended from the Euphrates to the ocean, from mount Atlas to the Grampian hills, a fanciful historian<sup>q</sup> amused the Romans with the picture of their infant wars. "There was a time," says Florus, "when Tibur and Præneste, our summer retreats, were the objects of hostile vows in the capitol, when we dreaded the shades of the Arician groves, when we could triumph without a blush over the nameless villages of the Sabines and Latins, and even Corioli could afford a title not unworthy of a victorious general." The pride of his contemporaries was gratified by the contrast of the past with the present, they would have been humbled by the prospect of futurity, by the prediction, that after a thousand years, Rome, despoiled of empire and contracted to her primæval limits, would renew the same hostilities, on the same ground which was then decorated with her villas and gardens. The adjacent territory on either side of the Tiber was always claimed, and sometimes possessed, as the patrimony of St. Peter, but the barons assumed a lawless independence, and the cities too faithfully copied the revolt and discord of the metropolis. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the Romans incessantly laboured to reduce or destroy the contumacious vassals of the church and senate, and if their headstrong and selfish am-

Wars of the Romans against the neighbouring cities

Ergo triumphum urbs potes memor esse priorum
Quos tibi mittebant reges qui bella gerebant

Ne si dec. tacere (I now use the Italian Dissertations tom. i. p. 444) else nell'anno 1727, una copia del Caraccio in marmo dianzi il noto si scoprì, nel Campidoglio, presso alle careere di quel luogo, dove Sisto V l'avea fatto rinchiudere. Stava esso posto sopra quattro colonne di marmo fino colla seguente inserzione, &c. to the same purpose as the old inscription.

<sup>p</sup> The decline of the imperial arms and authority in Italy is related with impartial learning in the Annals of Muratori (tom. x. xi. xii.) and the reader may compare his narrative with the Histoire des Allemans (tom. iii. iv.) by Schmidt, who has deserved the esteem of his countrymen.

<sup>q</sup> Tibur nunc suburbani, et æstivæ Præneste delitiæ, nuncupatis in Capitolio votis petebantur. The whole passage of Florus (l. i. c. 11) may be read with pleasure and has deserved the praise of a man of genius (L'uvres de Montesquieu, tom. iii. p. 634, 635 quarto edition.)

bition was moderated by the pope, he often encouraged their zeal by the alliance of his spiritual arms. Their warfare was that of the first consuls and dictators, who were taken from the plough. They assembled in arms at the foot of the capitol, sallied from the gates, plundered or burnt the harvests of their neighbours, engaged in tumultuary conflict, and returned home after an expedition of fifteen or twenty days. Their sieges were tedious and unskilful, in the use of victory, they indulged the meaner passions of jealousy and revenge, and instead of adopting the valour, they trampled on the misfortunes, of their adversaries. The captives, in their shirts, with a rope round their necks, solicited their pardon: the fortifications, and even the buildings, of the rival cities were demolished, and the inhabitants were scattered in the adjacent villages. It was thus that the seats of the cardinal bishops, Porto, Ostia, Albanum, Tusculum, Præneste, and Tibur or Tivoli, were successively overthrown by the ferocious hostility of the Romans. Of these, Porto and Ostia, the two keys of the Tiber, are still vacant and desolate, the marshy and unwholesome banks are peopled with herds of buffalos, and the river is lost to every purpose of navigation and trade. The hills which afford a shady retirement from the autumnal heats, have again smiled with the blessings of peace, Frascati has arisen near the ruins of Tusculum, Tibur or Tivoli has resumed the honours of a city, and the meaner towns of Albano and Palestrina are decorated with the villas of the cardinals and princes of Rome. In the work of destruction, the ambition of the Romans was often checked and repulsed by the neighbouring cities and their allies: in the first siege of Tibur, they were driven from their camp, and the battles of Tusculum<sup>a</sup> and Viterbo<sup>b</sup> might be compared in their relative state to the memorable fields of Thrasymene and Cannæ. In the first of these petty wars, thirty thousand Romans were overthrown by a thousand German horse, whom Frederic Barbarossa had detached to the relief of Tusculum, and if we number the slain at three, the prisoners at two, thousand, we shall embrace the most authentic and moderate account. Sixty-eight years afterwards they marched against Viterbo in the ecclesiastical state with the whole force of the city by a rare coalition the Teutonic eagle was blended, in the adverse banners, with the keys of St Peter, and the pope's auxiliaries were commanded by a count of Thoulouse and a bishop of Winchester. The Romans were discomfited with shame and slaughter, but the English prelate must have indulged the vanity of a pilgrim, if he multiplied their numbers to one hundred, and their loss in the field to thirty, thousand men. Had the policy of the senate and the discipline of the legions been restored with the capitol, the divided condition of Italy would have offered the fairest opportunity of a second conquest. But in arms the modern Romans were not above, and in arts, they were far below, the common level of the neighbouring republics. Nor was their warlike spirit of any long continuance, after some irregular sallies they subsided in the national apathy, in the neglect of military institutions, and in the disgraceful and dangerous use of foreign mercenaries.

Battle of Tusculum
A D 1167

Ambition is a weed of quick and early vegetation in the vineyard of the pope. Christ. Under the first christian princes, the chair of St Peter was disputed by the votes, the venality, the violence, of a popular election, the sanctuaries of Rome were polluted with blood, and, from the third to the twelfth century, the church was distracted by the mischief of frequent schisms. As long as the final appeal was determined by the civil magistrate, these mischiefs were transient and local: the merits were tried by equity or favour, nor could the unsuccessful competitor long disturb the triumph of his rival. But after the emperors had been divested of their prerogatives, after a maxim had been established, that the year of Christ is amenable to no earthly tribunal, each vacancy of the holy see might involve Christendom in controversy and war. The claims of the cardinals and inferior clergy, of the nobles and people, were vague and litigious: the freedom of choice was overruled by the tumults of a city that no longer owned or obeyed a superior. On the decease of a pope, two factions proceeded in different churches to a double election: the number and weight of votes, the priority of time, the merit of the candidates, might balance each other: the most respectable of the clergy were divided, and the distant princes, who bowed before the spiritual throne, could not distinguish the spurious, from the legitimate, idol. The emperors were often the authors of the schism, from the political motive of opposing a friendly to an hostile pontiff, and each of the competitors was reduced to suffer the insults of his enemies, who were not awed by conscience, and to purchase the support of his adherents, who were instigated by avarice or ambition. A peaceful and perpetual succession was ascertained by Alexander the third, who finally abolished the tumultuary votes of the clergy and

The election of the popes.

Right of the cardinals established by Alexander III
A D 1179

<sup>a</sup> Ne a fertate Romanorum, sicut fuerant Hostienses Portuenses, Tusulanenses Albanenses, Labicenses et nuper Tiburtini destruerentur (Matthew Paris, p. 757). These events are marked in the Annals and Index (the eighteenth volume) of Muratori.

<sup>b</sup> For the state or ruin of these suburban cities the banks of the Tiber &c see the lively picture of the P. Labat, (Voyage en Espagne et en Italie) who had not long resided in the neighbourhood of Rome, and the more accurate description of which P. Eschmard (Rome 1750 in octavo) has added to the topographical map of Campania.

<sup>c</sup> Labat (tom. iii. p. 233) mentions a recent decree of the Roman government which has severely mortified the pride and poverty of Tivoli: in civitate Tiburtina non vivitur civiliter.

<sup>d</sup> I depart from my usual method, of quoting only by the date the Annals of Muratori, in consideration of the critical balance in which he has weighed nine contemporary writers who mention the battle of Tusculum (tom. x. p. 42-44).

<sup>e</sup> Matthew Paris p. 345. This bishop of Winchester was Peter de Rupibus who occupied the see thirty two years (A D 1206-1238), and is described by the English historian as a soldier and a statesman, (p. 178-399).

<sup>f</sup> See Norheim Institut. Histor. Eccles. vol. 401-403. Alexander himself had nearly been the victim of a contested election and the doubtful merits of Innocent had only preponderated by the weight of genius and learning which St. Bernard cast into the scale. (See his life and writings.)

people, and defined the right of election in the sole college of cardinals.<sup>2</sup> The three orders of bishops, priests, and deacons, were assimilated to each other by this important privilege, the parochial clergy of Rome obtained the first rank in the hierarchy, they were indifferently chosen among the nations of Christendom, and the possession of the richest benefices, of the most important bishoprics, was not incompatible with their title and office. The senators of the catholic church, the coadjutors and legates of the supreme pontiff, were robed in purple, the symbol of martyrdom or royalty, they claimed a proud equality with kings and their dignity was enhanced by the smallness of their number, which till the reign of Leo the tenth, seldom exceeded twenty or twenty-five persons. By this wise regulation, all doubt and scandal were removed, and the root of schism was so effectually destroyed, that in a period of six hundred years a double choice has only once divided the unity of the sacred college. But as the concurrence of two thirds of the votes had been made necessary, the election was often delayed by the private interest and passions of the cardinals, and while they prolonged their independent reign, the christian world was left destitute of a head. A

Institution of the conclave by Gregory X.

A. D. 1274

vacancy of almost three years had preceded the elevation of Gregory the tenth, who resolved to prevent the future abuse, and his bull, after some opposition, has been consecrated in the code of the canon law.<sup>3</sup> Nine days are allowed for the obsequies of the deceased pope, and the arrival of the absent cardinals on the tenth, they are imprisoned, each with one domestic, in a common apartment or conclave, without any separation of walls or curtains; a small window is reserved for the introduction of necessaries, but the door is locked on both sides, and guarded by the magistrates of the city, to seclude them from all correspondence with the world. If the election be not consummated in three days, the luxury of their tables is contracted to a single dish at dinner and supper, and after the eighth day, they are reduced to a scanty allowance of bread, water, and wine. During the vacancy of the holy see, the cardinals are prohibited from touching the revenues, or assuming, unless in some rare emergency, the government of the church, all agreements and promises among the electors are formally annulled, and their integrity is fortified by their solemn oath and the prayers of the catholics. Some articles of inconvenient

<sup>2</sup> The origin, titles, importance, dress, precedence, &c. of the Roman cardinals, are very ably discussed by Thomassin (Discipline de l'Eglise, tom. i. p. 1262-1287) but their purple is now much faded. The sacred college was raised to the definite number of seventy two, to represent, under his vicar, the disciples of Christ.

<sup>3</sup> See the bull of Gregory X. approbante sacro concilio, in the Sexte of the Canon Law (l. i. tit. 6 c. 3) a supplement to the Decretals which Boniface VIII. promulgated at Rome in 1298, and addressed to all the universities of Europe.

<sup>4</sup> The genius of cardinal de Retz had a right to print a conclave (of 15-57) in which he was a spectator and an actor (Memoirs tom. ii. p. 15-57) but I am at a loss to appreciate the knowledge or authority of an anonymous Italian whose history (Conclavi de Pontifici Romani, in 4to, 1667) has been continued since the reign of Alexander VII. The accidental form of the work furnishes a lesson, though not an antidote to ambition. From a labyrinth of intrigues, we emerge to the adoration of the successful candidate, but the next page opens with his funeral.

<sup>5</sup> The expressions of cardinal de Retz are positive and picturesque

or superfluous rigour have been gradually relaxed, but the principle of confinement is vigorous and entire, they are still urged by the personal motives of health and freedom to accelerate the moment of their deliverance and the improvement of ballot or secret votes has wrapt the struggles of the conclave<sup>b</sup> in the silky veil of charity and politeness.<sup>c</sup> By these institutions, the Romans were excluded from the election of their prince and bishop and in the fever of wild and precarious liberty, they seemed insensible of the loss of this inestimable privilege. The emperor Lewis of Bavaria A. D. 1328 revived the example of the great Otho.

After some negotiation with the magistrates, the Roman people were assembled<sup>d</sup> in the square before St Peter's, the pope of Avignon, John the twenty-second, was deposed, the choice of his successor was ratified by their consent and applause. They freely voted for a new law, that their bishop should never be absent more than three months in the year, and two days' journey from the city and that if he neglected to return on the third summons, the public servant should be degraded and dismissed.<sup>e</sup> But Lewis forgot his own debility and the prejudices of the times beyond the precincts of a German camp, his useless phantom was rejected, the Romans despised their own workmanship, the antipope implored the mercy of his lawful sovereign,<sup>f</sup> and the exclusive right of the cardinals was more firmly established by this unseasonable attack.

Had the election been always held in the Vatican, the rights of the senate and people would not have been violated with impunity. But the Romans forgot, and were forgotten, in the absence of the successors of Gregory the seventh, who did not keep as a divine precept their ordinary residence in the city and diocese. The care of that diocese was less important than the government of the universal church, nor could the popes delight in a city in which their authority was always opposed, and their person was often endangered. From the persecution of the emperors, and the wars of Italy, they escaped beyond the Alps into the hospitable bosom of France, from the tumults of Rome they prudently withdrew to live and die in the more tranquil stations of Anagni, Perugia, Viterbo, and the adjacent cities. When the flock was offended or impoverished by the absence of the shepherd, they were recalled by a stern admonition, that St Peter had fixed his

Absence of the popes from
Rome

On y vécut toujours ensemble avec le même respect, et la même civilité que l'on observe dans le cabinet des rois, avec la même politesse qu'on avoit dans la cour de Henri III. avec la même familiarité que l'on voit dans les noviciats et avec la même charité du moins en apparence, qui pourroit être entre des frères parfaitement unis.

<sup>d</sup> Recheisti per brudo (says John Villani) sanctorum di Roma, e 52 del popolo et capitani di 25 e consoli, (consoli?) et 13 buone homini, uno per rione. Our knowledge is too imperfect to pronounce how much of this constitution was temporary, and how much ordinary and permanent. Yet it is faintly illustrated by the ancient statutes of Rome.

<sup>e</sup> Villani (l. x. c. 68-71 in Muratori, Script. tom. xii. p. 641-645) relates this law and the whole transaction, with much less abhorrence than the prudent Muratori. Any one conversant with the darker ages must have observed how much the sense (I mean the nonsense) of superstition is fluctuating and inconsistent.

<sup>f</sup> In the first volume of the popes of Avignon, see the second original Life of John XXII. p. 142-145 the confession of the antipope p. 145-152 and the laborious notes of Baluze, p. 714, 715.

chair, not in an obscure village, but in the capital of the world, by a ferocious menace that the Romans would march in arms to destroy the place and people that should dare to afford them a retreat. They returned with timorous obedience, and were saluted with the account of a heavy debt, of all the losses which their desertion had occasioned, the hire of lodgings, the sale of provisions, and the various expenses of servants and strangers who attended the court. After a short interval of peace, and perhaps of authority, they were again banished by new tumults, and again summoned by the imperious or respectful invitation of the senate. In these occasional retreats, the exiles and fugitives of the Vatican were seldom long, or far, distant from the metropolis, but in the beginning of the fourteenth century the apostolic throne was transported, as it might seem for ever, from the Tiber to the Rhone, and the cause of the transmigration may be deduced from the furious

Boniface VIII
A D 1294—1303

contest between Boniface the eighth and the king of France.<sup>b</sup> The spiritual arms of excommunication and interdiction were repulsed by the union of the three estates, and the privileges of the Gallican church, but the pope was not prepared against the carnal weapons which Philip the Fair had courage to employ. As the pope resided at Anagni, without the suspicion of danger, his palace and person were assaulted by three hundred horse, who had been secretly levied by William of Nogaret, a French minister, and Sciarra Colonna, of a noble but hostile family of Rome. The cardinals fled, the inhabitants of Anagni were seduced from their allegiance and gratitude, but the dauntless Boniface, unarmed and alone, seated himself in his chair, and invited, like the conscript fathers of old, the swords of the Gauls. Nogaret, a foreign adversary, was content to execute the orders of his master by the domestic enmity of Colonna, he was insulted with words and blows, and during a confinement of three days his life was threatened by the hardships which they inflicted on the obstinacy which they provoked. Their strange delay gave time and courage to the adherents of the church, who rescued him from sacrilegious violence, but his imperious soul was wounded in a vital part, and Boniface expired at Rome in a frenzy of rage and revenge. His memory is stained with the glaring vices of avarice and pride, nor has the courage of a martyr promoted this ecclesiastical champion to the honours of a saint—a magnanimous sinner, (say the chronicles of the times,) who entered like a fox, reigned like a lion, and died like a dog. He was succeeded by Benedict the eleventh, the mildest of mankind. Yet he excommunicated the impious emissaries of Philip, and devoted the city and people of Anagni by a tremendous curse, whose effects are still visible to the eyes of superstition.<sup>1</sup>

After his decease, the tedious and equal suspense of the conclave was fixed by the dexterity of the French faction. A specious offer was made and accepted, that, in the term of forty days, they would elect one of the three candidates who should be named by their opponents. The archbishop of Bourdeaux, a furious enemy of his king and country, was the first on the list, but his ambition was known, and his conscience obeyed the calls of fortune and the commands of a benefactor, who had been informed by a swift messenger that the choice of a pope was now in his hands. The terms were regulated in a private interview, and with such speed and secrecy was the business transacted, that the unanimous conclave applauded the elevation of Clement the fifth.<sup>2</sup> The cardinals of both parties were soon astonished by a summons to attend him beyond the Alps, from whence, as they soon discovered, they must never hope to return. He was engaged, by promise and affection, to prefer the residence of France, and, after dragging his court through Poitou and Gascony, and devouring, by his expense, the cities and convents on the road, he finally reposed at Avignon,<sup>3</sup> which flourished above seventy years<sup>m</sup> the seat of the Roman pontiff and the metropolis of Christendom. By land, by sea, by the Rhone, the position of Avignon was on all sides accessible, the southern provinces of France do not yield to Italy itself, new palaces arose for the accommodation of the pope and cardinals, and the arts of luxury were soon attracted by the treasures of the church. They were already possessed of the adjacent territory, the Venaisin county,<sup>n</sup> a populous and fertile spot, and the sovereignty of Avignon was afterwards purchased from the youth and distress of Jane, the first queen of Naples and countess of Provence, for the inadequate price of

<sup>1</sup> The original lives of the eight popes of Avignon, Clement V, John XXI, Benedict XII, Clement VI, Innocent VI, Urban V, Gregory XI, and Clement VII, are published by Stephen Baluze (Vite Paparum Avinionensium Paris 1693 2 vols. in 4to) with copious and elaborate notes and a second volume of acts and documents. With the true zeal of an editor and a patriot, he devoutly justifies or excuses the characters of his countrymen.

<sup>2</sup> The exile of Avignon is compared by the Italians with Babylon, and the Babylonish captivity. Such furious metaphors more suitable to the ardour of Petrarch than to the judgment of Muratori are gravely refuted in Baluze's preface. The Abbé de Sade is attracted between the love of Petrarch and of his country. Yet he modestly pleads that many of the local inconveniences of Avignon are now removed, and many of the vices against which the poet declaims had been imported with the Roman court by the strangers of Italy, (tom i. p. 23—28.)

<sup>3</sup> The comital Venaisin was ceded to the popes in 1273 by Philip III king of France, after he had inherited the dominions of the count of Thoulouse. Forty years before the heresy of count Raymond had given them a pretence of seizure and they derived some obscure claim from the eleventh century to some lands extra Rhodanum (Vaisin Notitia Galliarum p. 450 610 Longuerue Description de la France tom i. p. 376—381).

<sup>a</sup> Romani autem non valentes nec volentes ultra suam celare cupiditatem gravissimum contra papam movere cœperunt questionem exigentem ab eis urgentissime omnia quæ subierant per ejus abentiam damna et jacturas, vulchret in hospitibus loculis in mercimoniis in usuris, in redditibus in provisionibus, et in aliis modis innumerabilibus. Quod cum audisset papa preceporum illorum, et se compuleret musculatum, &c. Matt. Paris p. 757. For the ordinary history of the popes their life and death their residence and absence it is usual to refer to the ecclesiastical annals. Spondanus and Thury.

<sup>b</sup> Besides the general historians of the church of Italy and of France, we possess a valuable treatise composed by a learned friend of Thuanus, which his last and best editors have published in the appendix (Notice particulière du pape Boniface VIII et Philippe le Bel, par Pierre du Puy tom vii. p. xi. p. 61—82.)

<sup>c</sup> It is difficult to know whether Labat (tom i. p. 57—57) be in jest or in earnest when he supposes that Anagni still feels the weight of this curse and that the corn fields or vineyards or olive trees are annually blasted by nature the obsequious handmaid of the popes.

<sup>d</sup> See in the Chronicle of Giovanni Villani (l. vii. c. 63, 64 80 in Muratori tom xiii.) the imprisonment of Boniface VIII and the election of Clement V. the last of which, like most anecdotes, is embarrased with some difficulties.

four score thousand florins ° Under the shadow of the French monarchy, amidst an obedient people, the popes enjoyed an honourable and tranquil state, to which they long had been strangers but Italy deplored their absence, and Rome, in solitude and poverty, might repent of the ungovernable freedom which had driven from the Vatican the successor of St Peter Her repentance was tardy and fruitless after the death of the old members, the sacred college was filled with French cardinals, <sup>p</sup> who beheld Rome and Italy with abhorrence and contempt, and perpetuated a series of national, and even provincial, popes, attached by the most indissoluble ties to their native country

<sup>Institution of the jubilee or holy year
A D 1300</sup> The progress of industry had produced and enriched the Italian republics the æra of their liberty is the most flourishing period of population and agriculture, of manufactures and commerce, and their mechanic labours were gradually refined into the arts of elegance and genius But the position of Rome was less favourable, the territory less fruitful, the character of the inhabitants was debased by indolence and elated by pride, and they fondly conceived that the tribute of subjects must for ever nourish the metropolis of the church and empire This prejudice was encouraged in some degree by the resort of pilgrims to the shrines of the apostles, and the last legacy of the popes, the institution of the HOLY YEAR, <sup>q</sup> was not less beneficial to the people than to the clergy Since the loss of Palestine, the gift of plenary indulgences, which had been applied to the crusades, remained without an object, and the most valuable treasure of the church was sequestered above eight years from public circulation A new channel was opened by the diligence of Boniface the eighth, who reconciled the vices of ambition and avarice, and the pope had sufficient learning to recollect and revive the secular games, which were celebrated in Rome at the conclusion of every century To sound without danger the depth of popular credulity, a sermon was seasonably pronounced, a report was artfully scattered, some aged witnesses were pronounced, and on the first of January of the year thirteen hundred, the church of St Peter was crowded with the faithful, who demanded the customary indulgence of the holy time The pontiff, who watched and irritated their devout impatience, was soon persuaded by ancient testimony of the justice of their claim, and he proclaimed a plenary absolution to all catholics who,

° If a possession of four centuries were not itself a title, such objections might annul the bargain but the purchase money must be refunded, for indeed it was paid Civilatem Avenionem emil per ejusmodi venditionem pecuniâ redundantem, &c (2da Vila Clement VI in Baluz tom i p 272 Muratori, Script. tom iii p 11 p 563) The only temptation for Jane and her second husband was ready money, and without it they could not have returned to the throne of Naples

<sup>p</sup> Clement V immediately promoted ten cardinals, nine French and one English (Vita 4ta, p 63 et Baluz p 625, &c.) In 1331, the pope refused two candidates recommended by the king of France, quod xx Cardinales, de quibus xiiii de Regno Francie originem traxerunt nuncuntur in memorato collegio existant (Thomasio, Discipline de l'Eglise, tom i p 1281)

<sup>q</sup> Our primitive account is from Cardinal James Caietan (Ultima Dispositio, tom xxv) and I am at a loss to determine whether the nephew of Boniface VIII be a fool or a knave the uncle is a much clearer character

in the course of that year, and at every similar period, should respectfully visit the apostolic churches of St Peter and St Paul The welcome sound was propagated through Christendom, and at first from the nearest provinces of Italy, and at length from the remote kingdoms of Hungary and Britain, the highways were thronged with a swarm of pilgrims, who sought to expiate their sins in a journey, however costly or laborious, which was exempt from the perils of military service All exceptions of rank or sex, of age or infirmity, were forgotten in the common transport, and in the streets and churches many persons were trampled to death by the eagerness of devotion The calculation of their numbers could not be easy nor accurate, and they have probably been magnified by a dexterous clergy, well apprized of the contagion of example, yet we are assured by a judicious historian, who assisted at the ceremony, that Rome was never replenished with less than two hundred thousand strangers, and another spectator has fixed at two millions the total concourse of the year A trifling oblation from each individual would accumulate a royal treasure, and two priests stood night and day, with rakes in their hands, to collect, without counting, the heaps of gold and silver that were poured on the altar of St Paul It was fortunately a season of peace and plenty, and if forage was scarce, if inns and lodgings were extravagantly dear, an inexhaustible supply of bread and wine, of meat and fish, was provided by the policy of Boniface and the venal hospitality of the Romans From a city without trade or industry, all casual riches will speedily evaporate but the avarice and envy of the next generation solicited Clement the sixth<sup>r</sup> to anticipate the distant period of the century The gracious pontiff complied with their wishes, afforded Rome this poor consolation for his loss, and justified the change by the name and practice of the Mosaic jubilee His summons was obeyed, and the number, zeal, and liberality, of the pilgrims did not yield to the primitive festival But they encountered the triple scourge of war, pestilence, and famine many wives and virgins were violated in the castles of Italy, and many strangers were pillaged or murdered by the savage Romans, no longer moderated by the presence of their bishop To the impatience of the popes we may ascribe the successive reduction to fifty, thirty-three, and twenty-five years, although the second of these terms is commensurate with the

<sup>r</sup> See John Villani (l viii c 36) in the twelfth, and the Chronicon Astruce, in the eleventh volume (p 191 192) of Muratori's Collectio Papa innumerabilem pecuniam ab eisdem accepit, nam duo clerici, cum ristra &c

<sup>s</sup> The two bulls of Boniface VIII and Clement VI are inserted in the Corpus Juris Canonici (Extravaganti Commun l r lii c 12)

<sup>t</sup> The sabbatic years and jubilees of the Mosaic law (Cyr Sigon de Republica Hebræorum, Opp tom iv l iii c 14, 15 p 151 152) the suspension of all care and labour the periodical release of lands debts, servitude &c may seem a noble idea, but the extension would be impracticable in a pifane republic, and I should be glad to learn that this ruinous festival was observed by the Jewish people

<sup>u</sup> See the chronicle of Matteo Villani (l i c 56) in the fourteenth volume of Muratori, and the Memoires sur la Vie de Petrarque tom i p 75—89

life of Christ The profusion of indulgences, the revolt of the protestants, and the decline of superstition, have much diminished the value of the jubilee yet even the nineteenth and last festival was a year of pleasure and profit to the Romans, and a philosophic smile will not disturb the triumph of the priest or the happiness of the people *

The nobles or barons of Rome In the beginning of the eleventh century, Italy was exposed to the feudal tyranny, alike oppressive to the sovereign and the people The rights of human nature were vindicated by her numerous republics, who soon extended their liberty and dominion from the city to the adjacent country The sword of the nobles was broken, their slaves were enfranchised, their castles were demolished, they assumed the habits of society and obedience, their ambition was confined to municipal honours, and in the proudest aristocracy of Venice or Genoa, each patrician was subject to the laws But the feeble and disorderly government of Rome was unequal to the task of curbing her rebellious sons, who scorned the authority of the magistrate within and without the walls It was no longer a civil contention between the nobles and plebeians for the government of the state the barons asserted in arms their personal independence, their palaces and castles were fortified against a siege, and their private quarrels were maintained by the numbers of their vassals and retainers In origin and affection, they were aliens to their country and a genuine Roman, could such have been produced, might have renounced these haughty strangers, who disdained the appellation of citizens, and proudly styled themselves the princes, of Rome After a dark series of revolutions, all records of pedigree were lost the distinction of surnames were abolished, the blood of the nations was mingled in a thousand channels, and the Goths and Lombards, the Greeks and Franks, the Germans and Normans, had obtained the fairest possessions by royal bounty, or the prerogative of valour These examples might be readily presumed but the elevation of an Hebrew race to the rank of senators and consuls, is an event without a parallel in the long captivity of these miserable exiles In the time of Leo the ninth, a wealthy and learned Jew

was converted to christianity, and honoured at his baptism with the name of his godfather, the reigning pope The zeal and courage of Leo the son of Leo were signalized in the cause of Gregory the seventh, who intrusted his faithful adherent with the government of Adrian's mole, the tower of Crescentius, or, as it is now called, the castle of St Angelo Both the father and the son were the parents of a numerous progeny their riches, the fruits of usury, were shared with the noblest families of the city, and so extensive was their alliance, that the grandson of the proselyte was exalted by the weight of his kindred to the throne of St Peter A majority of the clergy and people supported his cause he reigned several years in the Vatican, and it is only the eloquence of St Bernard, and the final triumph of Innocent the second, that has branded Anacletus with the epithet of antipope After his defeat and death the posterity of Leo is no longer conspicuous, and none will be found of the modern nobles ambitious of descending from a Jewish stock It is not my design to enumerate the Roman families, which have failed at different periods, or those which are continued in different degrees of splendour to the present time The old consular line of the Frangipani discover their name in the generous act of breaking or dividing bread in a time of famine, and such benevolence is more truly glorious than to have enclosed, with their allies the Corsi, a spacious quarter of the city in the chains of their fortifications the Savelli, as it should seem a Sabine race, have maintained their original dignity, the obsolete surname of the Capizucchi is inscribed on the coins of the first senators, the Conti preserve the honour, without the estate, of the counts of Signia, and the Annibaldi must have been very ignorant, or very modest, if they had not descended from the Carthaginian hero <sup>d</sup>

But among, perhaps above, the peers and princes of the city, I distinguish the rival houses of COLONNA and URSINI, whose private story is an essential part of the annals of modern Rome The name and arms of Colonna have been the theme of much doubtful etymology, nor have the orators and antiquarians overlooked either Trajan's pillar, or the columns of Heracles, domestic fables, may be offended with his firm and temperate criticism yet surely some ounces of pure gold are of more value than many pounds of base metal

The earliness of St George, in his poetical, or rather metrical history of the election and coronation of Boniface VIII (Muratori Script Ital tom iii p 1 p 641, &c.) describes the state and families of Rome at the coronation of Boniface VIII (A D 1295)

Intercon titulus redimittit san, uine et armis
Illustrisque viri Romanæ stirpe trahentes
Nomen, in emeritis tantæ virtutis honores
Intulerant se mediis, festumque colebant, Aurati fulgentes toga sociate ceteris
Ex ipsa devota domus præstantis ab Urbe
Ecclesie vultumque gerens demissis attum
Festa Columna jocis, necnon Sabellica mitis Stephaniles senior, Comites, Ambulica proles, Præfectusque urbis magnus sine viribus nomen

(t ii c 5 100 p 647 648)
The ancient statutes of Rome (l iii c 59 p 174, 175) distinguish eleven families of barons who are obliged to swear in concilio communi before the senator, that they would not harbour or protect any malefactor, nulltaws, &c — a feeble security

It is pity that the Colonn themselves have not favoured the world with a complete and critical history of their illustrious house I add here to Muratori (Dissert xlii tom iii p 647 648)

* The subject is entrusted by M Chauv a French minister at the Hague, in his Lettres Historiques et Do, matiques, sur les Jubiles et les Indulgences in Haye 1751 3 vols in 12mo, an elaborate and pleasing work had not the author preferred the character of a polemic to that of a philosopher

y Muratori (Dissert xlii) alleges the Annals of Florence Paulus Genna &c the analogy of the rest, the evidence of Otho of Frisingen (de Gest Fred I l ii c 13) and the submission of the marquis of Este z As early as the year 824, the emperor Lothure I found it expedient to interrogate the Roman people, to learn from each individual by what national law he chose to be governed (Muratori Dissert xxii)

a Petrarch attacks these foreigners the tyrants of Rome in a declaration or epistle full of bold truths and absurd pedantry, in which he applies the maxims and even prejudices of the old republic to the state of the fourteenth century (Mémoires tom iii p 157—169)

b The origin and adventures of this Jewish family are noticed by Pagi (Critica, tom ii p 435 A D 1124 Nn 3 4) who draws his information from the Chronographus Maurignacensis and Arnulphus Sigensis de Schismate (in Muratori Script Ital tom iii p 1 p 423—432). The fact must in some degree be true, yet I could wish that it had been more coolly related before it was turned into a reproach against the antipope

c Muratori has given two dissertations (xli and xlii) to the names surnames and families of Italy Some nobles, who glory in their do or the pillar of Christ's flagellation, or the luminous column that guided the Israelites in the desert. Their first historical appearance in the year eleven hundred and four, attests the power and antiquity, while it explains the simple meaning, of the name. By the usurpation of Cavæ, the Colonna provoked the arms of Paschal the second, but they lawfully held in the Campagna of Rome, the hereditary fiefs of Zagarola and Colonna, and the latter of these towns was probably adorned with some lofty pillar, the relic of a villa or temple.<sup>f</sup> They likewise possessed one moiety of the neighbouring city of Tusculum, a strong presumption of their descent from the counts of Tusculum, who in the tenth century were the tyrants of the apostolic see. According to their own and the public opinion, the primitive and remote source was derived from the banks of the Rhine,<sup>g</sup> and the sovereigns of Germany were not ashamed of a real or fabulous affinity with a noble race, which in the revolutions of seven hundred years has been often illustrated by merit, and always by fortune.<sup>h</sup> About the end of the thirteenth century, the most powerful branch was composed of an uncle and six brothers, all conspicuous in arms, or in the honours of the church. Of these, Peter was elected senator of Rome, introduced to the capitol in a triumphant car, and hailed in some vain acclamations with the title of Cæsar, while John and Stephen were declared marquis of Ancona and count of Romagna, by Nicholas the fourth, a patron so partial to their family, that he has been delineated in satirical portraits, imprisoned as it were in a hollow pillar.<sup>i</sup> After his decease, their haughty behaviour provoked the displeasure of the most implacable of mankind. The two cardinals, the uncle and the nephew, denied the election of Boniface the eighth, and the Colonna were oppressed for a moment by his temporal and spiritual arms.<sup>k</sup> He proclaimed a crusade against his personal enemies, their estates were confiscated, their fortresses on either side of the Tiber were besieged by the troops of St Peter and those of the rival nobles, and after the ruin of Palestrina or Præneste, their principal seat, the ground was marked with a ploughshare, the emblem of perpetual desolation. Degraded, banished, proscribed, the six brothers, in disguise and danger, wandered over Europe without renouncing the hope of deliverance and revenge. In this double hope, the French court was their surest asylum: they prompted and directed the enterprise of Philip, and I should praise their magnanimity, had they respected the misfortune and courage of the captive tyrant. His civil acts were annulled by the Roman people, who restored the honours and possessions of the Colonna, and some estimate may be formed of their wealth by their losses, of their losses by the damages of one hundred thousand gold florins which were granted them against the accomplices and heirs of the deceased pope. All the spiritual censures and disqualifications were abolished<sup>l</sup> by his prudent successors, and the fortune of the house was more firmly established by this transient hurricane. The boldness of Sciarra Colonna was signalized in the captivity of Boniface, and long afterwards in the coronation of Lewis of Bavaria, and by the gratitude of the emperor, the pillar in their arms was encircled with a royal crown. But the first of the family in fame and merit was the elder Stephen, whom Petrarch loved and esteemed as a hero superior to his own times, and not unworthy of ancient Rome. Persecution and exile displayed to the nations his abilities in peace and war, in his distress he was an object, not of pity, but of reverence, the aspect of danger provoked him to avow his name and country, and when he was asked, "where is now your fortress?" he laid his hand on his heart, and answered, "here." He supported with the same virtue the return of prosperity, and, till the ruin of his declining age, the ancestors, the character, and the children of Stephen Colonna, exalted his dignity in the Roman republic, and at the court of Avignon.

and Ursini

II The Ursini migrated from Spo-leto,<sup>m</sup> the sons of Ursus, as they are styled in the twelfth century, from some eminent person, who is only known as the father of their race. But they were soon distinguished among the nobles of Rome, by the number and bravery of their kinsmen, the strength of their towers, the honours of the senate and sacred college, and the elevation of two popes, Celestin the third and Nicholas the third, of their name and lineage.<sup>n</sup> Their riches may be accused as an early abuse of nepotism: the estates of St Peter were alienated in their favour by the liberal <sup>f</sup> Prodolph Pisin in Vit Paschal II in Muratori, Script Ital tom ii p 335. The family has still great possessions in the Campagna of Rome, but they have alienated to the Rospighosi this original fief of Colonna (Eschard, p 258, 259).

<sup>g</sup> Te lon, inquit dedit tellus et præcua Rhæni, says Petrarch, and, in 1447, a duke of Guelders and Juliers acknowledges (Lefant, Hist du Concile de Constance tom ii p 539) his descent from the ancestors of Martin V (Otho Colonna) but the royal author of the Memoirs of Brandenburg observes, that the sceptre in his arms has been confounded with the column. To maintain the Roman origin of the Colonna, it was ingeniously supposed, (Diario di Monaldeschi, in the Script Ital tom xii p 533) that a cousin of the emperor Nero escaped from the city, and founded Mentz in Germany.

<sup>h</sup> I cannot overlook the Roman triumph or ovation of Marco Antonio Colonna, who had commanded the pope's army at the naval victory of Lepanto (Thurn Hist i 7 tom ii p 55, 56 Muret Oratio x Opp tom i p 180-190).

<sup>i</sup> Muratori, Annali d Italia, tom x p 216 220.

<sup>k</sup> Petrarch's attachment to the Colonna has authorized the Abbé de Sade to expatiate on the state of the family in the fourteenth century, the persecution of Boniface VIII the character of Stephen and his sons, their quarrels with the Ursini &c (Memoires sur Petrarque tom i p 98-110 146-148 174-170 222-230 275-280). His criticism often

rectifies the hearsay stories of Villani and the errors of the less diligent moderns. I understand the branch of Stephen to be now extinct.

<sup>l</sup> Alexander III had declared the Colonna who adhered to the emperor Frederic I incapable of holding any ecclesiastical benefice (Villani, l v c 1) and the last stains of annual excommunication, were purified by Sixtus V (Vita di Sisto V tom iii p 416). Treason, sacrilege, and proscription, are often the best titles of ancient nobility.

<sup>m</sup> Appenninigenæ quæ præta iurentia syl æst
Spoletanæ metunt armentis, repes protegent
Monaldeschi (tom xii Script Ital p 533) gives the Ursini a French origin, which may be remotely true.

<sup>n</sup> In the medieval life of Celestin V by the cardinal of St George, (Muratori, tom iii p 1 p 613, &c) we find a luminous, and not inelegant, passage (l i c 3 p 203 &c)

genitum quem nobilis Ursæ (Ursini?)
Progenies, Romanæ domus, veteratque magnis Fascibus in clero, pompasque exparta senatus, Bellorumque manu grandi stipata parentum
Cardines apices neenon fasti, in dudum Papatus iterata tenens

Muratori (Dissert viii tom iii p ) observes, that the first Ursini pontificate of Celestin III was unknown he is inclined to read Ursini progenies

Celestin,<sup>o</sup> and Nicholas was ambitious for their sake to solicit the alliance of monarchs, to found new kingdoms in Lombardy and Tuscany, and to invest them with the perpetual office of senators of Rome. All that has been observed of the greatness of the Colonna, will likewise redound to the glory of the Ursini, their constant and equal antagonists in the long hereditary feud, which distracted above two hundred and fifty years the ecclesiastical state.

Their hereditary feuds. The jealousy of pre-eminence and power was the true ground of their quarrel, but as a specious badge of distinction, the Colonna embraced the name of Ghibelines and the party of the empire, the Ursini espoused the title of Guelphs and the cause of the church. The eagle and the keys were displayed in their adverse banners, and the two factions of Italy most furiously raged when the origin and nature of the dispute were long since forgotten.<sup>p</sup> After the retreat of the popes to Avignon, they disputed in arms the vacant republic, and the mischiefs of discord were perpetuated by the wretched compromise of electing each year two rival senators. By their private hostilities, the city and country were desolated, and the fluctuating balance inclined with their alternate success. But none of either family had fallen by the sword, till the most renowned champion of the Ursini was surprised and slain by the younger Stephen Colonna.<sup>q</sup> His triumph is stained with the reproach of violating the truce, their defeat was basely avenged by the assassination, before the church-door, of an innocent boy and his two servants. Yet the victorious Colonna, with an annual colleague, was declared senator of Rome during the term of five years. And the muse of Petrarch inspired a wish, a hope, a prediction, that the generous youth, the son of his venerable hero, would restore Rome and Italy to their pristine glory, that his justice would extirpate the wolves and lions, the serpents and bears, who laboured to subvert the eternal basis of the marble COLUMN.<sup>r</sup>

CHAP LXX

Character and coronation of Petrarch — Restoration of the freedom and government of Rome by the

<sup>o</sup> Filii Ursi quondam Celestini pape nepotes de bonis ecclesie Romanie ditati (Vit Innocent III in Muratori Script tom iii p 1) The partial profligacy of Nicholas III is more conspicuous in Villani and Muratori. Yet the Ursini would disdain the nephews of a modern pope.

<sup>p</sup> In his fifty first Dissertation on the Italian Antiquities Muratori explains the factions of the Guelphs and Ghibelines.

<sup>q</sup> Petrarch (tom i p 222—230) has celebrated the victory according to the Colonna but two contemporaries, a Florentine (Giovanni Villani, l x c 220) and a Roman (Ludovico Monaldeschi, p 533 334) are less favourable to their arms.

<sup>r</sup> The Abbé de Sade (tom i Notes p 61—66) has applied the sixth Canzone of Petrarch, Spirto Gentil, &c to Stephen Colonna the younger.

Ora lupi, leoni, aquile e serpi
Ad una gran marmorea Colonna
Fanno nojo savente e à se ilanuo

<sup>a</sup> The Mémoires sur la Vie de François Petrarque (Amsterdam 1764, 1767 3 vols in 4to) form a copious original, and entertaining work a labour of love composed from the accurate study of Petrarch and his contemporaries. But the hero is too often lost in the general history of the age, and the author too often lags, wishes in the affectation of polite news and gallantry. In the preface to his first volume, he enumerates and weighs his twenty Italian biographers, who have professedly treated of the same subject.

<sup>b</sup> The allegorical interpretation prevailed in the fifteenth century, but the wise commentators were not agreed whether they should tribute Rienzi — His virtues and vices, his expulsion and death — Return of the popes from Avignon — Great schism of the west — Re-union of the Latin church — Last struggles of Roman liberty — Statutes of Rome — Final settlement of the ecclesiastical state.

IN the apprehension of modern times, Petrarch<sup>a</sup> is the Italian songster of Laura and love. In the harmony of his Tuscan rhymes, Italy applauds, or rather adores, the father of her lyric poetry and his verse, or at least his name, is repeated by the enthusiasts, or affectation, of amorous sensibility. Whatever may be the private taste of a stranger, his slight and superficial knowledge should humbly acquiesce in the taste of a learned nation, yet I may hope or presume, that the Italians do not compare the tedious uniformity of sonnets and elegies, with the sublime compositions of their epic muse, the original wildness of Dante, the regular beauties of Tasso, and the boundless variety of the incomparable Ariosto. The merits of the lover I am still less qualified to appreciate nor am I deeply interested in a metaphysical passion for a nymph so shadowy, that her existence has been questioned,<sup>b</sup> for a matron so prolific,<sup>c</sup> that she was delivered of eleven legitimate children,<sup>d</sup> while her amorous swain sighed and sung at the fountain of Vaucluse.<sup>e</sup> But in the eyes of Petrarch, and those of his graver contemporaries, his love was a sin, and Italian verse a frivolous amusement. His Latin works of philosophy, poetry, and eloquence, established his serious reputation, which was soon diffused from Avignon over France and Italy. His friends and disciples were multiplied in every city and if the ponderous volume of his writings<sup>f</sup> be now abandoned to a long repose, our gratitude must applaud the man, who by precept and example revived the spirit and study of the Augustan age. From his earliest youth, Petrarch aspired to the poetic crown. The academical honours of the three faculties had introduced a royal degree of master or doctor in the art of poetry,<sup>g</sup> and the title of poet-laureat, which custom, rather than vanity, perpetuates in the understand by Laura religion, or virtue or the blessed Virgin, or — See the prefaces to the first and second volume.

<sup>c</sup> Laure de Noves born about the year 1307 was married in January 1375 to Hugues de Saie, a noble citizen of Avignon whose jealousy was not the effect of love since he married a second wife within seven months of her death, which happened the 6th of April 1348 precisely one and twenty years after Petrarch had seen and loved her.

<sup>d</sup> Corpus crebris partibus exhaustum from one of these is issued, in the tenth de-ree, the Abbé de Sade, the fond and grateful biographer of Petrarch, and this domestic motive most probably suggested the idea of his work and urged him to inquire into every circumstance that could affect the history and character of his grandmother (See particularly tom i p 122—133 notes, p 7—58 tom ii p 455—495 notes p 76—82).

<sup>e</sup> Vaucluse, so familiar to our English travellers is described from the writings of Petrarch and the local knowledge of his biographer (Mémoires tom i p 340—359). It was in truth, the retreat of a hermit and the moderns are much mistaken if they place Laura and a trippier lover in the grotto.

<sup>f</sup> Of 1250 pages in a close print at Basil in the sixteenth century, but without the date of the year. The Abbé de Sade calls aloud for a new edition of Petrarch's Latin works, but I much doubt whether it would redound to the profit of the bookseller, or the amusement of the public.

<sup>g</sup> Consult Setten's Titles of Honour in his works (vol iii p 45—466). A hundred years before Petrarch St Francis received the visit of a poet, qui ab imperatore fuerat coronatus exinde rursus quidam

English court.<sup>a</sup> was first invented by the Cæsars of Germany. In the musical games of antiquity, a prize was bestowed on the victor,<sup>b</sup> the belief that Virgil and Horace had been crowned in the capitol inflamed the emulation of a Latin bard,<sup>c</sup> and the laurel<sup>d</sup> was endeared to the lover by a verbal resemblance with the name of his mistress. The value of either object was enhanced by the difficulties of the pursuit, and if the virtue or prudence of Laura was inexorable,<sup>e</sup> he enjoyed, and might boast of enjoying, the nymph of poetry. His vanity was not of the most delicate kind, since he applauds the success of his own labours, his name was popular, his friends were active, the open or secret opposition of envy and prejudice was surmounted by the dexterity of patient merit. In the thirty-sixth year of his age, he was solicited to accept the object of his wishes, and on the same day, in the solitude of Vaucluse, he received a similar and solemn invitation from the senate of Rome and the university of Paris. The learning of a theological school, and the ignorance of a lawless city, were alike unqualified to bestow the ideal though immortal wreath which genius may obtain from the free applause of the public and of posterity, but the candidate dismissed this troublesome reflection, and after some moments of complacency and suspense, preferred the summons of the metropolis of the world.

His poetic coronation at Rome,
A.D. 1341
April 8

The ceremony of his coronation<sup>f</sup> was performed in the capitol, by his friend and patron the supreme magistrate of the republic. Twelve patrician youths were arrayed in scarlet, six representatives of the most illustrious families, in green robes, with garlands of flowers, accompanied the procession, in the midst of the princes and nobles, the senator, count of Anguillara, a kinsman of the Colonna, assumed his throne, and at the voice of a herald Petrarch arose. After discoursing on a text of Virgil, and thrice repeating his vows for the prosperity of Rome, he knelt before the throne, and received from the senator a laurel crown, with a more precious declaration, "This is the reward of merit." The people shouted, "Long

<sup>a</sup> From Augustus to Louis the muse has too often been false and veiled, but I much doubt whether any age or court can produce a similar establishment of a stipendiary poet, who in every reign, and at all events, is bound to furnish twice a year a measure of praise and verse such as may be sung in the chapel, and, I believe, in the presence of the sovereign. <sup>b</sup> I speak the more freely, as the best time for abolishing this ridiculous custom, is while the prince is a man of virtue, and the poet a man of genius.

<sup>c</sup> Isocrates (in Panegyrico, tom. i. p. 116, 117 edit. Bittie Cantab. 1729) claims for his native Athens the glory of first instituting and recommending the αγῶνας καὶ τὰ ἀθλὰ μέγιστα μη μοιούσας καὶ ρωμῆς ἀλλὰ καὶ λαῶν καὶ γυναικῶν. The example of the Panathenæa was imitated at Delphi, but the Olympic games were ignorant of a musical crown till it was extorted by the tyranny of Nero (Sueton. in Nerone, c. 23, Philostratus apud Crasobon id. locum, Dion Cassius, or Xiphilinus l. lxxiii p. 1032 1041. Potter's Greek Antiquities vol. i. p. 445 460).

<sup>d</sup> The Capitoline games (certamen quinquennale, musicum, equestre, gymnasticum) were instituted by Domitian (Sueton. c. 4) in the year of Christ 86, (Censorius de Die Natali c. 18 p. 100 edit. Havercamp) and were not abolished in the fourth century (Ammianus de Professoribus of Statius (Capitolii nostre inficiata lyre, Sylv. l. iii. v. 31) may do more Domitian and the senators of Rome were ignorant that the laurel was not the Capitoline, but the Delphic, crown (Pha. Hist. Natur. xi. 39. Hist. Critique de la Republique des Lettres, tom. i. p. 150—220).

<sup>e</sup> Petrarch and the senators of Rome were ignorant that the laurel was not the Capitoline, but the Delphic, crown (Pha. Hist. Natur. xi. 39. Hist. Critique de la Republique des Lettres, tom. i. p. 150—220).

life to the capitol and the poet.<sup>g</sup> A sonnet in praise of Rome was accepted as the effusion of genius and gratitude, and after the whole procession had visited the Vatican, the profane wreath was suspended before the shrine of St Peter. In the act of diploma<sup>h</sup> which was presented to Petrarch, the title and prerogatives of poet-laureat are revived in the capitol, after the lapse of thirteen hundred years, and he receives the perpetual privilege of wearing, at his choice, a crown of laurel, ivy, or myrtle, of assuming the poetic habit, and of teaching, disputing, interpreting, and composing, in all places whatsoever, and on all subjects of literature. The grant was ratified by the authority of the senate and people, and the character of citizen was the recompence of his affection for the Roman name. They did him honour, but they did him justice. In the familiar society of Cicero and Livy, he had imbibed the ideas of an ancient patriot, and his ardent fancy kindled every idea to a sentiment, and every sentiment to a passion. The aspect of the seven hills and their majestic ruins confirmed these lively impressions, and he loved a country by whose liberal spirit he had been crowned and adopted. The poverty and debasement of Rome excited the indignation and pity of her grateful son, he dissembled the faults of his fellow-citizens, applauded with partial fondness the last of their heroes and matrons, and in the remembrance of the past, in the hope of the future, was pleased to forget the miseries of the present time. Rome was still the lawful mistress of the world, the pope and the emperor, her bishop and general, had abdicated their station by an inglorious retreat to the Rhone and the Danube, but if she could resume her virtue, the republic might again vindicate her liberty and dominion. Amidst the indulgence of enthusiasm and eloquence,<sup>i</sup> Petrarch, Italy, and Europe, were astonished by a revolution which realized for a moment his most splendid visions. The rise and fall of the tribune Rienzi will occupy the following pages,<sup>j</sup> the subject is interesting, the materials are rich, and the glance of a patriot-bard<sup>k</sup> will some-

The virtues in the capitol were crowned with a garland of oak leaves (Martial, l. iv. epigram 54).

<sup>m</sup> The pious grandson of Laura has laboured, and not without success, to vindicate her immaculate chastity against the censures of the grave and the sneers of the profane, (tom. ii. notes, p. 76—82.)

<sup>n</sup> The whole process of Petrarch's coronation is accurately described by the Abbe de Sade, (tom. i. p. 425—435 tom. ii. p. 1—8 notes p. 1—13) from his own writings and the Roman Diary of Ludovico Mouridsen, without mixing in this authentic narrative the more recent fables of Sannuccio Delbene.

<sup>o</sup> The original act is printed among the Pieces Justificatives in the Memoires sur Petrarque tom. iii. p. 50—53.

<sup>p</sup> To find the proofs of his enthusiasm for Rome I need only request that the reader would open, by chance either Petrarch, or his French biographer. The latter has described the poet's first visit to Rome, (tom. i. p. 323—335.) But in the place of much idle rhetoric and morality Petrarch might have amused the present and future age with an original account of the city and his coronation.

<sup>q</sup> It has been treated by the pen of a Jesuit the P. du Cerceau, whose posthumous work, (Conjuration de Nicolas Gabrini, dit de Rienzi Tyrant de Rome en 1347) was published at Paris 1748 in 12mo I am indebted to him for some facts and documents in John Hocsemius, canon of Liege, a contemporary historian (Fabricius, Bib. lat. med. ævi, tom. iii. p. 273 tom. iv. p. 85).

<sup>r</sup> The Abbe de Sade who so freely expatiates on the history of the fourteenth century, might treat as his proper subject a revolution in which the heart of Petrarch was so deeply engaged. (Memoires, tom. ii. p. 50 51 720—417 notes p. 70—76 tom. iii. p. 221—243 366—377.) Not an idea or a fact in the writings of Petrarch has probably escaped him.

times vivify the copious, but simple, narrative of the Florentine,* and more especially of the Roman,† historian

Birth character, and patriotic designs of Rienzi

In a quarter of the city which was inhabited only by mechanics and Jews, the marriage of an innkeeper and a washerwoman produced the future deliverer of Rome. From such parents Nicholas Rienzi Gabriini could inherit neither dignity nor fortune, and the gift of a liberal education, which they painfully bestowed, was the cause of his glory and untimely end. The study of history and eloquence, the writings of Cicero, Seneca, Livy, Cæsar, and Valerius Maximus, elevated above his equals and contemporaries the genius of the young plebeian. He perused with indefatigable diligence the manuscripts and marbles of antiquity, loved to dispense his knowledge in familiar language, and was often provoked to exclaim, "Where are now these Romans? their virtue, their justice, their power? why was I not born in those happy times?"* When the republic addressed to the throne of Avignon an embassy of the three orders, the spirit and eloquence of Rienzi recommended him to a place among the thirteen deputies of the commons. The orator had the honour of haranguing pope Clement the sixth, and the satisfaction of conversing with Petrarch, a congenial mind, but his aspiring hopes were chilled by disgrace and poverty, and the patriot was reduced to a single garment and the charity of the hospital. From this misery he was relieved by the sense of merit or the smile of favour, and the employment of apostolic notary afforded him a daily stipend of five gold florins, a more honourable and extensive connexion, and the right of contrasting, both in words and actions, his own integrity with the vices of the state. The eloquence of Rienzi was prompt and persuasive: the multitude is always prone to envy and censure: he was stimulated by the loss of a brother and the impunity of the assassins, nor was it possible to excuse or exaggerate the public calamities. The blessings of peace and justice, for which civil society has been instituted, were banished from Rome: the jealous citizens, who might have endured every personal or pecuniary injury, were most deeply wounded in the dishonour of their wives and daughters: they were equally oppressed by the arrogance of the nobles and the corruption of the magistrates, and the abuse of arms or of laws was the only circumstance that distinguished the lions, from the dogs and serpents, of the capitol. These allegorical emblems were variously repeated in the pictures which Rienzi exhibited in the streets and churches, and while the spectators gazed with curious wonder, the bold and ready orator unfolded the meaning, applied the satire, inflamed their passions, and announced a distant hope of comfort and deliverance. The privileges of Rome, her eternal sovereignty over her princes and provinces, was the theme of his public and private discourse, and a monument of servitude became in his hands a title and incentive of liberty. The decree of the senate, which granted the most ample prerogatives to the emperor Vespasian, had been inscribed on a copper-plate still extant in the choir of the church of St John Lateran. A numerous assembly of nobles and plebeians was invited to this political lecture, and a convenient theatre was erected for their reception. The notary appeared, in a magnificent and mysterious habit, explained the inscription by a version and commentary,† and descended with eloquence and zeal on the ancient glories of the senate and people, from whom all legal authority was derived. The supine ignorance of the nobles was incapable of discerning the serious tendency of such representations: they might sometimes elatise with words and blows the plebeian reformer, but he was often suffered in the Colonna palace to amuse the company with his threats and predictions, and the modern Brutus‡ was concealed under the mask of folly and the character of a buffoon. While they indulged their contempt, the restoration of the good estate, his favourite expression, was entertained among the people as a desirable, a possible, and at length as an approaching, event, and while all had the disposition to applaud, some had the courage to assist, their promised deliverer.

A prophecy, or rather a summons, affixed on the church door of St George, was the first public evidence of his designs, a nocturnal assembly of a hundred citizens on mount Aventine, the first step to their execution. After an oath of secrecy

He assumes the government of Rome
A D 1347
May 20

* Giovanni Vallani, l. xii c. 89 104 in Muratori, Rerum Italicarum Scriptores tom. xiii p. 969 970 981—983.

† In his third volume of Italian antiquities (p. 249—548) Muratori has inserted the Fragmenta Historiæ Romanæ ab anno 1327 usque ad annum 1354, in the original dialect of Rome or Naples in the fourteenth century, and a Latin version for the benefit of strangers. It contains the most particular and authentic life of Cola (Nicholas) di Rienzi which had been printed at Bracciano, 1627, in quarto under the name of Tomaso Fortihera, who is only mentioned in this work as having been punished by the tribune for forgery. Human nature is scarcely capable of such sublime or stupid impartiality: but whosoever is the author of these Fragmenta he wrote on the spot and at the time and paints without design or art, the manners of Rome and the character of the tribune.

‡ The first and splendid period of Rienzi's tribunate government, is contained in the eighteenth chapter of the Fragmenta (p. 399—479) which, in the new division forms the second book of the history in thirty eight smaller chapters or sections.

§ The reader may be pleased with a specimen of the original idiom. Fo di sun juncutafine nutrituto di latte de eloquentin bono grammatice migliore rectorico autoretta bravo. Deli como et quito era veloce letture motto usava Tito Livio Seneca et Tullio, et Valerio Massimo muto h dilettava le magnificentie di Julio Cesare raccontare. Tutta la die se speculava negli intagli di marmo le quali raccio intorno Roma. Non era altri che esso che sapesse leggere li antichi pitalli. Tutte sculture antiche vulgarizzava queste figure di marmo justamente interprelava. Oh come spesso diceva, "Dove sono quelli boni Romani? dove ene loro somma justitia? poteramme trovare in tempo che questi furano!"

† Petrarch compares the jealousy of the Romans with the easy temper of the husband of Avignon (Memires, tom. i p. 330).

‡ The fragments of the Lex Regia may be found in the Inscriptions of Gruter, tom. i p. 242, and at the end of the Tacitus of Ernesti with some learned notes of the editor, tom. ii.

§ I cannot overlook a stupendous and laughable blunder of Rienzi. The Lex Regia empowers Vespasian to enlarge the Pomerium, a word familiar to every antiquary. It was not so to the tribune. He confounds it with pomarium an orchard, translates la Jardine de Roma cioene Italia and is copied by the less excusable ignorance of the Latin translator, (p. 406) and the French historian, (p. 33). Even the learning of Muratori has slumbered over the passage.

¶ Priari (Bruto) tamen similior, juvenis uterque longe, in enim quum eius simulationem inderat ut sub hoc obtentu liberator ille P. R. appareretur tempore suo. Ille regibus hic tyrannis contemptus. (Opp. p. 536)

office, which, as long as it had subsisted in its pristine integrity, had so much contributed to the perpetuity of the state,<sup>a</sup> till it was usurped and gradually neglected by the Cæsars.<sup>b</sup> Conscious that the favour of the sovereign may confer power, but that the esteem of the people can alone bestow authority, he submitted the choice of the censor to the unbiassed voice of the senate. By their unanimous votes, or

A D 251 27th October rather acclamations, Valerian, who was afterwards emperor, and who then served with distinction in the army of Decius, was declared the most worthy of that exalted honour. As soon as the decree of the senate was transmitted to the emperor, he assembled a great council in his camp, and, before the investiture of the censor elect, he apprized him of the difficulty and importance of his great office. "Happy Valerian," said the prince to his distinguished subject, "happy in the general approbation of the senate and of the Roman republic! Accept the censorship of mankind, and judge of our manners. You will select those who deserve to continue members of the senate, you will restore the equestrian order to its ancient splendour; you will improve the revenue, yet moderate the public burthens. You will distinguish into regular classes the various and infinite multitude of citizens, and accurately review the military strength, the wealth, the virtue, and the resources of Rome. Your decisions shall obtain the force of laws. The army, the palace, the ministers of justice, and the great officers of the empire, are all subject to your tribunal. None are exempted, excepting only the ordinary consuls,<sup>c</sup> the præfect of the city, the king of the sacrifices, and (as long as she preserves her chastity inviolate) the eldest of the vestal virgins. Even these few, who may not dread the severity, will anxiously solicit the esteem, of the Roman censor!"

A magistrate, invested with such extensive powers, would have appeared not so much the minister as the colleague of his sovereign.<sup>d</sup> Valerian justly dreaded an elevation so full of envy and of suspicion. He modestly urged the alarming greatness of the trust, his own insufficiency, and the incurable corruption of the times. He artfully insinuated, that the office of censor was inseparable from the imperial dignity, and that the feeble hands of a subject were unequal to the support of such an immense weight of cares and of power.<sup>e</sup> The approaching event of war soon put an end to the prosecution of a project so specious but so impracticable, and whilst it preserved Valerian from the danger, saved the emperor Decius from the disappointment, which would most probably have attended it. A censor may maintain, he can never restore, the morals of a state. It is impossible for such a magistrate to exert his authority with benefit, or even with effect, unless he is supported by a quick sense of honour and virtue in the minds of the people, by a decent reverence for the public opinion, and by a train of useful prejudices combating on the side of national manners. In a period when these principles are annihilated, the censorial jurisdiction must either sink into empty pageantry, or be converted into a partial instrument of vexatious oppression.<sup>f</sup> It was easier to vanquish the Goths than to eradicate the public vices, yet, even in the first of these enterprises, Decius lost his army and his life.

The Goths were now, on every side, <sup>Defect and death of Decius and his son</sup> surrounded and pursued by the Roman arms. The flower of their troops had perished in the long siege of Philippopolis, and the exhausted country could no longer afford subsistence for the remaining multitude of licentious barbarians. Reduced to this extremity, the Goths would gladly have purchased, by the surrender of all their booty and prisoners, the permission of an undisturbed retreat. But the emperor, confident of victory, and resolving, by the chastisement of these invaders, to strike a salutary terror into the nations of the north, refused to listen to any terms of accommodation. The high-spirited barbarians preferred death to slavery. An obscure town of Mæsia, called Forum Terebroni,<sup>g</sup> was the scene of the battle. The Gothic army was drawn up in three lines, and, either from choice or accident, the front of the third line was covered by a morass. In the beginning of the action, the son of Decius, a youth of the fairest hopes, and already associated to the honours of the purple, was slain by an arrow, in the sight of his afflicted father, who, summoning all his fortitude, admonished the dismayed troops, that the loss of a single soldier was of little importance to the republic.<sup>h</sup> The conflict was terrible, it was the combat of despair against grief and rage. The first line of the Goths at length gave way in disorder, the second, advancing to sustain it, shared its fate, and the third only remained entire, prepared to dispute the passage of the morass, which was imprudently attempted by the presumption of the enemy. "Here the fortune of the day turned, and all things became adverse to the Romans. The place deep with ooze, sinking under those who stood, slippery to such as advanced, their armour heavy, the waters deep, nor could they wield, in that uneasy situation, their weighty javelins. The barbarians, on the contrary, were inured to encounters in the bogs,

<sup>a</sup> Montesquieu, Grandeur et Décadence des Romains c. viii. He illustrates the nature and use of the censorship with his usual ingenuity, and with uncommon precision.

<sup>b</sup> Vespasian and Titus were the last censors (Plin. Hist. Natur. vii. 49. Censorinus de Die Natali). The modesty of Trajan refused an honour which he deserved, and his example became a law to the Antonines. See Pliny's Panegyric, c. 42. and 60.

<sup>c</sup> Yet in spite of this exemption Pompey appeared before that tribunal during his consulship. The occasion indeed was equally singular and honourable. Plutarch in Pomp. p. 630.

<sup>d</sup> See the original speech in the Augustan Hist. p. 173, 171.

<sup>e</sup> This transaction might deceive Zonaras, who supposes that Valerian was actually declared the colleague of Decius, l. vii. p. 625.

<sup>f</sup> Hist. August. p. 171. The emperor's reply is omitted.

<sup>g</sup> Such as the attempt of Augustus towards a reformation of manners. Tacit. Annal. iii. 24.

<sup>h</sup> Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs Romains iii. p. 598. As Zosimus and some of his followers mistake the Danube for the Tanais, they place the field of battle in the plains of Scythia.

<sup>i</sup> Aurelius Victor allows two distinct actions for the death of the two Decii, but I have preferred the account of Jornandes.

and aid, he represented to the conspirators the importance and facility of their enterprise, that the nobles, without union or resources, were strong only in the fear of their imaginary strength, that all power, as well as right, was in the hands of the people, that the revenues of the apostolical chamber might relieve the public distress, and that the pope himself would approve their victory over the common enemies of government and freedom. After securing a faithful band to protect his first declaration, he proclaimed through the city, by sound of trumpet, that on the evening of the following day all persons should assemble without arms before the church of St Angelo, to provide for the re-establishment of the good estate. The whole night was employed in the celebration of thirty masses of the Holy Ghost, and in the morning, Rienzi, bare-headed, but in complete armour, issued from the church, encompassed by the hundred conspirators. The pope's vicar, the simple bishop of Orvieto, who had been persuaded to sustain a part in this singular ceremony, marched on his right hand, and three great standards were borne aloft as the emblems of their design. In the first, the banner of liberty, Rome was seated on two lions, with a palm in one hand and a globe in the other. St Paul, with a drawn sword, was delineated in the banner of justice, and in the third, St Peter held the keys of concord and peace. Rienzi was encouraged by the presence and applause of an innumerable crowd, who understood little, and hoped much, and the procession slowly rolled forwards from the castle of St Angelo to the capitol. His triumph was disturbed by some secret emotion which he laboured to suppress: he ascended without opposition, and with seeming confidence, the citadel of the republic, harangued the people from the balcony, and received the most flattering confirmation of his acts and laws. The nobles, as if destitute of arms and counsels, beheld in silent consternation this strange revolution, and the moment had been prudently chosen, when the most formidable, Stephen Colonna, was absent from the city. On the first rumour, he returned to his palace, affected to despise this plebeian tumult, and declared to the messengers of Rienzi, that at his leisure he would cast the madman from the windows of the capitol. The great bell instantly rang an alarm, and so rapid was the tide, and so urgent was the danger, that Colonna escaped with precipitation to the suburb of St Laurence from thence, after a moment's refreshment, he continued the same speedy career till he reached in safety his castle of Palestrina, lamenting his own imprudence, which had not trampled the spark of this mighty conflagration. A general and peremptory order was issued from the capitol to all the nobles, that they should peaceably retire to their estates: they obeyed, and their departure secured the tranquillity of the free and obedient citizens of Rome.

But such voluntary obedience evaporates with the first transports of zeal, <sup>with the title and office of tribune</sup> and Rienzi felt the importance of justifying his usurpation by a regular form and a legal title. At his own choice, the Roman people would have displayed their attachment and authority, by lavishing on his head the names of senator or consul, of king or emperor: he preferred the ancient and modest appellation of tribune, the protection of the commons was the essence of that sacred office, and they were ignorant, that it had never been invested with any share in the legislative or executive powers of the republic. In this character, and <sup>Laws of the good estate</sup> with the consent of the Romans, the tribune enacted the most salutary laws for the restoration and maintenance of the good estate. By the first he fulfils the wish of honesty and inexperience, that no civil suit should be protracted beyond the term of fifteen days. The danger of frequent perjury might justify the pronouncing against a false accuser the same penalty which his evidence would have inflicted: the disorders of the times might compel the legislator to punish every homicide with death, and every injury with equal retaliation. But the execution of justice was hopeless till he had previously abolished the tyranny of the nobles. It was formally provided, that none, except the supreme magistrate, should possess or command the gates, bridges, or towers, of the state: that no private garrisons should be introduced into the towns or castles of the Roman territory: that none should bear arms, or presume to fortify their houses in the city or country, that the barons should be responsible for the safety of the highways, and the free passage of provisions, and that the protection of malefactors and robbers should be expiated by a fine of a thousand marks of silver. But these regulations would have been impotent and nugatory, had not the licentious nobles been awed by the sword of the civil power. A sudden alarm from the bell of the capitol could still summon to the standard above twenty thousand volunteers, the support of the tribune and the laws required a more regular and permanent force. In each harbour of the coast, a vessel was stationed for the assurance of commerce, a standing militia of three hundred and sixty horse and thirteen hundred foot was levied, clothed, and paid in the thirteen quarters of the city: and the spirit of a commonwealth may be traced in the grateful allowance of one hundred florins, or pounds, to the heirs of every soldier who lost his life in the service of his country. For the maintenance of the public defence, for the establishment of granaries, for the relief of widows, orphans, and indigent convents, Rienzi applied, without fear of sacrilege, the revenues of the apostolic chamber: the three branches of hearth-money, the salt-duty, and the customs, were each of the annual produce of one hundred thousand florins,<sup>c</sup> and scandalous were the

<sup>c</sup> In one MS I read (l. ii c. 4 p. 409) perfumante quatro solli in another quatro florini an important variety, since the florin was worth ten Roman solidi (Muratori, dissert. xxviii). The former reading

would give us a population of 25 000, the latter of 250 000, families and I much fear, that the former is more consistent with the decay of Rome and her territory.

abuses, if in four or five months the amount of the salt-duty could be trebled by his judicious economy. After thus restoring the forces and finances of the republic, the tribune recalled the nobles from their solitary independence, required their personal appearance in the capitol, and imposed an oath of allegiance to the new government, and of submission to the laws of the good estate. Apprehensive for their safety, but still more apprehensive of the danger of a refusal, the princes and barons returned to their houses at Rome in the garb of simple and peaceful citizens. The Colonna and Ursini, the Savelli and Frangipani, were confounded before the tribunal of a plebeian, of the vile buffoon whom they had so often derided, and their disgrace was aggravated by the indignation which they vainly struggled to disguise. The same oath was successively pronounced by the several orders of society, the clergy and gentlemen, the judges and notaries, the merchants and artisans, and the gradual descent was marked by the increase of sincerity and zeal. They swore to live and die with the republic and the church, whose interest was artfully united by the nominal association of the bishop of Orvieto, the pope's vicar, to the office of tribune. It was the boast of Rienzi, that he had delivered the throne and patrimony of St Peter from a rebellious aristocracy, and Clement the sixth, who rejoiced in its fall, affected to believe the professions, to applaud the merits, and to confirm the title, of his trusty servant. The speech, perhaps the mind, of the tribune, was inspired with a lively regard for the purity of the faith, he insinuated his claim to a supernatural mission from the Holy Ghost, enforced by a heavy forfeiture the annual duty of confession and communion, and strictly guarded the spiritual as well as the temporal welfare of his faithful people.<sup>a</sup>

Freedom and prosperity of the Roman republic. Never perhaps has the effect of a single mind been more remarkably felt than in the sudden, though transient, reformation of Rome by the tribune Rienzi. A den of robbers was converted to the discipline of a camp or convent. patient to hear, swift to redress, inexorable to punish, his tribunal was always accessible to the poor and stranger, nor could birth, or dignity, or the immunities of the church, protect the offender or his accomplices. The privileged houses, the private sanctuaries in Rome, on which no officer of justice would presume to trespass, were abolished, and he applied the timber and iron of their barricades in the fortifications of the capitol. The venerable father of the Colonna was exposed in his own palace to the double shame of being desirous, and of being unable, to protect a criminal. A mule, with a jar of oil, had been stolen near Capranica, and the lord of the Ursini family was condemned to restore the damage, and to discharge a fine of four hundred florins for his negligence in guarding the highways. Nor were the persons of the barons more inviolate than their lands or houses, and, either from accident or design, the same impartial rigour was exercised against the heads of the adverse factions. Peter Agapet Colonna, who had himself been senator of Rome, was arrested in the street for injury or debt, and justice was appeased by the tardy execution of Martin Ursini, who, among his various acts of violence and rapine, had pillaged a shipwrecked vessel at the mouth of the Tiber.<sup>c</sup> His name, the purple of two cardinals, his uncles, a recent marriage, and a mortal disease, were disregarded by the inflexible tribune, who had chosen his victim. The public officers dragged him from his palace and nuptial bed. his trial was short and satisfactory. the bell of the capitol convened the people, stript of his mantle, on his knees, with his hands bound behind his back, he heard the sentence of death, and after a brief confession Ursini was led away to the gallows. After such an example, none who were conscious of guilt could hope for impunity, and the sight of the wicked, the licentious, and the idle, soon purified the city and territory of Rome. In this time (says the historian) the woods began to rejoice that they were no longer infested with robbers, the oxen began to plough, the pilgrims visited the sanctuaries, the roads and runs were replenished with travellers, trade, plenty, and good faith, were restored in the markets, and a purse of gold might be exposed without danger in the midst of the highway. As soon as the life and property of the subject are secure, the labours and rewards of industry spontaneously revive. Rome was still the metropolis of the christian world, and the fame and fortunes of the tribune were diffused in every country by the strangers who had enjoyed the blessings of his government.

The deliverance of his country inspired Rienzi with a vast, and perhaps visionary, idea of uniting Italy in a great federative republic, of which Rome should be the ancient and lawful head, and the free cities and princes the members and associates. His pen was not less eloquent than his tongue, and his numerous epistles were delivered to swift and trusty messengers. On foot, with a white wand in their hand, they traversed the forests and mountains, enjoyed, in the most hostile states, the sacred security of ambassadors, and reported, in the style of flattery or truth, that the highways along their passage were lined with kneeling multitudes, who implored Heaven for the success of their undertaking. Could passion have listened to reason, could private interest have yielded to the public welfare, the supreme tribunal and confederate union of the Italian republic might have healed their intestine less selfish than those of Sicily and Genoa. 3 The navigation from Marseilles was a coasting voyage to the mouth of the Tiber where they took shelter in a storm but instead of finding the current un- fortunately ran on a shoal. The vessel was stranded the mariners escaped. 4 The cargo which was pillaged consisted of the revenue of Provence for the royal treasury, many bags of pepper and cinnamon and bales of French cloth, to the value of 20,000 florins a rich prize

<sup>a</sup> Hæcsemius p. 399 opud du Cerceau, Hist de Rienzi p. 194. The fifteen tribunitian laws may be found in the Roman historian (whom for brevity I shall name) Fortificæ l. ii c. 4.

<sup>c</sup> Fortificæ l. ii c. 11. From the account of this shipwreck, we learn some circumstances of the trade and navigation of the age. 1 The ship was built and freighted at Naples for the ports of Marseilles and Avignon. 2 The sailors were of Naples and the isle of Cænara, discord, and closed the Alps against the barbarians of the north. But the propitious season had elapsed, and if Venice, Florence, Siena, Perugia, and many inferior cities, offered their lives and fortunes to the good estate, the tyrants of Lombardy and Tuscany must despise, or hate, the plebeian author of a free constitution. From them, however, and from every part of Italy, the tribune received the most friendly and respectful answers: they were followed by the ambassadors of the princes and republics, and in this foreign conflux, on all the occasions of pleasure or business, the low-born notary could assume the familiar or majestic courtesy of a sovereign.<sup>f</sup> The most glorious circumstance of his reign was an appeal to his justice from Lewis king of Hungary, who complained, that his brother, and her husband, had been perfidiously strangled by Jane queen of Naples.<sup>g</sup> Her guilt or innocence was pleaded in a solemn trial at Rome, but after hearing the advocates,<sup>h</sup> the tribune adjourned this weighty and invidious cause, which was soon determined by the sword of the Hungarian. Beyond the Alps, more especially at Avignon, the revolution was the theme of curiosity, wonder, and applause. Petrarch and celebrated by Petrarch had been the private friend, perhaps the secret counsellor, of Rienzi: his writings breathe the most ardent spirit of patriotism and joy, and all respect for the pope, all gratitude for the Colonna, was lost in the superior duties of a Roman citizen. The poet-laureat of the Capitol maintains the act, applauds the hero, and mingles with some apprehension and advice the most lofty hopes of the permanent and rising greatness of the republic.<sup>i</sup>

His vices and follies. While Petrarch indulged these prophetic visions, the Roman hero was fast declining from the meridian of fame and power, and the people, who had gazed with astonishment on the ascending meteor, began to mark the irregularity of its course, and the vicissitudes of its light and obscurity. More eloquent than judicious, more enterprising than resolute, the faculties of Rienzi were not balanced by cool and commanding reason: he magnified in a tenfold proportion the objects of hope and fear, and prudence, which could not have erected, did not presume to fortify, his throne. In the blaze of prosperity, his virtues were insensibly tinctured with the adjacent vices, justice with

<sup>f</sup> It was thus that Oliver Cromwell's old acquaintance, who remembered his vulgar and ungracious entrance into the House of Commons, were astonished at the ease and majesty of the protector on his throne, (see Harris's Life of Cromwell p. 27—34 from Clarendon, Warwick, Whitelock, Waller, &c.) The consciousness of merit and power will sometimes elevate the manners to the station.

<sup>g</sup> See the causes, circumstances, and effects of the death of Andrew, in Grunone, (tom. iii. l. xxiii. p. 220—229) and the life of Petrarch (Memoires, tom. ii. p. 143—148, 245—250, 375—379 notes, p. 21—37) The Abbe de Sade wishes to extenuate her guilt.

<sup>h</sup> The advocate who pleaded against Jane, could add nothing to the local force and brevity of his master's epistle. Johanni<sup>1</sup> mordita viti precedens, relento potestatis in regno, neglecta, vindicta, viri alter suspectus et excusatio subsequens necis viri tui te probant fuisse participem et consortium. Jane of Naples, and Mary of Scotland, have a singular conformity.

<sup>i</sup> See the Epistolæ Hortatoriæ de Capessenda Republica, from Petrarch to Nicholas Rienzi, (Opp. p. 535—540) and the fifth eclogue or pastoral: perpetual and obscure allusion.

<sup>k</sup> In his Romæ Questions, Plutarch (Opusculum tom. i. p. 505, 506 edit. Grev. Hen. Steph.) states on the most constitutional principles the simple greatness of the tribunes, who were properly not magistrates,

crudelty, liberality with profusion and the desire of fame with puerile and ostentatious vanity. He might have learned, that the ancient tribunes, so strong and sacred in the public opinion, were not distinguished in style, habit, or appearance, from an ordinary plebeian,<sup>k</sup> and that as often as they visited the city on foot, a single viator, or beadle, attended the exercise of their office. The Gracchi would have frowned or smiled, could they have read the sonorous titles and epithets of their successor, "NICHOLAS, SEVRE AND MERCIFUL, DELIVERER OF ROME, DEFENDER OF ITALY,<sup>l</sup> FRIEND OF MANKIND, AND OF LIBERTY, PEACE, AND JUSTICE, TRIBUNE AUGUST." His theatrical pageants had prepared the revolution, but Rienzi abused, in luxury and pride, the political maxim of speaking to the eyes, as well as the understanding, of the multitude. From nature he had received the gift of an handsome person,<sup>m</sup> till it was swelled and disfigured by intemperance, and his propensity to laughter was corrected in the magistracy by the affectation of gravity and sternness. He was clothed, at least on public occasions, in a party-coloured robe of velvet or satin, lined with fur, and embroidered with gold: the rod of justice, which he carried in his hand, was a sceptre of polished steel, crowned with a globe and cross of gold, and enclosing a small fragment of the true and holy wood. In his civil and religious processions through the city, he rode on a white steed, the symbol of royalty: the great banner of the republic, a sun with a circle of stars, a dove with an olive branch, was displayed over his head, a shower of gold and silver was scattered among the populace, fifty guards with halberds encompassed his person, a troop of horse preceded his march, and their tymbals and trumpets were of massy silver.

The ambition of the honours of chivalry<sup>n</sup> betrayed the meanness of his birth, and degraded the importance of his office, and the equestrian tribune was not less odious to the nobles, whom he adopted, than to the plebeians, whom he deserted. All that yet remained of treasure, or luxury, or art, was exhausted on that solemn day. Rienzi led the procession from the capitol to the Lateran, the tediousness of the way was relieved with decorations and games, the ecclesiastical, civil, and military orders marched under but a check on magistracy. It was their duty and interest ομοιουνοσθαι σχηματι, και σοφει και διατηρει επιτυχανουσι των πολιτων καταπεισθαι δει (a saying of C. Curio) και μη σεμιον ειαι τη δημαρχων σφει. οσω δε πολλον εκταπεινουνται τω σωμντι, τοσοντα πολλον αυφεται τη δυναμει &c. Rienzi and Petrarch himself, were incapable perhaps of reading a Greek philosopher: but they misapprehended the true modest doctrines from their favourite Latins, Livy and Valerius Maximus.

<sup>l</sup> I could not express in English the forcible, though barbarous, title of Zelator Italiae, which Rienzi assumed.

<sup>m</sup> Era bell' uomo (l. ii. c. i. p. 399) It is remarkable, that the risso sarcastico of the Bracciano edition is wanting in the Roman MS. from which Muratori has given the text. In his second edition, when he is printed almost as a monster, Rienzi traces una ventresca touna trionfale, a modo de uno Abbate Asiano or Asinno, (l. iii. c. 18 p. 523).

<sup>n</sup> Strange as it may seem this festival was not without a precedent. In the year 1327, two barons, a Colonna and an Ursini, the usual balance, were created knights by the Roman people: their birth was of rose-water, their beds were decked with royal magnificence, and they were served at St. Maria of Araceli in the capitol, by the twenty-eight buoni uomini. They afterwards received from Robert king of Naples the sword of chivalry (Hist. Rom. l. i. c. 2 p. 259).

The pomp of his kin-
hood,
A. D. 1347
August 1

their various banners, the Roman ladies attended his wife, and the ambassadors of Italy might loudly applaud, or secretly deride, the novelty of the pomp. In the evening, when they had reached the church and palace of Constantine, he thanked and dismissed the numerous assembly, with an invitation to the festival of the ensuing day. From the hands of a venerable knight he received the order of the Holy Ghost, the purification of the bath was a previous ceremony, but in no step of his life did Rienzi excite such scandal and censure as by the profane use of the porphyry vase, in which Constantine (a foolish legend) had been healed of his leprosy by pope Sylvester.<sup>o</sup> With equal presumption the tribune watched or reposed within the consecrated precincts of the baptistery, and the failure of his state-bed was interpreted as an omen of his approaching downfall. At the hour of worship, he showed himself to the returning crowds in a majestic attitude, with a robe of purple, his sword, and gilt spurs, but the holy rites were interrupted by his levity and insolence. Rising from his throne, and advancing towards the congregation, he proclaimed in a loud voice "We summon to our tribunal pope Clement, and command him to reside in his diocese of Rome. We also summon the sacred college of cardinals." We again summon the two pretenders, Charles of Bohemia and Lewis of Bavaria, who style themselves emperors. We likewise summon all the electors of Germany, to inform us on what pretence they have usurped the inalienable right of the Roman people, the ancient and lawful sovereigns of the empire."<sup>a</sup> Unsheathing his maiden sword, he thrice brandished it to the three parts of the world, and thrice repeated the extravagant declaration, "And this too is mine!" The pope's vicar, the bishop of Orvieto, attempted to check this career of folly, but his feeble protest was silenced by martial music, and instead of withdrawing from the assembly, he consented to dine with his brother tribune, at a table which had hitherto been reserved for the supreme pontiff. A banquet, such as the Cæsars had given, was prepared for the Romans. The apartments, porticoes, and courts of the Lateran were spread with innumerable tables for either sex, and every condition, a stream of wine flowed from the nostrils of Constantine's brazen horse, no complaint, except of the scarcity of water, could be heard, and the licentiousness of the multitude was curbed by discipline and fear. A subsequent day was appointed for the coronation of Rienzi, seven crowns of different leaves or metals were successively placed on his head by the most eminent of the Roman clergy, they represented the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost, and he still professed to imitate the example of the ancient tribunes. These extraordinary spectacles might deceive or flatter the people, and their own vanity was gratified in the vanity of their leader. But in his private life he soon deviated from the strict rule of frugality and abstinence. and the plebeians, who were awed by the splendour of their nobles, were provoked by the luxury of their equal. His wife, his son, his uncle, (a barber in name and profession,) exposed the contrast of vulgar manners and princely expense. and without acquiring the majesty, Rienzi degenerated into the vices, of a king.

A simple citizen describes with pity, <sup>Fear and hatred of the nobles of Rome</sup> or perhaps with pleasure, the humiliation of the barons of Rome. "Bar-headed, their hands crossed on their breast, they stood with downcast looks in the presence of the tribune, and they trembled, good God, how they trembled!"<sup>b</sup> As long as the yoke of Rienzi was that of justice and their country, their conscience forced them to esteem the man, whom pride and interest provoked them to hate. His extravagant conduct soon forfeited their hatred by contempt, and they conceived the hope of subverting a power which was no longer so deeply rooted in the public confidence. The old animosity of the Colonna and Ursini was suspended for a moment by their common disgrace. they associated their wishes, and perhaps their designs, an assassin was seized and tortured, he accused the nobles, and as soon as Rienzi deserved the fate, he adopted the suspicions and maxims of a tyrant. On the same day, under various pretences, he invited to the capitol his principal enemies, among whom were five members of the Ursini and three of the Colonna name. But instead of a council or a banquet, they found themselves prisoners under the sword of despotism or justice, and the consciousness of innocence or guilt might inspire them with equal apprehensions of danger. At the sound of the great bell the people assembled, they were arraigned for a conspiracy against the tribune's life, and though some might sympathize in their distress, not a hand, nor a voice, was raised to rescue the first of the nobility from their impending doom. Their apparent boldness was prompted by despair, they passed in separate chambers a sleepless and painful night, and the venerable hero, Stephen Colonna, striking against the door of his prison, repeatedly urged his guards to deliver him, by a speedy death, from such ignominious servitude. In the morning they understood their sentence from the visit of a confessor and the tolling of the bell. The great hall of the

<sup>o</sup> All parties believed in the leprosy and bath of Constantine, (Petrarch Epist. Famil. vi. 2.) and Rienzi justified his own conduct by observing in the court of Avignon that a vase which had been used by a pagan could not be profaned by a pious christian. Yet this crime is specified in the bull of excommunication (Hocsemius, apud de Cerguen p. 189. 190.)

<sup>p</sup> This verbal summons of Pope Clement VI. which rests on the authority of the Roman historian and a Vatican MS. is disputed by the biographer of Petrarch (tom. ii. not p. 70—76) with arguments rather of decency than of weight. The court of Avignon might not choose to agitate this delicate question.

<sup>q</sup> The summons of the two rival emperors, a monument of freedom and folly is extant in Hocsemius (Cerguen p. 163—166.)

<sup>r</sup> It is singular that the Roman historian should have overlooked this sevenfold coronation, which is sufficiently proved by internal evidence and the testimony of Hocsemius, and even of Rienzi (Cerguen p. 167—170. 229.)

<sup>s</sup> Primi se faceva stare denante a se mentre sedeva, li baroni tutti in piedi ritto en lo vacare pieante e co li capucci tratti. Delo como stavano prigioni! (Hist. Rom. l. ii. c. 20 p. 439.) He saw them and we see them.

capitol had been decorated for the bloody scene with red and white hangings, the countenance of the tribune was dark and severe, the swords of the executioners were unsheathed; and the barons were interrupted in their dying speeches by the sound of trumpets. But in this decisive moment, Rienzi was not less anxious or apprehensive than his captives. He dreaded the splendour of their names, their surviving kinsmen, the inconstancy of the people, the reproaches of the world, and, after rashly offering a mortal injury, he vainly presumed that, if he could forgive, he might himself be forgiven. His elaborate oration was that of a christian and a suppliant, and, as the humble minister of the commons, he entreated his masters to pardon these noble criminals, for whose repentance and future service he pledged his faith and authority. "If you are spared," said the tribune, "by the mercy of the Romans, will you not promise to support the good estate with your lives and fortunes?" Astonished by this marvellous clemency, the barons bowed their heads, and while they devoutly repeated the oath of allegiance, might whisper a secret, and more sincere, assurance of revenge. A priest, in the name of the people, pronounced their absolution. They received the communion with the tribune, assisted at the banquet, followed the procession, and, after every spiritual and temporal sign of reconciliation, were dismissed in safety to their respective homes, with the new honours and titles of generals, consuls, and patricians.<sup>1</sup>

During some weeks they were checked by the memory of their danger, rather than of their deliverance, till the most powerful of the Ursini, escaping with the Colonna from the city, erected at Marino the standard of rebellion. The fortifications of the castle were instantly restored, the vassals attended their lord, the outlaws armed against the magistrate, the flocks and herds, the harvests and vineyards, from Marino to the gates of Rome, were swept away or destroyed, and the people arraigned Rienzi as the author of the calamities which his government had taught them to forget. In the camp, Rienzi appeared to less advantage than in the rostrum, and he neglected the progress of the rebel barons till their numbers were strong, and their castles impregnable. From the pages of Livy, he had not imbibed the art, or even the courage, of a general. An army of twenty thousand Romans returned without honour or effect from the attack of Marino and his vengeance was amused by painting his enemies, their heads downwards, and drowning two dogs (at least they should have been bears) as the representatives of the Ursini. The belief of his incapacity encouraged their operations. They were invited by their secret adherents, and the barons attempted, with four thousand foot and sixteen hundred horse, to enter Rome by force or surprise. The city was prepared for their reception. The alarm-bell rung all night, the gates were strictly guarded, or insolently open, and after some hesitation they sounded a retreat. The two first divisions had passed along the walls, but the prospect of a free entrance tempted the headstrong valour of the nobles in the rear, and after a successful skirmish, they were overthrown and massacred without quarter by the crowds of the Roman people. Stephen Colonna the younger, <sup>Defeat and death of the Colonna,</sup> the noble spirit to whom Petrarch ascribed the restoration of Italy, was preceded or accompanied in death by his son John, a gallant youth, by his brother Peter, who might regret the ease and honours of the church, by a nephew of legitimate birth, and by two bastards of the Colonna race, and the number of seven, the seven crowns, as Rienzi styled them, of the Holy Ghost, was completed by the agony of the deplorable parent, of the veteran chief, who had survived the hope and fortune of his house. The vision and prophecies of St Martin and pope Boniface had been used by the tribune to animate his troops. <sup>Nov 20</sup> he displayed, at least in the pursuit, the spirit of a hero. But he forgot the maxims of the ancient Romans, who abhorred the triumphs of civil war. The conqueror ascended the capitol, deposited his crown and sceptre on the altar, and boasted with some truth, that he had cut off an ear, which neither pope nor emperor had been able to amputate. His base and implacable revenge denied the honours of burial, and the bodies of the Colonna, which he threatened to expose with those of the vilest malefactors, were secretly interred by the holy virgins of their name and family. The people sympathized in their grief, repented of their own fury, and detested the indecent joy of Rienzi, who visited the spot where these illustrious victims had fallen. It was on that fatal spot that he conferred on his son the honour of knighthood. and the ceremony was accomplished by a slight blow from each of the horsemen of the guard, and by a ridiculous and inhuman ablution from a pool of water, which was yet polluted with patrician blood.<sup>2</sup>

A short delay would have saved the Colonna, the delay of a single month, which elapsed between the triumph and exile of Rienzi. In the pride of

<sup>Fall and flight of the tribune Rienzi, A. D 1347, Dec 15</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The original letter, in which Rienzi justifies his treatment of the Colonna, (Hoesemius, apud du Cerceau, p. 222—229) displays in genuine colours, the mixture of the knave and the madman.
<sup>2</sup> Rienzi in the above mentioned letter ascribes to St Martin the tribune Boniface VIII the enemy of Colonna, himself, and the Roman people, the glory of the day when Villani likewise (l. 12 c. 104) describes as a regular battle. The disorderly skirmish the flight of the Romans, and the cowardice of Rienzi, are printed in the simple and minute narrative of Fortificca, or the anonymous citizen, (l. 11 c. 34—37).
<sup>3</sup> In describing the fall of the Colonna, I speak only of the family of Stephen the elder who is often confounded by the P. du Cerceau with his son. That family was extinguished, but the house has been perpetuated.

ated in the collateral branches, of which I have not a very accurate knowledge. Circumspice (says Petrarch) fumigant tunc statum, Columnarum domos solito pauciores habent columnas. Quid ad rem? modo fundamentum stabile, solidumque permanent.
<sup>4</sup> The convent of St Silvester was founded, endowed, and protected by the Colonna cardinals, for the daughters of the family who embraced a monastic life, and who, in the year 1318, were twelve in number. The others were allowed to marry with their kinsmen in the fourth degree, and the dispensation was justified by the small number and close alliances of the noble families of Rome (Memoires sur Petrarque, tom. 1 p. 110 tom. 11 p. 401).
<sup>5</sup> Petrarch wrote a stiff and pedantic letter of consolation (Fam. 1 vii. epist. 13 p. 682, 683). The friend was lost in the patriot. Nulla victory, he forfeited what yet remained of his civil virtues, without acquiring the fame of military prowess. A free and vigorous opposition was formed in the city, and when the tribune proposed in the public council<sup>a</sup> to impose a new tax, and to regulate the government of Perugia, thirty-nine members voted against his measures, repelled the injurious charge of treachery and corruption, and urged him to prove, by their forcible exclusion, that, if the populace adhered to his cause, it was already disclaimed by the most respectable citizens. The pope and the sacred college had never been dazzled by his specious professions, they were justly offended by the insolence of his conduct, a cardinal legate was sent to Italy, and after some fruitless treaty, and two personal interviews, he fulminated a bull of excommunication, in which the tribune is degraded from his office, and branded with the guilt of rebellion, sacrilege, and heresy<sup>b</sup>. The surviving barons of Rome were now humbled to a sense of allegiance, their interest and revenge engaged them in the service of the church, but as the fate of the Colonna was before their eyes, they abandoned to a private adventurer the peril and glory of the revolution. John Pepin, count of Minorbino<sup>c</sup> in the kingdom of Naples, had been condemned for his crimes, or his riches, to perpetual imprisonment, and Petrarch, by soliciting his release, indirectly contributed to the ruin of his friend. At the head of one hundred and fifty soldiers, the count of Minorbino introduced himself into Rome, barricaded the quarter of the Colonna, and found the enterprise as easy as it had seemed impossible. From the first alarm, the bell of the capitol incessantly tolled, but, instead of repairing to the well-known sound, the people were silent and inactive, and the pusillanimous Rienzi, deploring their ingratitude with sighs and tears, abdicated the government and palace of the republic.

Revolutions of Rome,
A D 1347—1354

Without drawing his sword, count Pepin restored the aristocracy of the church, three senators were chosen, and the legate assuming the first rank, accepted his two colleagues from the rival families of Colonna and Ursini. The acts of the tribune were abolished, his head was proscribed, yet such was the terror of his name, that the barons hesitated three days, before they would trust themselves in the city, and Rienzi was left above a month in the castle of St Angelo, from whence he peaceably withdrew, after labouring, without effect, to revive the affection and courage of the Romans. The vision of freedom and empire had vanished their fallen spirit would have acquiesced in servitude, had it been smoothed by tranquillity and order and it was scarcely observed, that the new senators derived their authority from the Apostolic See, that four cardinals were appointed to reform, with dictatorial power, the state of the republic. Rome was again agitated by the bloody feuds of the barons, who detested each other, and despised the commons their hostile fortresses, both in town and country, again rose, and were again demolished, and the peaceful citizens, a flock of sheep, were devoured, says the Florentine historian, by these rapacious wolves. But when their pride and avarice had exhausted the patience of the Romans, a confraternity of the Virgin Mary protected or avenged the republic the bell of the capitol was again tolled, the nobles in arms trembled in the presence of an unarmed multitude, and of the two senators, Colonna escaped from the window of the palace, and Ursini was stoned at the foot of the altar. The dangerous office of tribune was successively occupied by two plebeians, Cerroni and Baroncelli. The mildness of Cerroni was unequal to the times, and after a faint struggle, he retired with a fair reputation and a decent fortune to the comforts of rural life. Devoid of eloquence or genius, Baroncelli was distinguished by a resolute spirit he spoke the language of a patriot, and trod in the footsteps of tyrants, his suspicion was a sentence of death, and his own death was the reward of his cruelties. Amidst the public misfortunes, the faults of Rienzi were forgotten, and the Romans sighed for the peace and prosperity of the good estate<sup>d</sup>.

After an exile of seven years, the first deliverer was again restored to his country. In the disguise of a monk or a pilgrim, he escaped from the castle of St Angelo, implored the friendship of the kings of Hungary and Naples, tempted the ambition of every bold adventurer, mingled at Rome with the pilgrims of the jubilee, lay concealed among the hermits of the Apennine, and wandered through the cities of Italy, Germany, and Bohemia. His person was invisible, his name was yet formidable, and the anxiety of the court of Avignon supposes, and even magnifies, his personal merit. The emperor Charles the fourth gave audience to a stranger, who frankly revealed himself as the tribune of the republic, and astonished an assembly of ambassadors and princes, by the eloquence of a patriot and the visions of a prophet, the downfall of tyranny and the kingdom of the Holy Ghost<sup>e</sup>. Whatever had been his hopes, Rienzi toto orbe principum familia carior cyrior tamen republico, carior Roma, carior Italia.

Je rends grâces aux Dieux de n'être pas Romain.

<sup>a</sup> The council and opposition is obscurely mentioned by Pollastore a contemporary writer who has preserved some curious and original facts. Her Italiconum tom xxv c 31 p 798—804.

<sup>b</sup> The briefs and bulls of Clement VI against Rienzi are translated by the P du Cerceau (p 196 232) from the Ecclesiastical Annals of Odericus Ryndaldis, (A D 1347 No 15 17 21, &c) who found them in the archives of the Vatican.

<sup>c</sup> Matteo Villani describes the origin, character, and death of this count of Minorbino a man di natura inconstante e senza fede whose grandfather, a crafty scolar, was enriched and ennobled by the spoils of the Saracens of Nocera, (l vii c 102, 103) See his imprisonment, and the efforts of Petrarch, tom ii p 140—151.

<sup>d</sup> The troubles of Rome from the departure to the return of Rienzi, are related by Matteo Villani, (l ii c 47 l iii c 33 57, 78) and Thomas Fortificata (l iii c 4) I have slightly passed over these secondary characters, who imitated the original tribune.

<sup>e</sup> These visions, of which the friends and the enemies of Rienzi seem alike ignorant, are surely magnified by the zeal of Pollastore, a Dominican inquisitor (Her Ital tom xxv c 36 p 819). Had the tribune taught that Christ was succeeded by the Holy Ghost, that the tyranny of the pope would be abolished, he might have been convicted of heresy and treason without offending the Roman people.

found himself a captive, but he supported a character of independence and dignity, and obeyed, as his own choice, the irresistible summons of the supreme pontiff. The zeal of Petrarch, which had been cooled by the unworthy conduct, was rekindled by the sufferings and the presence, of his friend, and he boldly complains of the times, in which the saviour of Rome was delivered by her emperor into the hands of her bishop. Rienzi was transported slowly, but in safe custody, from Prague to Avignon. His entrance into the city was that of a malefactor, in his prison he was chained by the leg, and four cardinals were named to inquire into the crimes of heresy and rebellion. But his trial and condemnation would have involved some questions, which it was more prudent to leave under the veil of mystery. The temporal supremacy of the popes, the duty of resistance, the civil and ecclesiastical privileges of the clergy and people of Rome. The reigning pontiff well deserved the appellation of Clement the strange vicissitudes and magnanimous spirit of the captive excited his pity and esteem, and Petrarch believes that he respected in the hero the name and sacred character of a poet. Rienzi was indulged with an easy confinement and the use of books, and in the assiduous study of Livy and the Bible, he sought the cause and the consolation of his misfortunes.

The succeeding pontificate of Innocent the sixth opened a new prospect of his deliverance and restoration, and the court of Avignon was persuaded, that the successful rebel could alone appease and reform the anarchy of the metropolis. After a solemn profession of fidelity, the Roman tribune was sent into Italy with the title of senator, but the death of Baroccelli appeared to supersede the use of his mission, and the legate, cardinal Albornoze, a consummate statesman, allowed him with reluctance, and without aid, to undertake the perilous experiment. His first reception was equal to his wishes. The day of his entrance was a public festival, and his eloquence and authority revived the laws of the good estate. But this momentary sunshine was soon clouded by his own vices and those of the people. In the capitol, he might often regret the prison of Avignon, and after a second administration of four months, Rienzi was massacred in a tumult which had been fomented by the Roman barons. In the society of the Germans and Bohemians, he is said to have contracted the habits of intemperance and cruelty. Adversity had chilled his enthusiasm, without fortifying his reason or virtue, and that youthful hope, that lively assurance, which is the pledge of success, was now succeeded by the cold impotence of distrust and despair. The tribune had reigned with absolute dominion, by the choice, and in the hearts, of the Romans. The senator was the servile minister of a foreign court, and while he was suspected by the people, he was abandoned by the prince. The legate Albornoze, who seemed desirous of his ruin, inflexibly refused all supplies of men and money, a faithful subject could no longer presume to touch the revenues of the apostolical chamber, and the first idea of a tax was the signal of clamour and sedition. Even his justice was tainted with the guilt or reproach of selfish cruelty. The most virtuous citizen of Rome was sacrificed to his jealousy, and in the execution of a public robber, from whose purse he had been assisted, the magistrate too much forgot, or too much remembered, the obligations of the debtor. A civil war exhausted his treasures, and the patience of the city. The Colonna maintained their hostile station at Palestrina, and his mercenaries soon despised a leader whose ignorance and fear were envious of all subordinate merit. In the death as in the life of Rienzi, the hero and the coward were strangely mingled. When the capitol was invested by a furious multitude, when he was basely deserted by his civil and military servants, the intrepid senator, waving the banner of liberty, presented himself on the balcony, addressed his eloquence to the various passions of the Romans, and laboured to persuade them, that in the same cause himself and the republic must either stand or fall. His oration was interrupted by a volley of imprecations and stones, and after an arrow had transpierced his hand, he sunk into abject despair, and fled weeping to the inner chambers, from whence he was let down by a sheet before the windows of the prison. Destitute of aid or hope, he was besieged till the evening. The doors of the capitol were destroyed with axes and fire, and while the senator attempted to escape in a plebeian habit, he was discovered and dragged to the platform of the palace, the fatal scene of his judgments and executions. A whole hour, without voice or motion, he stood amidst the multitude half naked and half dead, their rage was hushed into curiosity and wonder. The last feelings of reverence and compassion yet struggled in his favour, and they might have prevailed, if a bold assassin had not plunged a dagger in his breast. He fell senseless with the first stroke, the impotent revenge of his enemies inflicted a thousand wounds, and the senator's body was abandoned to the dogs, to the Jews, and to the flames. Posterity will compare the virtues and failings of this extraordinary man, but in a long period of anarchy and servitude, the name of Rienzi has often been celebrated as the deliverer of his country, and the last of the Roman patriots.

<sup>f</sup> The astonishment, the envy almost, of Petrarch is a proof, if not of the truth of this incredible fact, at least of his own veracity. The Abbé de Sade (Mémoires tom. iii. p. 242.) quotes the sixth epistle of the thirteenth book of Petrarch, but it is of the royal MS. which he consulted and not of the ordinary Basil edition, (p. 220.)

<sup>g</sup> Ægidius or Giles Albornoze, a noble Spaniard, archbishop of Toledo and cardinal legate in Italy, (A. D. 1353–1367) restored, by his arms and counsels, the temporal dominion of the popes. His life has been separately written by Sepúlveda but Dryden could not reason

ably suppose, that his name, or that of Wolsey, had reached the ears of the Mufti in Don Sebastian.

<sup>h</sup> From Matteo Villani and Fortificoca, the P. du Cerceau (p. 344–394) has extracted the life and death of the chevalier Montreal, the life of a robber and the death of a hero. At the head of a free company, the first that desolated Italy, he became rich and formidable. He had money in all the banks, 60 000 ducats in Padua alone.

<sup>i</sup> The exile, second government, and death of Rienzi, are minutely related by the anonymous Roman, who appears neither his friend nor

His death,
A. D. 1354
Sept. 8

Petrarch invites and upbraid*
the emperor
Charles IV
A D 1355
January—
May

The first and most generous wish of Petrarch was the restoration of a free republic, but after the exile and death of his plebeian hero, he turned his eyes from the tribune, to the king, of the Romans The capitol was yet stained with the blood of Rienzi, when Charles the fourth descended from the Alps to obtain the Italian and imperial crowns. In his passage through Milan he received the visit, and repaid the flattery, of the poet-laureat, accepted a medal of Augustus, and promised, without a smile, to imitate the founder of the Roman monarchy. A false application of the names and maxims of antiquity was the source of the hopes and disappointments of Petrarch, yet he could not overlook the difference of times and characters, the immeasurable distance between the first Cæsars and a Bohemian prince, who by the favour of the clergy had been elected the titular head of the German aristocracy. Instead of restoring to Rome her glory and her provinces, he had bound himself, by a secret treaty with the pope, to evacuate the city on the day of his coronation, and his shameful retreat was pursued by the reproaches of the patriot bard.<sup>k</sup>

He solicits the popes of Avignon to fix their residence at Rome

After the loss of liberty and empire, his third and more humble wish, was to reconcile the shepherd with his flock, to recall the Roman bishop to his ancient and peculiar diocese. In the fervour of youth, with the authority of age, Petrarch addressed his exhortations to five successive popes, and his eloquence was always inspired by the enthusiasm of sentiment and the freedom of language.<sup>l</sup> The son of a citizen of Florence invariably preferred the country of his birth to that of his education, and Italy, in his eyes, was the queen and garden of the world. Amidst her domestic factions, she was doubtless superior to France both in art and science, in wealth and politeness, but the difference could scarcely support the epithet of barbarous, which he promiscuously bestows on the countries beyond the Alps. Avignon, the mystic Babylon, the sink of vice and corruption, was the object of his hatred and contempt, but he forgets that her scandalous vices were not the growth of the soil, and that in every residence they would adhere to the power and luxury of the papal court. He confesses, that the successor of St Peter is the bishop of the universal church, yet it was not on the banks of the Rhone, but of the Tiber, that the apostle had fixed his everlasting throne. And while every city in the christian world was blessed with a bishop, the metropolis alone was desolate and forlorn. Since the his enemy (l m c 12—25) Petrarch, who loved the tribune, was indifferent to the fate of the senator.

<sup>k</sup> The hopes and the disappointment of Petrarch are agreeably described in his own words by the French biographer (Memoires, tom iii p 375—413) but the deep, though secret wound, was the coronation of Zanubi the poet laureat by Charles IV.

<sup>l</sup> See in his accurate and amusing biographer the application of Petrarch and Rome to Benedict XII in the year 1334 (Memoires, tom i p 261—265) to Clement VI in 1342 (tom ii p 45—47) and to Urban V in 1366 (tom iii p 677—691) his pride (p 711—715) and excuse (p 772) of the last of these pontiffs. His angry controversy on the respective merits of France and Italy may be found (Opp p 1069—1085).

removal of the holy see, the sacred buildings of the Lateran and the Vatican, their altars and their saints, were left in a state of poverty and decay, and Rome was often painted under the image of a disconsolate matron, as if the wandering husband could be reclaimed by the homely portrait of the age and infirmities of his weeping spouse.<sup>m</sup> But the cloud which hung over the seven hills, would be dispelled by the presence of their lawful sovereign eternal fame, the prosperity of Rome, and the peace of Italy, would be the recompence of the pope who should dare to embrace this generous resolution. Of the five whom Petrarch exhorted, the three first, John the twenty-second, Benedict the twelfth, and Clement the sixth, were importuned or amused by the boldness of the orator, but the memorable change which had been attempted by Urban the fifth, was finally accomplished by Gregory the eleventh. The execution of their design was opposed by weighty and almost insuperable obstacles. A king of France who has deserved the epithet of wise, was unwilling to release them from a local dependence the cardinals, for the most part his subjects, were attached to the language, manners, and climate, of Avignon, to their stately palaces, above all, to the wines of Burgundy. In their eyes, Italy was foreign or hostile, and they reluctantly embarked at Marseilles, as if they had been sold or banished into the land of the Saracens. Urban the fifth resided three years in the Vatican with safety and honour his sanctity was protected by a guard of two thousand horse, and the king of Cyprus, the queen of Naples, and the emperors of the east and west, devoutly saluted their common father in the chair of St Peter. But the joy of Petrarch and the Italians was soon turned into grief and indignation. Some reasons of public or private moment, his own impatience or the prayers of the cardinals, recalled Urban to France, and the approaching election was saved from the tyrannic patriotism of the Romans. The powers of heaven were interested in their cause. Bridget of Sweden, a saint and pilgrim, disapproved the return, and foretold the death, of Urban the fifth. the migration of Gregory the eleventh was encouraged by St Catherine of Sienna, the spouse of Christ and ambassadress of the Florentines,

Return of Urban V
A D 1367
October 16
A D 1370
April 17

and the popes themselves, the great masters of human credulity, appear to have listened to these visionary females.<sup>n</sup> Yet those celestial admonitions were supported by some arguments of temporal policy. The residence of Avignon had been invaded

m *dequida sed quoniam facies neglectaque cultu Caesares multique malis lassata senectus
Eripuit solitam effigiem vetus accipe nomen Roma voror*

(Carm l 2, p 77)

He spins this allegory beyond all measure or patience. The Epistles to Urban V in prose are more simple and persuasive (Senilium, l vii p 811—827 l ix epist i p 844—854).

<sup>n</sup> I have not leisure to expatiate on the legends of St Bridget or Catherine, the last of which might furnish some amusing stories. Their effect on the mind of Gregory XI is attested by the last solemn words of the dying pope who admonished the assistants not to caver at his mimibus, sive viris sive mulieribus sub specie religionis loquentibus visiones sui capitis, quia per tales ipse rednetur, &c (Baluz Not ad Vit Pap Avinionensium, tom i p 1223).

by hostile violence at the head of thirty thousand robbers, a hero had extorted ransom and absolution from the vicar of Christ and the sacred college, and the maxim of the French warriors, to spare the people and plunder the church, was a new heresy of the most dangerous import. While the pope was driven from Avignon, he was strenuously invited to Rome. The senate and people acknowledged him as their lawful sovereign, and laid at his feet the keys of the gates, the bridges, and the fortresses, of the quarter at least beyond the Tiber. But this loyal offer was accompanied by a declaration, that they could no longer suffer the scandal and calamity of his absence, and that his obstinacy would finally provoke them to revive and assert the primitive right of election. The abbot of mount Cassin had been consulted, whether he would accept the triple crown<sup>a</sup> from the clergy and people. "I am a citizen of Rome,"<sup>r</sup> replied that venerable ecclesiastic, "and my first law is the voice of my country."<sup>s</sup>

If superstition will interpret an untimely death,<sup>t</sup> if the merit of counsels be judged from the event, the heavens may seem to frown on a measure of such apparent reason and propriety. Gregory the eleventh did not survive above fourteen months his return to the Vatican, and his decease was followed by the great schism of the west, which distracted the Latin church above forty years. The sacred college was then composed of twenty-two cardinals: six of these had remained at Avignon, eleven Frenchmen, one Spaniard, and four Italians, entered the conclave in the usual form. Their choice was not yet limited to the purple, and their unanimous votes acquiesced in the archbishop of Bari, a subject of Naples, conspicuous for his zeal and learning, who ascended the throne of St Peter under the name of Urban the sixth. The epistle of the sacred college affirms his free and regular election, which had been inspired, as usual, by the Holy Ghost. He was adorned, invested, and crowned, with the customary rites, his temporal authority was obeyed at Rome and Avignon, and his ecclesiastical supremacy was acknowledged in the Latin world. During several weeks, the cardinals attended their new master with the fairest professions of attachment and loyalty, till the summer heats permitted a decent escape from the city. But as soon as they were united at Anagni and Fundi, in a place of security, they cast aside the mask, accused their own falsehood and hypocrisy, excommunicated the apostate and antichrist of Rome, and proceeded to a new election of Robert of Canova, Clement the seventh, whom they announced to the nations as the true and rightful vicar of Christ. Their first choice, an involuntary and illegal act, was annulled by the fear of death and the menaces of the Romans, and their complaint is justified by the strong evidence of probability and fact. The twelve French cardinals, above two-thirds of the votes, were masters of the election, and whatever might be their provincial jealousies, it cannot fairly be presumed that they would have sacrificed their right and interest to a foreign candidate, who would never restore them to their native country. In the various, and often inconsistent, narratives,<sup>u</sup> the shades of popular violence are more darkly or faintly coloured, but the licentiousness of the seditious Romans was inflamed by a sense of their privileges, and the danger of a second emigration. The conclave was intimidated by the shouts, and encompassed by the arms, of thirty thousand rebels, the bells of the capitol and St Peter's rang an alarm, "Death, or an Italian pope!" was the universal cry, the same threat was repeated by the twelve bannerets or chiefs of the quarters, in the form of charitable advice, some preparations were made for burning the obstinate cardinals, and had they chosen a Transalpine subject, it is probable that they would never have departed alive from the Vatican. The same constraint imposed the necessity of dissembling in the eyes of Rome and of the world: the pride and cruelty of Urban presented a more inevitable danger, and they soon discovered the features of the tyrant, who could walk in his garden and recite his breviary, while he heard from an adjacent chamber six cardinals groaning on the rack. His inflexible zeal, which loudly censured their luxury and vice, would have attached them to the stations and duties of their parishes at Rome, and had he not fatally delayed a new promotion, the French cardinals would have been reduced to a helpless minority in the sacred college. For these reasons, and in the hope of repassing the Alps, they rashly violated the peace and unity of the church, and the merits of their

Election of Clement VII
Sept. 21

His death,
A D 1378
March 27

Election of Urban VI
April 9

<sup>a</sup> This predatory expedition is related by Froissard, (Chronique, tom i p 230) and in the life of du Guesclin (Collection Generale des Memoires Historiques, tom ii c 16 p 107—113). As early as the year 1361 the court of Avignon had been molested by similar freebooters, who afterwards passed the Alps (Memoires sur Petrarque, tom iii p 563—569).

<sup>p</sup> Fleury alleges from the annals of Odericus Raynaldus, the original treaty which was signed the twenty first of December 1376 between Gregory XI and the Romans, (Hist Eccles tom xx p 275).

<sup>q</sup> The first crown or regnum (Ducange Gloss Latin tom v p 702) on the episcopal mitre of the popes is ascribed to the gift of Constantine or Clovis. The second was added by Boniface VIII as the emblem not only of a spiritual but of a temporal kingdom. The three states of the church are represented by the triple crown which was introduced by John XXII or Benedict XII (Memoires sur Petrarque, tom i p 258 259).

<sup>r</sup> Baluze (Not ad Pap Avinion tom i p 1191 1192) produces the original evidence which attests the threats of the Roman ambassadors and the resignation of the abbot of mount Cassin, qui ultro se offerens, respondit se civem Romanum esse, et illud velle quod ipsi vellent.

<sup>s</sup> The return of the popes from Avignon to Rome, and their reception by the people are related in the original Lives of Urban V and Gregory XI in Baluze (Vit Papium Avinionensium, tom i p 363—486) and Muratori (Scripti Italicarum tom iii p i p 610—712). In the disputes of the schism every circumstance was severely, though partially, scrutinized: more especially in the great inquest which decided the obediency of Castile, and to which Baluze, in his notes so often and so largely appeals from a MS volume in the Harley library, (p 1281, &c.)

<sup>t</sup> Can the death of a good man be esteemed a punishment by those who believe in the immortality of the soul? They betray the instability of their faith. Yet as a mere philosopher, I cannot agree with the Greeks: οὐκ οἱ θεοὶ φιλοῦσιν ἀποθνήσκειν (Brunck, Poetæ Græci, p 231). See in Herodotus (i c 31) the moral and pleasing tale of the Argive youth.

<sup>u</sup> In the first book of the Histoire du Concile de Pise, M Lenfant has abridged and compared the original narratives of the adherents of Urban and Clement, of the Italians and Germans, the French and Spaniards. The latter appear to be the most reticent and laconic, and every fact and word in the original Lives of Gregory XI and Clement VII are supported in the notes of their editor Baluze.

double choice are yet agitated in the Catholic schools * The vanity rather than the interest of the nation determined the court and clergy of France † The states of Savoy, Sicily, Cyprus, Arragon, Castille, Navarre, and Scotland, were inclined by their example and authority to the obedience of Clement the seventh, and, after his decease, of Benedict the thirteenth. Rome and the principal states of Italy, Germany, Portugal, England, ‡ the Low Countries, and the kingdoms of the North, adhered to the prior election of Urban the sixth, who was succeeded by Boniface the ninth, Innocent the seventh, and Gregory the twelfth.

From the banks of the Tiber and the Rhone, the hostile pontiffs encountered each other with the pen and the sword. The civil and ecclesiastical order of society was disturbed, and the Romans had their full share of the mischiefs of which they may be arraigned as the primary authors † They had vainly flattered themselves with the hope of restoring the seat of the ecclesiastical monarchy, and of relieving their poverty with the tributes and offerings of the nations, but the separation of France and Spain diverted the stream of lucrative devotion, nor could the loss be compensated by the two jubilees which were crowded into the space of ten years. By the avocations of the schism, by foreign arms, and popular tumults, Urban the sixth and his three successors were often compelled to interrupt their residence in the Vatican. The Colonna and Ursini still exercised their deadly feuds: the bannerets of Rome asserted and abused the privileges of a republic: the vicars of Christ, who had levied a military force, chastised their rebellion with the gibbet, the sword, and the dagger, and, in a friendly conference, eleven deputies of the people were perfidiously murdered and cast into the street. Since the invasion of Robert the Norman, the Romans had pursued their domestic quarrels without the dangerous interposition of a stranger. But in the disorders of the schism, an aspiring neighbour, Ladislaus king of Naples, alternately supported and betrayed the pope and the people: by the former he was declared gonfalonier, or general, of the church, while the latter submitted to his choice the nomination of their magistrates. Besieging Rome by land and water, he thrice entered the gates as a barbarian conqueror, profaned the altars, violated the virgins, pillaged the merchants, performed his devotions at St. Peter's, and left a garrison in the castle of St. Angelo. His arms were sometimes unfortunate, and to a delay of three days he was indebted for his life and crown, but Ladislaus triumphed in his turn, and it was only his premature death that could save the metropolis and the ecclesiastical state from the ambitious conqueror who had assumed the title, or at least the powers, of king of Rome †

I have not undertaken the ecclesiastical history of the schism, but Rome, the object of these last chapters, is deeply interested in the disputed succession of her sovereigns. The first counsels for the peace and union of Christendom arose from the university of Paris, from the faculty of the Sorbonne, whose doctors were esteemed, at least in the Gallican church, as the most consummate masters of theological science †. Prudently waving all invidious inquiry into the origin and merits of the dispute, they proposed, as a healing measure, that the two pretenders of Rome and Avignon should abdicate at the same time, after qualifying the cardinals of the adverse factions to join in a legitimate election, and that the nations should substantially † their obedience, if either of the competitors preferred his own interest to that of the public. At each vacancy, these physicians of the church deprecated the mischiefs of a hasty choice, but the policy of the conclave and the ambition of its members were deaf to reason and entreaties, and whatsoever promises were made, the pope could never be bound by the oaths of the cardinal. During fifteen years, the pacific designs of the university were eluded by the arts of the rival pontiffs, the scruples or passions of their adherents, and the vicissitudes of French factions, that ruled the insanity of Charles the sixth. At length a vigorous resolution was embraced: and a solemn embassy, of the titular patriarch of Alexandria, two archbishops, five bishops, five abbots, three knights, and twenty doctors, was sent to the courts of Avignon and Rome, to require, in the name of the church and king, the abdication of the two pretenders, of Peter de Luna, who styled himself Benedict the thirteenth, and of Angelo Corrario, who assumed the name of Gregory the twelfth. For the ancient honour of Rome, and the success of their commission, the ambassadors solicited a conference with the magistrates of the city, whom they gratified by a positive declaration, that the most christian king did not entertain a wish of transporting the holy see from the Vatican, which he considered as the genu-

* The ordinal numbers of the popes seem to decide the question against Clement VII and Benedict XIII who are boldly stigmatized as antipopes by the Italians while the French are content with authorities and reasons to plead the cause of doubt and toleration (Baluz in Prefat.) It is singular or rather it is not singular, that saints, visions, and miracles should be common in both parties.

† Baluze strenuously labours (Not p. 1271—1280) to justify the pure and pious motives of Charles V. king of France: he refused to hear the arguments of Urban but were not the Urbanists equally deaf to the reasons of Clement, &c.

‡ An epistle or declaration in the name of Edward III (Baluz Vil Pap Avignon tom i p. 553) displays the zeal of the English nation against the Clementines. Nor was their zeal confined to words: the Bishop of Norwich led a crusade of 60 000 knights beyond sea (Hume's History vol iii p. 57 58).

§ Besides the general historians, the Diaries of Delphinus Gentilis, Peter Antonius and Stephen Infessura, in the great Collection of Muratori represent the state and misfortunes of Rome.

† It is supposed by Grinnone (tom iii p. 292) that he styled himself Rex Romæ, a title unknown to the world since the expulsion of Tarquin. But a nearer inspection has justified the reading of Rex Romæ, of Rama, an obscure kingdom annexed to the crown of Hungary.

‡ The leading and decisive part which France assumed in the schism is stated by Peter du Puits in a separate history, extracted from authentic records, and inserted in the seventh volume of the last and best edition of his friend Thuanus (P. xi p. 110—184).

§ Of this measure, John Gerson, a stout doctor, was the author or the champion. The proceedings of the university of Paris and the Gallican church were often prompted by his advice and are copiously displayed in his theological writings of which Le Clerc (Bibliothèque Choiseul, tom x p. 1—78) has given a valuable extract. John Gerson acted an important part in the councils of Pisa and Constance.

their persons tall, their spears long, such as could wound at a distance"<sup>a</sup> In this morass the Roman army, after an ineffectual struggle, was irrecoverably lost, nor could the body of the emperor ever be found<sup>a</sup> Such was the fate of Decius, in the fiftieth year of his age, an accomplished prince, active in war, and affable in peace,<sup>b</sup> who, together with his son, has deserved to be compared, both in life and death, with the brightest examples of ancient virtue<sup>c</sup>

Invasion of Gallus
A D 251
December

This fatal blow humbled, for a very little time, the insolence of the legions They appear to have patiently expected, and submissively obeyed, the decree of the senate which regulated the succession to the throne From a just regard for the memory of Decius, the imperial title was conferred on Hostilianus, his only surviving son, but an equal rank, with more effectual power, was granted to Gallus, whose experience and ability seemed equal to the great trust of guardian to the young prince and the distressed empire<sup>d</sup> The first care of the new emperor was to deliver the Illyrian provinces from the intolerable weight of the victorious Goths He consented to leave in their hands the rich fruits of their invasion, an immense booty, and, what was still more disgraceful, a great number of prisoners of the highest merit and quality

Retreat of the Goths

He plentifully supplied their camp with every convenience that could assuage their angry spirits, or facilitate their so much wished for departure, and he even promised to pay them annually a large sum of gold, on condition they should never afterwards infest the Roman territories by their incursions<sup>e</sup>

In the age of the Scipios, the most opulent kings of the earth, who courted the protection of the victorious commonwealth, were gratified with such trifling presents as could only derive a value from the hand that bestowed them, an ivory chair, a coarse garment of purple, an inconsiderable piece of plate, or a quantity of copper coin<sup>f</sup> After the wealth of nations had centred in Rome, the emperors displayed their greatness, and even their policy, by the regular exercise of a steady and moderate liberality towards the allies of the state They relieved the poverty of the barbarians, honoured their merit, and recompensed their fidelity These voluntary marks of bounty were understood to flow, not from the fears, but merely from the generosity or the gratitude, of the Romans, and whilst presents and subsidies were liberally distributed among friends and suppliants, they were sternly refused to such as claimed them as a debt<sup>g</sup> But this stipulation, of an annual payment to a victorious enemy, appeared without disguise in the light of an ignominious tribute, the minds of the Romans were not yet accustomed to accept such unequal laws from a tribe of barbarians, and the prince, who by a necessary concession had probably saved his country, became the object of the general contempt and aversion The death of Hostilianus, though it happened in the midst of a raging pestilence, was interpreted as the personal crime of Gallus,<sup>h</sup> and even the defeat of the late emperor was ascribed by the voice of suspicion to the perfidious counsels of his hated successor<sup>i</sup> The tranquillity which the empire enjoyed during the first year of his administration,<sup>k</sup> served rather to inflame than to appease the public discontent, and, as soon as the apprehensions of war were removed, the infamy of the peace was more deeply and more sensibly felt

But the Romans were irritated to a still higher degree, when they discovered that they had not even secured their repose, though at the expense of their honour The dangerous secret of the wealth and weakness of the empire had been revealed to the world New swarms of barbarians, encouraged by the success, and not conceiving themselves bound by the obligation, of their brethren, spread devastation through the Illyrian provinces, and terror as far as the gates of Rome The defence of the monarchy, which seemed abandoned by the pusillanimous emperor, was assumed by Æmilianus, governor of Pannonia and Mæsia, who rallied the scattered forces, and revived the fainting spirits of the troops The barbarians were unexpectedly attacked, routed, chased, and pursued beyond the Danube The victorious leader distributed as a donative the money collected for the tribute, and the acclamations of the soldiers proclaimed him emperor on the field of battle<sup>l</sup> Gallus, who, careless of the general welfare, indulged himself in the pleasures of Italy, was almost in the same instant informed of the success, of the revolt, and of the rapid approach, of his aspiring lieutenant He advanced to meet him as far as the plains of Spoleto When the armies came in sight of each other, the soldiers of Gallus compared the ignominious conduct of their sovereign with the glory of his rival They admired the valour of Æmilianus, they were attracted by his liberality, for he offered a considerable increase of pay to all deserters<sup>m</sup>

<sup>a</sup> I have ventured to copy from Tacitus (Annal. i. 64) the picture of a similar engagement between a Roman army and German tribe a Jornandes, c. 18 Zosimus i. i p. 22 Zonaras, l. xii p. 627 Aurelius Victor

<sup>b</sup> The Decei were killed before the end of the year two hundred and fifty one since the new princes took possession of the consulship on the ensuing calends of January

<sup>c</sup> Hist. August. p. 223 gives them a very honourable place among the small number of good emperors who reigned between Augustus and Diocletian

<sup>d</sup> Hec ubi Pitres comperere

decernunt Victor in

Cæsariis

<sup>e</sup> Zonaras, l. xii p. 628

<sup>f</sup> A sella, a toga, and a golden patera of five pounds weight were accepted with joy and gratitude by the wealthy king of Egypt (Livy, xxvii. 4) Quina milia æris a weight of copper, in value about fifteen pounds sterling, was the usual present made to foreign ambassadors (Livy, xxxi. 9)

<sup>g</sup> See the firmness of a Roman general so late as the time of Alexander Severus in the Excerptæ Legationum, p. 25 Edit. Louvre

<sup>h</sup> For the plague, see Jornandes c. 19 and Victor in Cæsariis

<sup>i</sup> These improbable accusations are alleged by Zosimus, l. i p. 23 24

<sup>k</sup> Jornandes, c. 19 The Gothic writer at least observed the peace which his victorious countrymen had sworn to Gallus

<sup>l</sup> Zosimus, l. i p. 25, 26

<sup>m</sup> Victor in Cæsariis

ine and proper seat of the successor of St Peter In the name of the senate and people, an eloquent Roman asserted their desire to co-operate in the union of the church, deplored the temporal and spiritual calamities of the long schism, and requested the protection of France against the arms of the king of Naples The answers of Benedict and Gregory were alike edifying and alike deceitful, and, in evading the demand of their abdication, the two rivals were animated by a common spirit They agreed on the necessity of a previous interview, but the time, the place, and the manner, could never be ascertained by mutual consent. "If the one advances," says a servant of Gregory, "the other retreats, the one appears an animal fearful of the land, the other a creature apprehensive of the water And thus, for a short remnant of life and power, will these aged priests endanger the peace and salvation of the christian world"

The christian world was at length provoked by their obstinacy and fraud they were deserted by their cardinals, who embraced each other as friends and colleagues, and their revolt was supported by a numerous assembly of prelates and ambassadors With equal justice, the council of Pisa deposed the popes of Rome and Avignon, the conclave was unanimous in the choice of Alexander the fifth, and his vacant seat was soon filled by a similar election of John the twenty-third, the most profligate of mankind But instead of extinguishing the schism, the rashness of the French and Italians had given a third pretender to the chair of St Peter Such new claims of the synod and conclave were disputed three kings, of Germany, Hungary, and Naples, adhered to the cause of Gregory the twelfth, and Benedict the thirteenth, himself a Spaniard, was acknowledged by the devotion and patriotism of that powerful nation The rash proceedings of Pisa were corrected by the council of Constance, the emperor Sigismund acted a conspicuous part as the advocate or protector of the catholic church, and the number and weight of civil and ecclesiastical members might seem to constitute the states-general of Europe Of the three popes, John the twenty-third was the first victim, he fled and was brought back a prisoner the most

Council of Pisa,
A. D 1409
Council of Constance,
A. D 1414-1418

e Leonardus Brunus Aretinus, one of the revivers of classic learning in Italy, who after serving many years as secretary in the Roman court retired to the honourable office of chancellor of the republic of Florence (Fabrie Bibliot. medii ævi, tom i p 290) Lenfant has given the version of this curious epistle (Concile de Pise, tom i p 192-195)

f I cannot overlook this great national cause which was vigorously maintained by the English ambassadors against those of France The latter contended, that Christendom was essentially distributed into the four great nations and votes, of Italy Germany France, and Spain and that the lesser kingdoms (such as England, Denmark Portugal, &c) were comprehended under one or other of these great divisions The English asserted that the British Islands, of which they were the head should be considered as a fifth and co-ordinate nation with an equal vote and every argument of truth or falsehood was introduced to exalt the dignity of their country Including England Scotland, Wales, the four kingdoms of Ireland, and the Orkneys the British islands are decorated with eight royal crowns, and discriminated by four or five languages English Welsh Cornish, Scotch, Irish, &c The greater island from north to south measures 800 miles or forty days journey and England alone contains 32 counties, and 52 000 parish churches (a bold account!) besides cathedrals colleges priories and hospitals They celebrate the mission of St Joseph of Arimathea the birth of Constantine, and the legantine powers of the two primates, scandalous charges were suppressed, the vicar of Christ was only accused of piracy, murder, rape, sodomy, and incest, and after subscribing his own condemnation, he expiated in prison the imprudence of trusting his person to a free city beyond the Alps Gregory the twelfth, whose obedience was reduced to the narrow precincts of Rimini, descended with more honour from the throne, and his ambassador convened the session, in which he renounced the title and authority of lawful pope To vanquish the obstinacy of Benedict the thirteenth or his adherents, the emperor in person undertook a journey from Constance to Perpignan The kings of Castille, Arragon, Navarre, and Scotland, obtained an equal and honourable treaty. with the concurrence of the Spaniards, Benedict was deposed by the council, but the harmless old man was left in a solitary castle to excommunicate twice each day the rebel kingdoms which had deserted his cause After thus eradicating the remains of the schism, the synod of Constance proceeded with slow and cautious steps to elect the sovereign of Rome and the head of the church On this momentous occasion, the college of twenty-three cardinals was fortified with thirty deputies, six of whom were chosen in each of the five great nations of christendom, the Italian, the German, the French, the Spanish, and the English the interference of strangers was softened by their generous preference of an Italian and a Roman, and the hereditary, as well as personal, merit of Otho Colonna recommended him to the conclave Rome accepted with joy and obedience the noblest of her sons, the ecclesiastical state was defended by his powerful family, and the elevation of Martin the fifth is the æra of the restoration and establishment of the popes in the Vatican

The royal prerogative of coining money, which had been exercised near three hundred years by the senate, was first resumed by Martin the fifth, and his image and superscription introduce the series of the papal medals Of his two immediate successors, Eugenius the fourth was the last pope expelled by the tumults of the Roman people, and Nicholas the fifth, the last who was importuned by the presence of a

Election of Martin V

Martin V
A. D 1417

Eugenius IV
A. D 1431

Nicholas V
A. D 1447

without forgetting the testimony of Bartholmey de Glanville, (A. D 1360) who reckons only four christian kingdoms 1 of Rome 2 of Constantinople, 3 of Ireland, which had been transferred to the English monarchs, and, 4 of Spain Our countrymen prevailed in the council, but the victories of Henry V added much weight to their arguments The adverse pleadings were found at Constance by Sir Robert Wingfield, ambassador from Henry VIII to the emperor Maximilian I and by him printed in 1517 at Louvain From a Leipzig MS they are more correctly published in the Collection of Von der Hardt, tom i but I have only seen Lenfant's abstract of these acts (Concile de Constance tom ii p 447 453 &c)

g The histories of the three successive councils, Pisa Constance, and Basil, have been written with a tolerable degree of candour, industry, and elegance by a protestant minister M Lenfant, who retired from France to Berlin They form six volumes in quarto, and as Basil is the worst, so Constance is the best part of the collection

h See the twenty seventh Dissertation of the Antiquities of Muratori and the first Instruction of the Science des Medailles of the Pere Joubert and the Baron de la Bastie The Metallic History of Martin V and his successors has been composed by two monks Moulinet a Frenchman, and Bonnam an Italian but I understand, that the first part of the series is restored from more recent coins

i Besides the Lives of Eugenius IV (Rerum Italic tom iii p i p 869 and tom xxv p 256) the Diaries of Paul Petroni and Stephen

Last revolt of Rome,
A D 1434
May 29—
October 26

Roman emperor<sup>k</sup> I The conflict of Eugenius, with the fathers of Basil, and the weight or apprehension of a new excommunicator, emboldened and provoked the Romans to usurp the temporal government of the city. They rose in arms, elected seven governors of the republic, and a constable of the capitol, imprisoned the pope's nephew, besieged his person in the palace, and shot volleys of arrows into his bark as he escaped down the Tiber in the habit of a monk. But he still possessed in the castle of St Angelo a faithful garrison and a train of artillery: their batteries incessantly thundered on the city, and a bullet more dexterously pointed broke down the barricade of the bridge, and scattered with a single shot the heroes of the republic. Their constancy was exhausted by a rebellion of five months. Under the tyranny of the Ghibeline nobles, the wisest patriots regretted the dominion of the church, and their repentance was unanimous and effectual. The troops of St Peter again occupied the capitol, the magistrates departed to their homes, the most guilty were executed or exiled, and the legate, the head of two thousand foot and four thousand horse, was saluted as the father of the city. The synods of Ferrara and Florence, the fear or resentment of Eugenius, prolonged his absence, he was received by a submissive people, but the pontiff understood from the acclamations of his triumphal entry, that to secure their loyalty and his own repose, he must grant without delay the abolition of the odious excommunicator. II Rome was restored, adorned, and enlightened, by the peaceful reign of Nicholas the fifth. In the midst of these laudable occupations,

Last coronation of a German emperor, Frederic
III
A D 1452
March 18

the pope was alarmed by the approach of Frederic the third of Austria, though his fears could not be justified by the character or the power of the imperial candidate. After drawing his military force to the metropolis, and imposing the best security of oaths<sup>l</sup> and treaties, Nicholas received with a smiling countenance the faithful advocate and vassal of the church. So tame were the times, so feeble was the Austrian, that the pomp of his coronation was accomplished with order and harmony: but the superfluous honour was so disgraceful to an independent nation, that his successors have excused themselves from the toilsome pilgrimage to the Vatican, and rest their imperial title on the choice of the electors of Germany.

The slaves and government of
Rome

A citizen has remarked, with pride and pleasure, that the king of the Romans, after passing with a slight salute the cardinals and prelates who met him at the gate, distinguished the dress and person of the senator of

Rome, and in this last farewell, the pageants of the empire and the republic were elapsed in a friendly embrace<sup>m</sup>. According to the laws of Rome,<sup>n</sup> her first magistrate was required to be a doctor of laws, an alien, of a place at least forty miles from the city, with whose inhabitants he must not be connected in the third canonical degree of blood or alliance. The election was annual: a severe scrutiny was instituted into the conduct of the departing senator, nor could he be recalled to the same office till after the expiration of two years. A liberal salary of three thousand florins was assigned for his expense and reward, and his public appearance represented the majesty of the republic. His robes were of gold brocade or crimson velvet, or in the summer season of a lighter silk, he bore in his hand an ivory sceptre, the sound of trumpets announced his approach, and his solemn steps were preceded at least by four letors or attendants, whose red wands were enveloped with bands or streamers of the golden colour or livery of the city. His oath in the capitol proclaims his right and duty, to observe and assert the laws, to control the proud, to protect the poor, and to exercise justice and mercy within the extent of his jurisdiction. In these useful functions he was assisted by three learned strangers, the two collaterals, and the judge of criminal appeals: their frequent trials of robberies, rapes, and murders, are attested by the laws, and the weakness of these laws convicts at the licentiousness of private feuds and armed associations for mutual defence. But the senator was confined to the administration of justice: the capitol, the treasury, and the government of the city and its territory, were intrusted to the three conservators, who were changed four times in each year: the militia of the thirteen regions assembled under the banners of their respective chiefs, or caporioni, and the first of these was distinguished by the name and dignity of the prior. The popular legislature consisted of the secret and the common councils of the Romans. The former was composed of the magistrates and their immediate predecessors, with some fiscal and legal officers, and three classes of thirteen, twenty-six, and forty counsellors, amounting in the whole to about one hundred and twenty persons. In the common council all male citizens had a right to vote, and the value of their privilege was enhanced by the care with which any foreigners were prevented from usurping the title and character of Romans. The tumult of a democracy was checked by wise and jealous precautions: except the magistrates, none could propose a question, none were permitted to speak, except from an open pulpit or tribunal, all disorderly acclamations were sup-few years he should ascend the throne and imbibe the maxims, of Boniface VIII.

<sup>m</sup> Lo senatore di Roma, vestito di broccato con quella berella, e con quelle maniche, et ornamenti di pelle, co' quali va alle feste di Testaccio e Nazzone milita escape the eye of Aeneas Sylvius, but he is viewed with admiration and complacency by the Roman citizen (Diario di Stephano Infessura, p. 1173).

<sup>n</sup> See in the statutes of Rome, the senator and three judges, (l. i. c. 3—14) the conservators (l. i. c. 15—17 l. iii. c. 4) the caporioni, (l. i. c. 18 l. iii. c. 8) the secret council, (l. iii. c. 2) the common coun-

Infessura are the best original evidence for the revolt of the Romans against Eugenius IV. The former who lived at the time and on the spot, speaks the language of a citizen, equally afraid of priestly and popular tyranny.

<sup>k</sup> The coronation of Frederic III is described by Lenfant (Concile de Basle tom. ii. p. 276—288) from Aeneas Sylvius, a spectator and actor in that splendid scene.

<sup>l</sup> The oath of fidelity imposed on the emperor by the pope, is recorded and sanctified in the Clementines (l. ii. tit. ix.) and Aeneas Sylvius, who objects to this new demand, could not foresee, that in a

pressed, the sense of the majority was decided by a secret ballot, and their decrees were promulgated in the venerable name of the Roman senate and people. It would not be easy to assign a period in which this theory of government has been reduced to accurate and constant practice, since the establishment of order has been gradually connected with the decay of liberty. But in the year one thousand five hundred and eighty, the ancient statutes were collected, methodized in three books, and adapted to present use, under the pontificate, and with the approbation, of Gregory the thirteenth. This civil and criminal code is the modern law of the city, and, if the popular assemblies have been abolished, a foreign senator, with the three conservators, still resides in the palace of the capitol. The policy of the Cæsars has been repeated by the popes, and the bishop of Rome affected to maintain the form of a republic, while he reigned with the absolute powers of a temporal, as well as spiritual, monarch.

It is an obvious truth, that the times must be suited to extraordinary characters, and that the genius of Cromwell or Retz might now expire in obscurity. The political enthusiasm of Rienzi had exalted him to a throne, the same enthusiasm, in the next century, conducted his imitator to the gallows. The birth of Stephen Porcero was noble, his reputation spotless, his tongue was armed with eloquence, his mind was enlightened with learning, and he aspired, beyond the aim of vulgar ambition, to free his country and immortalize his name. The dominion of priests is most odious to a liberal spirit, every scruple was removed by the recent knowledge of the fable and forgery of Constantine's donation, Petrarch was now the oracle of the Italians, and as often as Porcero revolved the ode which describes the patriot and hero of Rome, he applied to himself the visions of the prophetic bard. His first trial of the popular feelings was at the funeral of Eugenius the fourth. In an elaborate speech he called the Romans to liberty and arms, and they listened with apparent pleasure, till Porcero was interrupted and answered by a grave advocate, who pleaded for the church and state. By every law the seditious orator was guilty of treason, but the benevolence of the new pontiff, who viewed his character with pity and esteem, attempted by an honourable office to convert the patriot into a friend. The inflexible Roman returned from Anagni with an increase of reputation and zeal, and, on the first opportunity, the games of the place Navona, he tried to inflame the casual dispute of some boys and mechanics into a general rising of the people. Yet the humane Nicholas was still averse to accept the forfeit of his life, and the traitor was removed from the scene of temptation to Bologna, with a liberal allowance for his support, and the easy obligation of presenting himself each day before the governor of the city. But Porcero had learned from the younger Brutus, that with tyrants no faith or gratitude should be observed. The exile declaimed against the arbitrary sentence, a party and a conspiracy were gradually formed, his nephew, a daring youth, assembled a band of volunteers, and on the appointed evening a feast was prepared at his house for the friends of the republic. Their leader, who had escaped from Bologna, appeared among them in a robe of purple and gold. His voice, his countenance, his gestures, bespoke the man who had devoted his life or death to the glorious cause. In a studied oration, he expatiated on the motives and the means of their enterprise. The name and liberties of Rome, the sloth and pride of their ecclesiastical tyrants, the active or passive consent of their fellow-citizens, three hundred soldiers, and four hundred exiles, long exercised in arms or in wrongs, the licence of revenge to edge their swords, and a million of ducats to reward their victory. It would be easy, (he said,) on the next day, the festival of the Epiphany, to seize the pope and his cardinals, before the doors, or at the altar, of St Peter's, to lead them in chains under the walls of St Angelo, to extort by the threat of their instant death a surrender of the castle, to ascend the vacant capitol, to ring the alarm-bell, and to restore in a popular assembly the ancient republic of Rome. While he triumphed, he was already betrayed, the senator, with a strong guard, invested the house, the nephew of Porcero cut his way through the crowd, but the unfortunate Stephen was drawn from a chest, lamenting that his enemies had anticipated by three hours the execution of his design. After such manifest and repeated guilt, even the mercy of Nicholas was silent. Porcero, and nine of his accomplices, were hanged without the benefit of the sacraments, and amidst the fears and invectives of the papal court, the Romans pitied, and almost applauded, these martyrs of their country. But their applause was mute, their pity ineffectual, their liberty for ever extinct, and, if they have since risen in a vacancy of the throne or a scarcity of bread, such accidental tumults may be found in the bosom of the most abject servitude.

But the independence of the nobles, which was fomented by discord, survived the freedom of the commons, which must be founded in union. A privilege of

Last disorders of the nobles of Rome

cit (l. iii c. 3) The tide of feuds, defiance, acts of violence, &c. is spread through many a chapter, (c. 14-40) of the second book. Statuta alma Urbis Romæ Auctoritate S. D. N. Gregorij XIII Pont. Max. a Senatu Populoque Rom. reformata et edita Romæ, 1580 in folio. The obsolete, repugnant statutes of antiquity were consolidated in five books, and Lucas Patius a lawyer and antiquarian was appointed to act as the modern Tribonian. Yet I regret the old code, with the rugged cruel of freedom and barbarism. In my time, (1763,) and in M. Grouley's Observations sur l'Italie, tom. ii. p. 361, the senator of Rome was M. Buelke, a noble Swede, and a professed Catholic. The pope's right to appoint the senator and the conservator is implied, rather than affirmed, in the statutes. Besides the curious though concise narrative of Machiavel, (Storie Fiorentine, l. vi Opere, tom. i. p. 210, 211 edit. Londra, 1747, in 4to) the Porcarian conspiracy is related in the Diary of Stephen Infessura, (Rer. Ital. tom. iii. p. 1124, 1130) and in a separate tract by Leo Baptista Alberti (Rer. Ital. tom. xiv. p. 600-614). It is amusing to compare the style and sentiments of the courtier and citizen. Facinus huius, neque crudelitate tetrum, neque audacia delectabili, profecto quo neque periculo horribilius, neque audaci delectabili. Perdette la vita quell'huomo da bene, e amatore dello bene et liberta di Roma.

rapine and oppression was long maintained by the barons of Rome, their houses were a fortress and a sanctuary and the ferocious train of banditti and criminals whom they protected from the law, repaid the hospitality with the service of their swords and daggers. The private interest of the pontiffs, or their nephews, sometimes involved them in these domestic feuds. Under the reign of Sixtus the fourth, Rome was distracted by the battles and sieges of the rival houses after the conflagration of his palace, the protonotary Colonna was tortured and beheaded, and Savelli, his captive friend, was murdered on the spot, for refusing to join in the acclamations of the victorious Ursini. But the popes no longer trembled in the Vatican they had strength to command, if they had resolution to claim the obedience of their subjects, and the strangers, who observed these partial disorders, admired the easy taxes and wise administration of the ecclesiastical state.

The popes acquire the absolute dominion of Rome A.D. 1500 &c.

The spiritual thunders of the Vatican depend on the force of opinion, and if that opinion be supplanted by reason or passion, the sound may idly waste itself in the air, and the helpless priest is exposed to the brutal violence of a noble or plebeian adversary. But after their return from Avignon, the keys of St. Peter were guarded by the sword of St. Paul. Rome was commanded by an impregnable citadel the use of cannon is a powerful engine against popular seditions a regular force of cavalry and infantry was enlisted under the banners of the pope his ample revenues supplied the resources of war, and, from the extent of his dominion, he could bring down on a rebellious city an army of hostile neighbours and loyal subjects. Since the union of the duchies of Ferrara and Urbino, the ecclesiastical state extends from the Mediterranean to the Adriatic, and from the confines of Naples to the banks of the Po, and as early as the sixteenth century, the greater part of that spacious and fruitful country acknowledged the lawful claims and temporal sovereignty of the Roman pontiffs. Their claims were readily deduced from the genuine, or fabulous, donations of the darker ages the successive steps of their final settlement would engage us too far in the transactions of Italy, and even of Europe, the crimes of Alexander the sixth, the martial operations of Julius the second, and the liberal policy of Leo the tenth, a theme which has been adorned by the pens of the noblest historians of the times. In the first period of their conquests, till the expedition of Charles the eighth, the popes might successfully wrestle with the adjacent princes and states, whose military force was equal, or inferior, to their own. But as soon as the monarchs of France, Germany, and Spain, contended with gigantic arms for the dominion of Italy, they supplied with art the deficiency of strength, and concealed, in a labyrinth of wars and treaties, their aspiring views, and the immortal hope of chasing the barbarians beyond the Alps. The nice balance of the Vatican was often subverted by the soldiers of the north and west, who were united under the standard of Charles the fifth the feeble and fluctuating policy of Clement the seventh exposed his person and dominions to the conqueror, and Rome was abandoned seven months to a lawless army, more cruel and rapacious than the Goths and Vandals. After this severe lesson, the popes contracted their ambition, which was almost satisfied, resumed the character of a common parent, and abstained from all offensive hostilities, except in a hasty quarrel, when the vicar of Christ and the Turkish sultan were armed at the same time against the kingdom of Naples. The French and Germans at length withdrew from the field of battle Milan, Naples, Sicily, Sardinia, and the sea-coast of Tuscany, were firmly possessed by the Spaniards, and it became their interest to maintain the peace and dependence of Italy, which continued almost without disturbance from the middle of the sixteenth to the opening of the eighteenth century. The Vatican was swayed and protected by the religious policy of the catholic king his prejudice and interest disposed him in every dispute to support the prince against the people, and instead of the encouragement, the aid, and the asylum, which they obtained from the adjacent states, the friends of liberty, or the enemies of law, were enclosed on all sides within the iron circle of despotism. The long habits of obedience and education subdued the turbulent spirit of the nobles and commons of Rome. The barons forgot the arms and factions of their ancestors, and insensibly became the servants of luxury and government. Instead of maintaining a crowd of tenants and followers, the produce of their estates was consumed in the private expenses, which multiply the pleasures, and diminish the power, of the lord. The Colonna and Ursini vied with each other in the decoration of their palaces and chapels, and their antique splendour was rivalled or surpassed by the

* The disorders of Rome, which were much inflamed by the partiality of Sixtus IV. are exposed in the Diaries of two speculators Stephen In fessura and an anonymous citizen. See the troubles of the year 1484 and the death of the protonotary Colonna, in tom. iii. p. 11 p. 1093 1158.

† Est toute la terre de Pe, lie troublée pour cette partialité (des Colones et des Ursins) comme nous dirons Luce et Grammont, ou en Hol lande Houc et Caballan et quand ce ne seroit ce différent la terre de l'episcopat seroit la plus heureuse habitation pour les sujets qui sont dans tout le monde (car ils ne payent ni tailles ni guerres autres choses) et seroient toujours bien conduits (car toujours les papes sont sages et bien conseillés) mais tres souvent en advenant de grands et cruels meurtres et pilleries.

‡ By the economy of Sixtus V. the revenue of the ecclesiastical state was raised to two millions and a half of Roman crowns (Viti tom. ii. p. 291—296) and so regular was the military establishment, that in one month Clement VIII. could invade the duchy of Ferrara with three thousand horse and twenty thousand foot, (tom. iii. p. 64.) Since that time, (A.D. 1597) the papal arms are happily rusted, but the revenue must have gained some nominal increase.

§ More especially by Guicciardini and Machiavel, in the general history of the former, in the Florentine history the Prince and the political discourses of the latter. These, with their worthy successors, Fra Paolo and Davila were justly esteemed the first historians of modern languages till in the present age, Scotland arose, to dispute the prize with Italy herself.

¶ In the history of the Catholic empire I have compared the barbarians with the subjects of Charles V. (vol. v. p. 319—322) an anticipation which like that of the Tartar conquests I indulged with the less scruple as I could scarcely hope to reach the conclusion of my work.

‡ The ambitious and feeble hostilities of the Caraffa pope, Paul IV. may be seen in Thuanus (l. xvi.—xviii) and Grunone (tom. iv. p. 149—163). Those catholic lords Philip II. and the duke of Alva presumed to separate the Roman prince from the vicar of Christ yet the holy character which would have sanctified his victory was decently applied to protect his defeat.

§ This gradual change of manners and expense is admirably explained by Dr. Adam Smith, (Wealth of Nations, vol. i. p. 495—504) who sudden opulence of the papal families In Rome the voice of freedom and discord is no longer heard, and instead of the foaming torrent, a smooth and stagnant lake reflects the image of idleness and servitude

A christian, a philosopher,<sup>a</sup> and a patriot, will be equally scandalized by the temporal kingdom of the clergy, and the local majesty of Rome, the remembrance of her consuls and triumphs, may seem to imbitter the sense, and aggravate the shame, of her slavery If we calmly weigh the merits and defects of the ecclesiastical government, it may be praised in its present state, as a mild, decent, and tranquil system, exempt from the dangers of minority, the sallies of youth, the expenses of luxury, and the calamities of war But these advantages are overbalanced by a frequent, perhaps a septennial, election of a sovereign, who is seldom a native of the country the reign of a young statesman of threescore, in the decline of his life and abilities, without hope to accomplish, and without children to inherit, the labours of his transitory reign The successful candidate is drawn from the church, and even the convent, from the mode of education and life the most adverse to reason, humanity, and freedom In the trammels of servile faith, he has learned to believe because it is absurd, to revere all that is contemptible, and to despise whatever might deserve the esteem of a rational being, to punish error as a crime, to reward mortification and celibacy as the first of virtues; to place the saints of the kalendar<sup>b</sup> above the heroes of Rome and the sages of Athens, and to consider primes, perhaps too severely, that the most salutary effects have flowed from the meanest and most selfish causes

<sup>a</sup> Mr Hume (Hist of England, vol 1 p. 389) too hastily concludes, that if the civil and ecclesiastical powers be united in the same person, it is of little moment whether he be styled prince or prelate, since the temporal character will always predominate

<sup>b</sup> A protestant may disdain the unworthy preference of St Francis or St Dominic, but he will not rashly condemn the zeal or judgment of Sixtus V who placed the statues of the apostles, St Peter and St Paul, on the vacant columns of Trajan and Antonine

<sup>c</sup> A wandering Italian, Gregorio Leti, has given the Vita di Sisto, Quinto (Amstel 1721, 3 vols in 12mo) a copious and amusing work, but which does not command our absolute confidence Yet the character of the man and the principal facts, are supported by the annals of Spondanus and Muratori, (A D 1585—1590) and the contemporary history of the great Thuanus, (l lxxxi c 1, 2 l lxxxii c 10 l c 8)

<sup>d</sup> These privileged places the quartieri or franchises, were adapted from the Roman nobles by the foreign ministers Julius II had once abolished the abominandum et detestandum franchitiarum privilegium nunc et after Sixtus V they again revived I cannot discern either the justice or magnanimity of Louis XIV who, in 1687 sent his ambassador the marquis de Lavardieu, to Rome with an armed force of a thousand officers, guards, and domestics, to maintain this iniquitous claim, and insult pope Innocent XI in the heart of his capital (Vita di Sisto V tom iii p 260—278 Muratori Annali D Italia, tom xi p 494—496 and Voltaire, Siècle de Louis XIV tom ii c 14 p 58, 59)

<sup>e</sup> This outrage produced a decree, which was inscribed on marble, and placed in the capital It is expressed in a style of manly simplicity and freedom Si quis sine privatis sine nra, stratum gerens de collocandis viro pontifici statua mentinem facere ausit le, thiois S P Q R decreto in perpetuum infamis et publicorum munerum expers esto MDXC mense Augusto (Vita di Sisto V tom iii p 469) I believe that this decree is still observed and I know that every monarch who deserves a statue should himself impose the prohibition

<sup>f</sup> The histories of the church Italy, and Christendom, have contributed to the chapter which I now conclude In the original Lives of the Popes we often discover the city and republic of Rome, and the events of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries are preserved in the rude and domestic chronicles which I have carefully inspected, and shall recapitulate in the order of time

1 Monaldeschi (Ludovico Boncompagni) Frammenta Anonymi Romanæ A D 1328, in the Scriptores Rerum Italicarum of Muratori, tom xi p 525 A B The credit of this fragment is somewhat hurt by a singular interpolation, to which the author relates his own death at the age of 115 years

2 Fragmenta Historiæ Romanæ, (Vulgo Thomas Fortificocæ,) in Ro-

mana Dialecto vulgari, (A D 1327—1354) in Muratori, Antiquitat. mediæ Aevi Italiæ tom iii p 247—348 the authentic ground-work of the history of Rienzi

3 Delphini (Gentilis) Diarium Romanum, (A D 1370—1410) in the Rerum Italicarum, tom iii p ii p 846

4 Antonii (Petri) Diarium Romæ (A D 1404—1417) tom xxiv p 969

5 Pelroni (Pauli) Miscellanea Historica Romanæ, (A D 1433—1446) tom xxv p 1101

6 Vilelerrani (Jacob) Diarium Romæ (A D 1472—1484) tom xxviii p 81

7 Anonymi Diarium Urbis Romæ (A D 1481—1492) tom iii p ii p 1060

8 Infesuræ (Stephani) Diarium Romanum, (A D 1294, or 1338—1494) tom iii p ii p 1109

9 Historiæ Arcana Alexandri VI sive Excerpta ex Diario Joh. Bircardi, (A D 1492—1503) edita a Godefr. Gulielm. Leibnizio Hanover, 1697, in 4to The large and valuable Journal of Bircard might be completed from the MSS in different libraries of Italy and France (M de Foncemagne, in the Memoires de l'Acad des Inscriptions tom xvii p 594—606)

Except the last all these fragments and diaries are inserted in the Collections of Muratori, my guide and master in the history of Italy His country and the public are indebted to him for the following works on that subject 1 Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, (A D 500—1500) quorum potissima pars nunc primum in lucem prodit, &c twenty eight vols in folio Milan, 1723—1738, 1751 A volume of chronological and alphabetical tables is still wanting as a key to this great work which is yet in a disorderly and defective state 2 Antiquitates Italiæ mediæ Aevi, six vols in folio, Milan, 1738—1743 in seventy-five curious dissertations, on the manners, government, religion &c of the Italians of the darker æra, with a large supplement of charters, chronicles, &c 3 Dissertationi sopra le Antiquità Italiane, three vols in 4to, Milano, 1751 a free version by the author which may be quoted with the same confidence as the Latin text of the Antiquities 4 Annali d' Italia, eleven vols in octavo, Milano, 1753—1756 a dry though accurate and useful abridgment of the history of Italy from the birth of Christ in the middle of the eighteenth century 5 Dei Antichità Estense et Italiane two vols in folio, Modena 1717 1740 In the history of this illustrious race, the parent of our Brunswick kin, the critic is not seduced by the loyalty or gratitude of the subject In all his works, Muratori appears himself a diligent and laborious writer, who aspires above the prejudices of a catholic priest He was born in the year 1672, and died in the year 1750, after passing near sixty years in the libraries of Milan and Modena (Vita del Proposio Ludovico Antonio Muratori, by his nephew and successor, Giovanni Francesco Soli Muratori, Venezia, 1756, in 4to)

Sixtus V
A D 1585—1590

CHAP LXXI

Prospect of the ruins of Rome in the fifteenth century—Four causes of decay and destruction—Example of the Coliseum—Renovation of the city—Conclusion of the whole work

View and discourse of Poggius from the Capitoline hill,
A D 1430

IN the last days of pope Eugenius the fourth, two of his servants, the learned Poggius<sup>a</sup> and a friend, ascended the Capitoline hill, reposed themselves among the ruins of columns and temples, and viewed from that commanding spot the wide and various prospect of desolation<sup>b</sup>. The place and the object gave ample scope for moralizing on the vicissitudes of fortune, which spares neither man nor the proudest of his works, which buries empires and cities in a common grave, and it was agreed, that in proportion to her former greatness, the fall of Rome was the more awful and deplorable. "Her primæval state, such as she might appear in a remote age, when Evander entertained the stranger of Troy,<sup>c</sup> has been delineated by the fancy of Virgil. This Tarpeian rock was then a savage and solitary thicket in the time of the poet, it was crowned with the golden roofs of a temple, the temple is overthrown, the gold has been pillaged, the wheel of fortune has accomplished her revolution, and the sacred ground is again disfigured with thorns and brambles. The hill of the capitol, on which we sit, was formerly the head of the Roman empire, the citadel of the earth, the terror of kings, illustrated by the footsteps of so many triumphs, enriched with the spoils and tributes of so many nations. This spectacle of the world, how is it fallen! how changed! how defaced! the path of victory is obliterated by vines, and the benches of the senators are concealed by a dunghill. Cast your eyes on the Palatine hill, and seek among the shapeless and enormous fragments, the marble theatre, the obelisks, the colossal statues, the porticoes of Nero's palace. survey the other hills of the city, the vacant space is interrupted only by ruins and gardens. The forum of the Roman people, where they assembled to enact their laws and elect their magistrates, is now enclosed for the cultivation of potherbs, or thrown open for the reception of swine and buffaloes. The public and private edifices that were founded for eternity, lie prostrate, naked, and broken, like the limbs of a mighty giant, and the ruin is the more visible, from the stupendous relics that have survived the injuries of time and fortune."<sup>d</sup>

His description of the ruins

These relics are minutely described by Poggius, one of the first who raised

<sup>a</sup> I have already (note 50, 51 on chap. 65) mentioned the age, character and writings of Poggius, and particularly noticed the date of this elegant moral lecture on the varieties of fortune.

<sup>b</sup> Concedimus in ipsa Tarpeia arce ruinis pone in æns portæ ejusdem, ut patet in ipsi marmoreum limen plurimisque passim confractas columnas unde manifeste ex parte prospectus urbis patet, (p. 5)

<sup>c</sup> Æneid viii 37—369. This ancient picture so artfully introduced, and so exquisitely finished, must have been highly interesting to an

his eyes from the monuments of legendary, to those of classic superstition.<sup>e</sup> 1 Besides a bridge, an arch, a sepulchre, and the pyramid of Cestius, he could discern, of the age of the republic, a double row of vaults, in the salt-office of the capitol, which were inscribed with the name and munificence of Catullus. 2 Eleven temples were visible in some degree, from the perfect form of the pantheon, to the three arches and a marble column of the temple of Peace, which Vespasian erected after the civil wars and the Jewish triumph. 3 Of the number, which he rashly defines, of seven therma, or public baths, none were sufficiently entire to represent the use and distribution of the several parts but those of Diocletian and Antoninus Caracalla still retained the titles of the founders, and astonished the curious spectator, who, in observing their solidity and extent, the variety of marbles, the size and multitude of the columns, compared the labour and expense with the use and importance. Of the baths of Constantine, of Alexander, of Domitian, or rather of Titus, some vestige might yet be found. 4 The triumphal arches of Titus, Severus, and Constantine, were entire, both the structure and the inscriptions, a falling fragment was honoured with the name of Trajan and two arches, still extant, in the Flaminian way, have been ascribed to the baser memory of Faustina and Gallienus. 5 After the wonder of the Coliseum, Poggius might have overlooked a small amphitheatre of brick, most probably for the use of the prætorian camp: the theatres of Marcellus and Pompey were occupied in a great measure by public and private buildings, and in the Circus Agonalis and Maximus, little more than the situation and the form could be investigated. 6 The columns of Trajan and Antonine were still erect but the Egyptian obelisks were broken or buried. A people of gods and heroes, the workmanship of art, was reduced to one equestrian figure of gilt brass, and to five marble statues, of which the most conspicuous were the two horses of Phidias and Praxiteles. 7 The two mausoleums or sepulchres of Augustus and Hadrian could not totally be lost, but the former was only visible as a mound of earth, and the latter, the castle of St Angelo, had acquired the name and appearance of a modern fortress. With the addition of some separate and nameless columns, such were the remains of the ancient city for the marks of a more recent structure might be detected in the walls, which formed a circumference of ten miles, included three hundred and seventy-nine turrets, and opened into the country by thirteen gates.

This melancholy picture was drawn above nine hundred years after the fall of Rome of the western empire, and even of the Gothic kingdom of Rome and our early studies allow us to sympathize in the feelings of a Roman

<sup>d</sup> Capitoliū adeo immutatum ut vineæ in senatorum subcellis succederent stercorem ac purgamentorum receptaculū fictum. Respice ad Palatinum montem vasta ruderā cæteros colles peristrā omnia veterū ædificiis ruinis vineisque oppleta conspicias. (Poggius de Varietate Fortunæ p. 21)

<sup>e</sup> See Poggius, p. 8—22.

dom of Italy A long period of distress and anarchy, in which empire, and arts, and riches, had migrated from the banks of the Tiber, was incapable of restoring or adorning the city, and as all that is human must retrograde if it do not advance, every successive age must have hastened the ruin of the works of antiquity To measure the progress of decay, and to ascertain, at each æra, the state of each edifice, would be an endless and useless labour, and I shall content myself with two observations, which will introduce a short inquiry into the general causes and effects 1 Two hundred years before the eloquent complaint of Poggius, an anonymous writer composed a description of Rome<sup>f</sup> His ignorance may repeat the same objects under strange and fabulous names Yet this barbarous topographer had eyes and ears, he could observe the visible remains, he could listen to the tradition of the people, and he distinctly enumerates seven theatres, eleven baths, twelve arches, and eighteen palaces, of which many had disappeared before the time of Poggius It is apparent, that many stately monuments of antiquity survived till a late period,<sup>g</sup> and that the principles of destruction acted with vigorous and increasing energy in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries 2 The same reflection must be applied to the three last ages, and we should vainly seek the Septizonium of Severus,<sup>h</sup> which is celebrated by Petrarch and the antiquarians of the sixteenth century While the Roman edifices were still entire, the first blows, however weighty and impetuous, were resisted by the solidity of the mass and the harmony of the parts, but the slightest touch would precipitate the fragments of arches and columns, that already nodded to their fall

Four causes of destruction

After a diligent inquiry, I can discern four principal causes of the ruin of Rome, which continued to operate in a period of more than a thousand years I The injuries of time and nature II The hostile attacks of the barbarians and christians III The use and abuse of the materials And, IV The domestic quarrels of the Romans

I The injuries of nature,

I The art of man is able to construct monuments far more permanent than the narrow span of his own existence yet these monuments, like himself, are perishable and frail, and in the boundless annals of time, his life and his labours must equally be measured as a fleeting mo-

<sup>f</sup> Liber de Mirabilibus Romæ ex Registro Nicolai Cardinalis de Arragoni in Bibliotheca St Isidori Amari IV No 69 This treatise, with some short but pertinent notes, has been published by Montfaucon (Diarium Italicum, p 283—301) who thus delivers his own critical opinion Scripsit virum eruditum sæculi, ut ibidem notatur, antiquariæ rei imperitus, et, ut ab illo sevo, nugis et anilibus fabellis referens sed, quæ monumenta quæ in temporibus Romæ supererant pro modulo recenset, non parum inde lucis inturbatur qui Romanis antiquitatibus indagandis operum navabit, (p 283)

<sup>g</sup> The Pere Mabillon (Antiquæ, tom iv p 502) has published an anonymous pilgrim of the ninth century, who, in his visit round the churches and holy places of Rome, touches on several buildings, especially porticoes, which had disappeared before the thirteenth century

<sup>h</sup> On the Septizonium, see the Memoires sur Petrarque, (tom i p 325) Donatus, (p 338) and Nardini, (p 117 414)

<sup>i</sup> The age of the pyramid is remote and unknown since Diodorus Siculus (tom i l i c 44 p 72) is unable to decide whether they were constructed 1000 or 3400, years before the hundred and eleventh Olympiad Sir John Marsham's contracted scale of the Egyptian dy-

ment Of a simple and solid edifice, it is not easy however to circumscribe the duration As the wonders of ancient days, the pyramids<sup>i</sup> attracted the curiosity of the ancients a hundred generations, the leaves of autumn,<sup>j</sup> have dropt into the grave, and after the fall of the Pharaohs and Ptolemies, the Cæsars and caliphs, the same pyramids stand erect and unshaken above the floods of the Nile A complex figure of various and minute parts is more accessible to injury and decay, and the silent lapse of time is often accelerated by hurri- hurricanes and canes and earthquakes, by fires and earthquakes, inundations The air and earth have doubtless been shaken, and the lofty turrets of Rome have tottered from their foundations, but the seven hills do not appear to be placed on the great cavities of the globe, nor has the city, in any age, been exposed to the convulsions of nature, which, in the climate of Antioch, Lisbon, or Lima, have crumbled in a few moments the works of ages into dust. Fire is the most powerful fires, agent of life and death the rapid mischief may be kindled and propagated by the industry or negligence of mankind, and every period of the Roman annals is marked by the repetition of similar calamities A memorable conflagration, the guilt or misfortune of Nero's reign, continued, though with unequal fury, either six or nine days<sup>k</sup> Innumerable buildings, crowded in close and crooked streets, supplied perpetual fuel for the flames, and when they ceased, four only of the fourteen regions were left entire, three were totally destroyed, and seven were deformed by the relics of smoking and lacerated edifices<sup>m</sup> In the full meridian of empire, the metropolis arose with fresh beauty from her ashes, yet the memory of the old deplored their irreparable losses, the arts of Greece, the trophies of victory, the monuments of primitive or fabulous antiquity In the days of distress and anarchy, every wound is mortal, every fall irretrievable, nor can the damage be restored either by the public care of government, or the activity of private interest Yet two causes may be alleged, which render the calamity of fire more destructive to a flourishing than a decayed city 1 The more combustible materials of brick, timber, and metals, are first melted or consumed, but the flames may play without injury or effect on the naked walls, and massy arches, that have been despoiled of their ornaments 2 It is among the nasties would fix them above 2000 years before Christ (Canon Chronicus p 47)

<sup>k</sup> See the speech of Glaucus in the Iliad (ζ 146) This natural but melancholy picture is familiar to Homer

<sup>l</sup> The learning and criticism of M des Vignoles (Histoire Critique de la Republique des Lettres, tom viii p 74—118 ix p 172—187) dates the fire of Rome from A D 64, July 19, and the subsequent persecution of the christians from November 15, of the same year

<sup>m</sup> Quippe in regiones quatuordecim Roma dividitur, quorum quatuor inter, ræ manebant, tres solo tenus dejectæ septem reliquis præcæ tectorum vestigia supererant, læcra et semiusta Among the old relics that were irreparably lost, Tacitus enumerates the temple of the moon Hecuræ, the temple of Jupiter Stator, a vow of Romulus the palace of Numa the temple of Vesta cum Penatibus populi Romani He then deplores the opes tot victoris quæsitæ et Græcærum artium decora multa quæ seniores meminerant, quæ reparari nequibant (Annal xv 40, 41)

common and plebeian habitations, that a mischievous spark is most easily blown to a conflagration, but as soon as they are devoured, the greater edifices which have resisted or escaped, are left as so many islands in a state of solitude and safety

From her situation, Rome is exposed to the danger of frequent inundations

Without excepting the Tiber, the rivers that descend from either side of the Apennine have a short and irregular course a shallow stream in the summer heats, an impetuous torrent, when it is swelled, in the summer or winter, by the fall of rain, and the melting of snows When the current is repelled from the sea by adverse winds, when the ordinary bed is inadequate to the weight of waters, they rise above the banks, and overspread, without limits or control, the plains and cities of the adjacent country Soon after the triumph of the first Punic war, the Tiber was increased by unusual rains, and the inundation, surpassing all former measure of time and place, destroyed all the buildings that were situate below the hills of Rome According to the variety of ground, the same mischief was produced by different means, and the edifices were either swept away by the sudden impulse, or dissolved and undermined by the long continuance, of the flood<sup>a</sup> Under the reign of Augustus, the same calamity was renewed the lawless river overturned the palaces and temples on its banks,<sup>b</sup> and, after the labours of the emperor in cleansing and widening the bed that was encumbered with ruins,<sup>c</sup> the vigilance of his successors was exercised by similar dangers and designs The project of diverting into new channels the Tiber itself, or some of the dependent streams, was long opposed by superstition and local interests,<sup>d</sup> nor did the use compensate the toil and cost of the tardy and imperfect execution The servitude of rivers is the noblest and most important victory which man has obtained over the licentiousness of nature,<sup>e</sup> and if such were the ravages of the Tiber under a firm and active government, what could oppose, or who can enumerate, the injuries of the city, after the fall of the western empire? A remedy was at length produced by the evil itself the accumulation of rubbish, and the earth that has been washed down from the hills, is supposed to have elevated the plain of Rome fourteen or fifteen feet, perhaps, above the ancient level,<sup>f</sup> and the modern city is less accessible to the attacks of the river<sup>1</sup>

II The crowd of writers of every nation, who impute the destruction of the Roman monuments to the Goths and the christians, have neglected to inquire how far they were animated by a hostile principle, and how far they possessed the means and the leisure to satiate their enmity In the preceding volumes of this History, I have described the triumph of barbarism and religion, and I can only resume, in a few words, their real or imaginary connexion with the ruin of ancient Rome Our fancy may create, or adopt, a pleasing romance, that the Goths and Vandals sailed from Scandinavia, ardent to avenge the flight of Odin,<sup>2</sup> to break the chains, and to chastise the oppressors, of mankind, that they wished to burn the records of classic literature, and to found their national architecture on the broken members of the Tuscan and Corinthian orders But in simple truth, the northern conquerors were neither sufficiently savage, nor sufficiently refined, to entertain such aspiring ideas of destruction and revenge The shepherds of Scythia and Germany had been educated in the armies of the empire, whose discipline they acquired, and whose weakness they invaded, with the familiar use of the Latin tongue, they had learned to reverence the name and titles of Rome, and, though incapable of emulating, they were more inclined to admire, than to abolish, the arts and studies of a brighter period In the transient possession of a rich and unresisting capital, the soldiers of Alaric and Genseric were stimulated by the passions of a victorious army, amidst the wanton indulgence of lust or cruelty, portable wealth was the object of their search nor could they derive either pride or pleasure from the unprofitable reflection, that they had battered to the ground the works of the consuls and Cæsars Their moments were indeed precious, the Goths evacuated Rome on the sixth,<sup>3</sup> the Vandals on the fifteenth, day,<sup>4</sup> and, though it be far more difficult to build than to destroy, their hasty assault would have made a slight impression on the solid piles of antiquity We may remember, that both Alaric and Genseric affected to spare the buildings of the city, that they subsisted in strength and beauty under the suspicious government of Theodoric,<sup>5</sup> and that the

<sup>a</sup> A U C 507 repentina subversio ipsius Romæ prævenit triumphum Romanorum diversæ ignum aquarumque elades pene absumere urbem Nam Tiberis insolitis avelis imbribus et ultra opinionem, vel diuturnitate vel magnitudine redundans, omnia Romæ ædificia in plauposita delevit Diversæ qualitates locorum ad usum convenere perniciem quoniam et quæ superior inundatio tenuit macta dissolvit, et quæ cursu torrentis invenit impulsa deiecit (Orosius, Hist. l. iv c. 11 p. 244 edit. Havercamp)

Yet we may observe, it is the plan and study of the christian apologist, to magnify the calamities of the pagan world

<sup>b</sup> Vidimus flavum Tiberim retortis Littore Etrusco violentis undis Ire dejectum monumenta Regis

Templaque Vestæ (Horat. Carm. l. 2)

If the palace of Numa and temple of Vesta were thrown down in Etruria, what was consumed of those buildings, by Nero's fire could hardly deserve the epithets of vestustissima or incurrupta

<sup>c</sup> Ad coercendas inundationes alveum Tiberis laxavit ac repurgavit, completum nimis rudibus, et ædificiorum prolapsionibus coarctatum (Suetonius in Augusto c. 30)

<sup>d</sup> Tacitus (Annal. l. 70) reports the petitions of the different towns of Italy to the senate against the measure and we may applaud the progress of reason On a similar occasion local interests would undoubtedly be consulted: but an English House of Commons would reject with contempt the arguments of superstition, that nature had assigned to the rivers their proper course &c

<sup>e</sup> See the Époques de la Nature of the eloquent and philosophic Buffon His picture of Guyana in South America, is that of a new and savage land, in which the waters are abandoned to themselves without being regulated by human industry, (p. 212. 561 quarto edition)

<sup>f</sup> In his Travels in Italy, Mr Addison (his Works vol. ii p. 98 Baskerville's edition) has observed this curious and unquestionable fact. Yet in modern times the Tiber has sometimes damaged the city and in the years 1530, 1557, 1598, the Annals of Miratori record three mischievous and memorable inundations, (tom. xiv p. 268 429 tom. xv p. 19 &c)

<sup>1</sup> I take this opportunity of declaring, that in the course of twelve years I have forgotten, or renounced the flight of Odin from Asynia in Sweden, which I ever very seriously believed, (p. 96) The Goths are apparently Germans but all beyond Cæsar and Tacitus is darkness or fable, in the antiquities of Germany

<sup>2</sup> History of the Decline &c p. 518

<sup>3</sup> p. 580

<sup>4</sup> p. 652, 653

momentary resentment of Totila<sup>a</sup> was disarmed by his own temper and the advice of his friends and enemies. From these innocent barbarians, the reproach may be transferred to the catholics of Rome. The statues, altars, and houses of the dæmons, were an abomination in their eyes, and in the absolute command of the city, they might labour with zeal and perseverance to erase the idolatry of their ancestors. The demolition of the temples in the east<sup>b</sup> affords to them an example of conduct, and to us an argument of belief, and it is probable, that a portion of guilt or merit may be imputed with justice to the Roman proselytes. Yet their abhorrence was confined to the monuments of heathen superstition, and the civil structures that were dedicated to the business or pleasure of society might be preserved without injury or scandal. The change of religion was accomplished, not by a popular tumult, but by the decrees of the emperors, of the senate, and of time. Of the christian hierarchy, the bishops of Rome were commonly the most prudent and least fanatic, nor can any positive charge be opposed to the meritorious act of saving and converting the majestic structure of the pantheon<sup>c</sup>.

III The use and abuse of the materials

III The value of any object that supplies the wants or pleasures of mankind, is compounded of its substance and its form, of the materials and the manufacture. Its price must depend on the number of persons by whom it may be acquired and used, on the extent of the market, and consequently on the ease or difficulty of remote exportation, according to the nature of the commodity, its local situation, and the temporary circumstances of the world. The barbarian conquerors of Rome usurped in a moment the toil and treasure of successive ages, but, except the luxuries of immediate consumption, they must view without desire all that could not be removed from the city in the Gothic waggons or the fleet of the Vandals<sup>d</sup>. Gold and silver were the first objects of their avarice, as in every country, and in the smallest compass, they represent the most ample command of the industry and possessions of mankind. A vase or a statue of those precious metals might tempt the vanity of some barbarian chief, but the grosser multitude, regardless of the form, were tenacious only of the substance, and the melted ingots might be readily divided and stamped into the current coin of the empire. The less active or less fortunate robbers were reduced to the baser plunder of brass, lead, iron, and copper. whatever had escaped the Goths and Vandals was pillaged by the Greek tyrants, and the emperor Constans, in his rapacious visit, stripped the bronze tiles from the roof of the pantheon<sup>e</sup>. The edifices of Rome might be considered as a vast and various mine, the first labour of extracting the materials was already performed, the metals were purified and cast, the marbles were hewn and polished, and after foreign and domestic rapine had been satiated, the remains of the city, could a purchaser have been found, were still venal. The monuments of antiquity had been left naked of their precious ornaments, but the Romans would demolish with their own hands the arches and walls, if the hope of profit could surpass the cost of the labour and exportation. If Charlemagne had fixed in Italy the seat of the western empire, his genius would have aspired to restore, rather than to violate, the works of the Cæsars, but policy confined the French monarch to the forests of Germany, his taste could be gratified only by destruction, and the new palace of Aix la Chapelle was decorated with the marbles of Ravenna<sup>f</sup> and Rome<sup>g</sup>. Five hundred years after Charlemagne, a king of Sicily, Robert, the wisest and most liberal sovereign of the age, was supplied with the same materials by the easy navigation of the Tiber and the sea, and Petrarch sighs an indignant complaint, that the ancient capital of the world should adorn from her own bowels the slothful luxury of Naples<sup>h</sup>. But these examples of plunder or purchase were rare in the darker ages, and the Romans, alone and unenvied, might have applied to their private or public use the remaining structures of antiquity, if in their present form and situation they had not been useless in a great measure to the city and its inhabitants. The walls still described the old circumference, but the city had descended from

<sup>a</sup> History of the Decline, &c. p. 738, 739

<sup>b</sup> Eodem tempore petuit a Phocæ princeps templum, quod appellatur Pantheon, in quo fecit ecclesiam Sanctæ Mariæ semper Virginis, et omnium martyrum in qua ecclesiæ princeps multi boni obtulit (Amatus vel potius Liber Pontificis in Bonifacio IV in Muratori, Script Rerum Italicarum tom. iii. p. 135) According to the

anonymous writer in Montfaucon the Pantheon had been vowed by Agrippa to Cybele and Neptune, and was dedicated by Boniface IV. on the calends of November, to the Virgin, quæ est mater omnium sanctorum (p. 297, 298)

<sup>d</sup> Flaminius Vacca (apud Montfaucon, p. 155, 156) His Memoirs is likewise printed, pp. 21 at the end of the Roma Antica of Nardum) and several Romans doctrinâ graves, were persuaded that the Goths buried their treasures at Rome, and bequeathed the secret marks filius nepotibusque. He relates some anecdotes to prove, that in his own time, these places were visited and rifled by the Transalpine pilgrims, the heirs of the Gothic conquerors

<sup>e</sup> Omnia quæ erant in urbe ad ornatum civitatis deposita, sed et ecclesiarum B. Mariæ ad martyres quæ de templis æreâ cooperta dissiadit non evenit the poor pretence of plundering, an heathen temple, the pantheon was already a catholic church

<sup>f</sup> For the spoils of Ravenna (musiva atque marmora) see the original grant of pope Adrian I. to Charlemagne (Codex Carolin. epist. lxxv in Muratori Script. Ital. tom. iii. p. 11 p. 223)

<sup>g</sup> I shall quote the authentic testimony of the Saxon poet, (A. D.

887—899) de Rebus gestis Caroli magni, l. v. 437—440 in the Histories of France (tom. v. p. 180)

Ad quæ marmores præstabit ROMA columnas,

Quædam præcipuas pulchra Ravennæ dedit

De tam longinquâ poterit regione vetustas

Illius ornatum Francia ferre tibi

And I shall add, from the Chronicle of St. Ebert, (Histories of France, tom. v. p. 378) extruxit etiam Aquisgranî basilicam plurimæ pulchritudinis, id ejus structuram a ROMA et Ravenna columnas et marmora devehî fecit

<sup>h</sup> I cannot refuse to transcribe a long passage of Petrarch, (Opp. p. 536, 537) in Epistola hortatoriâ ad Nicolaum Laurentium, it is so strong and full to the point. Nec pudor aut pietas continuit quominus impu spoliata Dei templi, occupatis arces, opes publicas, regiones urbis, atque honores magistratum inter se divisos (habrant) quam uni in re, turbulenti ac seditiosi homines et totius reliquæ vitæ consilium et rationibus discordes inhumani fœderis stupenda societate convenerant in pontes et moenia atque immeritos lapides deservirent. Denique post vi vel senio collapsa palatia, quæ quondam ingentes tenuerunt viros, post diruptos arcus triumphales, (nude majores virum firmitatî caruerunt,) de ipsius vetustatis ac propriæ impietatis frugibus, non quæstionum turpi mercimonio captare non pudent. Itaque nunc, heu dolor! heu seculi indignum! de Vestris marmoreis columnis, de liminibus templorum, (id quæ nuper ex orbe toto concursus devotissimus fiebat,) de imis, inibus sepulchrorum sub quibus patrum vestrorum venerabilis civis (civitas) erat, ut reliquias sileam, desidia Neapolis adornatur Sic panthum ruinæ ipsæ deficiunt. Yet king Robert was a friend of Petrarch

the seven hills into the Campus Martius, and some of the noblest monuments which had braved the injuries of time were left in a desert, far remote from the habitations of mankind. The palaces of the senators were no longer adapted to the manners or fortunes of their indigent successors, the use of baths<sup>1</sup> and porticoes was forgotten, in the sixth century, the games of the theatre, amphitheatre, and circus, had been interrupted: some temples were devoted to the prevailing worship, but the christian churches preferred the holy figure of the cross, and fashion, or reason, had distributed after a peculiar model the cells and offices of the cloister. Under the ecclesiastical reign, the number of these pious foundations was enormously multiplied, and the city was crowded with forty monasteries of men, twenty of women, and sixty chapters and colleges of canons and priests,<sup>2</sup> who aggravated, instead of relieving, the depopulation of the tenth century. But if the forms of ancient architecture were disregarded by a people insensible of their use and beauty, the plentiful materials were applied to every call of necessity or superstition, till the fairest columns of the Ionic and Corinthian orders, the richest marbles of Paros and Numidia, were degraded, perhaps to the support of a convent or stable. The daily havoc which is perpetrated by the Turks in the cities of Greece and Asia, may afford a melancholy example, and in the gradual destruction of the monuments of Rome, Sixtus the fifth may alone be excused for employing the stones of the Septizonium in the glorious edifice of St Peter's.<sup>3</sup> A fragment, a ruin, howsoever mangled or profaned, may be viewed with pleasure and regret, but the greater part of the marble was deprived of substance as well as of place and proportion, it was burnt to lime for the purpose of cement. Since the arrival of Poggius, the temple of Concord,<sup>4</sup> and many capital structures, had vanished from his eyes, and an epigram of the same age expresses a just and pious fear, that the continuance of this practice would finally annihilate all the monuments of antiquity.<sup>5</sup> The smallness of their numbers was the sole check on the demands and depredations of the Romans. The imagination of Petrarch might create the presence of a mighty people,<sup>6</sup> and I hesitate to believe, that, even in the fourteenth century, they could be reduced to a contemptible list of thirty-three thousand inhabitants. From that period to the reign of Leo the tenth, if they multiplied to the amount of eighty-five thousand,<sup>7</sup> the increase of citizens was in some degree pernicious to the ancient city.

IV I have reserved for the last, the most potent and forcible cause of destruction, the domestic hostilities of the Romans themselves. Under the dominion of the Greek and French emperors, the peace of the city was disturbed by accidental, though frequent, seditions: it is from the decline of the latter, from the beginning of the tenth century, that we may date the licentiousness of private war, which violated with impunity the laws of the code and the gospel, without respecting the majesty of the absent sovereign, or the presence and person of the vicar of Christ. In a dark period of five hundred years, Rome was perpetually afflicted by the sanguinary quarrels of the nobles and the people, the Guelphs and Ghibelines, the Colonna and Ursini, and if much has escaped the knowledge, and much is unworthy of the notice, of history, I have exposed in the two preceding chapters the causes and effects of the public disorders. At such a time, when every quarrel was decided by the sword, and none could trust their lives or properties to the impotence of law, the powerful citizens were armed for safety, or offence, against the domestic enemies whom they feared or hated. Except Venice alone, the same dangers and designs were common to all the free republics of Italy, and the nobles usurped the prerogative of fortifying their houses, and erecting strong towers<sup>8</sup> that were capable of resisting a sudden attack. The cities were filled with these hostile edifices, and the example of Lucca, which contained three hundred towers, her law, which confined their height to the measure of fourscore feet, may be extended with suitable latitude to the more opulent and populous states. The first step of the senator Brancalone in the establishment of peace and justice, was to demolish (as we have already seen) one hundred and forty of the towers of Rome, and, in the last days of anarchy and discord, as late as the reign of Martin the fifth, forty-four still stood in one of the thirteen or fourteen regions of the city. To this mischievous purpose, the remains of antiquity were most readily adapted: the temples and arches afforded a broad and solid basis for the new structures of brick and stone, and we can name the modern turrets that were raised on the triumphal monuments of Julius Caesar, Titus, and the Anto-

IV The domestic quarrels of the Romans

<sup>1</sup> Yet Charlemagne washed and swam at Aix la Chapelle with a hundred of his courtiers (Eginhart, c. 22 p. 108, 109) and Muratori describes, as late as the year 814 the public baths which were built at Spoleto in Italy (Annali tom vi p. 416).

<sup>2</sup> See the Annals of Italy A D 988. For this and the preceding fact Muratori himself is indebted to the Benedictine history of Piere Mabillon.

<sup>3</sup> Vita di Sisto Quinto da Gregorio Leti, tom iii p. 50.

<sup>4</sup> Porticus ædis Concordiæ, quam eum primum ad urbem accessum fere integram opere marmoreo admodum specioso Romani post modum ad calcem sedem totam et porticus partem dygeclis columnis summi demoliti (p. 12). The temple of Concord was therefore not destroyed by a sedition in the thirteenth century, as I have read in a MS treatise del Governo civile di Rome lent me formerly at Rome, and ascribed (I believe falsely) to the celebrated Gravina. Poggius likewise affirms, that the sepulchre of Cecilia Metella was burnt for lime (p. 19 20).

<sup>5</sup> Composed by Æneas Sylvius afterwards pope Pius II and published by Mabillon from a MS of the queen of Sweden (Museum Italicum, tom i p. 97).

Obleat me Roma tuas spectare ruinas
Ex cujus lapsum gloria prisca patet.
Sed tuus hic populus miris defossa vetustis
Calce in obsequium marmora dura coquit
Impia tercentum et sic gens egerit annos
Nullum hinc indiciu nobilitatis erit.

<sup>6</sup> Vagabamur pariter in illa urbe tam magna quæ, cum propter spatium vacua videretur, populum habet immensum (Opp p. 60. Epist Familiarum ii 14).

<sup>7</sup> These states of the population of Rome at different periods are derived from an ingenious treatise of the physician Lancisi, de Romanæ Cœli Qualitatibus (p. 122).

<sup>8</sup> All the facts that relate to the towers at Rome and in other free cities of Italy may be found in the laborious and entertaining compilation of Muratori Antiquitates Italæ medii ævi dissertati (tom ii p. 493—496. of the Latin tom i p. 146 of the Italian work.)

Gallus abandon ed and slain,
A D 253 M<sup>1</sup>

The murder of Gallus, and of his son Volusianus, put an end to the civil war, and the senate gave a legal sanction to the rights of conquest. The letters of Æmilianus to that assembly displayed a mixture of moderation and vanity. He assured them, that he should resign to their wisdom the civil administration, and, contenting himself with the quality of their general, would in a short time assert the glory of Rome, and deliver the empire from all the barbarians both of the north and of the east.<sup>1</sup> His pride was flattered by the applause of the senate, and medals are still extant, representing him with the name and attributes of Hercules the Victor, and of Mars the Avenger.<sup>2</sup>

Valerian revenges
the death of Gal lus, and is reknowned emperor

If the new monarch possessed the abilities, he wanted the time, necessary to fulfil these splendid promises.

Less than four months intervened between his victory and his fall.<sup>3</sup> He had vanquished Gallus: he sunk under the weight of a competitor more formidable than Gallus. That unfortunate prince had sent Valerian, already distinguished by the honourable title of censor, to bring the legions of Gaul and Germany<sup>4</sup> to his aid. Valerian executed that commission with zeal and fidelity, and as he arrived too late to save his sovereign, he resolved to revenge him. The troops of Æmilianus, who still lay encamped in the plains of Spoleto, were awed by the sanctity of his character, but much more by the superior strength of his army, and as they were now become as incapable of personal attachment as they had always been of constitutional principle, they readily imbrued their hands in the blood of a prince who so lately had been the object of their partial choice. The guilt was theirs, but the advantage of it was Valerian's, who obtained the possession of the throne by the means indeed of a civil war, but with a degree of innocence singular in that age of revolutions, since he owed neither gratitude nor allegiance to his predecessor, whom he dethroned.

A D 253
August

Character of Va
lerian

Valerian was about sixty years of age<sup>5</sup> when he was invested with the purple, not by the caprice of the populace, or the clamours of the army, but by the unanimous voice of the Roman world. In his gradual ascent through the honours of the state, he had deserved the favour of virtuous princes, and had declared himself the enemy of tyrants.<sup>6</sup> His noble birth, his mild but unblemished manners, his learning, prudence, and experience, were revered by the senate and people, and if mankind (according to the observation of an

<sup>1</sup> Zonaras, l. xii. p. 628.

<sup>2</sup> Banduri Numismata, p. 94.

<sup>3</sup> Eutropius, l. iv. c. 6 says tertio mense. Lusebius omits this emperor.

<sup>4</sup> Zosimus, l. i. p. 28. Eutropius and Victor station Valerian's army in Rhætia.

<sup>5</sup> He was about seventy at the time of his accession, or, as it is more probable, of his death, Hist. August. p. 173. Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. iii. p. 893 note 1.

<sup>6</sup> Imiticus tyrannorum. Hist. August. p. 173. In the glorious struggle of the senate against Maximin, Valerian acted a very spirited part. Hist. August. p. 156.

<sup>7</sup> According to the distinction of Victor, he seems to have received

the title of Imperator from the army, and that of Augustus from the senate.

ancient writer) had been left at liberty to choose a master, their choice would most assuredly have fallen on Valerian.<sup>7</sup> Perhaps the merit of this emperor was inadequate to his reputation, perhaps his abilities, or at least his spirit, were affected by the languor and coldness of old age. The consciousness of his decline engaged him to share the throne with a younger and more active associate.<sup>8</sup> The emergency of the times demanded a general no less than a prince, and the experience

General misfortunes of the reigns of Valerian and Gallie-nus
A D 253-268

of the Roman censor might have directed him where to bestow the imperial purple, as the reward of military merit. But instead of making a judicious choice, which would have confirmed his reign and endeared his memory, Valerian, consulting only the dictates of affection or vanity, immediately invested with the supreme honours his son Gallienus, a youth whose effeminate vices had been hitherto concealed by the obscurity of a private station. The joint government of the father and the son subsisted about seven, and the sole administration of Gallienus continued about eight, years. But the whole period was one uninterrupted series of confusion and calamity. As the Roman empire was at the same time, and on every side, attacked by the blind fury of foreign invaders, and the wild ambition of domestic usurpers, we shall consult order and perspicuity, by pursuing, not so much the doubtful arrangements of dates, as the more natural distribution of subjects. The most dangerous enemies of Rome, during the reigns of Valerian and Gallienus, were, 1 The Franks, 2 The Alemanni, 3 The Goths, and, 4 The Persians. Under these general appellations, we may comprehend the adventurers of less considerable tribes, whose obscure and uncouth names would only serve to oppress the memory and perplex the attention of the reader.

Inroads of the
barbarians

I. As the posterity of the Franks compose one of the greatest and most enlightened nations of Europe, the powers of learning and ingenuity have been exhausted in the discovery of their unlettered ancestors. To the tales of credulity, have succeeded the systems of fancy. Every passage has been sifted, every spot has been surveyed, that might possibly reveal some faint traces of their origin. It has been supposed, that Pannonia,<sup>9</sup> that Gaul, that the northern parts of Germany,<sup>10</sup> gave birth to that celebrated colony of warriors. At length the most rational critics, rejecting the fictitious emigrations of ideal conquerors, have acquiesced in a sentiment whose simplicity persuades us of its truth.<sup>11</sup> They

Origin and confederacy of the Franks

the title of Imperator from the army, and that of Augustus from the senate.

<sup>7</sup> From Victor and from the medals, Tillemont (tom. iii. p. 710, very justly infers, that Gallienus was associated to the empire about the month of August of the year 253.

<sup>8</sup> Various systems have been formed to explain a difficult passage in Gregory of Tours, l. ii. c. 9.

<sup>9</sup> The Geographer of Ravenna, l. 11 by mentioning Mauringania, on the confines of Denmark, as the ancient seat of the Franks, gave birth to an ingenious system of Leibnitz.

<sup>10</sup> See Cluver Germaniæ Antiquæ, l. iii. c. 20. M. Treret, in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xiv.

nines.<sup>c</sup> With some slight alterations, a theatre, an amphitheatre, a mausoleum, was transformed into a strong and spacious citadel. I need not repeat, that the mole of Adrian has assumed the title and form of the castle of St Angelo,<sup>d</sup> the Septizonium of Severus was capable of standing against a royal army,<sup>e</sup> the sepulchre of Metella has sunk under its outworks,<sup>f</sup> the theatres of Pompey and Marcellus were occupied by the Savelli and Usim families,<sup>g</sup> and the rough fortress has been gradually softened to the splendour and elegance of an Italian palace. Even the churches were encompassed with arms and bulwarks, and the military engines on the roof of St Peter's were the terror of the Vatican and the scandal of the christian world. Whatever is fortified will be attacked and whatever is attacked may be destroyed. Could the Romans have wrested from the popes the castle of St Angelo, they had resolved by a public decree to annihilate that monument of servitude. Every building of defence was exposed to a siege, and in every siege the arts and engines of destruction were laboriously employed. After the death of Nicholas the fourth, Rome, without a sovereign or a senate, was abandoned six months to the fury of civil war. "The houses," says a cardinal and poet of the times,<sup>h</sup> "were crushed by the weight and velocity of enormous stones," the walls were perforated by the strokes of the battering-ram, the towers were involved in fire and smoke, and the assailants were stimulated by rapine and revenge.<sup>i</sup> The work was consummated by the tyranny of the laws, and the factions of Italy alternately exercised a blind and thoughtless vengeance on their adversaries, whose houses and castles they razed to the ground.<sup>k</sup> In comparing the days of foreign, with the ages of domestic, hostility, we must pronounce, that the latter have been far more ruinous to the city, and our opinion is confirmed by the evidence of Petrarch. "Behold," says the laureat, "the relics of Rome, the image of her pristine greatness! neither time, nor the barbarian, can boast the merit of this stupendous destruction. it was perpetrated by her own citizens, by the most illustrious of her sons, and your ancestors (he writes to a noble Annibaldi) have done with the battering-ram, what the Punic hero could not accomplish with the sword."<sup>l</sup> The influence of the two last principles of decay must in some degree be multiplied by each other, since the houses and towers, which were subverted by civil war, required a new and perpetual supply from the monuments of antiquity.

These general observations may be separately applied to the amphitheatre of Titus, which has obtained the name of the COLISEUM,<sup>m</sup> either from its magnitude, or from Nero's colossal statue. an edifice, had it been left to time and nature, which might perhaps have claimed an eternal duration. The curious antiquaries, who have computed the numbers and seats, are disposed to believe, that above the upper row of stone steps, the amphitheatre was encircled and elevated with several stages of wooden galleries, which were repeatedly consumed by fire, and restored by the emperors. Whatever was precious, or portable, or profane, the statues of gods and heroes, and the costly ornaments of sculpture, which were cast in brass, or overspread with leaves of silver and gold, became the first prey of conquest or fanaticism, of the avarice of the barbarians or the christians. In the massy stones of the Coliseum, many holes are discerned, and the two most probable conjectures represent the various accidents of its decay. These stones were connected by solid links of brass or iron, nor had the eye of rapine overlooked the value of the baser metals,<sup>n</sup> the vacant space was converted into a fair or market, the artisans of the Coliseum are mentioned in an ancient survey, and the chasms were perforated or enlarged to receive the poles that supported the shops or tents of the mechanic trades.<sup>o</sup> Reduced to its naked majesty, the Flavian amphitheatre was contemplated with awe and admiration

<sup>c</sup> As for instance, Templum Jui nunc dicitur, turris Centi Frangipanis. Et ante Jui inposita turris lateritiae conspicua hodieque vestigia supersunt (Montfaucon, Durum lib. cum, p. 186). The anonymous writer (p. 285) enumerates, arcus Titi, turris Cartularia, arcus Julli Cæsaris et Senatorum, turris de Bratis, arcus Antonini, turris de Coesetis &c.

<sup>d</sup> Hadriani molem magna ex parte Romanorum injuria destruxit. quod certe funditus evertisset, si enim mambus pervia, abruptis grandibus saxo, reliqua moles exstisset (Pogonius de Varietate Fortuna, p. 12).

<sup>e</sup> Against the emperor Henry IV (Muratori, Annali d'Italia, tom. i. p. 147).

<sup>f</sup> I must copy an important passage of Montfaucon. Turris ingens rotunda Cæsaris Metellæ sepulchrum erat, cuius muri tam solidi ut spatium per quatuor munitum intus vacuum superius et Torre di Bone dicitur a bonni capibus muro inscriptis. Hunc sequenti ævo, tempore intestinorum bellorum, cum urbem adjuvaret, cuius mœnia et turres eliamur videntur, ita ut sepulchrum Metellæ quasi arx oppidum fuerit. Perterritus in urbe partibus cum Urani atque Columnæ multis claudibus perierem inferent civitati, in utriusque partis ditionem cederet magni momenti erat, (p. 142).

<sup>g</sup> See the testimonies of Donatus, Nardini and Montfaucon. In the Savelli palace, the remains of the theatre of Marcellus are still great and conspicuous.

<sup>h</sup> James, cardinal of St George, ad volum aureum in his metrical life of pope Celestin V (Muratori, Scripti Ital tom. i. p. 621).

<sup>i</sup> Hoc dixisse ait est Romam circumse Senatû Mensibus exatit huius belloque vocatum (vocatos) In scelus in sociis fraternaque villera patres Tormentis pecisse viros matrem cæca, Perfidie domus tribus scissa ruinas Lumbis metum turres obscuraque fumo Iunius vicino quo ut spoliatæ supplex

<sup>z</sup> Muratori (Dissertatione sopra le Antiquità Italiane, tom. i. p. 427-431) finds, that stone bullets of two or three hundred pounds weight were not uncommon and they are sometimes computed at twelve or eighteen cantari of Genoa each cantara weighing 150 pounds.

<sup>a</sup> The sixth law of the Visconti prohibits this custom and himself our practice, and strictly enjoins that the houses of banished citizens should be preserved pro communis utilitate (Gualtherus de la Flamma in Muratori, Scripti Ital tom. xii. p. 1041).

<sup>b</sup> Petrarch thus addresses his friend, who, with shame and tears, had shown him the mœnia. Inter specimen miserabile Romæ anhelat deservit huius intentionem restoring them (Carmina Latina, l. ii. epist. Paulo Annibaldi, xii. p. 97, 98).

<sup>c</sup> Nec te parva manet servatis fama ruinis Quamvis quod inter, hæc fuit olim gloria Romæ Reliquia lesantur adhuc, quas longior ævis Frangere non valuit, non vident ira eruent Hostis abegregis franguntur civibus, heu! heu! Perficit linc aries

<sup>e</sup> The fourth part of the Verona Illustrata of the marquis Maggi, professes the merits of amphitheatres particularly those of Rome and Verona of their dimensions wooden galleries &c. It is from magnitude that he derives the name of Colosseum, or Coliseum. Since the same appellation was applied to the amphitheatre of Capua without the aid of a colossal statue, and that of Nero was erected in the court (in atrio) of his palace and not in the Coliseum (p. ii. p. 15-19 l. i. c. 4).

<sup>d</sup> Joseph Maria Surrias, a learned bishop, and the author of an history of Præste is composed a separate dissertation on the seven or eight probable causes of these holes which has been since reprinted in the Roman Thesaurus of Sallengre. Montfaucon (Durum, p. 233) pronounces the rapine of the barbarians to be the unam germanique causam foraminum.

<sup>e</sup> D. Martini, Roma Vetus et Nova, p. 285.

The Coliseum or amphitheatre of Titus

by the pilgrims of the north, and the rude enthusiasm broke forth in a sublime proverbial expression, which is recorded in the eighth century, in the fragments of the venerable Bede "As long as the Coliseum stands, Rome shall stand, when the Coliseum falls, Rome will fall, when Rome falls, the world will fall"<sup>f</sup> In the modern system of war, a situation commanded by three hills would not be chosen for a fortress, but the strength of the walls and arches could resist the engines of assault, a numerous garrison might be lodged in the enclosure, and while one faction occupied the Vatican and the capitol, the other was entrenched in the Lateran and the Coliseum<sup>g</sup>

Games of Rome The abolition at Rome of the ancient games must be understood with some latitude, and the carnival sports, of the Testacean mount and the Circus Agonalis,<sup>h</sup> were regulated by the law<sup>i</sup> or custom of the city The senator presided with dignity and pomp to adjudge and distribute the prizes, the gold ring, or the pallium,<sup>k</sup> as it was styled, of cloth or silk A tribute on the Jews supplied the annual expense,<sup>l</sup> and the races, on foot, on horseback, or in chariots, were ennobled by a tilt and tournament of seventy-two of the Roman youth In the year one thousand three hundred and thirty-two, a bull-feast, after the fashion of the Moors and Spaniards, was celebrated in the Coliseum itself, and the living manners are painted in a diary of the times<sup>m</sup> A convenient order of benches was restored, and a general proclamation, as far as Rimini and Ravenna, invited the nobles to exercise their skill and courage in this perilous adventure The Roman ladies were marshalled in three squadrons, and seated in three balconies, which on this day, the third of September, were lined with scarlet cloth The fair Jacova di Rovere led the matrons from beyond the Tiber, a pure and native race, who still represent the features and character of antiquity The remainder of the city was divided as usual between the Colonna and Ursini the two factions were proud of the number and beauty of their female hands the charms of Savella Ursini are mentioned with praise, and the Colonna regretted the absence of the youngest of their house, who had sprained her ancle in the garden of Nero's tower The lots of the champions were drawn by an old and respectable citizen and they descended into the arena, or pit, to encounter the wild bulls, on foot as it should seem, with a single spear Amidst the crowd, our annalist has selected the names, colours, and devices, of twenty of the most conspicuous knights Several of the names are the most illustrious of Rome and the ecclesiastical state, Malatesta, Polenta, della Valle, Cafarello, Savelli, Capoccio, Conti, Annibaldi, Altieri, Corsi, the colours were adapted to their taste and situation, the devices are expressive of hope or despair, and breathe the spirit of gallantry and arms "I am alone, like the youngest of the Horatii," the confidence of an intrepid stranger "I live disconsolate," a weeping widower "I burn under the ashes," a discreet lover "I adore Lavinia or Lucretia," the ambiguous declaration of a modern passion "My faith is as pure," the motto of a white livery "Who is stronger than myself?" of a lion's hide "If I am drowned in blood, what a pleasant death," the wish of ferocious courage The pride or prudence of the Ursini restrained them from the field, which was occupied by three of their hereditary rivals, whose inscriptions denoted the lofty greatness of the Colonna name "Though sad I am strong" "Strong as I am great" "If I fail," addressing himself to the spectators, "you fall with me"—intimating (says the contemporary writer) that while the other families were the subjects of the Vatican, they alone were the supporters of the capitol The combats of the amphitheatre were dangerous and bloody Every champion successively encountered a wild bull, and the victory may be ascribed to the quadrupeds, since no more than eleven were left on the field, with the loss of nine wounded and eighteen killed on the side of their adversaries Some of the noblest families might mourn, but the pomp of the funerals, in the churches of St John Lateran and St Maria Maggiore, afforded a second holiday to the people Doubtless it was not in such conflicts that the blood of the Romans should have been shed, yet, in blaming their rashness we are compelled to applaud their gallantry, and the noble volunteers, who display their magnificence, and risk their lives, under the balconies of the fair, excite a more generous sympathy than the thousands of captives and malefactors who were reluctantly dragged to the scene of slaughter<sup>n</sup>

This use of the amphitheatre was a rare, perhaps a singular, festival the

Injures

<sup>f</sup> Quamdiu stabit Colyseus, stabit et Roma quando cidet Colyseus, cadet Roma, quando cadet Roma cidet et mundus (Beda in Excerptis seu Collectaneis apud Duncange Glossæ med et infimæ Latinitatis, tom i p 407 edit Basil) This saying, must be ascribed to the Anglo-Saxon pilgrims who visited Rome before the year 735, the era of Bede's death, for I do not believe that our venerable monk ever passed the sea; I cannot recover in Muratori's original Lives of the Popes (Script Rerum Italicarum, tom iii p 1) the passage that attests this hostile partition, which must be applied to the end of the eleventh or the beginning of the twelfth century

<sup>h</sup> Although the structure of the Circus Agonalis be destroyed, it still retains its form and name (Agona Navona, Navana), and the interior space affords a sufficient level for the purpose of racing But the Monte Testaceo, that strange pile of broken pottery, seems only adapted for the annual practice of hurling from top to bottom some tragical loads of live logs for the diversion of the populace (Statuta Urbis Romæ, p 186)

<sup>i</sup> See the Statuta Urbis Romæ l iii c. 87, 88, 89 p 185 186 I have already given an idea of this municipal code The races of Nigama

and Monte Testaceo are likewise mentioned in the Diary of Peter Anthonius from 1404 to 1417 (Muratori, Script. Rerum Italicarum, tom xiv p 1124)

<sup>k</sup> The Pallium, which Menage so foolishly derives from Palmarum, is an easy extension of the idea and the words, from the robe or cloak, to the materials, and from thence to their application as a prize (Muratori, dissert xxxiii)

<sup>l</sup> For these expenses, the Jews of Rome paid each year 1130 florins, of which the odd thirty represented the pieces of silver for which Judas had betrayed his Master to their incensors There was a fool race of Jewish as well as of christian youths (Statuta Urbis ibidem)

<sup>m</sup> This extraordinary bull feast in the Coliseum is described from tradition rather than memory, by Indovico Buonconte Monaldesi, in the most ancient fragments of Roman annals (Muratori Script Rerum Italicarum tom xii p 535, 536) and however fanciful they may seem, they are deeply marked with the colours of truth and urlure

<sup>n</sup> Muratori has given a separate dissertation (the twenty ninth) to the games of the Italians in the middle ages.

demand for the materials was a daily and continual want, which the citizens could gratify without restraint or remorse. In the fourteenth century, a scandalous act of concord secured to both factions the privilege of extracting stones from the free and common quarry of the Coliseum,<sup>o</sup> and Poggius laments, that the greater part of these stones had been burnt to lime by the folly of the Romans.<sup>p</sup> To check this abuse, and to prevent the nocturnal crimes that might be perpetrated in the vast and gloomy recess, Eugenius the fourth surrounded it with a wall, and, by a charter long extant, granted both the ground and edifice to the monks of an adjacent convent.<sup>q</sup> After his death, the wall was overthrown in a tumult of the people, and had they themselves respected the noblest monument of their fathers, they might have justified the resolve that it should never be degraded to private property. The inside was damaged, but in the middle of the sixteenth century, an æra of taste and learning, the exterior circumference of one thousand six hundred and twelve feet was still entire and inviolate, a triple elevation of fourscore arches, which rose to the height of one hundred and eight feet. Of the present ruin, the nephews of Paul the third are the guilty agents, and every traveller who views the Farnese palace may curse the sacrilege and luxury of these upstart princes.<sup>r</sup> A similar reproach is applied to the Barberini, and the repetition of injury might be dreaded from every reign, till the Coliseum was placed under the safeguard of religion by the most liberal of the pontiffs, Benedict the fourteenth, who consecrated a spot which persecution and fable had stained with the blood of so many christian martyrs.<sup>s</sup>

Ignorance and barbarism of the Romans

When Petrarch first gratified his eyes with a view of those monuments, whose scattered fragments so far surpass the most eloquent descriptions, he was astonished at the supine indifference<sup>t</sup> of the Romans themselves,<sup>u</sup> he was humbled rather than elated by the discovery, that, except his friend Rienzi and one of the Colonna, a stranger of the Rhone was more conversant with these antiquities than the nobles and natives of the metropolis.* The ignorance and credulity of the Romans are elaborately displayed in the old survey of the city, which was composed about the beginning of the thirteenth century, and, without dwelling on the manifold errors of name and place, the legend of the capitol<sup>v</sup> may provoke a smile of contempt and indignation. "The capitol," says the anonymous writer, "is so named as being the head of the world where the consuls and senators formerly resided for the government of the city and the globe. The strong and lofty walls were covered with glass and gold, and crowned with a roof of the richest and most curious carving. Below the citadel stood a palace, of gold for the greatest part, decorated with precious stones, and whose value might be esteemed at one-third of the world itself. The statues of all the provinces were arranged in order, each with a small bell suspended from its neck, and such was the contrivance of art magic,<sup>z</sup> that if the province rebelled against Rome, the statue turned round to that quarter of the heavens, the bell rang, the prophet of the capitol reported the prodigy, and the senate was admonished of the impending danger." A second example of less importance, though of equal absurdity, may be drawn from the two marble horses, led by two naked youths, which have since been transported from the baths of Constantine to the Quirinal hill. The groundless application of the names of Phidias and Praxiteles may perhaps be excused, but these Grecian sculptors should not have been removed above four hundred years from the age of Pericles to that of Tiberius, they should not have been transformed into two philosophers or magicians, whose nakedness was the symbol of truth or knowledge, who revealed to the emperor his most secret actions, and, after refusing all pecuniary recompence, solicited the honour of leaving this eternal monument of themselves.<sup>a</sup> Thus awake to the power of magic, the Romans were insensible to the beauties of art: no more than five statues were visible to the eyes of Poggius and of the multitudes which chance or design had buried under the ruins, the resurrection

<sup>o</sup> In a concise but instructive memoir, the abbé Barthelemy (Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xxviii p. 585) has mentioned this agreement of the fictions of the fourteenth century, de Tiburtino faciendis in the Coliseum, from an original act in the archives of Rome.

<sup>p</sup> Coliseum ob stultitiam Romanorum majore ex parte ad ericem deletum, says the indignant Poggius (p. 17) but his expression too strong for the present age, must be very tenderly applied to the fifteenth century.

<sup>q</sup> Of the Olivetan monks Montfaucon (p. 142.) affirms this fact from the memoirs of Flaminius Vacca (No. 72.) They still hoped, on some future occasion, to revive and vindicate their grant.

<sup>r</sup> After mentioning the prætor amphitheatrum Lyrus, Montfaucon (p. 142.) only adds, that it was entire under Paul III. tacendo clamat Muratori (Annali d'Italia, tom. xiv p. 371) more freely reports the guilt of the Farnese pope and the indignation of the Roman people against the nephews of Urban VIII. I have no other evidence than the vulgar saying, "Quod non fecerunt barbari, fecere Barberini," which was perhaps suggested by the resemblance of the words.

<sup>s</sup> As an antiquarian and a priest, Montfaucon thus deprecates the ruin of the Coliseum. Quod si non sapientie merito itque pulchritudine diuinum fuisse quod improbas arceret manus indigna re utique in locum tot martirum cruore sacrum tantopere seculum eve-

<sup>t</sup> Let the statues of Rome (l. iii. c. 81 p. 182.) impose a fine of 500 aurei on whosoever shall demolish any ancient edifice, ne ruins civiles deformetur et ut antiqua edificia decorem urbis perpetuo representent. In his first visit to Rome (A. D. 1337. See Mémoires sur Pétrarque, tom. i. p. 322 &c.) Petrarch is struck mute miraculo rerum tantarum, et stuporis mole obrutus. Presentia vero, mirum dictu, nihil imminuit vere major sunt Roma majoresque sunt reliquæ quam rebar Jam non orbem ali hinc urbe domitum sed tum vero domitum, miror (Opp. p. 605. Familiares, ii. 14. Joanni Colonnae.)

<sup>z</sup> He excepts and prizes the rare knowledge of John Colonna. Qui enim hodie mihi ignari rerum Romanorum, quam Romani cives? In- vitus dico nusquam minus Romæ cognoscitur quam Romæ.

<sup>a</sup> After the description of the capitol, he adds, statue erant quot sunt mundi provincie, et habebat quælibet tintinnabulum ad collum. Et erant ita per magicam artem dispositæ, ut quando aliqua regio Romano Imperio rebellis erat, statim imago illius provincie vertebat se contra illam unde tintinnabulum resonabat quod pendebat ad collum tuncque vates Capitolini qui erant custodes sentinæ, &c. He mentions an example of the Saxons and Suevi, who, after they had been subdued by Agrippa, re- belled tintinnabulum sonavit, sacerdos qui erat in speculo in lichdomadâ sentinibus nuntiavit Agrippæ marchem back and reduced the — Persians (Anonym. in Montfaucon p. 297. 298.)

<sup>z</sup> The same writer affirms, that Virgil, in his Æneid, a Romanus invisibiliter exiit, vitæque Neapolim. A Roman magician in the eleventh century, is introduced by William of Malmshury (de Gestis Regum Anglorum, l. ii. p. 86.) and in the time of Flaminius Vacca (No. 81. 103.) it was the vulgar belief that the strangers (the Goths) invoked the demons for the discovery of hidden treasures.

<sup>a</sup> Anonym. p. 289. Montfaucon (p. 101.) justly observes that if Alexander be represented, these statues cannot be the work of Phidias (Olympiad lxxxiii.) or Praxiteles (Olympiad civ.) who lived before that conqueror (Plin. Hist. Natur. xxxiv. 19.)

Final conclusion

Of these pilgrims, and of every reader, the attention will be excited by a History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, the greatest, perhaps, and most awful, scene in the history of mankind. The various causes and progressive effects are connected with many of the events most interesting in human annals: the artful policy of the Cæsars, who long maintained the name and image of a free republic, the disorder of military despotism, the rise, establishment, and sects of christianity, the foundation of Constantinople, the division of the monarchy, the invasion and settlements of the barbarians of Germany and Scythia, the institutions of the civil law, the character and religion of Mahomet, the temporal sovereignty of the popes, the restoration and decay of the western empire of Charlemagne, the crusades of the Latins in the east, the conquests of the Saracens and Turks, the ruin of the Greek empire, the state and revolutions of Rome in the middle age. The historian may applaud the importance and variety of his subject, but, while he is conscious of his own imperfections, he must often accuse the deficiency of his materials. It was among the ruins of the capitol that I first conceived the idea of a work which has amused and exercised near twenty years of my life, and which, however inadequate to my own wishes, I finally deliver to the curiosity and candour of the public.

LAUSANNE,

June 27, 1787

THE END

was fortunately delayed till a safer and more enlightened age.<sup>b</sup> The Nile, which now adorns the Vatican, had been explored by some labourers, in digging a vineyard near the temple, or convent, of the Minerva, but the impatient proprietor, who was tormented by some visits of curiosity, restored the unprofitable marble to its former grave.<sup>c</sup> The discovery of a statue of Pompey, ten feet in length, was the occasion of a law-suit. It had been found under a partition-wall: the equitable judge had pronounced, that the head should be separated from the body to satisfy the claims of the contiguous owners, and the sentence would have been executed, if the intercession of a cardinal, and the liberality of a pope, had not rescued the Roman hero from the hands of his barbarous countrymen.<sup>d</sup>

Restoration and ornaments of the city

But the clouds of barbarism were gradually dispelled, and the peaceful A.D. 1420, &c. authority of Martin the fifth and his successors restored the ornaments of the city as well as the order of the ecclesiastical state. The improvements of Rome, since the fifteenth century, have not been the spontaneous produce of freedom and industry. The first and most natural root of a great city, is the labour and populousness of the adjacent country, which supplies the materials of subsistence, of manufactures, and of foreign trade. But the greater part of the Campagna of Rome is reduced to a dreary and desolate wilderness: the overgrown estates of the princes and the clergy are cultivated by the lazy hands of indigent and hopeless vassals, and the scanty harvests are confined or exported for the benefit of a monopoly. A second and more artificial cause of the growth of a metropolis, is the residence of a monarch, the expense of a luxurious court, and the tributes of dependent provinces. Those provinces and tributes had been lost in the fall of the empire: and if some streams of the silver of Peru and the gold of Brasil have been attracted by the Vatican, the revenues of the cardinals, the fees of office, the oblations of pilgrims and clients, and the remnant of ecclesiastical taxes, afford a poor and precarious supply, which maintains however the idleness of the court and city. The population of Rome, far below the measure of the great capitals of Europe, does not exceed one hundred and seventy thousand inhabitants,* and within the spacious enclosure of the walls, the largest portion of the seven hills is overspread with vineyards and ruins. The beauty and splendour of the modern city may be ascribed to the abuses of the government, to the influence of superstition. Each reign (the exceptions are rare) has been marked by the rapid elevation of a new family, enriched by the childish pontiff at the expense of the church and country. The palaces of these fortunate nephews are the most costly monuments of elegance and servitude, the perfect arts of architecture, painting, and sculpture, have been prostituted in their service, and their galleries and gardens are decorated with the most precious works of antiquity, which taste or vanity has prompted them to collect. The ecclesiastical revenues were more decently employed by the popes themselves in the pomp of the catholic worship, but it is superfluous to enumerate their pious foundations of altars, chapels, and churches, since these lesser stars are eclipsed by the sun of the Vatican, by the dome of St. Peter, the most glorious structure that ever has been applied to the use of religion. The same of Julius the second, Leo the tenth, and Sixtus the fifth, is accompanied by the superior merit of Bramante and Fontana, of Raphael and Michael Angelo: and the same munificence which had been displayed in palaces and temples, was directed with equal zeal to revive and emulate the labours of antiquity. Prostrate obelisks were raised from the ground, and erected in the most conspicuous places, of the eleven aqueducts of the Cæsars and consuls, three were restored, the artificial rivers were conducted over a long series of old, or of new, arches, to discharge into marble basins a flood of salubrious and refreshing waters: and the spectator, impatient to ascend the steps of St. Peter's, is detained by a column of Egyptian granite, which rises between two lofty and perpetual fountains, to the height of one hundred and twenty feet. The map, the description, the monuments of ancient Rome, have been elucidated by the diligence of the antiquarian and the student: and the footsteps of heroes, the relics, not of superstition, but of empire, are devoutly visited by a new race of pilgrims from the remote, and once savage, countries of the north.

<sup>b</sup> William of Malmesbury (i. 11 p. 86 87) relates a marvellous discovery (A.D. 1046) of Pallas the son of Evander who had been slain by Turnus: the perpetual light in his sepulchre: a Latin epitaph the corpse yet entire of a young giant the enormous wound in his breast, (pectus perforat in ens) &c. If this fable rests on the slightest foundation we may pity the bodies, as well as the statues, that were exposed to the air in a barbarous age.

<sup>c</sup> Prope portum Minervæ statua est recubantis: cuius caput integræ effigie tantæ magnitudinis, ut signa omnia excedit. Quidam ad plantandas arbores scriobes tæciens delectat. Ad hoc visendum cum plures in dies magis concurrerent strepitum advenientium frigidumque pertæsus horti patronus congestâ humo texit (Pogius de Varietate Fortunæ, p. 12).

<sup>d</sup> See the Memorials of Flaminia Vicia No. 57 p. 11, 12. at the end of the Roma Antica of Nardini (1704, in quarto).

<sup>e</sup> In the year 1709 the inhabitants of Rome (without including exiles or ten thousand Jews) amounted to 138,568 souls (Labat Voyages en Espagne et en Italie, tom. iii. p. 217 218). In 1740, they had increased to 146,080: and in 1765 I left them without the Jews, 161,891.

I am ignorant whether they have since continued in a progressive state.

<sup>f</sup> The Pere Montfaucon distributes his own observations into twenty days; he should have styled them weeks, or months of his visits to the different parts of the city (Diarium Italicum c. 8—20 p. 104—391). That learned Benedictine reviews the topographers of Ancient Rome: the first efforts of Blondus, Tullius, Maritimus, and Fannius: the superior labours of Pyrrhus Iginus, had his learning been equal to his labours: the writings of Compinus Prætorius, qui omnes obscuravit, and the recent but imperfect books of Donatus and Nardini. Yet Montfaucon still calls for a more complete plan and description of the old city, which must be attained by the three following methods:—1 The measurement of the space and intervals of the ruins. 2 The study of inscription and the places where they were found. 3 The investigation of all the acts, charters, diaries of the middle ages, which name any spot or building of Rome. The laborious work, such as Montfaucon desired must be promoted by princely or public munificences: but the great modern plan of Nolli (A.D. 1748) would furnish a solid and accurate basis for the ancient topography of Rome.

Final conclusion

Of these pilgrims, and of every reader, the attention will be excited by a History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, the greatest, perhaps, and most awful, scene in the history of mankind. The various causes and progressive effects are connected with many of the events most interesting in human annals: the artful policy of the Cæsars, who long maintained the name and image of a free republic, the disorder of military despotism, the rise, establishment, and sects of christianity, the foundation of Constantinople, the division of the monarchy, the invasion and settlements of the barbarians of Germany and Scythia, the institutions of the civil law, the character and religion of Mahomet, the temporal sovereignty of the popes, the restoration and decay of the western empire of Charlemagne, the crusades of the Latins in the east, the conquests of the Saracens and Turks, the ruin of the Greek empire, the state and revolutions of Rome in the middle age. The historian may applaud the importance and variety of his subject, but, while he is conscious of his own imperfections, he must often accuse the deficiency of his materials. It was among the ruins of the capitol that I first conceived the idea of a work which has amused and exercised near twenty years of my life, and which, however inadequate to my own wishes, I finally deliver to the curiosity and candour of the public.

LAUSANNE,
June 27, 1787

THE END

GENERAL INDEX.

ABAN the Saracen, heroism of his widow, 944
Abbasides elevation of the house of, to the office of caliph of the Saracens 978
Abdallah, the Saracen, his excursion to plunder the fair of Abyla 946 His African expedition 16
Abdalmalek, caliph of the Saracens refuses tribute to the emperor of Constantinople, and establishes a rational mint, 973
Abdallahman, the Saracen establishes his throne at Cordova in Spain 979 Splendour of his court, 980 His estimate of his happiness 981
Abdallah the Saracen his treaty with Theodemir the Gothic prince of Spain 966 His death 967
Abderrahman his expedition to France, and victories there, 976 His death 977
Abdel Maltek the grandfather of the prophet Mahomet his history 99
Abgarus inquiry into the authenticity of his correspondence with Jesus Christ, 870
Abgarus, the last king of Edessa, sent in chains to Rome, 83
Abilatus, the confidential præfect under Constantine the Great a conspiracy formed against him on that emperor's death, 264 Is put to death 16
Abu Alyb his history and the veneration paid to his memory by the Mahometans 972 1239
Abubeker the friend of Mahomet is one of his first converts 916 Dies from Mecca with him, 918 Succeeds Mahomet as caliph of the Saracens, 929 His character, 934
Abu Canb commands the Andalusian Moors who subdued the island of Crete, 985
Abu Sophian prince of Mecca conspires the death of Mahomet, 918 Battles of Bedier and Ohnd, 920, 921 Besieges Medina without success 921 Surrenders Mecca to Mahomet, and receives him as a prophet 922
Abu Taher the Carmathian, pillages Mecca, 990
Abulfeda, his account of the splendour of the caliph Moctadar 930
Abulpharagius, primæ of the eastern Jacobites, some account of 839 His encomium on wisdom and learning 941
Abundantius general of the east, and patron of the eunuch Eutropius is disgraced and exiled by him, 595
Abyla the fair of plundered by the Saracens, 946
Abysinia the inhabitants of described 731 Their alliance with the emperor Justinian, 16 Ecclesiastical history of 843
Acacius bishop of Amida an uncommon instance of episcopal benevolence, 513
Acacia its extent 10
Acra the memorable siege of, by the crusaders, 1101 Final loss of 1107
Actions institutes of Justinian respecting 772
Actium a review of Roman affairs after the battle of 24
Adamas the only martyr of distinction during the persecution under Diocletian 229
Adolphus, the brother of Alaric brings him a reinforcement of troops, 511 Is made count of the domestic to the new emperor Attalus 514 Succeeds his brother as king of the Goths, and concludes a peace with Honorius 520
Adoption the two kinds of, under the Greek empire, 1078, note
Adoration of the Roman emperor, custom of, and derivation of the term, 1802
Adornus the Chinese emperor of Phœcia conveys Anurath II from Asia to Europe 1101
Adrian I pope his alliance with Charlemagne against the Lombards 833 884 His reception of Charlemagne at Rome 885 Asserts the fictitious donation of Constantine the Great 886
Adultery distinctions of, and how punished by Augustus 776 By the christian emperors 16
Ælia Capitana, founded on Mount Zion by Hadrian 180
Ælius Petrus his Tripartite the oldest work of Roman jurisprudence 757
Æmilianus governor of Pannonia and Mœsia routs the barbarous invaders of the empire, and is declared emperor by his troops 100
Æneas of Gaza his attestation of the miraculous gift of speech to the catholic confessors of Tivoli, whose tongues had been cut out 615
Æneas Sylvius his account of the impracticability of a European crusade against the Turks 1241

His epigram on the destruction of ancient buildings in Rome, 1280, note
Æra of the world, remarkable epochs in, pointed out 684, note
Ælalan, of the Turks, when settled, 1061
Aerial tribute in the eastern empire, what 671
Ælius, surnamed the Atheist his character and adventures, 315, 318, 324, note
Ælius the Roman general under Valerian III his character 546 His treacherous scheme to ruin count Boniface 547 Is forced to retire into Pannonia 550 His invitation of the Huns into the empire, 553 Seizes the administration of the western empire, 566 His character, as given by Renatus a contemporary historian, 16 Employs the Huns and Alani in the defence of Gaul, 16 Concludes a peace with Theodoric 567 Raises the siege of Orleans 571 Battle of Châlons, 16 His prudence on the invasion of Italy by Attila, 575 Is murdered by Valentinian 578
Africa, its situation and revolutions 11 Great revenue raised from by the Romans, 64 Progress of christianity there, 201
 - is distracted with religious discord to the time of Constantine the Great 307 Character and revolt of the Circumcellions, 330 Oppressions of under the government of count Ithamianus 405 General state of Africa 406
 - revolt of count Boniface there 547 Arrival of Genseric king of the Vandals 16 Persecution of the Donatists 548 Devastations of, by the Vandals 549 Carthage surprised by Genseric, 551 Persecution of the catholics 612
 - expedition of Belisarius to, 687 Is recovered by the Romans 692 The government of, settled by Justinian 16 Revolt of the troops there under Stozza, 733 Devastation of the war, 734
 - invasion of by the Saracens, 958 Conquest of by Akbah, 960 Decline and extinction of christianity there 969 Revolt and independence of the Saracens there, 971
Aplabites the Saracen dynasty of, 991
Aplia, a Roman lady, patronizes St Boniface, 229
Aprilia, review of his conduct in Britain 2
Agriculture great improvement of in the western countries of the Roman empire 21 State of, in the eastern empire, under Justinian, 667
Ajar, the sepulchre of how distinguished, 225
Araden, battle of, between the Saracens and the Greeks 943
Akhab the Saracen his exploits in Africa, 960
Alani, occasion of these people invading Asia 129 Conquest of by the Huns 422 Join the Goths who had emigrated into France, 429 See Goths, and Vandals
Alaric the Goth learns the art of war under Theodosius the Great, 459 Becomes the leader of the Gothic revolt, and ravages Greece 483 Escapes from Stilicho, 485 Is appointed master general of the eastern Illyricum, 485 His invasion of Italy 486 Is defeated by Stilicho at Pollentia, 488 Is driven out of Italy 489 Is by treaty with Honorius declared master general of the Roman armies throughout the prefecture of Illyricum 496 His plans and motives for marching to Rome 501 Encamps under the walls of that city 502 Accepts a ransom and raises the siege, 511 His negotiations with the emperor Honorius, 512 His second siege of Rome, 513 Places Attalus on the imperial throne 514 Degrades him 515 Seizes the city of Rome, 16 His sack of Rome compared with that by the emperor Charles V 518 Retires from Rome and ravages Italy 16 His death and burial 519
Alaric II king of the Goths his overthrow by Clovis king of the Franks, 674
Alberic the son of Marozia, his revolt and government of Rome 896
Albigens of France persecution of 1017
Alboin king of the Lombards his history, 780 His alliance with the Avars against the Gepulæ 781 Reduces the Gepulæ 16 He undertakes the conquest of Italy 782 Overturns what is now called Lombardy 783 Assumes the regal title there 16 Takes Pavia and makes it his capital city 16 Is murdered at the instigation of his queen Rozamond, 16
Alchemy the books of, in Egypt, destroyed by Diocletian 145

Aleppo, siege and capture of by the Saracens 949 Is recovered by the Greeks 993 Is taken and sacked by a Saracene 1184
Alexander III pope establishes the papal election in the college of cardinals 1252
Alexander, archbishop of Alexandria, excommunicates Arius for his heresy, 312
Alexander Severus is declared Cæsar by the emperor Elagabalus, 59 Is raised to the throne 16 Examination into his pretended victory over Artaxerxes 83 Shows a regard for the christian religion 221
Alexandria a general massacre there by order of the emperor Caracalla 54 The city described, 111 Is ruined by ridiculous and senseless commotions 16 By famine and pestilence, 112 Is besieged and taken by Diocletian 145 The christian theology reduced to a systematical form in the school of, 200 Number of martyrs who suffered there in the persecution by Decius 216
 - the theological system of Plato taught in the school of, and received by the Jews there, 309 Questions concerning the nature of the Trinity originated in the philosophical and christian schools of 310, 312 History of the archbishop St Athanasius 319 Outrages attending his expulsion, and the establishment of his successor, George of Cappadocia, 325 The city distracted by pious factions, 327 Disgraceful life and tragical death of George of Cappadocia, 369 373 Restoration of Athanasius 364 Athanasius banished by Julian, 16 Suffers greatly by an earthquake 414
 - history of the temple of Serapis there, 466 This temple, and the famous library, destroyed by bishop Theophilus, 467
 - is taken by Amrour the Saracen, 955 The famous library there, 956
Aleus Augustus his usurpation of the Greek empire and character, 1111 Lies before the crusaders, 1118
Aleus I Comnenus emperor of Constantinople, 866 New titles of dignity invented by him 1001 Battle of Durazzo, 1044 Solicits the aid of the emperor Henry III 1045
 - solicits the aid of the christian princes against the Turks 1067 His suspicious policy on the arrival of the crusaders 1077 Exact homage from them 1078 Profits by the success of the crusaders 1091
Aleus II Comnenus, emperor of Constantinople, 869
Aleus Strategopulus the Greek general, retakes Constantinople from the Latins 1135
Aleus the son of Isaac Angelus his escape from his uncle who had deposed his father 1111 His treaty with the crusaders for his restoration 1115 Restoration of his father, 1119 His death, 1124
Alfred sends an embassy to the shrine of St Thomas in India 838
Algebra by whom invented 982
Al joins Mahomet in his prophetic mission 917 His heroism 922 His character 978 Is chosen caliph of the Saracens 929 Devotion paid at his tomb 931 His posterity 16
Algern defends Cumæ for his brother Teias king of the Goths 743 Is reduced 744
Allectus murders Carausius, and usurps his station, 143
Alamanni, the origin and warlike spirit of, 103 Are driven out of Italy by the senate and people 16 Invade the empire under Aurelian 117 Are totally routed 118 Gaul delivered from their depredations by Constantine Chlorus, 144
 - invade and establish themselves in Gaul 284 Are defeated at Strassburg by Julian 287 Are reduced by Julian in his expeditions beyond the Rhine 288 Invade Gaul under the emperor Valentinian 399 Are reduced by Jovinus, 16 And chastised by Valentinian 400
 - are subdued by Clovis king of the Franks, 620
Alp Arslan sultan of the Turks his reign 1058
Alpuus, governor of Britain is commissioned by the emperor Julian to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem 353
Amala, king of the Goths his high credit among them, 91
Amalaswintha, queen of Italy her history and character, 691 Her death 693

Amalphi description of the city, and its commerce, 1040
Amalphi improbability of any society of 124 note
Ambition reflections on the violence and various operations of that passion 873
Ambrose St composed a treatise on the Trinity for the use of the emperor (Constantine) 410 note
 His birth and promotion to the archbishopric of Milan 449 Opposes the Arian worship of the emperor Justin 451 Refuses to adhere to the imperial power 450 Controls the emperor Theodosius 456 Imposes penance on Theodosius for his cruel treatment of Thessalonica 457 Employed his influence over Gratian and Theodosius, to inspire them with maxims of persecution 462 Opposes Symmachus the advocate for the old Pagan religion 461 Comforts the citizens of Florence with a dream, when besieged by Radagaisus 462
Amida siege of, by Sapor king of Persia 228 Receives the fugitive inhabitants of Nisibis 225 Is besieged and taken by Cabades king of Persia 660
Amir prince of Ionia his character and passage into Europe 1173
Ammonius the historian, his religious character of the emperor Constantius 318 His remark on the enmity of christians toward each other 311 His account of the heavy obstructions to restoring the temple of Jerusalem 538 His account of the hostile contest of Damasus and Ursinus for the bishopric of Rome 378 Testimony in favour of his historical merit 435 His character of the nobles of Rome 504
Ammonius the mathematician, his measurement of the circuit of Rome 509
Ammonius the monk of Alexandria his martyrdom 621
Ammonius success and destruction of by the caliph Al-Mansur 523
Amphilochus bishop of Iconium gains the favour of the emperor Theodosius by an orthodox sermon 443
Amphitheatre at Rome a description of 137 1381
Amron his birth and character, 407 His invasion and conquest of Assyria 903 His administration there 907 His description of the country 16
Amurath I sultan of the Turks his reign 1175
Amurath II sultan his reign and character 1215
Anaeth etc in monkish history described 607
Anacletus pope his Jewish extraction 126
Anastasia I marries the empress Arcadia 616 His war with Theodorus the Ostroth king of Italy 655 His enemy, celebrated 670 His long wall from the Propontis to the Buxine 677 Is humbled by the catholic clergy 879
Anastasia II emperor of Constantinople 851 His preparations of defence against the Saracens 973
Anastasia St his brief history and martyrdom 807 note
Anath, the city of, on the banks of the Euphrates, described 57
Andactia derivation of the name of that province 603 note
Andronicus bishop of Lybia excommunicated by Eusebius 333
Andronicus Commenus his character and first adventures 869 Seizes the empire of Constantinople, 872 His unhappy fate 873
Andronicus the Elder emperor of Constantinople his superstition 1153 His war with his grand son and abdication 1155 1156
Andronicus the younger emperor of Constantinople his licentious character 1155 His civil war against his grandfather 16 His reign 1160 Is vanquished and wounded by sultan Orchan 1170 His private application to pope Benedict XIII of Rome, 1170
Anora battle of, between Tamerlane and Bajazet 1185
Anthonis bishop of Orleans his pious anxiety for the relief of that city, when besieged by Attila the Hun 510
Anthonis family at Rome brief history of 578
Anna Comnena character of her his ory of her father Alexius I emperor of Constantinople 807 Her conspiracy against her brother John 807
Anthimus emperor of the west his descent and institution by Leo the Great 571 His election confirmed at Rome 16 Is killed in the sack of Rome by Vitruvius 507
Anthimus prefect of the east character of his administration in the minority of the emperor Theodosius the younger 510
Antiphona the architect instances of his great knowledge in mechanics 674 Forms the design of the church of St Sophia at Constantinople 16
Anthony St father of the Egyptian monks his history 602
Antiochian martyrs among the early christians persecutions of the Deity 818
Antioch taken and destroyed by Sapor king of Persia 1185 Flourishing state of the christian church there in the reign of Theodosius 501
 - history of the body of St Babylas bishop of 370 The cathedral of but up and its wealth confiscated by the emperor Julian 16 Licentious manners of the citizens 307 Popular disturbances during the residence of Julian there 16
 - sedition there against the emperor Theodosius 451 The city paraded 453
 - is taken and ruined by the emperor Leo of Persia, 754 Great destruction there by an earthquake 750 Is again seized by Chosroes II 806
 - is reduced by the Saracens and ransommed 920 Is recovered by the first crusaders 1092
 - besieged and taken by the first crusaders 1092
Antonia the wife of Pelagius his character 607 Examines and convicts pope Sylvester of treachery 705 His activity during the siege of Rome 706 Her secret history 711 Found a convent for her retreat 718

Antoninus, a Roman refugee at the court of Sapor king of Persia stimulates him to an invasion of the Roman provinces 400
Antoninus Pius, his character and that of Hadrian compared 3 Is adopted by Hadrian 30
Antoninus Marcus his defensive wars 4 Is adopted by Pius at the instance of Hadrian 31 His character 33 His war against the united Germans 34 Suspicious story of his edict in favour of the christians 50
Aper Arian praetorian prefect and father in law to the emperor Numerian is killed by Diocletian as the presumptive murderer of that prince 139
Apharban the Persian his embassy from Sarses king of Persia to the emperor Valerian 138
Apocalypse why now admitted into the canon of the Scriptures 126 note
Apocryphus admiral of Constantinople his conspiracy against John Cantacuzene 1157 His death 1159
Apollinaris bishop of Laodicea his hypothesis of the divine incarnation of Jesus Christ 810
Apollinaris patriarch of Alexandria butchers his flock in defence of the catholic doctrine of the incarnation 841
Apollonius of Tyana his doubtful character, 121, note
Apotheosis of the Roman emperors, how this custom was introduced 23
Apollinaris deposes Leontius emperor of Constantinople and usurps his place 810
Apulia is conquered by the Normans 1036 Is confirmed to them by papal grant 1038
Aquila besieged by the emperor Maximian, 73 Taken and destroyed by Attila king of the Huns 54
Aquitan is settled by the Goths under their king Wallia 500 Is conquered by Clovis king of the Franks, 625
Arabia its situation soil and climate 901 Its division into the sandy the stony and happy 16 The pastoral Arabs 907 Their horses and camels 16 Cities of 16 Manners and customs of the Arabs 903 Their language 106 Their benevolence 18 Their art and description of the Crabs of Mecca 107 Their religion 901 Life and doctrine of Mahomet 903 Conquest of by Mahomet 903 Character of the caliphs 107 Rapid conquests of 906 Limits of their conquests 907 Three caliphs established 909 Introduction of leucism among the Arabs 909 Their progress in the sciences 932 Their literary deficiencies 933 Decline and fall of the caliphs 909
Arbeto a veteran under Constantine the Great leaves his retirement to oppose the usurper Procopius 300
Arbogastes the Frank his military promotion under Theodosius in Gaul and conspiracy against Valentinian the younger 44 Is defeated by Theodosius and kills himself 460
Arbogastes son of the emperor Theodosius succeeds to the empire of the east 473 His inactivity 531 Extent of his dominions 16 Administration of his favourite eunuch Eutropius 16 His cruel law against freemen 537 Signs the condemnation of Eutropius 531 His interview with the revolted Frisland and Camas 531 His death and supposed testament 531 540
Architecture Roman the general magnificence of, indicated by the existing ruins 18
Ardaturnus his expedition to Italy to reduce the usurper John 54
Argemone the object of their expedition to Colchis 756
Argemone daughter of the emperor Leo and wife of Leo her character and marriage afterward with Anastasius 616
Argi a tribe of the Egyptians their terrific mode of warfare 131
Arinthus was appointed general of the horse by the emperor Julian on his Persian expedition 771 Distinguishes himself against the usurper Procopius 300
Armenians seize two thirds of the lands of the Segani in Gaul, for himself and his German followers 600
Arnobius principal monster of the house of Carus is received into confidence by the emperor Diocletian 140
Ariotele his logic better adapted to the detection of error than for the discovery of truth 607
Arius is excommunicated for heretical notions concerning the Trinity 412 Strength of his party 16 His opinions examined in the council of Nice 313 Account of Arian sects 115 Council of Rimini 316 His banishment and recall 317 His suspicious death 16
 - the Arians persecute the catholics in Africa 611
Arius is seized by Sapor king of Persia 107 Julian restored 146 He is again expelled by the Persians 147 Is restored to his throne by treaty between the Romans and Persians 150
 - is rendered tributary to Persia on the death of Jovian 156 Character of Arius Arius Arius king of Persia and his conduct toward the emperor Julian 570 Is reduced by Sapor to a Persian province 407
 - his distractions and division between the Persians and the Romans 513
 - history of christianity there 810
Armies of the eastern empire made of under the emperor Maurice 507
Armenia the provinces of form a free government independent on the Romans 503 Submits to Clovis king of the Franks 622 Settlement of Britons to 638
Armenia defensive is laid aside by the Romans and adopted by the barbarians 461
Arnold of Brescia his heresy and his ory 104
Arragon derivation of the name of that province 8, note
Arrian, his visit to, and description of (Coles) 127
Artaeus Tiranus king of Armenia his character and disaffection to the emperor Julian 501 Withdraws his troops treacherously from the Roman service 377 His disastrous end 107
Artemius patriarch of Constantinople excommunicates the emperor Michael I theologus 1146
 - notion of the Arsenite, 16
Artaban king of Parthia is defeated and slain by Artaxerxes king of Persia 78
Artaban his conspiracy against the emperor Justinian 739 Is intrusted with the conduct of the armament sent to Italy, 740
Artaxerxes king of Armenia is deposed by the Persians at the instigation of his own subjects, 544
Artaxerxes, his revolt against the Greek emperor Constantine, at Constantinople 1178
Artaxerxes restores the Persian monarchy 1178 Prohibits every worship but that of Zoroaster 81 His war with the Romans 121 His character and maxims 81
Artemius duke of Egypt under Constantine is condemned to death under Julian, for treason and corruption 344
Arthur king of the Britons, his history obscured by monkish fictions 631
Arvandus praetorian prefect of Gaul his trial and condemnation by the Roman senate 544
Arsenal battle of between Godfrey king of Jerusalem and the sultan of Egypt 1147
Asclepius in ecclesiastical history account of 600
Asclepiodorus reduces and kills the British usurper Allelus 143
Asia summary view of the revolutions in that quarter of the world 78
Asia Minor described 10 Amount of its tribute to Rome 61 Is conquered by the Turks 1404
Asiarch the nature of this office among the ancient pagans 1081 note Aspar is commissioned by Theodosius the younger to conduct Valentinian III to Italy 515
 - takes his steward Leo on the throne of the eastern empire 510 He and his sons murdered by Leo 616
Assassins the principality of destroyed by the Moors 1160
Assurances of the people abolished under the Constantinian emperors 57 The nature of amon, the ancient Germans 57
Assyria the province of described 772 Is invaded by the emperor Julian 373 His retreat 379
Asiatic her image brought from Carthage to Rome as a spouse for Iulianus 58
Asiaticus king of the Lombards takes the city of Maxenry and attacks Rome, 883 Is repelled by Pepin king of France 16
Astronomy why cultivated by the Arabian astronomers 883
Ataliole the son of Amalasontha queen of Italy his education and character 677
Ataliole the Coptic chief his war against the emperor Valens 410 His alliance with Theodosius his death and funeral 427
Atmarian St contests his understanding bewildered by meditation on the divinity of the Logos 511 General view of his opinions 514 Is banished 317 His character and adventures 510 501 337 306 Was not the author of the famous creed under his name 614 note
Atmarian patriarch of Constantinople his contests with the Greek emperor Andronicus the Elder 1151
Atmarian daughter of the philosopher Leontius see Eutopia
Atmarian the libraries in that city why said to have been spared by the Goths 107 A val strength of the republic of, during its prosperity 175 note
 - is laid under contribution by Alaric the Goth 413
 - review of the philosophical history of 681
 - The schools of, silenced by the emperor Justinian 623
 - revolutions of after the crusades and its present state 1150
Atmar mount beatific visions of the monks of 1161
Atlantic Ocean derivation of its name 11
Atlatot a Caledonian tribe of cannibals account of 504
Attila prefect of Rome is chosen emperor by the senate under the influence of Alaric 513 Is publicly degraded 515 His future fortune 504
Attila a noble youth of Auvergne his adventures 630
Attila the Hun 554 Description of his person and character 16 His conquests 505 His treatment of his captives 558 Imposes terms of peace on Theodosius the younger 504 Imposes Theodosius by his ambassadors 561 Description of his royal residence 562 His reception of the ambassades of Theodosius 16 His behaviour on discovering the scheme of Theodosius to get him assassinated 564 His harsh messages to the emperors of the east and west 565 His invasion of Gaul 570 His oration to his troops on the approach of Flavius and Theodoric, 572 Battle of Chalons 16 His invasion of Italy 574 His retreat purchased by Valentinian 575 His death 576
Atys and Cypselus the fable of allegorized by the poet of Julian 30
Atys are described by the Turks 718 Their embassy to the emperor Justinian 16 Their conquests in Poland and Germany 16 Their conquests in Poland and Germany 16 Their suppose that about the year two hundred and forty,* a new confederacy was formed under the name of Franks, by the old inhabitants of the Lower Rhine and the Weser. The present circle of Westphalia, the landgraviate of Hesse, and the duchies of Brunswick and Lunenburg, were the ancient seat of the Chauci, who, in their inaccessible morasses, defied the Roman arms,<sup>b</sup> of the Cherusci, proud of the fame of Arminius, of the Catti, formidable by their firm and intrepid infantry, and of several other tribes of inferior power and renown.<sup>c</sup> The love of liberty was the ruling passion of these Germans, the enjoyment of it their best treasure, the word that expressed that enjoyment, the most pleasing to their ear. They deserved, they assumed, they maintained the honourable epithet of Franks, or Freemen, which concealed, though it did not extinguish, the peculiar names of the several states of the confederacy.<sup>d</sup> Tacit consent, and mutual advantage, dictated the first laws of the union, it was gradually cemented by habit and experience. The league of the Franks may admit of some comparison with the Helvetic body, in which every canton, retaining its independent sovereignty, consults with its brethren in the common cause, without acknowledging the authority of any supreme head, or representative assembly.<sup>e</sup> But the principle of the two confederacies was extremely different. A peace of two hundred years has rewarded the wise and honest policy of the Swiss. An inconstant spirit, the thirst of rapine, and a disregard to the most solemn treaties, disgraced the character of the Franks.

They invade Gaul. The Romans had long experienced the daring valour of the people of Lower Germany. The union of their strength threatened Gaul with a more formidable invasion, and required the presence of Gallienus, the heir and colleague of imperial power.<sup>f</sup> Whilst that prince, and his infant son Salonus, displayed, in the court of Treves, the majesty of the empire, its armies were ably conducted by their general Posthumus, who, though he afterwards betrayed the family of Valerian, was ever faithful to the great interest of the monarchy. The treacherous language of panegyrics and medals darkly announces a long series of victories. Trophies and titles attest (if such evidence can attest) the fame of Posthumus, who is repeatedly styled The Conqueror of the Germans, and The Saviour of Gaul.<sup>g</sup>

Ravage Spain. But a single fact, the only one indeed of which we have any distinct knowledge, erases, in a great measure, these monuments of vanity and adulation. The Rhine, though dignified with the title of Safeguard of the provinces, was an imperfect barrier against the daring spirit of enterprise with which the Franks were actuated. Their rapid devastations stretched from the river to the foot of the Pyrenees: nor were they stopped by those mountains. Spain, which had never dreaded, was unable to resist, the inroads of the Germans. During twelve years, the greatest part of the reign of Gallienus, that opulent country was the theatre of unequal and destructive hostilities. Tarragona, the flourishing capital of a peaceful province, was sacked and almost destroyed,<sup>h</sup> and so late as the days of Orosius, who wrote in the fifth century, wretched cottages, scattered amidst the ruins of magnificent cities, still recorded the rage of the barbarians.<sup>i</sup> When the exhausted country no longer supplied a variety of plunder, the Franks seized on some vessels in the ports of Spain,<sup>k</sup> and transported themselves into Mauritania. The distant province was astonished with the fury of these barbarians, who seemed to fall from a new world, as their name, manners, and complexion, were equally unknown on the coast of Africa.<sup>l</sup>

II In that part of Upper Saxony beyond the Elbe, which is at present called the marquisate of Lusace, there existed, in ancient times, a sacred wood, the awful seat of the superstition of the Suevi. None were permitted to enter the holy precincts, without confessing, by their servile bonds and suppliant posture, the immediate presence of the sovereign Deity.<sup>m</sup> Patriotism contributed as well as devotion to consecrate the Sonnenwald, or wood of the Semnones.<sup>n</sup> It was universally believed, that the nation had received its first existence on that sacred spot. At stated periods, the numerous tribes who gloried in the Suevic blood, resorted thither by their ambassadors, and the memory of their common extraction was perpetuated by barbaric rites and human sacrifices. The wide extended name of Suevi filled the interior countries of Germany, from the banks of the Oder to those of the Danube. They were distinguished from the other Germans by their peculiar mode of dressing their long hair, which they gathered into a rude knot on the crown of the head, and they delighted in an ornament that showed their ranks more lofty and terrible in the eyes of the enemy.<sup>o</sup> Jealous, as the Germans were, of military renown, they all confessed the superior valour of the Suevi, and the tribes of the Usipetes and Tencteri, who,

* Most probably under the reign of Gordian, from an accidental circumstance fully canvassed by Tillemont, tom iii p 710 1181

<sup>b</sup> Plin Hist Natur xvi l The panegyricists frequently allude to the morasses of the Franks

<sup>c</sup> Tacit Germania c 30 37

<sup>d</sup> In a subsequent period most of those old names are occasionally mentioned See some vestiges of them in Cluver Germ Antiq i iii

<sup>e</sup> Simler de Republica Helvet eum votis Fuselin

<sup>f</sup> Zosimus, l i p 27

<sup>g</sup> M de Brequigny (in the Memoires de l'Academie, tom xxx) has given us a very curious life of Posthumus. A series of the Augustan History from Medals and Inscriptions has been more than once planned, and is still much wanted

<sup>h</sup> Aurel Victor, c 33. Instead of Pæne direpto both the sense and the expression require deleto, though indeed, for different reasons it is alike difficult to correct the text of the best, and of the worst, writers

<sup>i</sup> In the time of Ausonius (the end of the fourth century) Iberia or Lerdia was in a very ruinous state, (Auson Epist xxv 58) which probably was the consequence of this invasion

<sup>k</sup> Valerius is therefore mistaken in supposing that the Franks had invaded Spain by sea

<sup>l</sup> Aurel Victor Eutrop i x 6

<sup>m</sup> Tacit Germania, 38.

<sup>n</sup> Cluver Germ Antiq iii 25

<sup>o</sup> Sic Suevi a celeris Germanis, sic Suevorum in Germani a se separantur. A proud separation!

embassy to Justin II 760 They join the Lombards against the Gepidae, 781 Pride policy and power of their chieftain Hagan 800 Their conquests 16 Invest Constantinople 809
Terroret, his religious imbecility, how far justifiable, 984, note
Heraca a town near Naples, built as a settlement for the Normans 1035
Ingur, Roman their number and peculiar office 402
Ingur, his account of the miracles wrought by the body of St Stephen 471 Celebrates the piety of the Goths in the sinking of Rome 516 Approves the persecution of the Donatists of Africa 548 His death character and writings, 549 550 History of his relics 600 note
Ingur, son of the patrician Drestes is chosen emperor of the west 508 Is deposed by Odoacer, 16 His banishment to the Lucullan villa in Campania 539
Ingur, emperor his moderate exercise of power 1, Is imitated by his successors 2 His naval regulations 8 His division of Gaul 16 His situation after the battle of Aetium 24 He reorganizes the senate 16 Procures a senatorial grant of the imperial dignity, 16 Division of the provinces between him and the senate 25 Is allowed his military command and guards in the city of Rome 26 Obtains the consular and triumphal offices for life 16 His character and policy, 28 Adopts Theodosius 29 Formed an accurate register of the revenues and expenses of the empire 63 Taxes instituted by him, 64 His naval establishments at Ravenna 400
Ingur and Cesar, those titles explained and distinguished, 23
Athenus, his character and embassy from Valentinian III to Attila king of the Huns 575
Avignon the holy see how transferred from Rome to that city, 1254 Return of pope Urban V to Rome 1668
Avitus his embassy from Attila to Theodoric king of the Visigoths, 571 Assumes the empire, 582 His deposition and death 584
Aurelian emperor his birth and services 116 His expedition against Palmyra 121 His triumph, 123 His cruelty and death, 125 106
Aureng ebe account of his immense camp 82 note
Aureolus is invested with the purple on the Upper Danube, 113
Aurum the tutor of the emperor Gratian, his promotion, 40 note
Autharic king of the Lombards in Italy his wars with the Franks, 787 His adventurous calantry 790
Autun the city of, stormed and plundered by the legions in Gaul 790
Auvergne province and city of, in Gaul, revolutions of 631
Auxiliarius barbarian fatal consequences of their admission into the Roman armies 248
Aruch a Turkish slave, his generous friendship to the princess Anna Comnena 267 And to Manuel Comnenus 268
Azumintum the citizens of defend their privileges against Peter, brother of the eastern emperor Manuier 801
Azumus remarkable spirit shown by the citizens of, against Attila and his Huns, 559

B

Baalther, description of the ruins of 947
Babylas St bishop of Antioch, his posthumous history 361
Babanda, in Gaul revolt of its occasion, and suppression by Maximian 141
Baband becomes the royal residence of the Abbas sides 980 Derivation of the name, 16 note
 The fallen state of the temples of 992 The city of, stormed and sacked by the Moslems, 1168
Bahram, the Persian general his character and exploits 796 Is provoked to rebellion 797 De thrones Chosroes 799 His usurpation and death 799
Bahan, chieftain of the Avars his pride policy and power 800 His perfidious seizure of Sirmium and Singulorum 801 His conquests 16 His treacherous attempt to seize the emperor Licinius, 804 Invests Constantinople in conjunction with the Persians 810 Retires 16
Bajazet I sultan of the Turks his reign 1175 His correspondence with Ismael 1182 Is defeated and captured byamerlane, 1185 In quiry into the story of the iron cage, 1186 His sons 1190
Balthus elected joint emperor with Maximus in the senate on the deaths of the two Gordians, 70
Baldwin count of Flanders engages in the fourth crusade 1112 Is chosen emperor of Constantinople 1166 Is taken prisoner by Cilo Idm, kin, of the Bulgarians 1169 His death, 1130
Baldric II emperor of Constantinople 1139 His distresses and expedients 16 His expulsion from that city 1140
Baldric brother of Cndreus of Bonillon, recom penses him on the first crusade, 1074 Louds the principality of Fdesa 1081
Baltic Sea progressive subsidence of the water of, 60 note
 How the Romans acquired a knowledge of the naval powers of 401 note
Balthus theory and practice of, among the primitive Christians 590
Barbary the name of that country whence derived 66 note
 The Moors of converted to the Mahometan faith 96
Barbary, general of infantry in Gant under Julianus his misconduct 206
Bar ebehar his rebellion against the emperor Hlward 206
Bar, Celtic their power of exciting a martial enthusiasm in the people 92

Barde, British their peculiar office and duties 610
Barbas, Caesar one of the restorers of learning 1031
Baris is taken from the Saracens by the joint efforts of the Latin and Greek empires 1036
Barlaam a Calabrian monk his dispute with the Greek theologians about the light of mount Iliab, 1161 His embassy to Rome from Aniloricus the younger, 1120 His literary character, 1208
Basil I the Macedonian emperor of Constantinople, 857 Reduces the Paulicians, 1016
Basil II emperor of Constantinople 862 His great wealth, 990 His inhuman treatment of the Bulgarians, 1021
Basil, archbishop of Ctesarea no evidence of his having been persecuted by the emperor Valens 397 Insults his tuncil Gregory Nazianzen, under the appearance of promotion, 444 The father of the monks of Pontus, 603
Basiliscus brother of the empress Verina is intrusted with the command of the armada sent against the Vandals in Africa 503 His fleet destroyed by Censeric 16 His promotion to the empire and death, 616
Barnanus, high priest of the sun his parentage 56 Is proclaimed emperor at Lmesa, 57 See Elagabalus
Bassianus brother in law to Constantine, revolts against him 172
Bastora its foundation and situation 938
Baths, public of Rome, described 508
Batna, reception of the emperor Julian there, 369
Bastis wild the variety of, introduced in the circus, for the public games at Rome 137
Bemusbre M de, character of his ilustre Critique du Manichisme 816 note
Beder battle of between Mahomet and the Koreish of Mecca 920
Redoacus of Arrha their mode of life 902
Beet remarks on the structure of their combs and cells 981 note
Belharus his birth and military promotion, 685 Is appointed by Justinian to conduct the African war 686 Embarkation of his troops 687 Janis in Africa, 688 Defeats Gelimer 689 Is received into Carthage 16 Second defeat of Gelimer 691 Reduction of Africa 690 Surrender of Gelimer, 693 His triumphant return to Constantinople, 694 Is declared sole consul 16 He menaces the Ostrogoths of Italy, 697 He seizes Sicily, 698 Invades Italy, 700 Takes Naples, 16 He enters Rome 701 He is besieged in Rome by the Goths 16 The siege raised 707 Causes Constantine, one of his generals to be killed 16 Siege of Ravenna 709 Takes Ravenna by stratagem 16 Returns to Constantinople, 710 His character and behaviour 711 Scandalous life of his wife Antonina 711 His disgrace and submission 712 Is sent into the east to oppose Chosroes king of Persia, 724 His politic reception of the Persian ambassadors 725 His second campaign in Italy 736 His ineffectual attempt to raise the siege of Rome, 737 Dissuades Totila from destroying Rome, 738 Recovers the city, 16 His final recall from Italy 749 Rescues Constantinople from the Bulgarians, 747 His disgrace and death, 748
Fenecise, in feudal language, explained, 630
Benevento battle of, between Charles of Anjou, and Manfred the Sicilian usurper, 1140
Beneventum, anecdotes relating to the siege of 1097
Benjamin of Tudela his account of the riches of Constantinople 999
Beren or Alepi o, reception of the emperor Julian there, 363
Bernard St his character and influence in promoting the second crusade 1094 His character of the Romans 1245
Berytus account of the law school established there 245 Is destroyed by an earthquake 750
Bernier his account of the camp of Aurengzebe, 16 note
Bessarion cardinal his character, 1210
Bessar governor of Rome for Justinian his rapacity during the siege of that city by Totila the Goth 796 Occasions the loss of Rome 737
Berabde, is taken and garrisoned by Vapour king of Persia 283 Is ineffectually besieged by Constantine 284
Bindoes a Sassanian prince, deposes Hormouz king of Persia 790
Birthing the least invasions of all human distinctions 67
Bishops, among the primitive christian the office of explained, 193 Progress of episcopal authority, 194 Assumed dignity of episcopal government, 197 number of, at the time of Constantine the Great 301 Mode of their election 16 Their power of ordination, 302 The ecclesiastical revenue of each diocese how divided 304 Their civil jurisdiction 16 Their spiritual censures 305 Their legislative assemblies 306
Bisrville rural, their rank and duties 301
Bismertile superstitious regard to this year by the Romans, 300
Bithynia, the cities of, plundered by the Goths 105
Blemmyes, their revolt against the emperor Diocletian 115
Bleccae his literary character 1000
Blethius the learned senator of Rome, his history, 606 His imprisonment and death 657
Bohemund, the son of Robert Guiscard his character and military exploits 1045 1074 His route to Constantinople on the crusade 1077 His flattering reception by the emperor Alexius Comnenus 1078 Takes Antioch and obtains the principality of it, 1082 His subsequent transactions, and death, 1091

Boufface St his history, 229
Boufface, count, the Roman general under Valentinian III his character 516 Is betrayed into a revolt by Aetius 547 His repentance 549 Is besieged in Hippo Regius by Genseric king of the Vandals, 16 Returns to Italy, and is killed by Aetius, 550
Boufface VIII pope, his violent contest with Philip the Fair king of France, and his character, 1254 Institutes the jubilee 1255
Boufface marquis of Montferrat is chosen general of the fourth crusade to the Holy Land 1114 Is made king of Macedonia, 1127 Is killed by the Bulgarians 1130
Bosphorus revolutions of that kingdom, 104 Is seized by the Goths, 16 The strait of, described, 233
Borra siege of, by the Saracens, 942, 943
Botteric, the imperial general in Thessalonica, murdered in a sedition, 405
Bouceault marshal, defends Constantinople against Pyazet 1178
Boulagne the port of recovered from Carusius by Constantius Chlorius 149
Bozides the Persian dynasty of 992
Branelone senator of Rome his character 1240
Bretagne the province of, in France, settled by Britons 638, note
Britain, reflections on the conquest of by the Romans 2 Description of 9 Colonies planted in, 15 note
 A colony of Vandals settled there by Probus 133 Revolt of Carausius 140 how first peopled, 402 Invasions of by the Scots and Picts, 403 Is restored to peace by Theodosius 404 revolt of Maximian there, 441 Revolt of the troops there against Honorius 495 Is abandoned by the Romans 527 State of until the arrival of the Saxons 528 Descent of the Saxons on 636 Establishment of the Saxon heptarchy 637 Wars in 16 Saxon devastation of the country, 638 Manners of the independent Britons 640 Description of by Procopius, 641 conversion of the Britons by a mission from pope Gregory the Great, 701 The doctrine of the incarnation revealed there 835
Brutus the Trojan his colonization of Britain, now given up by intelligent historians, 402, note
Buffon M his extraordinary burning mirrors, 673, note
Bulgarians their character, 715 Their incursions on the eastern empire 716 Invasion of, under Zabergan, 746 Repulsed by Belisarius 747 the kingdom of, destroyed by Basil II the Greek emperor, 860, 1021 revolt of, from the Greek empire and submission to the pope of Rome 1111 War with the Greeks under Alex John 1120
Bull feast, in the Coliseum at Rome, described, 162
Burgundians, their settlement on the Elbe, and maxims of government 400 Their settlement in Gaul 527 Limits of the kingdom of under Gundobad, 622 Are subdued by the Franks, 699
Burnet character of his Sacred Theory of the Earth, 186, note
Burramporter, source of that river 1182 note
Buster in Egypt four several places known under this name, 770 note
Buzurg, the philosophical preceptor of Hormouz king of Persia his high reputation 706, note
 By antique historians, list and character of, 1241, note
Byzantium siege of by the emperor Severus 48 Is taken by Maximian, 170 Siege of, by Constantine the Great 175 Its situation described, 933 By whom founded, 16 note See Constantinople

C

Caaba or temple of Mecca described, 907 Tholols in destroyed by Mahomet 923
Cabades king of Persia besieges and takes Amida 680 Seizes the straits of Caucasus, 16 Discusses of his reign 700
Cadessa battle of, between the Saracens and the Persians 977
Cadyah her marriage with Mahomet, 910 Is converted by him to his new religion 916 Her death 918 Mahomet's veneration for her memory, 918
Caelian the peace of the church in Africa disturbed by him and his party 308
Caelius, the authority of his account of the famous vision of Constantine the Great, inquired into, 266
Caelitian senator of Carthage his distress on the taking of that city by Censeric, 551
Cesar Julius, his inducement to the conquest of Britain 2 Degrades the senatorial dignity, 24 note Assumes a place among the tutelary deities of Rome in his lifetime 28 His address in appeasing a military sedition 60 note
 His prudent application of the coronary gold presented to him 255
Cesar and Augustus, those titles explained and discriminated, 98
Cesary, of the emperor Julian the philosophical fable of that work delineated 366
Cetarea capital of Cyprus taken by Sapor king of Persia 108 Is reduced by the Saracens, 951
Cahna queen of the Moors of Africa her policy to drive the Arabs out of the country 960
Castro, the city of, founded in the kingdom of Tunis 661
Caled, deserts from the idolatrous Arabs to the party of Mahomet 922 His gallant conduct at the battle of Muta 924 His victories under the caliph Abubeker, 927 Attends the Saracen army on the Syrian expedition, 941 His valour at the see of Ithacius 942. Distinguishes himself in the battle of Aiznau 944 His cruel treatment of the refugees from Damascus 946 Joins in plundering the fair of Abyla, 946 Commands the Saracens at the battle of Yermuk 948 His death 951

Caledonia and its ancient inhabitants, described, 403

Caledonia 1. Ar, under the emperor Severus, an account of, 51

Calpurnia the character of 935 Their rapid conquests, 935 Extent and power of 971 Their division of the office 979 They patronize learning 981 Decline and fall of their empire, 979 1168

Calpurnius the punishment of a religious sedition in that city opposed by St. Ambrose 456

Callinicus of Heliopolis, assists in defending Constantinople against the Saracens by his chymical inflammable compositions 975

Calmeke black, recent emigration of from the confines of Russia to those of China 421

Calo-John the Bulgarian chief his war with Baldwin the Latin emperor of the Greeks 1129 Defeats and takes him prisoner, 11 His savage character and death 1130

Calceus in camel-driver, excites an insurrection in the island of Cyprus 961

Calpurnius the machinery of his eulogy on the accession of the emperor Carus 135

Calvin, the reformer his doctrine of the Eucharist 1018 Examination of his conduct to Servetus 16

Camel, of Arabia described, 902

Camisardes of Languedoc their enthusiasm compared with that of the Circumcellions of Numidia 330

Campania, the province of desolated by the ill policy of the Roman emperors 253 Description of the Lucullan villa in 599

Canada the present climate and circumstances of, compared with those of ancient Germany, 186

Cannae enormous one of the sultan Mahomet II described 1027 Burgis 1230

Cannes Russian a description of 1078

Caracalla John character of his Greek History 1154 His good fortune under the younger Andronicus 1157 Is driven to assume the purple 1158 His lively distinction between foreign and civil war, 16 His entry into Constantinople and reign 1159 Abdicates and turns monk 1160 His war with the Genoese factory at Pera 1160 Marries his daughter to a Turk, 1165 His negotiation with pope Clement VI 16

Caracalla history of the Ottoman empire, a character of 1172 note

Caracallus governor of Mauritania defeats the younger Gordian, and takes Carthage 71

Caracalla tax under the Roman emperors an account of, 63

Capito Ateius the civilian his character 759

Capitol of Rome burning and restoration 112

Capodopera famous for its fine breed of horses 251

Capri isle of character of the monks there 481

Captives how treated by the barbarians, 557 611

Caracalla son of the emperor Severus his lived antipathy to his brother Geta 51 Succeeds to the empire jointly with him 52 Tendency of his edict to extend the privileges of Roman citizens to all the free inhabitants of his empire 63 His view in this transaction 66 Doubles the tax on legacies and inheritances 16

Caracorum, the Tartar settlement of, described, 1170

Caracans, Sordian their route to and from Chion for silk to supply the Roman empire, 668

Caracanus, his revolt in Britain 142 Is acknowledged by Diocletian and his colleagues 143

Caracaus the Paulician, his revolt from the Greek emperor to the Saracens, 1015

Caracaus the election of a pope vested in them, 1052 Institution of the condave, 1053

Cardene situation and history of that territory 150

Carinus the son of Carus succeeds his father in the empire, jointly with his brother Numerian 136

Cari mians their invasion of Syria 1104

Carolingian race first kings commencement of, in France 884

Caruak the Arabi in reformer, his character 999 His military exploits 990

Carmentis from whom they derive their pedigree 60th note

Carpathian mountains their situation 85

Carthage the bishopric of, bought for Majoranus 202, note religious discord generated there by the factions of Cerecian and Donatus 308

the temple of Venus there converted into a christian church 466 Is surprised by Germanic king of the Vandals 551

the gates of opened to Belisarius 699

Natural alterations produced by time in the situation of this city 690 note The walls of repaired by Belisarius 690 Insurrection of the Roman troops there, 733 is reduced and pillaged by Hassan the Saracen, 961 Subsequent history of 16

Carthage an extraordinary rich silver mine worked there for the Romans, 64

Carus emperor his election and character 134

Carman and Iberian gates of mount Caucasus, distinguished 680

Cassians the party of among the Roman civilians expelled 799

Cassiodorus his Gothic history, 95 His account of the infant state of the republic of Venice 75 His long and prosperous life 652

Cassius George see Scanderbeg

Catalans, their service and war in the Greek empire, 1151

Catholi church, the doctrines of how discriminated from the opinions of the Platonist school 311 The authority of extended to the ministris of mankind 312 Faith of the western or Latin church, 315 Is distracted by factions in the cure of Athanasius 320 The doxology how introduced, and how perverted, 327 The revenue of, transferred to the heathen priests by Julian 359 edict of Ithacius, for the establishment of the catholic faith, 443 The progressive steps of idolatry in 470 Persecution of the catholics in Africa 612 Pious frauds of the catholic clergy 614

how bewilder by the doctrine of the Incarnation 870 Union of the Greek and Latin churches 835

scism of the Greek church 1107

Celestine, pope, espouses the party of Cyril against Nestorius and pronounces the degradation of the latter from his episcopal dignity 223

Celtic language, driven to the mountains by the Latin 15 note

Censor the office of revived under the emperor Decius, 99 But without effect 16

Cess the manufacture of silk first introduced to Europe from that island 668

Chang the principal quest of Attila king of the Huns, his reception of Maximin the Roman ambassador, 562

Cerulus, his opinion of the two-fold nature of Jesus Christ 813.

Ceylon ancient names given to that island, and the imperfect knowledge of, by the Romans, 366 note

Chalcedon the injudicious situation of this city stigmatized by proverbial contempt 234 A triumph erected there by the emperor Julian to try and punish the evil ministers of his predecessor Constantius 344

a stately church built there by Iulianus the iniquitous minister of the emperor Theodosius, 474

is taken by Chosroes II king of Persia 806

Chalcondyles the Greek historian, his remarks on the several nations of Europe 1109

Chalons battle of between the Romans and Attila king of the Huns 571

Chalmers reduced and generously treated by Julian 238.

Chancellor, the original and modern application of this word compared 136 note

Characters, national the distinction of, how formed, 915

Charots of the Romans described 505 note

Charlemagne conquers the kingdom of Lombardy, 884 His reception at Rome 885 Fulfills fulfilling the promises of Pepin and himself to the Roman pontiff 886 His coronation at Rome by the pope Leo III 889 His reign and character 890 Extension of his empire 891 His marches and enemies 892 His successors 893 His negotiations and treaty with the eastern empire 891 State of his family and dominions in the tenth century 1008

Charles the 1st emperor of the Romans 893

Charles of Anjou subduces Naples and Sicily, 1149

Charles the Sicilian emperor 1150 His character as a senator of Rome 1240

Charles V emperor of Germany, his weakness and poverty 899 His public ostentation 900 Contrast between him and Augustus 16

Charles V emperor parallel between him and Diocletian, 154 And between the sack of Rome by him and that by Alaric the Goth 518

Chastity its high esteem among the ancient Germans 90 And the primitive christians 191

Chemistry the art of from whom derived 903

Chersonesus Thracian, how fortified by the emperor Justinian 677

Chersonesus under Constantine the Great against the Goths 762 Are cruelly persecuted by the Greek emperor Justinian 11 840

Che s the object of the game of, by whom invented, 700

Childeric king of France, deposed under papal sanction 834

Children the exposing of a prevailing vice of antiquity 765 Natural, according to the Roman laws what 768

China how distinguished in ancient history 137 note Great numbers of children annually exposed there 197 note its situation 418 The high chronology claimed by the historians of 16 The great wall of when erected 419 Was twice conquered by the northern tribes 420

the Romans supplied with silk by the caravans from 668 is conquered by the Moguls 1167, 1170

Expulsion of the Moguls 1170

Chivalry origin of the order of 1075

Chindemir prince of the Alemanni taken prisoner by Julius at the battle of Strasburg 457

Chosroes king of Armenia assisted by the emissaries of Sapor king of Persia 107

Chosroes son of Iridates king of Armenia his character 266

Chosroes I king of Persia protects the last surviving philosophers of Athens, in his treaty with the emperor Justinian 633 Review of his history 720 Sells a peace to Justinian 702 His invasion of Syria 703 His negotiations with Justinian 703 His prosperity, 731 Battle of Meitene 745 His death 16

Chosroes II king of Persia is raised to the throne on the deposition of his father Hormizd 780 Is reduced to implore the assistance of the emperor Maurice 16 His restoration and policy 799 Conquers Syria 806 Palestine 16 Egypt and Asia Minor 807 His reign and magnificence 16 Rejects the Mahometan religion 808 Imposes an ignominious peace on the emperor

Ileracius 809 His flight, depollation and death, 814

Chosari, the horde of sent by the Turks to the assistance of the emperor Ileracius, 813

Christ the festival of his birth why fixed by the Romans at the winter solstice, 338 note

Christians primitive the various sects into which they branched out, 180 Ascribed the pagan idolatry to the agency of demons 16 Believed the end of the world to be near at hand 185 The miraculous powers ascribed to the primitive church 187 Their faith stronger than in modern times, 188 Their superior virtue and austerity 189 Repentance, a virtue in high esteem among them 16 Their notions of marriage and chastity, 191 Their disclaim war and government 16 Were active however in the internal government of their own society 192 Bishops 193 By monks 16 Metropolitans and primates 194 Bishop of Rome, 16 Their probable proportion to the pagan subjects of the empire before the conversion of Constantine the Great 202 26 inquiry into their persecutions, 20. Why more odious to the governing powers than the Jews, 206 Their religious meetings suspected 206 persecuted by Nero as the incendiaries of Rome 210 Institutions of the emperor Trajan to Pliny the younger for the regulation of his conduct towards them 214 Remuneration proposed to popular resentment on public festivities, 216 Legal mode of proceeding against them, 217 The ardour with which they courted martyrdom, 218 When allowed to erect places for public worship 221 Their persecution under Diocletian and his associates 225 An edict of toleration for them published by Galerius just before his death 230 Some considerations necessary to be attended to in reading the sufferings of the martyrs 231 Edict of Milan published by Constantine the Great 236 Political accommodations of the christian morality to Constantine 16 Theory and practice of passive obedience 293 Their loyalty and zeal 294 The sacrament of baptism how administered in early times 299 Extraordinary propagation of christianity after it obtained the imperial sanction, 299 300 Becomes the established religion of the Roman empire 300 Spiritual and temporal powers distinguished, 301 Itinerary of the episcopal order in the church 16 The ecclesiastical revenue of each diocese how divided 304 Their legislative assemblies 306 Edict of Constantine the Great against heretics 307 Mysterious doctrine of the Trinity, 310 The doctrines of the catholic church how discriminated from the opinions of the Platonist school, 311 General character of the christian sects 331 Christian schools prohibited by the emperor Julian 359 They are removed from all offices of trust 360 Are obliged to reinstate the pagan temples 16 Their imprudent and irregular zeal against idolatry 365

Christians distinction of into vulgar and ascetic, 60 Conversion of the barbarous nations 609

Christianity inquiry into the progress and establishment of 376 Religion and character of the Jews 377 The Jewish religion the basis of christianity 379 Is offered to all mankind, 16 The sects into which the christians divided, 180 The theology of reduced to a systematical form in the school of Alexandria 200 Injudicious conduct of its early advocates 204 Its persecutions 205 First erection of churches 201 The system of found in Plato a doctrine of the Logos 310 salutary effects resulting from the conversion of the barbarous nations 610

its progress in the North of Europe, 1031

Chrysanthus the eunuch engages Ithacius to assassinate his king Attila 564 Is put to death by the empress Pulcheria 565 Assisted in the second council of Ephesus, 896

Chrysostom, general of the revolted Paulicians overruns and pillages Asia Minor, 1015 His death 1016

Chrysostom Manuel the Greek envoy his character 1210 His alimination of Rome and Constantinople, 1213

Chrysostom battle of between Constantine the Great and Licinius 176

Chrysostom M, St his account of the pompous luxury of the emperor Arcadius 530 Protects his faithful patron the eunuch Euphrasius 531 His story of his promotion to the archiepiscopal see of Constantinople, 536 His character and administration 536 537 His persecution 538 His death 539 His relics removed in Constantinople 16 His encomium on the monastic life 604, note

Chreches, christian the first erection of 221 Demolition of under Diocletian 227 Splendour of under Constantine the Great 303 Seven of Asia the fate of 1193

Chrysis, battle of between Constantine the Great and Licinius 172

Cicero his view of the philosophical opinions as to the immortality of the soul, 184 His encomium on the study of the law, 754 System of his republic 758.

Cimmerian darkness, the expression of, whence derived 505 note

Circumcellions of Africa, Donatist schismatics history of their revolt 330 Their religious suicides 16 Persecution of by the emperor Honorius 548

Circumcision of both sexes a physical custom in Ethiopia unconnected with religion 814

Circus Roman the four factions in described 664 Constantinople and the eastern empire, distracted by these factions 16

Cities in the Roman empire enumerated, 19

Cities commercial, of Italy, rise and government of 847
Citizens of Rome, motive of Caracalla for extending, the privileges of to all the free inhabitants of the empire, 63 66 Political tendency of this grant 66
City, the birth of a new one, how celebrated by the Romans, 236, note
Civilians of Rome, origin of the profession, and the three periods in the history of 757 758.
Civitas the Batavian, his successful revolt against the Romans, 93
Claudian the poet and panegyrist of Stilicho, his works supply the deficiencies of history, 477
 Celebrates the murder of Ilfusus, 478 His death and character, 490, 500 His character of the eunuch Eutropius, 531
Claudius emperor, chosen by the praetorian guards, without the concurrence of the senate 29
Claudius, emperor, successor to Gallienus, his character and elevation to the throne 113
Claudian, minister of the emperor Commodus, his history, 36
Clement, Flavius, and his wife Domitilla, why distinguished as christian martyrs, 213
Clement III pope, and the emperor Henry III mutually confirm each other's sovereign character, 1046
Clement V pope transfers the holy see from Rome to Avignon, 1254
Clergy, when first distinguished from the laity, 185, 301
 - the ranks and numbers of, how multiplied, 303
 - Their property, 311 Their offences only cognizable by their own order 304 Valentinian's edict to restrain the avarice of 307
Clovis, the first of the Merovingian race of Kings of the Franks in Gaul 15 reign 568
Clovis, Albinus, governor of Britain, his steady fidelity during the revolutions at Rome, 43
 Declares himself against Julianus, 44
Clotilda niece of the king of Burgundy, is married to Clovis king of the Franks and converts her pagan husband, 621 Exhorts her husband to the Gothic war, 674
Clotaire, king of the Franks, his descent, and reign, 610
Clotarius his account of the objects of adoration among the ancient Germans 91, note
Cochineal, importance of the discovery of, in the art of dyeing 667, note
Code of Justinian, how formed, 760 New edition of, 763
Codices, how far admitted by the Roman law respecting testaments 771
Conanobis, in monkish history, described, 607
Conage, how regulated by the Roman emperors, 1248
Colchae, the modern Mingrelia, described, 725 Manners of the natives 726 Revolt of, from the Romans to the Persians and repentance, 728
 Colchian war in consequence 729
Coliseum, of the emperor Titus observations on, 1261 Exhibition of a bull feast in 1282
Collyridian heretics, an account of 911
Colomes Roman, how planted 15
Colonna, history of the Roman family of, 1256
Colossus of Rhodes, some account of, 952
Columns of Hercules, their situation 11
Comana, the rich temple of, suppressed and the revenues confiscated, by the emperors of the east 250 251
Combat, judicial, origin of, in the Salic laws, 609
 The laws of, according to the assize of Jerusalem, 1189 Apology for the practice of, 1144 note
Comets account of those which appeared in the reign of Justinian, 749
Commentarius his disgraceful warfare against the Avars 802
Commodus emperor, his education, character, and reign 34
Comneni, origin of the family of on the throne of Constantinople, 864 Its extinction, 1239
Conception immaculate of the Virgin Mary, the doctrine of from whence derived 912
Concubine, according to the Roman civil law, explained, 768
Conflagration general, ideas of the primitive christians concerning, 186
Conquest, the vanity of not so justifiable as the desire of spoil, 404 Is rather achieved by art than personal valour, 554
Conrad III emperor engages in the second crusade, 1091 His disastrous expedition, 1107 Conrad of Montferrat defends Tyre against Sala din 1100 Is assassinated 1102
Constance, treaty of, 898
Constant, the third son of Constantine the Great, is sent to govern the western provinces of the empire, 261 Division of the empire among him and his brothers on the death of their father, 265 Is invaded by his brother Constantine 268 Is killed, on the usurpation of Magnentius 260
 Sponsors the cause of Athanasius against his brother Constantius 392
Constant II emperor of Constantinople 848
Constantine princess grand-daughter of Constantine the Great, is carried by her mother to the camp of the usurper Procopius 302 Narrowly escapes falling into the hands of the Quadi, 412 Marries the emperor Gratian, 413
Constantine daughter of Constantine the Great and widow of Julianian places the diadem on the head of the general Valerian 269 Is married to Gallus, 274 Her character, 28
Constantina widow of the eastern emperor Maurice, the cruel fate of and her daughters 804
Constantine the Great, the several opinions as to the place of his birth 138 His history, 158 159 He is saluted emperor by the British legions on the death of his father, 159 Marries Faustina, the daughter of Maximian, 161 Puts Maximian to death 164 General review of his administration in Gaul, 165 Undertakes to deliver Rome from the tyranny of Maxentius, 166 Defeats Maxentius and enters Rome 168 His alliance with Licinius, 170 Defeats Licinius 172 Peace concluded with Licinius, 173 His laws 18 Chastises the Goths, 174 Second civil war with Licinius 18

 - motives which induced him to make Byzantium the capital of his empire, 233 Declares his determination to spring from divine command, 236 Despoils other cities of their ornaments to decorate his new capital, 237 Ceremony of dedicating his new city, 239 Form of civil and military administration established there, 240 Separates the evil from the military administration, 246 Corrupted military discipline, 25 His character 256 Account of his family, 257 His jealousy of his son Crispus, 258 Mysterious deaths of Crispus and Licinius, 259 His repentance and acts of atonement inquired into, 26 His sons and nephews, 260 Sends them to superintend the several provinces of the empire, 261 Assists the Sarmatians and provokes the Goths, 262 Reduces the Goths to peace 263 His death 264 Attempt to ascertain the date of his conversion to Christianity, 290 His pagan superstition 291 Protects the christians in Gaul 26 Publishes the edict of Milan, 292 Motives which recommended the christians to his favour, 26 Exhorts his subjects to embrace the christian profession, 294 His famous stand ard the Labarum described, 295 His celebrated vision previous to his battle with Maxentius, 296 Story of the miraculous cross in the air 297 His conversion accounted for, from natural and probable causes 26 His theological discourses, 298 His devotion and privileges 26 The delay of his baptism accounted for 299 Is commended as a saint by the Greeks, 26 His edict against heretics, 307 Favours the cause of Caecilian against Donatus, 308 His sensible letter to the bishop of Alexandria 316 How prevailed on to ratify the Nicene creed 317 His levity in religion, 26 Granted toleration to his pagan subjects 331 His reform of pagan abuses, 26 Was associated with the heathen deities after his death, by a decree of the senate 332 His discovery of the holy sepulchre, 356
Constantine, publication of his fictitious donation to the bishops of Rome 886 Fabulous interdiction of marriage with strangers ascribed to him, 1003
Constantine II the son of Constantine the Great, is sent to preside over Gaul, 261 Division of the empire among him and his brothers, on the death of their father, 265 Invades his brother Constans, and is killed, 268
Constantine III emperor of Constantinople, 847
Constantine IV Pogonatus, emperor of Constantinople 848
Constantine V Copronymus emperor of Constantinople, 854 Fries of his five sons, 853 Revolt of Artavasdes, and troubles on account of image worship 878 Abolishes the monkish order 879
Constantine VI emperor of Constantinople, 853
Constantine VII Porphyrogenitus emperor of Constantinople 860 His cautious valour and covering his secret of the Greek fire, 975 Account of his works 991 Their imperfections pointed out, 995 His account of the ceremonies of the Byzantine court 1003 Justifies the marriage of his son with the princess Bertha of France 26
Constantine VIII emperor of Constantinople 860
Constantine IX emperor of Constantinople 862
Constantine X Monomachus, emperor of Constantinople, 864
Constantine XI Ducas, emperor of Constantinople, 865
Constantine Palaeologus the last of the Greek emperors, his reign 1222
Constantine Syllanus, founder of the Paulicians, his death, 1014
Constantine a private soldier in Britain, elected emperor for the sake of his name, 405 He reduces Gaul and Spain, 490, 522 His reduction and death 523
Constantine general under Belisarius in Italy, his death, 707
Constantinople its situation described with the motives which induced Constantine the Great to make this city the capital of his empire, 233 Its local advantages, 235 Its extent 236 Progress of the work 237 Principal edifices, 238 How furnished with inhabitants 238 Privileges granted to it 239 Its dedication 238 Review of the new form of civil and military administration established there, 240 Is allotted to Constantine the younger in the division of the empire on the emperor's death, 265 Violent contests there between the rival bishops, Paul and Macedonius 278 Bloody enmities between the Athanasians and Arians on the removal of the body of Constantine, 329 Triumphant entry of the emperor Julian, 341 The senate of, allowed the same powers and honours as that at Rome 346 Arrival of Valens, as emperor of the East, 390 Revolt of Procopius 391
 - continued the principal seat of the Arian heresy during the reign of Constantius and Valens, 447 Is purged from Arianism by the emperor Theodosius, 445 Council of, 446 Is enriched by the bodies of saints and martyrs 470 Insurrection against Gaius and his Arian Gothic sons 538 Persecution of the archbishop St Chrysostom 538 Popular tumults on his account, 26 Earthquake there 557
 - the city and eastern empire distracted by the factions of the eunuchs 604 Foundation of the church of St Sophia 674 Other churches erected

there by Justinian, 675 Triumph of Belisarius over the Vandals, 694 State of the armies under the emperor Maurice 802 The armies and city revolt against him, 803 Deliverance of the city from the Persians and Avars, 812 Religious war about the Transjordan, 830
 - prospectus of the remaining history of the eastern empire 845 Summary review of the five dynasties of the Greek empire 871 Tumults in the city to oppose the destruction of images 878 Abolition of the monkish order by Constantine, 879 First siege of, by the Saracens 972 Second siege by the Saracens 973 Review of the provinces of the Greek empire in the tenth century 996 Riches of the city of Constantinople, 999 The imperial palace of, 26 Offices of state, 1001 Military character of the Greeks 1006 The name and character of Romans supported to the last 1010 Decline and revival of literature, 26 The city menaced by the Turks 1024 Account of the Varangians 1026 Naval expeditions of the Russians against the city 1027
 - origin of the separation of the Greek and Latin churches, 1107 Massacre of the Latins, 1110 Invasion of the Greek empire, and conquest of Constantinople by the crusaders, 1117 The city taken, and Isaac Angelus restored, 1119 Part of the city burnt by the Latins, 1120 Second siege of the city by the Latins 1121 Is pillaged, 1122 Account of the statues destroyed, 1124 Partition of the Greek empire by the French and Venetians, 1125 The Greeks rise against their Latin conquerors, 1129 The city retaken by the Greeks 1135 The suburb of Galata assigned to the Genoese 1161 Hostilities between the Genoese and the emperor, 1162 How the city escaped the Moguls, 1171 Is besieged by the sultan Amurath II 1192 Is conquered with Ilme 1213 Is besieged by Mahomet II sultan of the Turks 1228 Is stormed and taken, 1235 Be comes the capital of the Turkish empire, 1238
Constantine Chludus governor of Dalmatia, was intended to be adopted by the emperor Carus, in the room of his vicious son Carinus, 137 Is associated as Cæsar by Diocletian in his administration 141 Assumes the title of Augustus, on the abdication of Diocletian 157 His death, 159 Granted toleration to the christians, 228
Constantine the second son of Constantine the Great, his education 260 Is sent to govern the eastern provinces of the empire, 261 Seizes Constantinople on the death of his father, 264 Conspires the death of his kinsmen 261 Division of the empire among him and his brothers, 265 Restores Chosroes king of Armenia, 266 Battle of Singara with Sapor king of Persia, 266 He rejects the offers of Magnentius and Vetricano on the plea of a vision, 269 His oration to the Illyrian troops at the interview with Vetricano, 270 Defeats Magnentius at the battle of Mursa, 271 His councils governed by eunuchs, 273 Education of his cousins Gallus and Julian, 274 Disgrace and death of Gallus 276 Sends for Julian to court, 277 Invests him with the title of Cæsar, 278 Visits Rome, 279 Presents an obsequy to that city 280 The Quadian and Sarmatian wars 26 His Persian negotiations, 281 Mismatchment of affairs in the east, 281 Favours the Arians 318 His religious character by Ammonius the historian, 26 His restless endeavours to establish an uniformity of christian doctrine 26 Athanasius driven into exile by the council of Antioch, 321 Is intimidated by his brother Constans, and in viles Athanasius back again 322 His severe treatment of those bishops who refused to concur in deposing Athanasius 324 His scrupulous orthodoxy, 26 His cautious conduct in expelling Athanasius from Alexandria 225 His strenuous efforts to seize his person 26 Athanasius writes invectives to expose his character, 327 Is constrained to restore Valerius, bishop of Rome 328 Supports Macedonius bishop of Constantinople and countenances his persecutions of the catholics and Novatians 329 His conduct toward his pagan subjects, 332 Invites the fame of Julian, 333 Revalls the legions from Gaul, 334 Negotiations between him and Julian, 337 His preparations to oppose Julian, 340 His death and character, 341
Constantine general relieves the British emperor Constantine when besieged in Arles 527 His character and victories 26 His marriage with Placidia and death, 544 545
Constantius, secretary to Attila king of the Huns, his matrimonial negotiation at the court of Constantinople, 560
Consul, the office of, explained 26 Alterations in this office underwent under the emperors and when Constantinople became the seat of empire, 241 The office of suppressed by the emperor Justinian 683 Is now sunk to a commercial agent 1247
Contracts the Roman laws respecting, 772
Coptic of Egypt, brief history of, 841
Corinth reviving as a Roman colony, celebrates the Isthmian games, under the emperor Julian 346 The isthmus of, fortified by the emperor Justinian, 677
Corruption, reduction of, by the Saxons 697
Corrosive gold nature of those offerings to the Roman emperors 255
Corvinus, Mathias, king of Hungary, his character, 220
Cosmas Indicopleustes, account of his christian topography, 670, note, 837, note
Cosmo of Medias his character, 1212
Councils and synods of Antioch 321
 Arles, 323

Councils and synods of

Basil 1201
Cesarea, 370
Cathar., c. 61<sup>o</sup> 613 692
Chalcedon 538, 827
Clermont 1046
Constantine 1508 1701 1771
Constantinople 446 833, 831 877 1109
Ephesus 821 876
Gerard 1204
Florence 1204
Frankfort 888
Lyons 692 1134 1148
Milan 323
Nice 313 387
Pisa 1701
Piacenza 1067
Rimini 316
S. John, 372
Tolentino 617 635
Tyre 370

Count great difference between the ancient and modern application of this title 246 By whom first invented ib Of the sacred largesses under Constantine the Great his office, 250 Of the domestic in the eastern empire his office, 251

Courtenay history of the family of 1138

Crescentius consul of Rome his vicissitudes, and disgraceful death 897

Crete the island subdued by the Saracens 885

Crispian son of Constantine the Great is declared Caesar 173 Distinguishes his valor against the Franks and Alemanni 174 Forces the passage of the Hellespont and defeats the fleet in Lycia 175 His character, 248 His mysterious death, 250

Crispus the patrician marries the daughter of Plautus and contrives to depose him, 345 Is obliged to turn monk ib

Croatia account of the kingdom of 1070

Cross the different sentiments entertained of this in strictness of punishment by the Pagan and Christian Romans 295 The famous standard in the army of Constantine the Great, described ib

His visions of 296 297 The holy sepulchre and cross of Christ discovered 347 The cross of Christ undiminished by distribution to pilgrims ib

Crown of thorns, its transfer from Constantinople to Paris 1174

Crown mural and obelisk, the distinction between 375 note

Crusade the first resolved on at the council of Clermont 1068 Inquiry into the justice of the holy war 1069 Examination into the private motives of the crusaders, 1071 Departure of the crusaders 1072 Account of the chiefs 1073

Their march to Constantinople 1076 Review of their numbers 1079 They take Nice 1080 Battle of Dorylaeum, ib They take Antioch 1082 Their distresses 1083 Are relieved by the discovery of the holy lance, 1084 Sieges and conquest of Jerusalem 1090 Confines not Rouillon chosen king of Jerusalem 1087 The second crusade 1091 The crusaders ill treated by the Greek emperors 1093 The third crusade 1100

Siege of Acre 1101 Fourth and fifth crusades ib Sixth crusade, 1105 Seventh crusade 1106 Recapitulation of the fourth crusade 1114 General consequences of the crusades 1136

Cresphont the city plundered by the Romans 875 Its situation described 375 Julian declares the siege of that city 377 Is sacked by the Saracens 938

Cubla emperor of China his character, 1170

Cyropalata his office under the Greek emperors, 1001

Customs duties of imposed by Augustus 61

Cycle of indictments the origin of, traced and how now employed 27 note

Cyprian bishop of Carthage his history and martyrdom 216

Cyprus the kin dom of, bestowed on the house of Ius, on, by Richard I of England 1111

Cyrene, the Greek colonies there finally exterminated by Chosroes I king of Persia 807

Cyrindes an obscure fugitive is set up by Sapor the Persian monarch as emperor of Rome 1011

Cyril bishop of Jerusalem his pompous relation of a miraculous appearance of a celestial cross 1049 His unpolished character, 357

Cyril patriarch of Alexandria his life and character, 820 t on omens the heresy of Nestorius 823 Procures the intercession of the council of Ephesus against Nestorius ib His court intrigues 805

Cyicut, how it escaped destruction from the Goths 106 Is at length ruined by them 106 The island and city of, seized by the usurper Procopius 391

D

Dacia, conquest of by the emperor Trajan 3 Its situation 31 Is overrun by the Goths, 98 Is resigned to them by Aurelian 117

Dama supposed to be the authors and objects of ib in idolatry by the primitive Christians 11

Damascus general of the emperor Justinian 3 Its situation 31 Is overrun by the Goths, 98 Is resigned to them by Aurelian 117

Damian archbishop of Pisa, installed patriarch of Jerusalem 1087

Dalmatia described 9 Produce of silver mine there 61 note

Dalmatian nephew of Constantine the Great is created Caesar 290 Is sent to govern the Gothic frontier 261 Is cruelly destroyed by Constantius 261

Damascus siege of by the Saracens, 942 The city reduced both by storm and by treaty, 943

Hermarks no longer suffered of this siege 945, note taken and destroyed by Lamerianus 1181

Damian bishop of Rome edict of Valentinian addressed to him, to restrain the cratty voice of the Roman clergy 307 His bloody contest with Ursinus for the episcopal dignity 308

Dames the Arab his gallant enterprise against the castle of Aleppo, 950

Damietta is taken by Louis IX. of France 1105

Damophilus archbishop of Constantinople, resigns his see, rather than subscribe the Nicene creed, 44

Dand, Henry, doge of Venice his character, 1113 Is made despot of Imanli, 1116

Daniel first bishop of Winchester his instructions to St Boniface for the conversion of infidels, 610

Daniels a Grecian matron her presents to the emperor Basil 938 Her visit to him at Constantinople 1009 Her testament ib

Danube course of the river and the provinces of, described 9

Daphne, the sacred grove and temple of at Antioch, described 361 Is converted to christian purposes by Gallus and restored to the Pagan by Julian ib The temple burnt 362

Dara, the fortification of by Justinian described 680 The demolition of, by the Persians prevented by peace 722 Is taken by Chosroes king of Persia 710

Darius his scheme for connecting the continents of Europe and Asia 211

Darkness preternatural at the time of the passion is unnoticed by the heathen philosophers and historians 704

De la garde the Persian royal seat of, plundered by the emperor Julian 311

Dattanis governor of Spain yields ready obedience to the imperial edicts against the christians 231

Datus bishop of Milan, instigates the revolt of the Ligurians to Justinian 705 Escapes to Constantinople on the taking of Milan by the Burgundians, 708

Debtors insolent cruel punishment of by the law of the twelve tables 774

Decemvir review of the laws of the twelve tables 751 Their laws suspended by the perpetual edict, 762 See 762

Decius his exaltation to the empire 95 Was a persecutor of the christians 222

Decurions in the Roman empire, are severely treated by the imperial laws, 203

Defecation of the Roman emperors how this species of idolatry was introduced, 21

Delators are encouraged by the emperor Commodus, to gratify his lust of the senate 35 Are suppressed by Pertinax 40

Delphi the sacred ornaments of the temple of Apollo at Constantinople by Constantine the Great 238 note

Democracy a form of government unfavourable to freedom in a large state 14

Demosthenes governor of Cesarea his gallant defence against and heroic escape from Sapor king of Persia 108

Dengratius bishop of Carthage humbly sends the captives from him to him by Genesius king of the Vandals 681

Dennis the Saracen his character 913

Denderius the king of the Lombards conquered by Charlemagne 834

Despot, nature of that title in the Greek empire, 1001

Despotism originates in superstition 19 note

Diadem assumed by Diocletian what 15<sup>o</sup>

Diamonds the art of cutting them unknown to the ancients 65 note

Didius Julianus purchases the imperial dignity at a public auction 43

Dignities of the Roman empire their number and government 214

Diocletian, the manner of his military election to the empire, 133 His third and character ib

Takes Maximian for his colleague 140 Associates as Cæsars Galerius, and Constantius Chlorus 141 His triumph in conjunction with Maximian 150 Takes his court at the city of Nicomedia 151 Abolishes the empire 151

Parallels between him and the emperor Charles V. Passes his retirement at Salona 155 His imperial behaviour toward the christians 223 Causes that produced the persecution of the christians under his reign, 224

Dion Cassius the historian screamed from the fury of the soldiers, by the emperor Alexander Severus 69

Diocletian patriarch of Alexandria his outrageous behaviour at the second council of Ephesus 876 Is deposed by the council of Chalcedon 874

Disasters great clan of the Turks his reception of the ambassadors of tustman 719

Divorce the liberty and abuse of by the Roman laws 166 Limitations of 767

Doctes their peculiar tenets 310 617 Derivation of their name 310 note

Domine St Loricatus his tortitude in flagellation 1070

Domitian when this epithet was applied to the Roman emperors 122

Domitian emperor his treatment of his kinsmen Flavius Sabinus and Flavius Clemens 213

Domitian the oriental prefect is sent by the emperor Constantius to return the state of the east then oppressed by Calvus 275 Is put to death there ib

Dynastus, his contest with Cæcilian for the see of Carthage, 33 History of the schism of the Donatists, ib 330 Persecution of the Donatists by the emperor Honorius 515.

Dorylaeum, battle of, between sultan Soliman and the first crusaders 1063

Doxology how introduced into the church service, and how perverted 37

Dramatic representations at Rome, a character of, 504

Dreams the popular opinion of the preternatural origin, favourable to that of Constantine previous to his battle with Maxentius 206

Dreaded extraordinary speed of this animal, 122 note

Dromæus of the Greek empire, described, 1005

Druis their power in Gaul expressed by the emperors Iulianus and Claudius 14

Druis of mount Libanus, a character of, 1065, note

Duke derivation of that title, and great change in the modern from the ancient application of it, 246

Durazzo siege of, by Robert Guiscard 1042

Little of between him and the Greek emperor Alexius, 1014

E

Earthquake an extraordinary one over the part of the Roman empire 414 Account of ib

East India, the Roman commercial intercourse with that region 22 Commodities of, raised by Alexander Severus, 65

Ebionites account of that sect, 180

A contumacious of their errors, supposed by the primitive fathers to be a particular subject in the writings of St John the evangelist 310

- their ideas of the person of Jesus Christ, 816

Ecclesiastes the book of why not likely to be the production of king Solomon 694, note

Ecclesiastical and civil powers distinguished, by the fathers of the christian church 311

Ecdicius son of the emperor Avitus, his gallant conduct in Gaul 311

Ecdicius of the emperor Heraclius 831

Edda of Iceland the system of mythology in 96

Edoon is sent from Attila king of the Huns, as his ambassador to the emperor Theodosius the younger 501 Envoies in a proposal to assassinate Attila, 501 This son Odoacer the first barbarian king of Italy, 506

Edezza the purest dialect of the Syriac language spoken there 63 note The property of the christians there confiscated by the emperor Julian, for the disorderly conduct of the Arians, 363 Revolt of the Roman troops there 802

Account of the school of 836 History of the famous miracle there 876 The city and principality of seized by Baldwin the crusader, 1081 Is retaken by Zengi 1096 The councils of 1181

Edict of Milan, published by Constantine the Great, 313

Edicts of the praetors of Rome under the republic, their nature and tenacity 755

Edom why that name was applied to the Roman empire by the Jews 206 note

Edrisier, the Saracen dynasty of, 991

Edward I of England, his crusade to the Holy Land 1106

Egidius his character and revolt in Gaul 589

Egypt, general description of 10 The superstitious with which tolerated at Rome 13 Amount of its revenues, 64 Public works executed there by Probus 131 Conflict of Diocletian there, 145 Progress of christianity there, 200 edict of the emperor Valens to restrain the number of recluse monks there 397

- the worship of Serapis how introduced there 466 His temple, and the Alexandrian library destroyed by bishop Theophilus, 467

Origin of monastic institutions in 67<sup>o</sup>

- the great number of monks furnished by, for the end of Constantinople in the time of Justinian, 667 Ecclesiastical history of, 841

- conquered by the Saracens 453 Capture of Alexandria 955 Administration of, 957 Description of by Amrou ib

The Egyptians take Jerusalem from the Turks 1085 Egypt conquered by the Turks 1096 Government of the Mamelukes there, 1106

Diagabazus is declared emperor by the troops at Lyons 67 Was the first Itoman who wore garments of pure silk, 668

Elephants inquiry into the number of brought into the held by the ancient primers of the east 83 note With what view introduced in the circus at Rome in the first Punic war, 17

Eleusinian mysteries why tolerated by the emperor Valentinian 396

Emigration of the ancient northern nations the nature and motives of examined 84

Emperors of Rome, a review of their constitutions 755 Their legislative power 756 Their rescripts ib

- of Germany their limited powers 899

Officers of the palace state and army 1001

Adoration of the emperor made of 1062 Their public appearance ib Their despotic power 1004 Their navy, 1005 They retain the name of Romans to the last 1010

Empire Roman division of into the East and West empires by Valentinian 390 Extinction of the western empire 590

Encampment, Itom in described 7

Ennodius the servile flatterer of Theodoric the Ostroth king of Italy is made bishop of Iavia 649, note

Egegnathus, leader of the innumerable praetorians, who

GENERAL INDEX

murdered their prefect Ulpius punished by the emperor Alexander Severus 62
Lepidus, the famous temple of Diana at, destroyed by the Goths, 106 Council of, 873 Episcopal riots there 16
Lucian, his legacy to his philosophical disciples at Athens 682
Lycus disports on the dismemberment of the Greek empire 1128
Maximus master general of the Illyrian frontier, is defeated by the Armatians 419
Maximus his merit as a reformer 1019
Maximian, their distinguishing tenets and practices, 800
Maximian, a knotty subject to the first reformers 1018
Maximian duke of Aquitaine repels the first Saracen invasion of France 976 Implores the aid of Charles Martel, 977 Recovers his dukedom, 978
Maximian her birth, character and marriage with the emperor Theodosius the Younger, 512 Her life, race and death 513
Maximian her marriage with the emperor Arcadius, 476 Stimulates him to give up his favourite Maximian 534 Persecutes St Chrysostom 538 Her death and character, 539
Maximian the daughter of Theodosius the younger, is betrothed to the young emperor Valentinian III at the west 516 Her character, 518 Is married to the emperor Maximus 580 Invites the emperor king of the Vandals to Italy 16
Maximian, bishop of Constantinople, baptizes the emperor Valens 306
Maximian, the rhetorician, is made emperor of the west by Arbogastes the Frank, 459 Is defeated and killed by Theodosius 101
Maximian IV pope his contest with the council of Jerusalem 1601 Procures a re union of the Latin and Greek churches 1206 Forms a league against the Turks 1716 Revolt of the Roman citizens against him, 1722
Maximian the orator's account of 157 note
Maximian the sophist his character of monks, and of the objects of their worship, 470
Maximian punishment of, by the edict of the emperor Theodosius against heretics 417
Maximian, enumerated in the list of eastern common dities imported and taxed in the time of Alexander Severus 65 They infest the palace of the third Gordian 76
 - their ascendancy in the court of Constantius 273 Why they favoured the Arians, 318 note Procure the banishment of Liberius bishop of Rome 327
 - a conspiracy of, to disappoint the schemes of Rufinus, and marry the emperor Arcadius to Eudoxia, 175 They distract the court of the emperor Theodosius 512, 513 And govern that of Arcadius 510 Scheme of Chrysaphius to assassinate Attilla king of the Huns 561
 - the bishop of Sees and his whole chapter castrated 1244, note
Maximian, king of the Visigoths in Gaul, his conquests in Spain, 591 Is vested with all the Roman conquests beyond the Alps by Odoacer king of Italy, 618
Maximian, evidences that the climate of, was much colder in ancient than in modern times, 85 This alteration accounted for 86
 - final division of, between the western and eastern empires 473 Is ravaged by Attila king of the Huns, 547 Is now one great republic, 613
Maximian empress wife of Constantius her steady friendship to Julian 277 Is accused of arts to deprive Julian of children, 278
Maximian his character of the followers of Artemidor, 203 His own character 231 His story of the miraculous appearance of the cross in the sky to Constantine the Great 297
Maximian the eunuch great chamberlain to the emperor Arcadius conceals his marriage with Eudoxia, in opposition to the views of Rufinus 475 Succeeds Rufinus in the emperor's confidence 471 His character and administration, 531 Provides for his own security, in a new law against treason 532 Takes sanctuary with St Chrysostom, 534 His death 535
Maximian his opinion on the subject of the incarnation supported by the second council at Ephesus 876 And adhered to by the Armenians 810
Maximian description of the vessels used in navigation, 101
Maximian the cross, origin of the annual festival of 815
Maximian under the Greek empire, the office and rank of 834 Of Ravenna the government of Italy settled in and administered by 745 783
Maximian duties imposed by Augustus 65
Maximian communication from Christ in communion, the origin of, 107 305
Maximian voluntary under accusation and conscious guilt its advantages among the Romans, 778

F

Faith and its operations defined 169
Falcidius, Illyro character of his Historia Sicula, 101 note His mention on the transfer of the sovereignty of the island to the emperor Henry VI 1056
Fathers of the Christian church cause of their austere morality 100
Faustina empress wife of Constantine the Great causes of her being put to death 261
Faustina wife of Marcus Antoninus her character, 13
Faustina the widow of the emperor Constantinus countermands the revolt of Procopius against the emperor Valens 342

Festivals, pagan, great offence taken at, by the primitive Christians, 183
Festivals, government, the rudiments of, to be found among the Egyptians, 418
Figures, the numerical occasion of their first public and familiar use 973
Finances of the Roman empire when the seat of it was removed to Constantinople reviewed, 252
Finis, his questionable history, whether to be connected with the invasion of Caledonia by the emperor Severus, 52
Fire Greek, the Saracen fleet destroyed by in the harbour of Constantinople, 974 Is long preserved as a secret, 975 Its effects not to be compared with gunpowder, 1000
Firmus an Egyptian merchant, his revolt against the emperor Aurelian 123
Firmus the Moor, history of his revolt against the emperor Valentinian 405
Flagellation its efficacy in penance, and how proportioned, 1070
Flamines, Roman, their number, and peculiar office 462
Flavianian way its course described, 742 note
Flavian archbishop of Constantinople, is killed at the second council of Ephesus 876, 887
Fleece, golden, probable origin of the fable of, 76
Florence, the foundation of that city, 492 note Is besieged by Hadrianus, and relieved by Stilicho, 16
Florentinus, praetorian prefect of Gaul under Constantius his character 339 341 Is condemned by the tribunal of Chalcedon, but suffered to escape by Julian, 344
Florianus, brother of the emperor Tacitus his eager usurpation of the imperial dignity, 129
Felix is consecrated bishop of Rome to supersede Liberius, who was exiled 325 He is violently expelled, and his adherents slaughtered, 16
Felix, an African bishop his inactivity, 607
Fornication, a doubtful plea for divorce, by gospel authority, 761, note
France modern computation of the number of its inhabitants, and the average of their taxation, 251
 - the name of whence derived, 631 Derivation of the French language, 633, note
 - Childeric deposed and Pepin appointed king, by papal sanction 884 Henry and character of Charlemagne, 890 Invasion of, by the Saracens, 976
Frangipani Censio his profane violation of the persons of pope Gelasius II and his college of cardinals, 1244 Derivation of his family name, 1256
Franks, their origin and confederacy, 101 They invade Gaul and ravage Spain 102 They pass over into Africa, 16 Hold and successful return of a colony of, from the sea of Pontus, by sea, 133
 - they overrun and establish themselves at Alexandria in Germany 284
 - their fidelity to the Roman government 494 Origin of the Merovingian race of their kings 568 How converted to Christianity 610 Reign of their king Clovis, 619 Final establishment of the French monarchy in Gaul, 626
 - their laws 627 Give the name of France to their conquests in Gaul 631 They degenerate into a state of anarchy 634
 - they invade Italy 708 744
 - their military character 1008
Frankia the Goth his character and deadly quarrel with his country in Pruthi, 439 His operations against Gaisas 535
Frederic I emperor of Germany, his tyranny in Italy 898 Engages in the third crusade, 1092 His disastrous expedition, 1093 1094 1100 sacrifices Arnold of Brescia to the pope 1246 His reply to the Roman ambassadors, 1251
Frederic II is driven out of Italy, 698 His disputes with the pope and reluctant crusade 1104 Exhorts the European princes to unite in opposition to the Tartars, 1169
Frederic III the last emperor crowned at Rome, 1572
Freemen of Laconia account of, 907
Fritigern, the Gothic chief extricates himself from the hands of Lupicinus, governor of Thiacia, 496 Defeats him, 16 Battle of Salices 428 His strength negotiated by the accession of new tribes, 16 Negotiates with Valens 430 Hatred of Hadrianople, 431 The union of the Gothic tribes broken by his death 436
Freemen among the Romans, their rank in society 764
Frontinus was the first Christian missionary in Abyssinia 300
Fulk of Denbigh, his ardour in preaching the fourth crusade, 1112

G

Gabinus, king of the Quadi is treacherously murdered by Marcellinus governor of Valeria 411
Gallard M character of his Historie de Charlemagne, 890, note
Gaisas the Goth is commissioned by Stilicho to execute his revenge on Rufinus prefect of the east 478 His conduct in the war against the revolter Tribigild, 534 Joins him, 535 His flight and death 536
Gala probable derivation of the term 1002 note
Calato the suburb of Constantinople, assigned to the Genoese 1161
Galernus is associated in the administration as Censor by the emperor Diocletian 141 Is defeated by the Persians 147 Surprises and overthrows Narses 148 Assumes the title of Augustus on the abdication of Diocletian 157 His jealousy of Constantine 159 Deems it prudent to acknowledge him Censor, 167 His unsuccessful invasion of Italy, 161 Invests Licinius with the purple on the death of Severus 163 His death 164 From which cause is entertained an aversion to the Christians, 221 Obtains the countenance of Diocletian for persecuting them 225 Publishes an edict of toleration just before his death 230

Gallienus, two-fold application of that name in the infancy of Christianity, 212 Why the emperor Valrian applied this name to the Christians 349
Gallienus son of the emperor Valerian, is associated by him in the imperial throne, 101 Prohibits the senators from exercising military employments 101 Character of his administration after the captivity of his father, 109 Names Claudius for his successor, 113 Favoured the Christians 222
Galleys of the Greek empire described, 1005
Gallus elected emperor on the minority of Hostilianus the son of Diocletian, 100
Gallus nephew of Constantine the Great, his education, 274 Is invested with the title of Censor, 16 His cruelty and imprudence, 16 His disgrace and death 276 Embraced the doctrine but neglected the precepts of Christianity, 318 Converts the province of Bithynia, at Autocli, to a Christian burial place, 361
Games, public of the Romans described 77 508 Account of the factions of the circus, 601
Ganges, source of that river, 1182, note
Genadius, the notary is condemned to death under the emperor Julian, 344
Gaul, the province of, described, 8 The power of the Druids suppressed there by Liberius and Claudius 13 Cities in 20 Amount of the tribute paid by that province to Rome, 61 Is detested against the Franks by Posthumus, 102 Succession of usurpers there 110 Invasion of by the Germans, 131 Revolt of the Paganus suppressed by Maximian, 141 Progress of Christianity there, 201
 - proportion of the capitation tax levied there by the Roman emperors, 251 Is invaded by the Germans 284 The government of assigned to Julian, 285 His civil administration, 286 Is invaded by the Alemanni under the emperor Valentinian, 399 And under Cratian 429
 - destruction of idols and temples there, by Martin bishop of Tours 465 Is overrun by the barbarous troops of Hadrianus, after his defeat by Stilicho, 494 Is settled by the Goths, Burgundians, and Franks 527 Assembly of the seven provinces in, 529 Reign of Theodoric king of the Visigoths in, 567 Origin of the Merovingian race of kings of the Franks in 568 Invasion of by Attila king of the Huns 570 Battle of Chalons 571 Revolutions of, on the death of the emperor Majorian 591 Conversion of, to Christianity by the Franks, 615 Representation of the advantages it enjoyed under the Roman government 618 Conquests and prosperity of Loric king of the Visigoths, 16 Character and reign of Clovis 619 The Alemanni conquered 620 Submission of the Armenians and the Roman troops, 622 Final establishment of the French monarchy in Gaul 626 History of the Salic laws 627 The lands of, how claimed and divided by the barbarian conquerors of, 629 Domain and heritages of the Merovingian princes 630 Usurpation of the Germans, 16 Privileges of the Romans in 633
Gedrosia, revolutions of the sea-coast of, 82, note
Gelatian era of the Turks when settled, 1761
Gelasius, pope his zeal against the celebration of the feast of Lupercalia, 592 Deplores the miserable decay of Italy 601
Gelasius I pope, his rough treatment by Censio Frangipani 1244
Gelimet deposes Childeric the Vandal king of Africa and usurps the government, 684 Is defeated by Belisarius 689 His final death 691 His distressful flight, 693 Surrenders himself to Belisarius 16 Graces his triumph, 694 His peaceful retirement, 16
General of the Roman army, his extensive power, 25
Generosity, Arabian striking instances of 906
Genadius the monk, his denunciation against a Greek union with the Latin church 1229
Genetius, the Roman general, under the emperor Honorius his character 512
Genoise their mercantile establishment in the suburb of Pera at Constantinople, 1161 Their war with the emperor Constantine 1162
Genosic king of the Vandals in Spain, his character 517 Gots over to Africa on the invitation of count Boniface, 16 His successes there by the assistance of the Donatists 518 Invasion of Africa by his troops 519 Besieges Boniface in Hippo Regius, 541 His treacherous surprise of Carthage, 551 Strengthens himself by an alliance with Attila king of the Huns 556 His brutal treatment of his son's wife daughter of Theodoric, 561 Uses a naval force and invades Italy 579 His sack of Rome 580 Destroys the fleet of Majorian 588 His naval depredations on Italy 589 His claims on the eastern empire 590 Destroys the Roman fleet under Basiliscus 591 Was an Arian, and persecuted his catholic subjects 612
Genitimus etymology of the term 1075 note
Geoponics of the emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus account of 905
George of Cappadocia supercedes Athanasius in the see of Alexandria 325 His scandalous history, and tragical death 362 Becomes the tutelary saint of England 363
Gepids, their encroachments on the eastern empire checked by the Lombards, 714 Are reduced by them 781
Germanus, nephew of the emperor Justinian his character and promotion to the command of the army sent to Italy 740 741 His death 741

Germany the rude institutions of that country the original principles of European laws and manners 85 Its ancient extent 18 How peopled 86 The natives unacquainted with letters in the time of Augustus 87 How peopled 89 State of liberty among them 18 Authority of their magistrates 91 Conjugal faith and chastity 18 Their religion 91 Arms and discipline 93 Their feuds, 91 General idea of the German tribes 18 Probus carries the Roman arms into Germany 137 A frontier wall built by Probus from the Rhine to the Danube 18

invasions of Gaul by the Germans, 234 397

state of under the emperor Charlemagne 897 The imperial crown established in the name and nation of Germany, by the first Otto 894 Division of among independent princes 898 Formation of the Germanic constitution 899 State assumed by the emperor 900

Germanus count sets up Maximus as emperor in Spain and loses his life in the attempt, 523

Geta and Caracalla sons of the emperor Severus their fixed antipathy to each other 51

Gildo the Moor his revolt in Africa 47 His defeat and death 481

Gladiators desperate enterprise and fate of a party of reserved for the triumph of Probus, 131 The combats of abolished by the emperor Honorius 483

Glycerius is first emperor of Rome and then bishop of Salona 577 Murders Julius Nepos and is made archbishop of Milan, 598

Gnatus, character and account of the sect of, 181 Principal sects into which they divided, 189 Their peculiar tenets 710 818.

Godfrey of Poulillon his character and engagement in the first crusade 1073 His route to Constantinople 1076 1077 Is elected king of Jerusalem 1087 Compiles the Assise of Jerusalem, 1089 Form of his administration 18

Gog and Magog, the famous rampart of described 68

Goths wife of Leo build king of Spain her pious cruelty to the princess Ingundis 616

Gold of affliction the tax so denominated in the eastern empire abolished by the emperor Anastasius 676

Goldn horn why the Porphyrus obtained this appellation in remotest antiquity 234

Gordianus proconsul of Africa his character and elevation to the empire of Rome 70 His son associated with him in the imperial dignity 18

Gordian the third and youngest declared Caesar, 73 Is declared emperor by the army on the murder of Maximus and Balbus 75 76

Goths of Scandinavia their origin 95 Their religion 96 The Goths and Vandals supposed to be originally one great people 97 Their emigrations to Prussia and the Ukraine, 18 They invade the Roman provinces 98 They receive tribute from the Romans 100 They subdue the Bosphorus 104 Plunder the cities of Bithynia 105 They ravage Crete 106 Conclude a treaty with the emperor Aurelian 117 They ravage Illyrium and are chastised by Constantine the Great 134

their war with the Sarmatians 269 Are again routed by Constantine 18 Gnuic war under the emperors Valentinian and Valens 410 Are defeated by the Huns 492 They employ the protection of the emperor Valens 424 They are received into the empire 18 They are oppressed by the Roman governors of Thrace 425 Are provoked to hostilities and defeat Lupicinus 426 They ravage Thrace 427 Battle of Salices 428 They are strengthened by fresh swarms of their countrymen 18 Battle of Hadrianople 431 Scour the country from Hadrianople to Constantinople 432 Massacre of the Gothic youth in Asia 433 Their formidable union broken by the death of Intar, 436 Death and funeral of Athanasius, 437 Invasion and defeat of the Ostrogoths 18 Are settled in Thrace by Theodosius, 438 Their hostile sentiments 441

re-volt of under Honorius 482 They ravage Greece under the command of Alaric, 483 They invade Italy 486 The sack of Rome by 512 Death of Alaric 519 The return of Wallia in Spain 576 They are settled in Aquitaine 18 See Gaul and Theodoric Conquest of the Visigoths in Gaul and Spain 594 How the Goths were converted to the Christian religion 609 616 reign of Theodoric king of the Ostrogoths 615 The Goths in Italy extinguished 746

Governments civil the origin of 89

Governors of provinces under the emperors their great power and influence 646

Gratian was the first emperor who refused the pontifical robe 339 note Marries the princess Constantia and succeeds to the empire 413 Defeats the Alemanni in Gaul 420 Invests Theodosius with the empire of the east 434 his character and conduct 439 His flight from Maximus and death 441 Overthrow the ecclesiastical establishment of paganism 463

Greece is ravaged by the Goths 106 Is overrun by Alaric the Goth 483 Is reduced by the Turks 1940

Greek church, origin of the schism of, 1107 1206 1214

Greek empire See Constantinople

why averse to the Roman language and 15 The Greek becomes a scientific among the Romans 16 Character of the Greek language of Constantinople, 1207 When first taught in Italy 1210

Greek learning revival of in Italy, 1208

Gregory the Great, pope his pious presents to Peter king of Spain 617 Exhorts Theodelmuth queen of the Lombards to propagate the Christian faith, 18 His earnest to the venerable buildings and learning of Rome 791 His birth and early profession 792 His elevation to the pontificate 18 Sends a mission to convert the Britons 793 Sanctifies the usurpation of the emperor Phocas 801

Gregory II pope his epistles to Leo III emperor of Constantinople 879 Revolts against the Greek emperor 889

Gregory VII pope, his ambitious schemes 896 His contest with the emperor Henry III 1045 His retreat to Salerno 1046 1044

Gregory prefect of Africa history of him and his daughter 958

Gregory Nazianzen his lamentation on the discord among Christians 331 Lays the memory of the emperor Julian with invective 348 Censures Constantius for having purified his life 351 note is presented in the wretched case of Sima by his friend archbishop Basil 444 His mission to Constantinople 18 Is placed on the archiepiscopal throne by Theodosius, 445 His reign and character 447

Grumbates king of the Comnites attends Sapor king of Persia in his invasion of Mesopotamia 262 Leo is taken at the siege of Amid, 18 Returns home in grief 283

Guardianship how tested and exercised according to the Roman civil laws 768

Guba king of Colchis his alliance with Chosroes king of Persia 788 Returns to his former connexion with the emperor Justinian, 18 Is treacherously killed 730

Guelphs and Ghibelines the parties of in Italy 893 1268

Guilt the degrees of, in the penal laws of the Romans 775

Guiscard Robert his birth and character 1038 Acquires the dukedom of Apulia 1059 His Italian conquests 18 Desires Barazza 1048 Defeats the Greek emperor Alexius there 1044 Engages in the cause of pope Gregory VII 1046 His second expedition to Crete and death 18

Gundobald king of the Burgundians is reduced by Clovis king of the Franks 673 His mode of justifying the judicial combat 679

Gunsperder the invention and use of 1104

Guy of Lusignan king of Jerusalem his character 1099 Is detected and taken prisoner by Saladin 18

Gyarus a small island in the Aegean sea, an instance of its poverty, 61

II

Hadrian emperor, relinquishes the eastern conquests of Trajan 3 Their characters compared 18 His character contrasted with that of Antoninus Pius 18 His several adoptions of successors 30 Founders the city of Aelia Capitolina on Mount Sion 180 reforms the laws of Rome in the perpetual edict 755

Hadrianople, battle of between Constantine the Great and Licinius 175 Is ineffectually besieged by Frithiger the Goth 477 Battle of between the emperor Valens and the Goths 431

Hakem caliph of the Saracens assumes a divine character to supplant the Monothelite faith, 1063

Hamadani the Saracen dynasty of in Mesopotamia 921

Hannibal, review of the state of Rome when he besieged that city 502

Hannibaldianus nephew of Constantine the Great is distinguished with the title of king 260 Provinces assigned to him for a grandson 261 Is cruelly destroyed by Constantius 261

Happiness instance how little it depends on power and magnificence 681

Harmatan the Persian satrap his interview with the caliph Omar 939

Harpies an ancient mythologic history Le Clerc's conjecture concerning 231 note

Haras al Ishadid caliph his friendly correspondence with the emperor Charlemagne 892 His wars with the Greek empire 984

Hastan the Saracen conquers Carthage 961

Hacking the art and sport of introduced into Italy by the Lombards 789

Hegira the era of how fixed 918

Helena the mother of Constantine her parentage ascertained, 158 Was converted to Christianity by her son 291 note

Helena sister of the emperor Constantius married to Julian 277 Is reported to be deprived of children by the arts of the empress Eusebia 278 Her death 257

Helipolus taken by the Saracens 947

Hell according to Mahomet described 916

Hellespont described 231

Helvetia amount of its population in the time of Caesar 89 note

Hengist his arrival in Britain with successors for Northern against the Caledonians 636 His establishment in Kent, 636 657

Henricus of the emperor Zeno character of 829

Henry succeeds his brother Baldwin as emperor of Constantinople 1130 His character and administration 1131

Henry III emperor his contest with pope Gregory VII 1045 Takes Rome and sets up pope Clement III 1046

Henry VI emperor conquers and pillages the island of Sicily 1052

Henry the Fowler, emperor of Germany, defeats the Turkish invader 1024

Hepharich Saxon establishment of, in Britain 637 Review of the state of 639

Heracleum count of Africa, retains that province in obedience to Honorius 514 His cruel usage of the refugees from the sack of Rome by Alaric, 518 His revolt and death 522

Heracleonas emperor of Constantinople 847

Heracleus deposes the eastern usurper Phocas and is chosen emperor 805 Conquests of Chosroes II king of Persia 806 His distressful situation 808 Accepts an ignominious peace from Chosroes 809 His first expedition against the Persians 18 His second Persian expedition 810 Strengthens himself by an alliance with the Turks 813 His third Persian expedition, 18 His treaty of peace with Persia 815 His triumph and pilgrimage to Jerusalem, 18 His theological inquiries 833 831

Heracleus marries his niece Martina 847 Leaves his two sons joint successors in the empire 18 Invasion of his provinces by the Saracens 848 Flies from Syria 851

Heracleus the prefect his expedition against the Vandals in Africa 692

Heracleus the eunuch instigates the emperor Valentinian III to the murder of the patrician Eutimius 577 His death 578

Heset I character of his Bibliothèque Orientale, 974 note

Hesperian forest the extent of, unknown in the time of Caesar 26 note

Heresy in religion the origin of traced, 181 Edict of Constantine the Great against 307

Hermanric king of the Ostrogoths, his conquests, 409 His death 423

Hermeneid prince of Pontica, his marriage with Licinius princess of Austrasia and conversion to the Nicene faith 616 Revolt and death 18

Hermus of the east their mortified course of life 624 Miracles performed by them and their relics 18

Hermopolis the Paphian resists the Romans in compiling their twelve tables of laws 753

Hermopolis master-general of the cavalry, is killed in the attempt to banish Paul bishop of Constantinople 378

Hero and Leander the story of, by whom converted and defended 235 note

Heredian his life of Alexander Severus why preferable to that in the Augustan history 63 note

Hermes Atticus his extraordinary fortune and munificence 18

Heredius his character of the Persian worship 80

Herruh of Germany and Poland, their character 650

Hesarian the monk of Palestine account of 603

Hesperia bishop of Poutiers his remarkable observation on the diversity of Christian doctrine 314 His exposition of the term Monothelism 315

Hilary, pope censures the emperor Anthemius for his tolerant principles 577

Hildene the Vandal king of Africa, his indulgence to his catholic subjects displaces both the Arians and Athanasians 604 Is deposed by Gelimer, 18 Is put to death 609

Hindoo of the east not the disciples of Zoroaster 669 note

Hindostan conquest of, by Tamerlane, 1181

Hippo Regius siege of by Genseric king of the Vandals 549

Hippur the principal subjects of 91

Holy war the justice of it inquired into 1069

Homocid, how commuted by the Salic laws 677

Homocidism origin and use of that term at the council of Nice 317 And Homocidism the distinction between 315

Roman war of, 923

Honoratus archbishop of Milan is with his clergy, driven from his see by the Lombards 783

Honoria princess sister of the emperor Valentinian III her history, 569

Honorius son of Theodosius the Great is declared emperor of the west by his dying father 461 Marries Maria, the daughter of Stilicho 482 His character 18 Flies from Milan on the invasion of Italy by Alaric, 487 His triumphant entry into Rome 489 Abolishes the combats or gladiators 490 Fixes his residence at Ravenna 18 Orders the death of Stilicho 490 His im politic measures and cruelty unite his barbarian soldiers against him under Alaric, 501 His councils distracted by the eunuchs 512 His subject overtures to Attilius and Alaric 514 His last acts and death 522 His triumph for the reduction of Spain by Wallia the Goth, 570 Is suspected of incest with his sister Placidia 540 His persecution of the Donatists in Africa 548

Honorius the new ranks of introduced in the city or Constantinople 240 1000

Hormidas a fugitive Persian prince in the court of the emperor Constantius his remarks on the city of Rome 276 note His history, and station under Julian 371

Hormuz the son of Chosroes king of Persia his accession 800 His slaughter 196 Is deposed and at length killed 197 788

Horses of Arabia their peculiar qualities 902

Hosien the son of Ali his tragical death 939

Hospitaliers knights of St John of Jerusalem, popularity and character of the order of 1088

Hostianus the minor son of the emperor Decius, elected emperor under the guardianship of Galus 110

Hugh king of Burgundy his marriage with Matilda and expulsion from Rome by Alberic 896

Hugh count of Vermandois engages in the first crusade 1074 Is shipwrecked and made captive by the Greek emperor Alexius Comnenus 1077 His return 1083

Human nature, its natural propensities, 100

Home, Mr his natural history of religion, the best commentary on the polytheism of the ancients 12, note His difficulty, as to the extent of the imperial palace at Rome resolved, 52, note Charges the most refined and philosophic sects with intolerance, 81 note
Hungary, establishment of the Huns in, 553 State of, under the emperor Charlemagne, 892 Terror excited by their first approach to Europe, 1021 Their character, 1023
Humaid, John his exploits against the Turks, 1217 His defence of Belgrade and death 1220
Huneric the son of Genseric king of the Vandals, persecutes his catholic subjects, 612 His cruelty to the catholics of Hippo, 615
Huns their original seat, and their conquests, 419 Their decline 430 Their emigrations, 421 Their victories over the Goths 422, 423
Huns they drive other barbarous tribes before them, upon the Roman provinces, 491 Their establishment in Hunary, 553 Character of their king Attila 551 Their invasion of Persia 555 The empire of, extinguished by the death of Attila 577
 Hunting of wild beasts, when a virtue, and when a vice, 37 Is the school of war, 417
Hypatia, the female philosopher, murdered in the church at Alexandria, 821
Hypatius, sedition of, at Constantinople, 666

I and J

Jacobites of the east, history of the sect of 838
James, St. his legendary exploits in Spain 202
Jakutars, first institution of those troops 1175
Iberian and Cyprian gates of mount Caucasus, distinguished 680 The Iberian gates occupied by Cabades king of Persia, 16
Idolus, his account of the misfortunes of Spain by an eruption of the barbarous nations, 525
Idolatry ascribed to the agency of demons, by the primitive christians, 182 Derivation of the term, and its successive applications 333 note
Jerom, his extravagant representation of the de vastation of Pannonia by the Goths, 433 His influence over the widow Paula 604
Jerusalem its situation, destruction and profanation, 356 Pilgrimages to and curious relics preserved there, 16 Abusive attempts of the emperor Julian to rebuild the temple, 307 a magnificent church erected there to the Virgin Mary by Justinian 676 The vessels of the temple brought from Africa to Constantinople by Belisarius 694 Is conquered by Chosroes II king of Persia, 806 Insurrection of the monks there 828 the city conquered by the Saracens 940 Great resort of pilgrims to, 1064 Conquest of, by the Turks 1065 is taken from the Turks by the Egyptians, 1005 Is taken by the crusaders 1087 Is erected into a kingdom under Godfrey of Bouillon 16 Succession of its christian princes, 1098 Is pillaged by the Carizmans, 1104
Jerusalem, New described according to the ideas of the primitive christians 186
Jemits, Portuguese persecute the eastern christians, 833 Their labours in, and expulsion from, Abyssinia, 644
Jews an obscure, unsocial, obstinate race of men, 177 Review of their history, 178 Their religion is the basis of christianity, 179 The promises of divine favour extended by christianity to all mankind 16 The immortality of the soul not inculcated in the law of Moses, 185 Why there are no Hebrew gospels extant, 199 Provoked the persecutions of the Roman emperors 205 those of a more liberal spirit adopted the theological system of Plato, 309 Their condition under the emperors Constantine and Constantius 356 Abusive attempt of Julian to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem 357 miraculous conversion of a number of at Minorca, 472, note Persecution of, in Spain, 617 are persecuted by the catholics in Italy, 655 And by Cyril at Alexandria 821 How plagued by the emperor Justinian 832 those in Arabia subdued by Mahomet, 921 Assist the Saracens in the reduction of Spain 965 massacres of by the first crusaders 1072
Jedepard, king of Persia is said to be left guardian to Theodosius the younger by the emperor Arcadius, 540 His war with Theodosius 543
Jedum, the small isl and of serves as a place of refuge for Romans who flew from the sack of Rome by Alaric 517
Ignatius, bishop of Antioch the christian fortitude displayed in his epistles, 918
Ikthidites, the Saracen dy nasty of 991
Illicitious, the title of, how limited in the times of Roman simplicity, and how extended when Constantinople became the seat of empire, 240, 241
Illyricum described 9
Images, introduction of, unto the christian church, 875 The worship of derived from paganism, 16 Are condemned by the council of Constantinople 878 The adoration of justified by pope Gregory II, 880 And sanctified by the second council of Nice 887
Imperator, in the Roman history, explained, 25, note The imperial prerogatives 26 The court 27 The sense of this appellation altered by long use 152
Inarnation, theological history of the doctrine of, 816
Inches, natural, and arbitrary, distinguished 768
Indus, account of the christians of St Thomas in, 838 Persecution of by the Portuguese 16
Indictions, the memorable era of, whence dated,

168, note The name and use of, in the middle ages, whence derived, 252
Indulgences, in the Romish church, the nature of explained, 1070
Inquidus, princess of Aushasir, is married to Hermenegild prince of Betica, and cruelly treated by his mother Gonsinthia, 616
Inheritance, paternal, subject to parental discretion among the Romans, 65 The Roman law of, 770 Testamentary dispositions of property, 771 The Vocolian law, how evaded, 16
Injuries, review of the Roman laws for the redress of, 773
Innocent III pope, enjoyed the plenitude of papal power, 1103
Inquisition, the first erection of that tribunal, 1103
Institutes of Justinian, an analysis of, 763
Interest of money how regulated by the Roman law, 773
Joan, pope, the story of, fethious, 895, note
John principal secretary to the emperor Honorius, usurps the empire after his death, 545
John, the evangelist, archbishop of Alexandria, relieves the Jewish refugees when Jerusalem was taken by the Persians, 807 His extraordinary liberality of the church treasure, 842
John, bishop of Antioch arrives at Ephesus after the meeting of the council, and with his bishops, decides against Cyril, 823 Coalition between him and Cyril 824
John of Apria patriarch of Constantinople, his pride, and confederacy against John Cantacuzene, 1158
John, of Brienne, emperor of Constantinople, 1133
Joka, of Cappadocia, praetorian prefect of the east, under the emperor Justinian, his character, 679 Is disgraced by the empress Theodora, and becomes a bishop, 673 Opposes the African war 685 His fraud in supplying the army with bread, 687
John Comnenus, emperor of Constantinople, 867
John Damascenus, St his history, 878 note
John of Lycopolis, the hermit, his character, and oracular promise to the emperor Theodosius the Great 459
John the Monophysite bishop of Asia is employed by the emperor Justinian to root out pagans and heretics, 832
John XII pope, his flagitious character, 806
John XIII pope his profligate character 1271
John St the evangelist, reveals the true sense of Plato's doctrine of the Lago 310
John the Saneunary, seizes the Gothic treasures in Picenum, and obliges Vitiges to raise the siege of Rome, 707
John Zimisces murders the Greek emperor Nicephorus and succeeds him 861 His eastern victories, 993 Defeats Swatoslaus, czar of Russia, 1029
Jona, one of the Hebride islands its ancient monastic eminence 603
Jonah, renegade of Damascus, story of, 945
Jordan, character of his work, De Originibus Sclavici, 1020 note
Joseph the Carizman, governor of Berzem, kills the sultan Alp Arslan 1060
Josephus the mention of Jesus Christ in his history, a forgery, 211, note His opinion, that Plato derived knowledge from the Jews, controverted 309 note
Jovian is elected emperor by the troops of Julian on their retreat from Assyria 381, 382 His treaty with Sapor king of Persia 383 His death, 388
Jovians and Herculanis, new bodies of guards instituted to supersede the praetorian units, 151
Jovinian of Verona, his punishment by a Roman synod, for heresy, 486
Jovinus reduces the Alemanni, who had invaded Gaul, 399, 400 account of his revolt against the emperor Honorius in Germany 524
Jovius, praetorian prefect under the emperor Honorius, succeeds Olympius as his confidential minister, 512 His negotiations with Alaric obstructed 513 Deserts Honorius and goes over to Alaric, and the new emperor Attalus 514
Irene, her marriage with the Greek emperor Isidore, 853 Her ambition and barbarity to her son Constantine, 16 Restores images to public devotion, 887
Ireland was first colonized from Scotland 403 Derivation of the name of its tutelary saint, Patrick, 600 note
Isaac I Comnenus, emperor of Constantinople, 864
Isaac II Angelus, emperor of Constantinople, 873 His character and reign, 1110 Is deposed by his brother Alexius 1111 Is restored by the crusaders 1119 His death, 1121
Isaac archbishop of Armenia, his apology for the vices of king Artasires, 544
Isauria the rebellion there against the emperor Gallienus, 112
Isaurians, reduction of, by the eastern emperors, 677
Isidore, cardinal, his ill treatment in Russia, 1215 Recites an act of union from the Greek clergy at Constantinople 1220
Isocrates, his price for the tuition of his pupils, 662
Italy, the dominion of, under Odoacer succeeds the extinction of the western empire, 699 Its miserable state at this era, 601 Conversion of the Lombards to the Nicene faith, 617 Is reduced by Theodoric the Ostrogoth, according to the Roman law, by Theodoric 651 Its flourishing state at this time 653 How supplied with silk from China, 668 History of Amalasontha, queen of Italy, 697 Invasion of,

by Belisarius, 700 Siege of Rome by the Goths, 701 Invasion of Italy by the Franks, 708 Revolt of the Goths, 734 Expedition of the eunuch Narses, 741 Invasion of, by the Franks and Alemanni, 744 Government of, under the exarchs of Ravenna, 745 Conquests of Althou king of the Lombards in, 783 Distress of, 787 How divided between the Lombards and the exarchs of Ravenna, 788
Italy, growth of the papal power in, 879 Revolt of, against the Greek emperors, 880 The exarchate of Ravenna granted to the pope, 885 Extent of the dominions of Charlemagne there, 891 The power of the German Crusers destroyed by the rise of the commercial cities there 897 Actions of the Guelphs and Ghibelines 898 Conflict of the Saracens, Latins, and Greeks in, 1032
 - revival of Greek learning in, 1208 Authors consulted for the history of, 1275, note
Jabiles, polish a revival of the secular games 71, note, 1255 The return of, accelerated 1255
Jude, St examination of his grandsons before the tribunal of the procurator of Judaea, 212
Judgments of God, in the Salm laws, how determined 628
Judgments, popular, of the Romans, displayed, 777
Julia Domna, wife of the emperor Severus, her character, 51 Her death, 56
Julian the nephew of Constantine the Great, his education 274 His dangerous situation on the death of his brother Gallus, 276 Is sent to Athens, where he cultivates philosophy, 277 Is recalled by Constantius, 16 Is invested with the title of Caesar, 278 Is appointed to the government of Gaul 285 His first campaign, 16 Battle of Strasburg, 286 Reduces the Franks into Thaxandria 287 His three expeditions beyond the Rhine 288 Restores the cities of Gaul, 16 His civil administration, 289 His account of the theological calamities of the empire under Constantius, 330 Constantius grows jealous of him, 333 The Gaulish legions are ordered into the east 334 Is saluted emperor by the troops, 335 His embassy and epistle to Constantius, 336 His fourth and fifth expeditions beyond the Rhine, 337 Declares war against Constantius, and abjures the christian religion, 338 His march from the Rhine into Illyricum, 339 Enters Sirmium, 16 Publishes apologies for his conduct, 340 His triumphant entry into Constantinople on the death of Constantius 341 His private life and civil government, 16 His reformation in the imperial palace, 343 Becomes a sloven to avoid popery, 16 Erects a tribunal for the trial of the evil ministers of Constantius, 344 Dismisses the spies and informers employed by his predecessor, 345 His love of freedom and the republic 16 His kindnesses to the Grecian cities 346 His abilities as an orator, 16 And as a judge, 347 His character, 16 His apostasy accounted for, 348 Adopts the pagan mythology, 16 His theological system, 350 His initiation into the Eleusinian mysteries and his fanaticism 16 His hypocritical duplicity, 351 Writes a vindication of his apostasy, 352 His edict for a general toleration, 16 His pagan superstitious zeal 353 His circular letters for the reformation of the pagan religion, 354 His industry in gaining proselytes, 355 His address to the Jews 356 His story of his attempt to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem, 357 Transfers the revenues of the christian church to the heathen priests 359 Prohibits christian schools 16 Obliges the christians to reinstate the pagan temples 360 Restores the sacred grove and temple of Daphne 361 Punishes the christians of Antioch for burning that temple, 362 His treatment of the cities of Edessa and Alexandria 363 Banishes Athanasius 364 The philosophical fable of his Caesars delineated 366 Meditates the conquest of Persia 367 Popular discontents during his residence at Antioch 16 Occasion of writing his Misopogon, 368 His march to the Euphrates, 369 He enters the Persian territories, 371 Invades Assyria 373 His personal conduct in this enterprise, 374 His address to his discontented troops 375 His successful passage over the Tigris, 376 Burns his fleet, 378 His retreat and distress, 379 His death, 381 His funeral, 386
Julian, count, offers to betray Spain into the hands of the Arabs, 963 His advice to the victorious Turks 964
Julian the papal legate, exhorts Ladislaus, king of Hungary and Poland, to breach of faith with the Turks 1217 His death and character, 1210
Julius, master general of the troops in the eastern empire, conceals a general massacre of the Gothic youth in Asia, 431
Jurispudence, Roman, a review of 752 Was polished by Grecian philosophy, 753 Abuses of, 778
Justin the elder, his military promotion, 658 His elevation to the empire, and character, 659 His death, 660
Justin II emperor succeeds his uncle Justinian 779 His trim behaviour to the ambassadors of the Arabs 780 His abdication and investiture of Iiberius as his successor, 785
Justin Martyr his decision in the case of the Ebionites 180 His extravagant account of the progress of christianity, 202 Occasion of his own conversion 203
Justina the popular story of her marriage with the emperor Valentinian examined, 413 Her infant son Valentinian II invested with the imperial ensigns on the death of his father 16 Her contest with Ambrose archbishop of Milan 449 Flies from the invasion of Maximus, with her son, 451

Justinian emperor of the east, his birth and promotion 141 His orthodoxy, 60 Is invested with the diadem by his uncle Justin 600 Marries Theodora 610 Patronizes the blue faction of the circus 605 Title of agriculture, and manufacture in his provinces 607 Introduces the culture of the silk worm, and manufacture of silk into 1000 609 Statute of his revenue, 610 His warlike and profusion 611 Taxes his mimopoles 611 His ministers 612 His public buildings, 613 Founds the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople 614 His other public works 615 His European fortifications, 616 His Asiatic fortifications 618 His suppression of the schools at Athens 618 And the consular dignity, 619 Purchases a peace from the Persians 621 700 Under whose to restore Illuderic kin, of Carthage 624 Reduction of Africa 625 His instructions for the government of 16 His acquisitions in Spain 626 His deceitful negotiations in Italy 628 Weakness of his empire 713 Receives an embassy from the Avars 718 And from the Turks, 719 Persian war 721 His negotiations with Chosroes 730 His alliance with the Aghsians 731 Neglects the Italian war under Theodorus 736 Settles the government of Italy under the exarch of Ravenna 745 The death of Theodorus 748 His death and character, 16 Councils and calamities in his reign 749 His Code Pandects and Institutes 750 His theological character and government 830 His persecutions 831 His orthodoxy, 832 Died a laureate, 833

Justinian II emperor of Constantinople 849

Justinian the son of Germanus his conspiracy with the empress Sophia and successes against the Persians 786

Justinian his remarks on the crowded state of the inhabitants of Rome, 509

K

Khan import of this title in the northern parts of Asia 417 401

King the title of conferred by Constantine the Great on his nephew Hannibalianus 500

Kindred degrees of, according to the Roman civil law 770

Knight how originally conferred and its obligations 1075

Koran of Mahomet account and character of 910

Korash, the tribe of, acquire the estates of the Canaan at Mecca 407 Pedigree of Mahomet 909 They oppose his pretensions to a prophetic character, 917 Light of Mahomet 918 Battle of Beder 920 Battle of Uhud 921 Meccasur rendered to Mahomet, 922

L

Labarum, or standard of the cross in the army of Constantine the Great described, 24

Labeo the civilian his diligence in business and composition 738 His professional character 739

Lactantius difficulties in ascertaining the date of his Divine Institutions 920 note His flattering prediction of the influence of christianity among mankind, 923 Incutates the divine right of Constantine to the empire 16

Ladislaus king of Hungary and Poland leads an army against the Turks 1217 His breach of faith with them 16

Ladislaus king of Naples harasses Rome during the schism of the papacy 1270

Laelus pretorian prefect conspires the death of Commodus, and confers the empire on Pertinax 39

Lally, when first distinguished from the clergy 195

Lampadius a Roman senator boldly condemns the treaty with Alaric the Goth 497

Lance Holy, narrative of the miraculous discovery of 1084

Land how assessed by the Roman emperors 253 How divided by the barbarians 609 Allodial and Salic distinguished 630 Of Italy how partitioned by Theodoric the Ostrogoth 149

Laudace, its ancient significance 20

Lazarus the date, establishes an empire at Nice 1108 His character 1141

Lazarus Theodore 14 his character 1142

Lazarus Janus the Greek grammarian, his character 1011

Latin church occasion of its separation from the Greek church 1107 Corruption and schism of 1201 Reunion of with the Greek church, 1206 The subsequent Greek schism 1214

Latium the river of, explained 15

Latvia in north-west history explained 657

Law review of the profession of, under the emperors 945

La s of Rome review of 750 Those of the kings, 751 Of the twelve tables 753 Of the people 754 Decrees of the senate and edicts of the pretors 755 Constitutions of the emperors 16 Their rescripts 758 The three codes of 16 The terms of 16 Succession of civil lawyers 757 Reformation of by Justinian 760 Abu lation and revision of the laws 775

La the tribe of in Colchis account of, 707

Le Clerc, character of his ecclesiastical history, 816 note

Legacies and inheritances taxed by Augustus, 64 How 16 dated by the Roman law 771

Legion, in the Roman army under the emperors described 55 General distribution of the legions 77 The size of reduced by Constantine the Great 247

Leo of Thrace is made emperor of the east by his minister Aspar 990 Was the first christian potentate who was crowned by a priest 16

Leo the emperor of the west on Anthemius 501 His armament against the Vandals in Africa, 502

Leo the emperor of Constantinople 831 His edicts against monasteries in churches, 877 Revolt of Italy, 831

Leo IV emperor of Constantinople 852

Leo V emperor of Constantinople 844

Leo the philosopher, emperor of Constantinople 849 Latin, studies the power of the senate 1004

Leo tushon of Rome, his character and embassy from Valentinian 111 to Attila, king of the Huns 576 Interacts with the emperor king of the Vandals for clemency to the city of Rome, 591 Calls the council of Chalcedon 807

Leo III pope his miraculous recovery from the assault of assassins 1849 Crowned Charlemagne emperor of the Romans 105

Leo IV pope his reign 937 Founds the Leonine city, 16

Leo IX pope his expedition against the Normans of Apulia 1057 His treaty with them 1038

Leo archbishop of Thessalonica one of the reformers of Greek learning, 1010

Leo general of the east under the emperor Arcadius his character 544

Leo Pilatus first Greek professor at Florence and in the west his character 1200

Leo the Jew proselyte history of his family 1056

Leon the jurist, his embassy from Constantinople to Julian 341

Leon the city at Rome founded 937

Leonius is taken from prison and chosen emperor of Constantinople on the deposition of Justinian 11 1100

Leonius Gothic king of Spain his character 616

Leo the death of his son Hieronymus 616

Letters a knowledge of the test of civilization in a people 107

Leontius the Pious emperor of the Romans 893

Leontius emperor of the Romans 893 His epistle to the Greek emperor Basil I 1002

Lazarus his account of the private life of the emperor Julian 340 And of his divine visions 341 Applauds the dismission of Julian 16 His character 108 His influence on the emperor Valens 432

Liberius bishop of Rome is banished by the emperor Constantius for 1000, to concur in deposing Athanasius 377

Liberty is called the only sure guard against an aspiring prince 24

Licinius is invested with the purple by the emperor Alerius 161 His alliance with Constantine the Great 170 Defeats Maximian 16 His cruelty, 16 Is defeated by Constantine at Cribus 170 And at Marilla 16 Peace concluded with Constantine 173 Commits civil war with Constantine, 174 His humiliation and death 176 Fate of his son 176 Concurred with Constantine in publishing the edict of Milan 200 Violated this agreement by oppressing the Christians, 204 Cerebus's account of his vision 207

Licentian imperial his office and rank, 95

Lightning superstition of the Romans with reference to persons and places struck with 136

Lingamites Saraceni in slaves, captives, masters and usurpation of their country, 263

Litigation of by Constantine 781

Literature revival of in Italy 1003 Ancient use and abuse of 1013

Lithuania its late conversion to christianity 1031

Litorius count is defeated and taken captive in Gaul by Theodoric 307

Luitprand king of the Lombards, attacks the city of Rome 800

Luitprand husband of Cremona, ambassador to Constantinople ceremony of his audience with the emperor 1000

Lois Plato's doctrine of 300 Is expounded by St John the evangelist, 309 Athanasius confesses himself unable to comprehend it, 311 Controversies on the eternity of 312

Logothete great, his office under the Greek emperors 1001

Lombardy ancient described 9 Conquest of by Charlemagne 814

Lombards iteration origin of their name and review of their history 714 Are expelled by the emperor Justinian to check the Gepids 715 Actions of their king, Alboin 780 They reduce the empire 781 They overrun that part of Italy now called Lombardy 783 Extent of their kingdom 788 Language and manners of the Lombards 16 Government and laws 790

Lombards his representation of the degeneracy of his race 23 Is put to death by Arianism 103

Lombards is sent to supersede Arianism as emperor of Ravenna 780 Receives Gasconade, the favorite queen of the Lombards 784

Lorraine I emperor of the Romans 893

Louis XI of France is rescued from the treachery of the Greeks by Roger king of Sicily 1049 Undertakes the second crusade 1091 His disastrous expedition 1091

Louis IX of France his crusades to the Holy Land 1105 His death 1106 Procured a valuable stock of relics from Constantinople 1134

Louis the severity of his satire against the heathen theologians accounted for 10

Lucian count of the east under the emperor Arcadius his cruel treatment by the prefect Rufinus 475

Lucian presbyter of Jerusalem his miraculous discovery of the body of St Stephen the first Christian martyr 471

Lucian governor of Illyricum is surprised and kindly treated by Julian 339 His death 339

Lucilla sister of the emperor Commodus, her attempt to kill him as unnatural 33

Luce 11 and 111 popes their disastrous reigns 1245

Lyceris lake described with its late destruction, 500 note

Lycian villa in Campania its description and history 603

Lyceris the first of, described and continued under the christian emperors 522

Lyceris the Roman governor of Thrace opposes the Gothic emperors there 1200 Is defeated by them 16

Lyceris contribution in the Roman empire, explained 250

Lyceris his character as a reformer 1018

Lyceris the only means of correcting the unequal distribution of property 20

Lyceris, a formidable German nation, account of, 11

Lyceris, battle of between the competitors Severus and Albinus, 47

M

Macedonia the Arian bishop of Constantinople, his contests with his competitor Paul 394 Fatal consequences on his removing the body of the emperor Constantine to the church of St. Arcadius 399 His cruel persecutions of the catholics and Novatians 16 His exile 133

Macedonia pretorian prefect under the emperor Alerian his character 107

Macedonia a prince of the Alamanians, his stepson 401

Macedonia his succession to the empire preferred by an African 53 Accelerates the completion of the prophecy 16 Purchases a peace with Persia 12

Madagay the capital of Persia sacked by the Saracens, 938

Magnus of Palmyra assassinated his uncle Odenathus 121

Magna its situation, 10

Magna the worship of in Persia reformed by Artaxerxes 70 Alignment of the Persian theology 16 Simplicity of their worship 16 Ceremonies and moral precepts, 16 Their power 16

Magna severe prosecution of persons for the crime of at Rome and Antioch 102

Magnus assumes the empire in Gaul, 281

Magna of Constantine 969 Sends an embassy to Constantine 16 Makes war against Constantine 270 Is defeated at the battle of Mursa 271 Kills himself 271

Mahomet, the Gazeview, his twelve expeditions into Illyria 1033 His character 1031

Mahomet the prophet his embassy to Chosroes II king of Persia, 1001

Mahomet his genealogy, birth, and education 909

Mahomet his person and character 910 Assumes his prophetic mission 911 Incutates the unity of God 912 His reverential mention of Jesus Christ 910 His koran, 911 His miracles, 912 His precepts 914 His hell, and paradise 915 The best authorities for his history 916 note Converts his own family 16 Preaches publicly at Mecca 917 Escapes from the korashites there 918 Is received as prince of Medina 919 His regal dignity and sacerdotal office 16 Declares war against infidels 16 Battle of Beder 920 Battle of Uhud 921 Subdues the Jews of Arabia, 16 Submission of Mecca to him 922 The conquerors Arabia 923 His sickness and death 924 His character 925 His death 926 His wives 16 His children 927 His posterity 928 His influence on the great spread and power of his religion 929

Mahomet the son of Hajariz his reign 1101

Mahomet II sultan of the Turks his character 1023 His reign 1253 Inclinations of his hostile intentions against the Greeks 16 He besieges Constantinople 1008 Takes the city by storm 1016 His entry into the city 1237 Makes it his capital 1038 His death 1241

Mahometism, the what means propagated, 968

Mahometism iteration of christianity under 16

Mahometism his history character, and elevation to the eastern empire, 684 His egotism to the service 685 His salutary laws 16 His preparations to invade Africa 587 His fleet destroyed by Genseric 588 His death 16

Mahometism his character of the Norjians 1036

Mahomet Shah sultan of the Turks his prosperous reign 1001 Retains the eastern calendar 16 His death 1060

Mallus Theodoros the great civil honours to which he attained 240 note

Mallus their origin and character 1106 Their establishment in Egypt 16

Mallus mother of the young emperor Alexander Severus acts as regent of the empire 60 Is put to death with him 68 Her conference with Origen 291

Manga an Armenian noble his history 147

Man, the only animal that can accommodate himself to all climates 86 note

Manichaeism in the Iranian law explained 760

Manichaeism are devoted to death by the edict of Theodosius against heretics 437 Constantinople 688 He repulses the Saracens 1049 But fails in his scheme of subduing the western empire, 1050 His ill treatment of the crusaders 1140

Manichaeism a city of Assyria reduced and destroyed by the emperor Julian 371

Manichaeism the four species of most esteemed by the Romans 70 note

Manichaeism count of the emperor Constantine the emperor Constantine in C. 16, assists the emperor

- tion of Magnentius, 268 His embassy to Constantius, 269 Was killed in the battle of Mursa, 273
- Marcellinus, his revolt in Dalmatia and character, 589 Joins the emperor Anthemius, and expels the Vandals from Sardinia, 592 His death, 593 594
- Marcellinus, son of the præfect Maximian his treacherous murder of Gabinius king of the Quadi, 411
- Marcellus, the centurion, martyred for desertion, 225
- Marcellus bishop of Rome, exiled to restore peace to the city, 229
- Marcellus, bishop of Apamea in Syria loses his life in destroying the pagan temples 465
- Marcia the concubine of the emperor Commodus, a patroness of the Christians 220
- Marcian senator or Constantinople, marries the empress Pulcheria, and is acknowledged emperor 555 His temperate refusal of the demands of Attila the Hun, 16
- Marcianopolis, the city of, taken by the Goths, 98
- Marcomanii are subdued and punished by Marcus Antoninus, 94 Alliance made with, by the emperor Gallienus, 103
- Marcus elected bishop of the Nazarenes 180
- Mardia, battle of between Constantine the Great and Licinius, 172
- Margus, battle of, between Diocletian and Carinus, 149
- Margus, bishop of, betrays his episcopal city into the hands of the Huns 556
- Maria daughter of Ludemom of Carthage, her remarkable adventures, 552
- Mariana, his account of the misfortunes of Spain, by an eruption of the barbarous nations, 525
- Marius, a subaltern officer, chosen emperor by the legions of Mesra 95
- Marius the armourer, a candidate for the purple among the competitors against Gallienus, his character, 110
- Mark bishop of Arethusa, is cruelly treated by the emperor Julian, 360
- Marjanga, engrained between the emperor Julian and Sapor king of Persia, 379
- Maronites of the east, character and history of, 839
- Marcia a Roman prostitute the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother, of three popes, 895
- Marriage, regulations of, by the Roman laws, 766 Of Roman citizens with strangers, proscribed by their jurisprudence 1003
- Marcell, Charles, duke of the Franks, his character, 977 His politic conduct on the Saracen invasion of France 16 Defeats the Saracens, 16 Why he was consigned over to hell flames by the clerics 978
- Martin, bishop of Tours, destroys the idols and pagan temples in Gaul, 465 His monkish situations there 603
- Martin marries her uncle the emperor Heraclius, 647 Endeavours to share the imperial dignity with her sons, 16 Her fate 648
- Martinianus receives the title of Cæsar from the emperor Licinius, 170
- Martius primitive an inquiry into the true history of 205 The several inducements to martyrdom 218 Three methods of escaping it, 219 Marks by which leaerod catholics distinguish the relics of the martyrs 216, note 1 The worship of, and their relics introduced 470
- Mary Virgin, her immaculate conception, borrowed from the Koran 912
- Mascezel, the persecuted brother of Gildo the Moor, takes refuge in the imperial court of Honorius, 480 Is intrusted with troops to reduce Gildo, 16 Defeats him, 481 His suspicious death, 16
- Master of the offices, under Constantine the Great, his functions, 249
- Maternus his revolt and conspiracy against the emperor Commodus, 36
- Matthew St his gospel originally composed in Hebrew 199 note 817 note
- Maure his birth, character and promotion to the eastern empire, 766 Restores Chosroes II king of Persia, 798 His war against the Avars 801 State of his armies, 802 His abdication and death, 803, 804
- Mauritanus, ancient, its situation and extent, 11 Character of the native Moors of, 548
- Mauritius the son of Maximian, declared emperor at Rome 161 His tyranny in Italy and Africa 165 The military force he had to oppose Constantine 166 His defeat and death, 169 His politic humanity to the Christians, 229 Maximian associate in the empire with Diocletian his character 140 Triumphs with Diocletian, 150 Holds his court at Milan 151 Abdicates the empire along with Diocletian 155 He resumes the purple, 161 Reduces Severus, and puts him to death 16 His second resignation and unfortunate end 163, 164 His aver sion to the Christians accounted for 224
- Maximilianus the African, a Christian martyr 225
- Maximian his birth fortune, and elevation to the empire of Rome, 67 Why deemed a persecutor of the Christians 221
- Maximin is declared Cæsar, on the abdication of Diocletian, 158 Obtains the rank of Augustus from Galerius 163 His defeat and death 170 Renewed the persecution of the Christians after the toleration granted by Galerius 240
- Maximin the cruel minister of the emperor Valentinian, promoted to the prefecture of Gaul, 301
- Maximin, his embassy from Theodosius the Younger to Attila king of the Huns 561
- Maximus and Balbinus elected joint emperors by the senate, on the deaths of the two Gordians, 72
- Maximus his character and revolt in Britain, 411 His treaty with the emperor Theodosius, 442 Persecutes the Priscillianists, 447 His invasion of Italy, 451 His defeat and death, 452
- Maximus, the pagan preceptor of the emperor Julian, imitates him into the Eleusini in mysteries, 350 Is honourably invited to Constantinople by his imperial pupil, 354 Is corrupted by his residence at court, 355
- Maximus, Petronius his wife ravished by Valentinian III emperor of the west, 578 His character and elevation to the empire 579 580
- Mebedes, the Persian general, ungratefully treated by Chosroes, 721
- Mecca, its situation and description, 903 The Canba, or temple of, 907 Its deliverance from Abraham, 909 The doctrine of Mahomet opposed there 917 His escape, 918 The city of, surrendered to Mahomet, 922 Is pillaged by Abn Saher 930
- Medina, reception of Mahomet there, on his flight from Mecca, 918
- Megalena, the festival of, at Rome, described, 36, note
- Meletians, an Egyptian sect, persecuted by Athanasius, 320
- Melitene, battle of between the eastern emperor Tiberius, and Chosroes king of Persia 795
- Melo citizen of Bari, invites the Normans into Italy, 1015
- Memphis its situation and reduction by the Saracens 953
- Meroë kings of the Franks in Gaul origin of, 568 Their domain and benefices, 630
- Mervan, caliph of the Saracens, and the last of the house of Oumiyah, his defeat and death, 879
- Mesopotamia invasion of, by the emperor Julian, 371 Described by Xenophon 16
- Messala, Valerius the first præfect of Rome, his high character, 243 note
- Messiah, under what character he was expected by the Jews 179 His birth-day, how fixed by the Romans, 338, note
- Metals and money, their operation in improving the human mind, 28
- Metellus Numidicus, the censor, his invective against women, 60 note
- Meteus Falconius his artful speech to the emperor Iulianus in the senate on his election 193
- Metrophanes of Cyzicus, is made patriarch of Constantinople, 1215
- Metz, cruel treatment of, by Attila king of the Huns 570
- Michael I Rhangabe, emperor of Constantinople, 854
- Michael II the stammerer, emperor of Constantinople, 855
- Michael III emperor of Constantinople, 856 Is defeated by the Paulicians 1015
- Michael IV the Paphlagonian, emperor of Constantinople, 863
- Michael V Calaphates, emperor of Constantinople, 863
- Michael VI Stratioticus, emperor of Constantinople, 864
- Michael VII Parapinaces, emperor of Constantinople, 865
- Milan how the imperial court of the western empire came to be transferred from Rome to that city, 151
- famous edict of Constantine the Great in favour of the Christians published there, 292
- St Ambrose elected archbishop of that city 448 Tumults occasioned by his refusing a church for the Arian worship of the empress Justina and her son 449
- revolt of, to Justinian, 706 Is taken and destroyed by the Burgundians 708
- is again destroyed by Frederick I 838
- Military force, its strength and efficacy dependent on a due proportion to the number of the people, 41
- Military officers of the Roman empire at the time of Constantine the Great, a review of 246
- Millennium, the doctrine of, explained 185
- Mingrelia See Cablers
- Minority, two distinctions of in the Roman law, 177, note
- Miracles those of Christ and his apostles escaped the notice of the heathen philosophers and historians 204 Account of those wrought by the body of St Stephen 471
- Miraculous powers of the primitive church, an inquiry into 107
- Misheus chief minister and father in law of the third Gordian his character 76
- Mispogon of the emperor Julian, on what occasion written 368
- Misrorum or great golden dish of Adolphus king of the Visigoths history of, 321
- Mosayah assumes the title of caliph and makes war against Ali 931 His character and reign, 16 Lays siege to Constantinople 972
- Mord prince of the Amah seduced by the emperor Theodosius turns his arms against his own countrymen 437
- Mugils primitive their method of treating then conquered enemies, 507 Reign and conquests of August 164 Conquests of his successors, 1167 See Jamerlane
- Mugilantum the city of, surprised by the Alemanni, 400
- Mohawkes the Egyptian, his treaty with the Saracens Amrou, 954
- Monarchy defined 24 Hereditary, ridiculous in theory, but salutary in fact 67 The peculiar objects of cruelty and of avarice under, 252
- Monastic institutions the seeds of sown by the primitive Christians 191 Origin progress and consequences of 602
- Money, the standard and computation of under Constantine the Great, and his successors, 251 note
- Monks have embellished the sufferings of the primitive martyrs by fictions, 215
- character of by Lunapius 470 By Rutilius, 480 Origin and history of, 602 Their industry in making proselytes, 604 Their obedience 16 Their dress and habitations, 605 Their diet 16 Their manual labour 606 Their riches 16 Their solitude, 607 Their devotion and visions 16 Their division into the classes of Canobites and Anachorets, 16
- suppression of, at Constantinople, by Constantine V 879
- Monophysites of the east, history of the sect of 838
- Monothelitic controversy account of, 833
- Montesquieu his description of the military government of the Roman empire, 77 His opinion that the degrees of freedom in a state are measured by taxation controverted, 252
- Morinus, questor of the palace, is sent by the emperor Constantius, with Domitian to correct the administration of Gallus in the east 275 Is put to death there, 16
- Moor of Barbary, their miserable poverty 693 Their invasion of the Roman province punished by Solomon the eunuch, 696
- Morea is reduced by the Turks, 1240
- Morossini, Thomas, elected patriarch of Constantinople by the Veneians, 1286
- Mosellama, an Arabian chief, endeavours to rivall Mahomet in his prophetic character, 935
- Moses, the doctrine of the immortality of the soul not inculcated in his law, 185 His sanatory laws compared with those of Mahomet 919
- Mosheim character of his work De rebus Christianis ante Constantinum, 816 note
- Moslemah, the Saracen, besieges Constantinople, 973
- Motassem the last caliph of the Saracens his wars with the Greek emperor Leocephalus, 998 Is killed by the Moguls 1168
- Mourouffe usurps the Greek empire and destroys Isaac Angelus, and his son Alexius, 1121 Is driven from Constantinople by the Latins, 1122 His death, 1128
- Mousa, the son of Bajazet, invested with the kingdom of Anatolia, by Tamerlane 1186 His return 1191
- Mozarabes, in the history of Spain, explained, 970
- Municipal cities, their advantages 15
- Muratori, his literary character, 1275 note
- Mursa, battle of, between the emperor Constantius, and the usurper Valentinus 271
- Musa the Saracen his conquest of Spain 965 His disgrace, 966 His death, 967
- Musapha, the supposed son of Bajazet, his story, 1190
- Musa battle of between the forces of the emperor Heraclius and those of Mahomet, 924
- Myndonus, river, the course of stopped by Sapor king of Persia, at the siege of Sisibis, 567
- N
- Narbonne is besieged by Theodoric and relieved by count Litorius 567
- Nacoran the Persian general, his defeat by the Romans and cruel fate 729
- Nauisus, battle of between the emperor Claudius and the Goths, 115
- Naples is besieged and taken by Belisarius, 700 Extent of the duchy of, under the Exarchs of Ravenna 788
- Narses, his embassy from Sapor king of Persia to the emperor Constantius, 281
- Narses, king of Persia prevails over the pretensions of his brother Hormuz, and expels Tiridates king of Armenia, 147 Overthrows Galerius, 16 Is surprised and routed by Galerius, 148 Articles of peace between him and the Romans 149
- Narses, the Persian general of the emperor Maurice, restores Chosroes II king of Persia, 798 His revolt against Phocas and cruel death, 806
- Narses, the eunuch his military promotion and dissension with Belisarius 705 His character and expedition to Italy, 741 Battle of Tagina 742 Takes Rome, 743 Reduces and kills Vitigis the last king of the Goths, 744 Defeats the Franks and Alemanni, 745 Governs Italy in the capacity of exarch, 16 His disgrace and death, 782
- Naulobatus a chief of the Herali enters into the Roman service, and is made consul 106
- Navy of the Roman empire described, 5
- Nazarene church at Jerusalem, account of 179
- Nazarus, the pagan orator, his account of miraculous appearances in the sky in favour of Constantine the Great 297
- Nebriidus, prætorian præfect in Gaul is maimed and superseded, by his indiscreet opposition to the troops of Julian 338
- Negroe of Africa, evidences of their intellectual inferiority to the rest of mankind, 407
- Necetarius is chosen archbishop of Constantinople 447
- Nennius his account of the arrival of the Saxons in Britain different from that of Gildas, Bede and Writuland, 636, note
- Nepos Julius is made emperor of the west by Leo the Great, 597
- Nepotian, account of his revolt in Italy 972
- Nero persecutes the Christians as the incendiaries of Rome, 210
- Nerva, emperor, his character, and prudent adoption of Trajan 30
- Nestorius archbishop of Constantinople, his character, 822 His heresy concerning the incarnation 16 His dispute with Cyril of Alexandria 873 Is condemned, and degraded from his episcopal dignity by the council of Ephesus, 844 Is exiled, 845 His death 826 His opi

mons still retained in Persia 836 Missions of his disciples to the East Indies 837
Nevers John count of disastrous fate of him and his party the battle of Nicopolis 1176
Nice become the capital residence of sultan Soliman 106 Siege of by the first crusaders 1080
Nicéphorus I emperor of Constantinople 854 His wars with the Saracens 984 His death 1021
Nicéphorus II Phocas emperor of Constantinople, 861 His military enterprises 992
Nicéphorus III Botaniates emperor of Constantinople 866 Was raised to the throne by sultan Soliman 1062
Nicetas senator of Constantinople, his flight, on the capture of the city by the Latins 1123 His brief history 1124 note His account of the statues destroyed at Constantinople 1124
Nicetas patriarch of Constantinople opposes the fourth marriage of the emperor Leo the philosopher 855
Nicholas pope his character 1012 How in terested in the fall of Constantinople 1028
Nicomedia the court of Diocletian held there, and the city embellished by him 151 The church of demolished by Diocletian 225 His palace 226
Nicopolis battle of, between sultan Bajazet and Sismond king of Hungary 1176
Nika, the sedition of at Constantinople 666
Nimrech battle of, between the emperor Heraclius and the Persians 813
Nisibis, the city of, described and its obstinate defence against the Persians, 967 Is yielded to sapor by treaty 383
Nizam the Persian vizir his illustrious character, and unhappy fate 1062
Noah, his ark very convenient for resolving the difficulties of Mosae antiquarians 86
Abulissimus a title invented by Constantine the Great to distinguish his nephew Hannibalianus, 200
Noricum described 9
Normans, their settlement in the province of Normandy in France 1012 Their introduction to Italy, 1035 They serve in Sicily 16 They conquer Apulia, 1036 Their character, 16 Their treaty with the pope 1033
Norwiche are exempted by Constantine the Great in a particular edict from the general penalties of heresy 307 Are cruelly persecuted by Valerianus bishop of Constantinople 379
Nozels of Justinian law formed, and their character 713
Nouradin sultan his exalted character 1000
Nubia, conversion of, to christianity 843
Numerian the son of Carus succeeds his father in the empire in conjunction with his brother Carinus, 130
Nympha its extent at different eras of the Roman history 11

O

Oasis, in the deserts of Libya described 530 note Three places under this name pointed out 825, note
Obediencia passive theory and practice of the christian doctrine of 293
Obelisk Egyptian, the purpose of their erection 770
Oblations to the church origin of 145
Obligations human, the sources of, 772 Laws of the Romans respecting 16
Odenathus the Palmyrene his successful opposition to Sapor king of Persia 108 Is associated to the empire by Gallienus 110 111 Character and fate of his queen Zenobia, 120
Odin the long reign of his family in Sweden 89 note
Odor the emperor the emperor king of Italy 508 His character and reign 600 Resists all the Roman conquests beyond the Alps to Furius king of the Visigoths 618 Is reduced and killed by Theodor the Ostrogoth 648
Ohad battle of between Nuhomet and Abu Sophi in prince of Necca 921
Olga princess of Russia her baptism 1030
Olire its introduction into the western world 21
Olympus is raised to the western empire by count Ricimer 596
Olympic games compared with the tournaments of the Goths 1075
Olympiodorus his account of the magnificence of the city of Rome 503 His account of the marriage of Adolphus king of the Visigoths with the princess Placidia 521
Olympus, favourite of the emperor Honorius, alarms him with unfavourable suspicions of the designs of Stilicho 498 Causes Stilicho to be put to death 499 His disgrace, and ignominious death 518
Omur caliph of the Saracens 929 His character, 936 His journey to Jerusalem 949
Omniyah elevation of the house of, to the office of caliph of the Saracens 931 Why not the objects of public favour, 978 Destruction of, 979
Oracles heathen are silenced by Constantine the Great, 331
Orchan, emir of the Ottomans his reign 1172 His daughter of the Greek emperor Cantacuzene 1174
Ordination of the clergy in the early ages of the church an account of 300
Orestes is sent ambassador from Attila king of the Huns to the emperor Theodosius the younger 560 His history and promotion under the western emperors 598 His son Augustulus the last emperor of the west 16
Orestes praetor of Egypt is insulted by a monkish mob at Alexandria 821

Origen declares the number of primitive martyrs to be very inconsiderable 216 His conference with the empress Mammaria 221 His memory persecuted by the emperor Justinian and his clergy 189
Orion besieged by Attila king of the Huns and relieved by Ethus and Theodorus 570
Ornus bishop of Cordova, his great influence with Constantine the Great, 298 Prevails on Constantine to ratify the Nicene creed 317 Is with difficulty prevailed on to concur in deposing Athanasius 324
Oserhoene the small kingdom of, reduced by the Romans 83
Ossian his poems, whether to be connected with the invasion of Caledonia by the emperor Severus 52 Is said to have disputed with a christian missionary, 522 note
Ottos the portrait of described 513
Ottoman caliph of the Saracens 909
Ottoman the father of the Ottomans, his reign 1172
Otho I king of Germany restores and appropriates the western empire 891 Claims by treaty the nomination of the pope of Rome, 890 Defeats the Turks 1074 1075
Otha II deposes pope John XII and exalts his party at Rome, 896
Otho, bishop of Frisingen his character as an historian 1250 note
Ottomans origin and history of 1171 They obtain an establishment in Europe 1171
Ovid banished to the banks of the Danube 261
Oxyrinchus, in Egypt monkish piety of that city, 603

P

Pactius his encomium on the emperor Theodosius the Great 454
Paderasty how punished by the Scythian law 776 By Justinian 777
Pagan derivation and revolutions of the term, 34 note
Paganism the ruin of, suspended by the divisions among the christians 332 Theological system of the emperor Julian, 333
Paganism general review of the ecclesiastical establishment and jurisdiction of before it was subverted by christianity 462 Is renounced by the Roman senate 464 The pagan sacrifices prohibited, 465 The temples demolished 16 The ruin of deplored by the sophists 470 Pagan ceremonies revived in christian churches, 470
Palladius Constantine Greek emperor his reign 1022 Is killed in the storm of Constantinople by the Turks 1253
Palladius John emperor of Constantinople 1157 Marries the daughter of John Cantacuzene 1159 Takes up arms against Cantacuzene and is reduced to flight 1160 His restoration, 16 Discord between him and his sons 1177 His treaty with pope Innocent VI 1196 His visit to pope Urban VI at Rome 1197
Palladius John II Greek emperor his zeal, 1201 His voyage to Italy 1202
Palladius Manuel associated with his father John, in the Greek empire 1177 Tribute exacted from him by sultan Bajazet 1178 His treaties with S. Immo and Mahomet the sons of Bajazet VI 1192 His visits to the courts of Europe 1197 Private motives of his European negotiations explained, 1200 His death 16
Palladius Michael emperor of Nice his brief replies to the negotiations of Baldwin II emperor of Constantinople 1135 His family and character 1147 His elevation to the throne 1144 His return to Constantinople 1145 His death and banishes his younger associate John Lascaris 1146 He is excommunicated by the patriarch Arsenius 16 Associates his son Andronicus in the empire 1147 His union with the Latin church 16 Insinuates the revolt of Sicily, 1150
Palatines and Borderers origin and nature of these distinctions in the Roman troops 247
Palermo taken by Belisarius by stratagem, 603
Palatine a character of 10
Palladium of Rome described 402 note
Palladius the notary sent by Valentinian to Africa to inquire into the government of current Romanus comes with him to oppressing the province 405
Palmyra description of and its destruction by the emperor Aurelian 122
Panctus was the first teacher of the Stoic philosophy at Rome 758, note
Pandects of Justinian how formed 761
Panhyperebastes import of that title in the Greek empire 1001
Pannemia described 0
Pantemon at Rome, by whom erected 18 note Is converted into a christian church, 466
Pantemonius Roman, described 539
Paper, where and when the manufacture of, was first found out, 941
Papinian the celebrated lawyer created praetorian praefect, by the emperor Severus 50 His death, 54
Papirius Caus reasons for concluding that he could not be the author of the Jus Papirianum 753 note
Papists, proportion their number bore to that of the protestants in England at the beginning of the last century 294 note
Para king of Armenia his history, 408 Is treacherously killed by the Romans 409
Parabolani of Alexandria account of, 821 note
Paradise Mahomet's described 916
Paris description of that city under the government of Juliao 200 Situation of his palace 33, note

Parthia subdued by Artaxerxes king of Persia 81 Its constitution of government similar to the feudal system of Europe 16 Recapitulation of the war with Rome 82
Paschal 11 pope, his troublesome pontificate, 1243
Pastoral manners much better adapted to the fierceness of war, than to peaceful innocence 415
Paternal authority, extent of by the Roman laws 761 Successive limitations of, 765
Patriar extraordinary deliverance of from the Seleucians and Saracens, 997
Patriarchs, the order of, under the Roman republic and under the emperors, compared 242 Under the Greek empire, their rank explained 684
Patriek the tutelar saint of Ireland, derivation of his name 600 note
Patria massacre of the friends of Stilicho there by the instigations of Olympius 498 Is taken by Alboin king of the Lombards, who fixes his residence there 783
Paul of Samosita bishop of Antioch his character and history 22
Paul archbishop of Constantinople his fatal contest with his competitor Macellonius 323
Paula a Roman widow her illustrious descent 502 Was owner of the city of Nicopolis, 504 Her monastic zeal 604
Paulician origin and character of 1013 Are persecuted by the Greek emperors 1015 They are reduced and transplanted to Thraee, 1016 Their present state, 1017
Paulina wife of the tyrant Maximian softens his ferocity by gentle counsels, 60 note
Paulinus, master of the offices to Theodosius the younger, his crime and execution 512
Paulinus bishop of Nola, his history, 519
Paulinus patriarch of Aquileia flies from the Lombards with his treasure into the island of Grado 783
Pegastus the party of, among the Roman civilians explained 759
Pekin the city of, taken by Zingus the Mogul emperor 1160
Pelagian controversy, initiated by the Latin clergy, 491 And in Britain 579
Pella the church of the Nazarenes settled there on the destruction of Jerusalem, 180
Peloponnesus, state of, under the Greek empire 997 Manufactures 998
Penal laws of Rome the abolition and revival of, 775
Pendragon his office and power in Britain 579
Penitentials of the Greek and Latin churches history of, 1070
Pepin king of France assists the pope of Rome against the Lombards 853 Receives the title of king by papal sanction 854 Grants the exarchate to the pope 825
Pepin John count of Minorhino reduces the tribune Rutenzi and restores aristocracy and church government at Rome, 1066
Pepper its high estimation and price at Rome, 511 note
Perennius minister of the emperor Commodus his great exaltation and downfall 35
Persabor a city of Assyria reduced and burned by the emperor Julian 573
Perses king of Persia his fatal expedition against the Nephthalites 679
Persecutions ten of the primitive christians, a review of 220
Perseus amount of the treasures taken from that prince 63
Persia, the monarchy of, restored by Artaxerxes 78 The religion of the Magi reformed, 79 Abridgment of the Persian theology 16 Simplicity of their worship 80 Ceremonies and moral precepts 16 Every other mode of worship prohibited but that of Zoroaster 81 Extent and population of the country 16 Its military power 84 The account of the audience given by the emperor Carus to the ambassadors of the Persians 130 The throne of disputed by the brothers Narses and Hormuz, 147 Galerius defeated by the Persians 16 Narses overthrown in his turn by Galerius 148 Articles of peace agreed on between the Persians and the Romans 149
Perna, war between Sapor king of, and the emperor Constantius 260 Battle of Siogara 16 Sapor invades Mesopotamia 262 The Persian territory invaded by the emperor Julian 571 Passage of the Tigris 576 Julius hasseled in his retreat 579 Treaty of peace between Sapor and the emperor Jovian 83 Reduction of Armenia and death of Sapor 407 408
Persia the silk trade how carried on from China through Persia for the supply of the Roman empire 668 Death of Perozes to an expedition against the white Huns 670 Itelver or the reigns of Cabades and his son Chosroes 720 Anarchy of after the death of Chosroes 11 815 Ecclesiastical history of 836
Persia invaded by the caliph Abubeker, 937 Battle of Cadesia 16 Sack of Ctesiphon 978 Conquest of by the Saracens 978 The Magian religion supplanted by Mahometanism 969 The power of the Arabs crushed by the dynasty of the Bowides, 992 Persia subdued by the Turks, 1066
Persia conquest of, by the Mongols, 1168. By Tamerlane, 1180
Pertinax his character and exaltation to the imperial throne 39 His funeral and apotheosis, 46
Pescennius Niger governor of Syria assumes the imperial dignity on the death of Pertinax, 44
Petrus character of his Dogmatica Theologia 816 note
Peter, brother of the eastern emperor Maurice with a vast army, encountered the dictator Cæsar, declared that they esteemed it not a disgrace to have fled before a people, to whose arms the immortal gods themselves were unequal <sup>p</sup>

<sup>A mixed body of Suevi assume the name of Alemanni,</sup> In the reign of the emperor Caracalla, an innumerable swarm of Suevi appeared on the banks of the Mein, and in the neighbourhood of the Roman provinces, in quest either of food, or plunder, or of glory <sup>q</sup> The hasty army of volunteers gradually coalesced into a great and permanent nation, and, as it was composed from so many different tribes, assumed the name of Alemanni, or All-men, to denote at once their various lineage, and their common bravery <sup>r</sup> The latter was soon felt by the Romans in many a hostile inroad The Alemanni fought chiefly on horseback, but their cavalry was rendered still more formidable by a mixture of light infantry, selected from the bravest and most active of the youth, whom frequent exercise had inured to accompany the horsemen in the longest march, the most rapid charge, or the most precipitate retreat <sup>s</sup>

<sup>invade Gaul and Italy,</sup> This warlike people of Germans had been astonished by the immense preparations of Alexander Severus, they were dismayed by the arms of his successor, a barbarian equal in valour and fierceness to themselves But still hovering on the frontiers of the empire, they increased the general disorder that ensued after the death of Decius They inflicted severe wounds on the rich provinces of Gaul they were the first who removed the veil that covered the feeble majesty of Italy A numerous body of the Alemanni penetrated across the Danube, and through the Rætian Alps, into the plains of Lombardy, advanced as far as Ravenna, and displayed the victorious banners of barbarians almost in sight of Rome <sup>t</sup> The insult and the danger rekindled in the senate some sparks

<sup>are repulsed from Rome by the senate and people</sup> of their ancient virtue Both the emperors were engaged in far distant wars, Valerian in the East, and Gallienus on the Rhine All the hopes and resources of the Romans were in themselves In this emergency the senators resumed the defence of the republic, drew out the prætorian guards, who had been left to garrison the capital, and filled up their numbers, by enlisting into the public service the stoutest and most willing of the plebeians The Alemanni, astonished with the sudden appearance of an army more numerous than their own, retired into Germany, laden with spoil, and their retreat was esteemed as a victory by the unwarlike Romans <sup>u</sup>

<sup>The senators excluded by Gallienus from the military service.</sup> When Gallienus received the intelligence that his capital was delivered from the barbarians, he was much less

delighted than alarmed with the courage of the senate, since it might one day prompt them to rescue the public from domestic tyranny, as well as from foreign invasion His timid ingratitude was published to his subjects, in an edict which prohibited the senators from exercising any military employment, and even from approaching the camps of the legions But his fears were groundless The rich and luxurious nobles, sinking into their natural character, accepted, as a favour, this disgraceful exemption from military service, and as long as they were indulged in the enjoyment of their baths their theatres, and their villas, they cheerfully resigned the more dangerous cares of empire to the rough hands of peasants and soldiers <sup>x</sup>

Another invasion of the Alemanni, <sup>Gallienus contracts an alliance with the Alemanni</sup> of a more formidable aspect, but more glorious event, is mentioned by a writer of the lower empire Three hundred thousand of that warlike people are said to have been vanquished, in a battle near Milan, by Gallienus in person, at the head of only ten thousand Romans <sup>y</sup> We may, however, with great probability, ascribe this incredible victory, either to the credulity of the historian, or to some exaggerated exploits of one of the emperor's lieutenants It was by arms of a very different nature that Gallienus endeavoured to protect Italy from the fury of the Germans He espoused Pipa, the daughter of a king of the Marcomanni, a Suevic tribe, which was often confounded with the Alemanni in their wars and conquests <sup>z</sup> To the father, as the price of his alliance, he granted an ample settlement in Pannonia The native charms of unpolished beauty seem to have fixed the daughter in the affections of the inconstant emperor, and the bands of policy were more firmly connected by those of love But the haughty prejudice of Rome still refused the name of marriage, to the profane mixture of a citizen and a barbarian, and has stigmatized the German princess with the opprobrious title of concubine of Gallienus <sup>a</sup>

III We have already traced the <sup>Inroads of the Goths</sup> emigration of the Goths from Scandinavia, or at least from Prussia, to the mouth of the Borysthenes, and have followed their victorious arms from the Borysthenes to the Danube Under the reigns of Valerian and Gallienus, the frontier of the last-mentioned river was perpetually infested by the inroads of Germans and Sarmatians, but it was defended by the Romans with more than usual firmness and success The provinces that were the seat of war, recruited the armies of Rome with an inexhaustible supply of hardy soldiers, and more than one of these Illyrian peasants attained the station, and displayed the abilities, of a general Though flying parties of the barbarians, who incess-

<sup>p</sup> Cæsar in Bello Gallico iv 7
<sup>q</sup> Victor in Caracal Dion Cassius, lxxvii § 13-50
<sup>r</sup> This etymology (far different from those which amuse the fancy of the learned) is preserved by Asinius Quadratus, an original historian, quoted by Agathias, i c 5
<sup>s</sup> The Suevi engaged Cæsar in this manner, and the manoeuvre deserved the approbation of the conqueror (in Bello Gallico, i 45)

<sup>t</sup> Hist. August p 215, 216 Dexippus in the Excerpta Legationum, p 8 Hieronym Chron Orosius vii 22 <sup>u</sup> Zosimus, i p 34
<sup>x</sup> Aurel Victor, in Gallieno et Probo His complaints breathe an uncommon spirit of freedom <sup>y</sup> Zonaras, i lii p 631
<sup>z</sup> One of the Victors calls him king of the Marcomanni, the other of the Germans
<sup>a</sup> See Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom iii p 398, &c his injurious treatment of the citizens of Asia

Munition and fight from thence, 801
Peter I ear of Russia, his conduct towards his son contrasted with that of Constantine the Great, 259
Peter of Aragon, assumes the kingdom of Sicily, 1153
Petrus Bartholomew his miraculous discovery of the holy lance 1084 His strange death, 16
Peter of Courtenay, emperor of Constantinople, 1131
Peter the hermit, his character and scheme to recover the Holy Land from the infidels, 1066 Leads the first crusaders, 1072 Failure of his raid, 1183
P the city of taken by the Persians, 728 Is blessed by the Romans, 16 Is demolished 729
Petrarch his studies and literary character 1208 and history, 1238 His account of the ruin of the ancient buildings of Rome 1241
Pfaff character of his history of Germany, 899, 12
Pfaff Greece, compared with the Roman legion, 6
Pharand the actions, and foundation of the French monarchy by him, of doubtful authority, 527
Pharast commands the Heruli, in the African war, under Belisarius 686 Pursues Gelimer, 693 His letter to Gelimer 16
Pharast, account of that sect among the Jews, 19
Pharast, river, its course described, 725
Pharast, derivation of the name of that herd 76
Pharast, Francis, his character of the Greek language of Constantinople 1207
Philip I of France, his limited dignity and power 1068
Philip Augustus, of France, engages in the third crusade, 1101
Philip praetorian prefect under the third Gon-tarian raised to the empire on his death 76 Was a labourer of the christians 221
Philip praetorian prefect of Constantinople conveys the bishop Paul into banishment clandestinely, 378
Philippicus emperor of Constantinople, 850
Philippopolis taken and sacked by the Goths, 98
Philo, a character of his works, 309
Philosophy Grecian review of the various sects of 12
Phineus, the situation of his palace 234
Phoenicia is settled by Genoese, who trade in alum, 1141 Phocas a centurion is chosen emperor by the dissatisfied troops of the eastern empire, 603 Murders of the emperor Maurice and his children 604 His character, 16 His fall, and death, 605
Phocaea described 10
Phoebus the son of Antoninus distinguishes himself at the siege of Naples, 711 Is exiled 16
Betrays his mother's vices to Belisarius, 712
Turns monk 16
Phoebus, the patrician kills himself to escape the persecution of Justinian 831
Phoebus patriarch of Constantinople character of his Library 1010 His quarrel with the pope of Rome 1108
Phranza George the Greek historian some account of 1200 note His embassies 1202 His fate on the taking of Constantinople by the Turks 1236
Picardy derivation of the name of that province, 1066 note
Pilate Pontius, his testimony in favour of Jesus Christ much improved by the primitive fathers, 100
Pilpay's fables history and character of 722
Pinna marina a kind of silk manufactured from the threads spun by this fish, by the Romans 668 Pipa a princess of the Marcomanni, espoused by the emperor Gallienus 303
Piso Calpurnius one of the competitors against Gallienus, his illustrious family and character, 110
Pistum, the city of destroyed by the Goths 104
Placidia, daughter of Theodosius the Great her history and marriage with Adolphus king of the Goths 221 Is injuriously treated by the usurper
Symelic after the death of her husband 56
Her marriage with Constantius and retreat to Constantinople 514 515 Her administration in the west, as guardian of her son the emperor Valentinian 11 516 History of her daughter Honorata 561 Her death and burial 571 note
Plague origin and nature of this disease 70 Great extent and long duration of that in the reign of Justinian 72
Plato, his philosophical system 309 Is received by the Alexandrian Jews 16 And expounded by St John the Evangelist 310 The theological system of the emperor Julian, 350
Platonius philosophy introduced into Italy 1211
Platonius new, an account of 157 Unite with the heretic priests to oppose the Christians 204
Platanius praetorian prefect under the emperor
Severus his history, 50
Platanius of Rome state and character of, 507
Pliny the younger examination of his conduct towards the christians 213
Poet laureat a ridiculous appointment 1250 note
Poggus his reflections on the ruin of ancient Rome 176
Pontiers battle of between Clovis king of the Franks and Alaric king of the Goths 473
Pollentia battle of between Stilicho the Roman general and Alaric the Goth 488
Polytheism of the Romans its origin and effects, 1111 Accounted for by the primitive Christians 182 Scepticism of the people at the time of the publication of Christianity 198 The christians why more odious to the pagans than the Jews 26

the ruin of suspended by the divisions among christians, 332 Theological system of the emperor Julian, 350
review of the pagan ecclesiastical establishment, 402 Revival of, by the christian monks 471
Pompetianus prefect of Rome proposes to drive
Alaric from the walls by spells 510
Pompetianus Ruricius general under Maxentius defeated and killed by Constantine the Great 167
Pompey his discretionary exercise of power during his command in the east 25 Increase of the tributes of Asia by his conquests 61
Pontiffs pagan their jurisdiction 402
Pontiffes Maximus, in pagan Rome, by whom that office was exercised 301
Popes of Rome the growth of their power 879 Revolt of, from the Greek emperors, 880 Origin of their temporal dominion 885 Publication of the Decretals and of the fictitious donation of Constantine the Great 886 Authority of the German emperors in their election 895 Violent disturbances in their election 16
Popes, foundation of their authority at Rome 1242 Their mode of election settled, 1252 Schism in the papacy 1269 They acquire the absolute dominion of Rome, 1274 The ecclesiastical government 1275
Population of Rome, a computation of 509
Porcarius Stephen his conspiracy at Rome 1273
Posthumus the Roman general under the emperor Gallienus defends Gaul against the incursions of the Franks 102
Power, absolute, the exercise of, how checked, 1006
Praetor of the sacred bed-chamber, under Constantine the Great his office 240
Praetors of Rome and Constantinople under the emperors the nature of their offices 243 The office revived at Rome 1248
Praetorian prefect of Rome under Valentinian, his character, 308
Praetorian hands in the Roman army an account of, 42 They sell the empire of Rome by public auction 16 Are disgraced by the emperor Severus 46 A new establishment of them, 49 Authority of the praetorian prefect, 50 Are reduced their privileges abolished and their place supplied by the Jovians and Herculeans, 151 Their desperate courage under Maxentius 168 Are totally suppressed by Constantine the Great, 169
Praetorian prefect revolutions of this office under the emperors 242 Their functions when it became a civil office 243
Praetors of Rome, the nature and tendency of their edicts explained, 755
Preaching a form of devotion unknown in the temples of paganism 305 Use and abuse of 306
Predetermination, influence of the doctrine of, on the Saracens and Turks 920
Prethymers among the primitive christians, the office explained 193
Prester John origin of the romantic stories concerning 637
Preists, no distinct order of men among the ancient pagans, 198 301
Priestley Dr the ultimate tendency of his opinions pointed out 1019 note
Primogeniture the prerogative of, unknown to the Roman law 770
Prince of the waters in Persia his office 721 note Priscillian bishop of Avila in Spain is, with his followers put to death for heresy 448
Priscus, the historian his conversation with a captive Greek in the camp of Attila, 508 His character 560 note
Priscus the Greek general his successes against the Avars, 800
Prisca widow of the prefect Petronius her flight from the sack of Rome by Alaric, 517
Probus assumes the imperial dignity in opposition to Florianus 120 His character and history 130
Probus, praetorian prefect of Illyricum preserves
Sirmium from the Quadi 412
Probus Scurius his embassy from the emperor Diocletian to Narses king of Persia 149
Proclus John of instigates the revolt of Sicily from John of Asopu 1150
Proclus, story of his extraordinary brazen mirror, 671 Proclus the Platonic philosopher of Athens, his superstition 682
Proconsuls of Asia, Aethiopia, and Africa, their office, 244
Procopius wife of the Greek emperor Michael I her marital inclinations 254
Procopius his history and revolt against Valens, emperor of the east 301 Is reduced and put to death 302 His account of the testament of the emperor Arcadius 510 His account of Britain 610 Character of his history 660 Accepts the office of secretary under Belisarius 685 His defence of the Roman archers 686 His account of the desolation of the African province by war, 734
Proculus origin of the sect of, in the Roman civil law 750
Proculus, his extraordinary character and his rebellion against Probus in Gaul 733 Prodigies in ancient history, a philosophical resolution of 296
Promises under what circumstances the Roman law enforced the fulfilment of 772
Prometheus master general of the infantry, under Theodosius, is ruined by the enmity of Rufinus, 473

Property, personal, the origin of, 769 How ascertained by the Roman laws, 16 Testamentary dispositions of, how introduced, 770
Prophets their office among the primitive Christians 192
Proponius described 234
Proterius patriarch at Alexandria his martial episcopacy, and violent death 828 829
Protestants, their resistance of oppression, not consistent with the practice of the primitive christians, 203 Proportion of their number to that of the catholics, in France, at the beginning of the last century 293 note Estimate of their reformation of popery, 1018
Protoschistos, import of that title in the Greek empire 1001
Proverbs the book of why not likely to be the production of King Solomon 691, note
Provinces of the Roman empire described 8 Distinction between Latin and Greek provinces 15 Account of the tributes received from 63 Their number and government after the seat of empire was removed to Constantinople, 244
Prusa, conquest of, by the Ottomans 1172
Prussia, emigration of the Goths to, 96
Pulcheria, sister of the emperor Theodosius the younger her character and administration 540
Her lessons to her brother 541 Her contests with the empress Eudocia, 542 Is proclaimed empress of the east, on the death of Theodosius, 560 Her death and canonization, 590
Purple, the royal colour of, among the ancients, far surpassed by the modern discovery of cochineal, 667, note
Pygmies of Africa, ancient fabulous account of 407

Q

Quadi the inroads of, punished by the emperor Constantian 280 Revenge the treacherous murder of their king Gabinius 411
Quaestor historical review of this office 240
Quaestum, criminal how exercised under the Roman emperors, 251
Quintilian brothers, Maximus and Condianus, their history, 35
Quintilius, brother of the emperor Claudius, his ineffectual effort to succeed him 116
Quintus Curtius, an attempt to decide the age in which he wrote, 76 note
Quirites, the effect of that word when opposed to soldiers, 62, note

R

Radagaisus, king of the Goths his formidable invasion of Italy, 402 His savage character, 16 Is reduced by Stilicho, and put to death 403
Radiger, king of the Varns compelled to fulfil his matrimonial obligations by a British heroine 611
Ramadan the month of how observed by the Turks, 915
Randi a chieftain of the Alemanni his unprovoked attack of Moguntiacum 400
Ravenna, the ancient city of, described 490 The emperor Honorius fixes his residence there 16 Invasion of, by a Greek fleet 831 Is taken by the Lombards, and recovered by the Venetians 882 Total conquest of, by the Lombards 883
The exarchate of bestowed by Pepin on the pope 885
Raymond of Thoulouse the crusader, his character 1074 His route to Constantinople, 1076 His bold behaviour there, 1078
Raymond, count of Tripoli betrays Jerusalem in to the hands of Saladin 1099
Raynal abbe, mistaken in asserting that Constantine the Great suppressed pagan worship, 331
Rebels who the most inordinate of, 1015
Reccard the first catholic king of Spain, converts his Gothic subjects 616
Reformation from popery, the amount of estimated, 1018 A secret reformation still working in the reformed churches 1019
Rein-deer, this animal driven northward by the improvement of climate from cultivation 86
Relics the worship of, introduced by the monks, 470 A valuable cargo of, imported from Constantinople by Louis IX. of France, 1134
Remigius, bishop of Rheims, converts Clovis, king of the Franks 621
Repentance its high esteem, and extensive operation among the primitive christians 189 Resurrection, general, the Mahometan doctrine of, 915
Retiarius, the mode of his combat with the secutor, in the Roman amphitheatre 38
Reveries of the primitive church, how distributed 106 304 Of the Roman empire when removed to Constantinople a review of 252
Rheteum city of, its situation, 235
Rhathia described 9
Rha-ater, the Persian general defeated and killed by the emperor Heraclius 813
Rhetoric the study of congenial to a popular state 681
Rhine the banks of, fortified by the emperor Va-lentinian, 400
Rhodes, account of the colossus of, 42 The knights of 1173
Richard I of England engages in the third crusade 1101 Restores the island of Cyprus on the house of Lusignan 1111 His reply to the exhortations of Iulk of Neuilly, 1112
Richard monk of Cirencester, his literary character 578, note
Ricimer count his history, 584 Permits Alaric to assume the imperial dignity in the western empire 505 Enjoys supreme power under cover of the name of the emperor Labus betrays 583 Alters the constitution of the emperor Anthemius 591 Sacks Rome and kills Anthemius 597 His death 15

Rienzi Nicholas di his birth, character and history, 1260

Ronds Roman the construction and great extent of 20

Robert of Courtenay, emperor of Constantinople 1132

Robert count of Flanders, his character and engagement in the first crusade 1074

Robert duke of Normandy his character and engagement in the first crusade 1074 Recalled by the emperor of the church 1083

Roderic the Gothic king of Spain, his defeat and death by Tarik the Arab 601

Redigunt probable origin of her character, in Howe's Royal Convert 641 note

Roger count of Sicily his exploits, and conquest of that island, 1040

Roger, son of the former the first king of Sicily, 1047 His military achievements in Africa and Greece, 1048

Roger de Flor engages as an auxiliary in the service of the Greek emperor Andronicus 1151 His assassination 1152

Romanus I Lecapenus, emperor of Constantinople 860

Romanus II emperor of Constantinople 861

Romanus III Argyrus emperor of Constantinople 863

Romanus IV Diogenes emperor of Constantinople, 865 Is defeated and taken prisoner by the Turkish sultan Alp Arslan 1039 His treatment and deliverance and death 15

Romanus count, Governor of Africa, his corrupt administration 405

Romanus governor of Bosra, betrays it to the Saracens 942

Rome the three periods of its decline pointed out Preface 15 Its prosperous circumstances in the second century 16 The principal conquests of achieved under the republic 16 Conquests under the emperors 2 Military establishment of the emperors 4 Naval force of the empire 7 View of the provinces of the empire, 8 Its general extent 11 The union and internal prosperity of the empire in the age of the Antonines accounted for, 16 Treatment of the provinces 14 Benefits included in the freedom of the city 15 Distinction between the Latin and Greek provinces 16 Prevalence of the Greek as a scientific language 16 Numbers and condition of the Roman slaves 16 Populousness of the empire 17 Unity and power of the government 18 Monuments of Roman architecture, 18 The Roman magnificence chiefly displayed in public buildings 19 Principal cities in the empire, 19 Public roads 20 Great improvements of agriculture in the western countries of the empire, 21 Arts of luxury, 20 Commerce with the east 21 Contemporary representation of the prosperity of the empire 23 Decline of courage and genius 24 Review of public affairs after the battle of Actium 24 The imperial power and dignity confirmed to Augustus by the senate 25 The various characters and powers vested in the emperor, 26 General idea of the imperial system 27 Abortive attempt of the senate to resume its rights after the murder of Caligula 29 The emperors associate their intended successors to power 16 The most happy period in the Roman history pointed out 31 Their peculiar misery under their tyrants 32 The empire publicly sold by auction by the pretorian guards 42 Civil wars of the Romans how generally decided 47 When the army first received regular pay 61 How the citizens were relieved from taxation 16 General estimate of the Roman revenue from the provinces 64 Miseries flowing from the succession to the empire being elective 67 A summary review of the Roman history 77 Recapitulation of the war with Parthia 82 Invasion of the provinces by the Goths 93 The office of censor revived by the emperor Decius 14 Peace purchased of the Goths 100 The emperor Valerian taken prisoner by Sapor king of Persia 107 The popular conceit of the thirty tyrants of Rome investigated 109 Famine and pestilence throughout the empire 112 The city fortified against the invasions of the Alemanni 119 Remarks on the alleged sedition of the officers of the mint under Aurelian 125 Observations on the peaceful interregnum after the death of Aurelian 126 Colonies of barbarians introduced into the provinces by Probus 132 Establishment of the public games by Carinus 137 Treaty of peace between the Persians and the Romans 140 The last triumph celebrated at Rome, 150 How the imperial courts came to be transferred to Milan and Nicomedia 151 The pretorian bands superseded by the Jovian and Herulian guards 16 The power of the senate annihilated 152 Four divisions of the empire under four conjunct princes 153 Their expensive establishments call for more numerous taxes 154 Diocletian and Maximian abdicate the empire, 154 Six emperors existing at one time 163 The senate and people apply to Constantine to deliver them from the tyrants of Maximian 166 Constantine enters the city victorious 169 Laws of Constantine, 174 Constantine remains sole emperor 176 His story of the progress and establishment of Christianity 18 Pretensions of the bishop of Rome whence deduced 194 State of the church at Rome at the time of the persecution by Nero 206 Narrative of the fire of Rome in the reign of Nero, 10 The Christians persecuted at the incendiariness 16 The memorable edicts of Diocletian and his associates against the Christians 226

Account of the building and establishment of the rivin city of Constantinople 233 New forms of administration established there 240 Division of the empire among the sons of Constantine, 265 Establishment of Christianity as the national religion, 300 Jewels excited by the rival bishops, Liberius and Felix, 321. Paganism restored by Julian 333 And Christianity by Julian 387 The empire divided into the east and west by the emperor Valentinian, 390 Civil institutions of Valentinian, 394 The crafty advance of the clergy restrained by Valentinian, 397 Bloody contest of Damasus and Ursinus for the bishopric of Rome, 393 Great earthquake, 414

The emperor Theodosius visits the city, 433 Inquiry into the cause of the corruption of morals in his reign, 461 Review of the pagan establishment 462 The pagan religion renounced by the senate 464 Sacrifices prohibited, 465 The pagan prohibited 468 Triumph of Honorius and Stilicho over Alaric the Goth 489 Alaric encamps under the walls of the city, 502 Retrospect of the state of the city when besieged by Hunnib, 16 Wealth of the nobles and magnificence of the city, 503 Character of the nobles of by Aemilius Marcellinus 501 State and character of the common people, 507 Public distributions of bread &c 508 Public baths 16 Games and spectacles 16 Attempts to ascertain the population of the city 509 The citizens suffer by famine, 510 Plague 16 The retreat of Alaric purchased by a ransom 511 Is again besieged by Alaric 513 The senate unites with him in electing Attalus emperor 514 The city seized by Alaric and plundered 515 Compromise between this event and the sack of Rome by the emperor Charles V 518 Alaric quits Rome and ravages Italy 16 Laws issued in consequence of the same, and Italy, 521 Triumph of Honorius for the reduction of Sicily by Valerius 526 Is preserved from the hands of Attila by a ransom 526 Imitations of the ruin of the empire at the death of Valentinian 111 528 Sack of the city by Genseric king of the Vandals, 580 The public buildings of protected from depredation by the laws of Majorian 586 Is sacked again by the pretorian Ricimer 597 Augustulus the last emperor of the west 598 The decay of the Roman spirit remarked 600 History of monastic institutions in 603 General observations on the history of the Roman empire 642

648 Conquest of the city under his government 651 Account of the four lactions in the circus 664 First introduction of silk among the Romans 668 The office of consul suppressed by Justinian, 683 The city receives Heliarius, 701 Siege of by the Goths 16 Distressful siege of by Totila the Goth 736 Is taken 737 Is recovered by Belisarius 738 Is again taken by Totila 740 Is taken by the eunuch Narses 747 Extinction of the senate, 16 The city degraded to the second rank under the exarchs of Ravenna 746 A review of the Roman empire 752 Extent of the duchy of under the exarchs of Ravenna 783 Visceral estate of the city 791 Pontificate of Gregory the Great 792

The government of the city new modelled under the popes after their revolt from the Greek emperors 881 Is attacked by the Lombards, and delivered by king Pepin 883 The office and rank of exarchs and patriarchs explained 884 Reception of Charlemagne by pope Adrian 16 Origin of the temporal power of the popes, 885 Mode of electing a pope 895 Is menaced by the Saracens 906 Procopius pontificate of Leo IV 967 Is besieged and taken by the emperor Henry, 111 1046 Great part of the city burnt by Robert Guiscard in the cause of pope Gregory 111 16

The history of, resumed after the capture of Constantinople by the Turks 1241 French and German emperors of 1242 Authority of the popes 16 Restoration of the republican form of government 1247 Office of senator 1249 Wars against the neighbouring cities 1251 Institution of the jubilee, 1255 Revolution in the city by the tribune Rienzi 1260 Calumnies flowing from the schism of the popes 1270 Statutes and government of the city 1270 For a conspiracy 1273 The ecclesiastical government of 1275 Reflections of Poggius on the ruin of the city, 1276 Four principal causes of its ruin specified 1277 The coliseum of Titus 1281 Restoration and ornaments of the city 1284

Romilda, the betrayer of Trull to the Avars, her cruel treatment by them 808

Rosamond daughter of Cunlunda king of the Goid, her marriage with Albion king of the Lombards 781 Conspires his murder 783 Her flight and death 784

Rom the Seljukian kingdom of formed 1062

Rudbeck Olaus summary abridgment of the argument in his Atlantica 17

Rufinus the conculsum minister of the emperor Theodosius the Great simulates his cruelty against Theodosius, 406 His character and administration 473 His death, 478

Rugilas the Hun his settlement in Hungary 553

Runic characters the antiquity of traced 87

Russia origin of the monarchy of 1095 Geography and trade of 1096 Naval expeditions of the Russians against Constantinople 1097 Return of the czar Swastostius 1099 The Russians converted to Christianity 1099 Is conquered by the Moguls, 1168

Rustan a Persian nobleman, a saying of his, expressive of the danger of living under despotism 480, 481

Ruthus, his character of the monks of Cyprus 480, 481

S

Sabellius the heresiarch his opinions afterwards adopted by his antagonists 312 His doctrine of the Trinity 313 The Sabellians unite with the Trinitarians at the council of Nice to overpower the Arians 314

Sabians their astronomical mythology 908

Sabinus obtains the command of the eastern provinces from Constantius, 784

Sabinian general of the east, is defeated by the Goth the Ostrogoth king of Italy, 651

Sabinianus origin of the sect of, in the 16th century 151

Sadducees, account of their doctrine 151

Saladin his birth, promotion and death 1097 Conquers the kingdom of Jerusalem 1187 Intellectual siege of Tyre, 1100 Is killed 1101 His negotiations with Richard I of England 1102 His death 1103

Salerno account of the medical school of, 1010

Salic laws history of 67

Salustius the praetor, and friend of the emperor Julian, declines the offer of the diadem on his death 331 Declines it again on the death of Julian 389 Is retained in his employment by the emperor Valentinian 390

Salutis the historian, by what funds he raised his price on the Quirinal hill, 517 note

Salvus the retreat of the emperor Diocletian described 145

Salvian his account of the distress and rebellion of the Illyria 579 note

Samaritans the Saracen dynasty of 691

Samaritanus, persecution and extinction of, by the emperor Justinian 690

Samaritanus the prophet his ashes conveyed to Constantinople 670

Sapor king of Persia procures the assassination of Chosroes, king of Armenia and seizes the country 107 Delays the emperor Valerian and takes him prisoner, 16 Sets up Cyprianus as successor to Valerian in the Roman empire, 108 Overruns Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, 16 His death 122

Sapor the son of Hormouz is crowned king of Persia before his birth, 265 His character an early heroism, 16 Harasses the eastern provinces of the Roman empire, 266 Battle of Mesopotamia against the emperor Constantius 16 His son brutally killed by Constantius 107 His general attempts on Naples 16 Concludes a truce with Constantius 16 His haughty propositions to Constantius 281 Invades Mesopotamia 282 Reduces Amida 283 Returns home, 16 His peculiar overtures to the emperor Julian, 266 His consternation at the successes of Julian 277 Harasses the retreat of the Romans 279 His treaty with the emperor Julian 285 His reduction of Armenia, and death 417 408

Saracens, various definitions of that appellation 60

Saracens successions of the caliphs of 690 Their rapid conquests 936 Conquest of Persia, 939 Siege of Damascus 942 Battle of Yermuk and conquest of Syria 947 Of Egypt, 942 Invasions of Africa 948 Their military character 1007

Sarbar the Persian general joins the Avars in besieging Constantinople 612 Revolts to the emperor Heraclius 813

Sardinia expulsion of the Vandals from by Narsetius 592 Is conquered by Vano the brother of Genseric king of the Vandals 691 Is surrendered to Belisarius, 699

Sarmatians memorable defeat of by the emperor Carus 14 The manner described 61 Brief history of, 60 They apply to Constantine the Great for assistance against the Goths 16 Are expelled their country by the Jovian emperors 203 Are restored by Constantius 281

Savage manners, a brief view of 18 Are more uniform than those of civilized nations 414

Sarus the Goth plunders the camp of Stilicho and carries him into the hands of the emperor at Ravenna 408 Results Alaric and concludes the sacking of Rome 516 Is killed by Asol Julius king of the Visigoths 544

Saturninus, one of the competitors for empire against Gallienus, his observation on his imposture 110

Saturninus lieutenant under the emperor Probus in the east is driven into rebellion by his troops, 133

Saxons ancient an account of, 401 Their political confederations 402 Their invasions of Gaul checked by the Romans 16 How converted to Christianity 610 Descent of the Saxons on Britain 636 Their brutal desolation of the country 638, 639

Scanderberg prince of Albania his history 1000

Scandinavia the of the Romans, account of, 776

Scavrus the patrician family or, how reduced under the emperors 242 note

Scythia in religion the origin of traced 181

Scythians reducible to four classes 209

Scythians their national character 715 Their barbarous roving on the eastern empire, 716 Of Dalmatia account of 1021

Scots and Picts the nations of how distinguished 400 403 Invasions of Britain by 403

Scythians this name variously applied to mixed tribes of barbarians 106 Their pastoral manners 414 Extent and boundaries of Scythia

Reolutions of 401 Their mode of war, master general of the infantry under emperor Valens his successful expedition against the Goths, 440 Is killed in the battle of Hadrumetum 431
 - basilius, the brother of the usurper Iovinus is associated with him in his assumed imperial titles 524
basileus import of that title in the Greek empire, 1001
 - in Normandy, the bishop, and chapter of,
 all castrated 1244 note
basileus the princes of, support their independency obstinately against Artaxerxes 81, note
basileus emperor of Abyssinia is with his whole court converted by the Jesuits 814
basileus, his sententious character of transubstantia-tion 874 note
basileus, the great city of ruined by the Romans, 82 basileus, Nicator, number of cities founded by him 81, note
basileus, Turkish dynasty of the house of, 1056 Division of their empire 1002
basileus legal and military import of that term, 1118 note
Severus Septimius general of the Pannonian legions assumes the purple on the death of Pertinax, 45. His conduct towards the christians, 221
Severus of Rome is reformed by Augustus, 24 Its legislative and judicial powers, 27 Abortive attempt of to resume its rights after the murder of Caligula 29 Its legal jurisdiction over the emperors 40 Is subjected to military despotism, by Severus 50 Women excluded from this assembly by a solemn law 60 The form of a secret meeting, 71 Measures taken to support the authority of the two Gordians 15 The senate elect Maximus and Balbinus emperors on the death of the Gordians 72 They drive the Alemanni out of Italy, 103 The senators forbid to exercise military employments by Calig-nus 16 Elect Tacitus the father of the senate emperor 127. Prerogatives gained to the senate by his election 128 Their power and authority annihilated by Diocletian 151
 - amount of the coronary gold, or customary free gift of to the emperors 256 The claim of Julian to the empire admitted, 340
 - petitions of to the emperors, for the restoration of the altar of Victory 463 The pagan religion renounced 464 Debates of, on the proposals of Alaric the Goth 497 Cenealogy of the senators 502 Passes a decree for putting to death Serena the widow of Stilicho 510 Under the influence of Alaric, elects Attalus emperor 514 Trial of Arvandus a pretorian prefect of Gaul, 535 Surrenders the sovereign power of Italy to the emperor of the east 599
 - extinction of that illustrious assembly, 743 restoration of in the twelfth century, 1247
 The assembly resolved into single magistrates, 1249
Scraper his lamentation for the loss of a person died 818
Scraper history of his worship, and of his temple at Alexandria, 466 The temple destroyed, 467
Serena niece of the emperor Theodosius married to his general Stilicho 477 Is cruelly strangled by order of the Roman senate 510
Secerinus St. excommunicates Odoacer to assume the dominion of Italy, 599 His body how disposed of, 600 note
Severus is declared Caesar on the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian, 128 His defeat and death 161
Severus is appointed general of the cavalry in Gaul under Julian 286
Shepherds and warriors, their respective modes of life compared, 415
Shites, a sect of Mahometans, their distinction from the Sunnites 929
Siberia extreme coldness of the climate and miserable state of the natives of 419 Is seized and occupied by the Tartars 1169
Sicily, reflections on the distractions in that island 111 Is conquered by the Saracens 825 Introduction of the silk manufacture there 998 Exploits of the Normans there 1035 Is conquered by Count Roger 1040 Roger, son of the former made king of 1047 Return of William the Bad, 1061 Return of William the Good 1062 Conquest of, by the emperor Henry VI 1062 Is subdued by Charles of Anjou, 1149 The Sicilian Vexsers 1150
Sidonius Apollinaris the poet, his humorous treatment of the capitulation 254 His character of Theodoric king of the Visigoths in Gaul, 582 His panegyric on the emperor Avitus 584 His panegyric on the emperor Anthemius 591
Sigismund kin. of the Burgundians murders his son and is canonized 623 Is overwhelmed by an army of Franks, 16
Silentiarius Paul his account of the various species of stone and marble employed in the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, 675, note
Silk first manufactured in China and then in the small Cretean island of Cos 668. A peculiar kind of silk procured from the pinna marina 16
 The silk worm, how introduced to Greece 669 Progress of the manufacture of in the tenth century 994
Simeon persecutor of the Paulicians becomes a proselyte to their opinions 1014
Simeon king of Bulgaria his exploits 1021
Simeon St. his hermit, his extraordinary mode of life 68
Simony an early instance of, 222 note

Simplex one of the last surviving pagan philosophers of Athens, his writings, and character, 683
Singara battle of between the emperor Constantus and Sapor king of Persia 260 The city of reduced by Sapor, 283 Is yielded to him by Jovian 383
Singerie, brother of Sarus, is made king of the Goths, 526
Singidunum is perfidiously taken by Baias chagan of the Avars 800
Sirmium is perfidiously taken by Baias chagan of the Avars 801
Sirex deposes and murders his father Chosroes II king of Persia 815 His treaty of peace with the emperor Iheraclius 16
Sisebut, a Gothic king of Spain persecutes the Jews
 there, 517
Sixtus V pope, character of his administration, 1275 Slave strange perversion of the original sense of that appellation 1070
Slaves among the Romans, who, and their condition described, 16
Slavery personal imposed on captives by the barbarous nations, 630
Sleepers Seven, narrative of the legendary tale of 532
Smyrna capture of, by Tamerlane, 1185
Society, philosophical reflections on the revolutions of, 644
Soffarides the Saracen dynasty of, 991
Soldiers Roman their obligations and discipline,
 4 When they first received regular pay, 63
Soliman, sultan, conquers Asia Minor 1062 Fixes his residence at Nice, 1063 Nice taken by the first crusaders 1080 Battle of Durylaenum, 16
Soliman the son of Bajazet his character 1190
 His alliance with the Greek emperor Manuel Palaeologus 1192
Solomon, king of the Jews not the author of the book which bears the name of his Wisdom 309 Reasons for supposing he did not write either the book of Ecclesiastes or the Proverbs, 694
 note
Solomon the eunuch relieves the Roman province in Africa from the depredations of the Moors 645 Revolt of his troops at Carthage 733 Is defeated and killed by Antalus the Moor 734
Solyman caliph of the Saracens undertakes the siege of Constantinople, 973 His enormous appenite, and death 974
Sunnites, in the Mahometan religion, their tenets, 929
Sapor a Syrian philosopher beheaded by Constantine the Great on a charge of binding the wind by magic 321 note
Sophia the widow of Iustin II her conspiracy against the emperor Tiberius, 785
Sophia St. foundation of the church of, at Constantinople 674 Its description, 16 Is converted into a mosque 1243
Sophian the Arab commands the first siege of Constantinople 972
Sophronia a Roman matron, kills herself to escape the violence of Valentinus 165 note
Sortes Sanctorum a mode of christian divination, adopted from the pagans 624 note
Soul, uncertain opinions of the ancient philosophers as to the immortality of, 164 This doctrine more generally received among the barbarous nations and for what reason 16 Was not taught by Moses 125 Four different prevailing doctrines as to the origin of 817 note Sosiphetra destroyed by the Greek emperor Theophylus 983
Spain the province of described, 8. Great revenues raised from this province by the Romans 64 Is ravaged by the Franks 102
 - Review of the history of 524 Is invaded by the barbarous nations 525 The invaders conquered by Wallia king of the Goths 576 Successes of the Vandals there 541 Expedition of Theodoric king of the Visigoths into, 583
 The christian religion received there 615 Revolt and martyrdom of Hermenegild 616 Persecution of the Jews in, 617 Legislative assemblies of 634
 - acquisitions of Justinian there 696
 - state of under the emperor Charlemagne 801 First introduction of the Arabs into the country 922 Defeat and death of Roderic the Gothic king of, 964 Conquest of by Musa 965 Its prosperity under the Saracens 968 The christian faith there supplanted by that of Mahomet 16 The throne of Cordova filled by Abdulkrahman 970
Stadium olympic the races of, compared with those in the Roman circus 661
Stauracius, emperor of Constantinople 854
Stephen, a freedman of Domitilla, a sassinale the emperor Domitian 213
Stephen, count of Chartres his character and engagement in the first crusade, 1074 Deserts his standard 1083
Stephen, St. the first christian martyr miraculo-us discovery of his body and the miracles worked by it 471
Stephen the Savaire sent by the Greek emperor Justinian II to exterminate the Chersonites 850
Stephen III pope solicits the aid of Pepin king of France against the Lombards under the character of St Peter 883 Crowns king Pepin, 884
Stilicho the great general of the western empire under the emperor Honorius his character 476 Put to death Rufinus the tyrannical prefect of the east, 478 His expedition against Alaric in Greece 484 His diligent endeavours to check his progress in Italy, 467 Defeats Alaric at Pollentia, 488. Drives him out of Italy, 489 His triumph at Rome, 16 His preparations to oppose the invasion of Radagaisus 492 Reduces and puts him to death, 493 Supports the claims of Alaric in the Italian senate, 497 Is put to death at Ravenna, 499 His memory persecuted 16

Stroza heads the revolted troops of the emperor Jus-tinian in Africa 733
Strasbourg battle of, between Julian and the Ale-manni, 286
Successianus defends the Roman frontier against the Goths 104
Sueri the origin and renown of 102
Swicide applauded and pitted by the Romans 778
Sulpicius Serenus, was the highest improver of the Roman jurisprudence 758
Sultan origin and import of this title of eastern sovereignty 1053
Sumat description of the Pazoda of in Guzarat, and its destruction by sultan Mahmud 1054 Sum the worship introduced at Rome by the emperor Elagabalus 589 Was the peculiar object of the devotion of Constantine the Great before his conversion, 291 And of Julian, after his apostasy, 351
Sua the city of, taken by Constantine the Great 167
Szaratians, czar of Russia his reign 1029
Szazs cantons the confederacy of how far similar to that of the ancient Franks 100
Sword of Mary the sacred weapon of the Huns history of, 554
Syagrius, king of the Franks and Burgundians his character 610 Is conquered by Clovis 620
Sulla the dictator his legislative character, 775
Syllanus the consul his speech to the senate, recommending the election of the two Gordians to their approbation 71
Syllania sister of the praefect Rufinus, her uncommon sanctity 478 note
Sylranus general in Gaul under Constantius, is ruined by treachery, 278
Sylverius pope, is degraded and sent into exile by Helisarius for an attempt to betray the city of Rome to the Goths, 705 His death, 735 note
Symmachus, his account of the pagan conformity of the emperor Constantius, during his visit to Rome, 339 Pleads in behalf of the ancient pagan religion of Rome, to the emperor Valentinian, 463
Synesius, bishop of Ptolemais, excommunicates the president Andronicus 305 His extraordinary character, 16 note His advice to the eastern emperor Arcadius 485
Synods provincial, in the primitive churches institution of 193 Nature of those assemblies 306
 See Councils
Syria its revolutions and extent, 10 Is reduced by Chosroes II king of Persia 806 General description of 916 Is conquered by the Sara-cens 447 Invasion of, by Tamerlane 1183
Syriac language where spoken in the greatest purity, 83, note
Syrtanus duke of Egypt, surprises the city of Alexandria and expels Athanasius the primate of Egypt, 325

T

Tabari the Arabian historian, account of his work, 976, note
Tabenne, the island of in Upper Thebais, is settled with monks by Pachomius 603
Table of emerald, in the Gothic treasury in Spain, account of 521
Tacitus emperor his election and character, 127
Tacitus the historian his character of the principles of the Portico 31 note The intention of his episodes, 78 His character as an historian, 85 His account of the ancient Germans 87 His history, how preserved and transmitted down to us 121, note His account of the persecution of the christians as the incendiaries of Rome, 210
Tactics of Leo and Constantine character of 995
 Military character of the Greeks 1006
Tagnia, battle of between the eunuch Narses, and Loula kin. of the Goths in Italy 742
Taherites the Saracen dynasty of, 991
Tamerlane his birth, reign and conquests, 1150
 His letter to Bajazet, 1183 His conference with the doctors of the law at Aleppo, 1181 Defeats and takes Bajazet prisoner, 1185 How kept out of Europe 1187 His triumph at Samarcand 1188 Dies on a march to China, 1189 His character 16
Tamered the crusader, his character 1074 His bold behaviour at Constantinople 1078
Tarasmus secretary to the empress Irene made patriarch of Constantinople 887 Presides at and frames the decrees of the second council of Nice 16
Taril the Arab, his descent on Spain 964 Defeats and kills Roderic the Gothic king of, 16
 His disgrace, 966 967
Tarragona the city of, almost destroyed by the Franks, 102
Tartars See Scythians
Tartary, eastern conquest of by Tamerlane 1181
Tatian and his son Proculus destroyed by the base arts of Rufinus the confidential minister of the emperor Theodosius 474
Taurus the consul, is banished by the tribunal of the senate 344
Taxes how the Roman citizens were exonerated from the burden of, 63 Account of those instituted by Augustus 64 How raised under Constantine the Great and his successors, 252
Tayf, siege of by Mahomet, 923
Teyes, the last king of the Goths, defeated and killed by the eunuch Narses, 743

Telemachus an Asiatic monk loses his life at Rome in an attempt to prevent the combat of the gladiators 490
Temple of Jerusalem burned 212 History of the emperor Julian's attempt to restore it 357
Temungu See Singus
Teptice is captured and fortified by the Paulicians 1015
Tertullian his pious exultation in the expected damnation of all the pagan world 167 Suggests desertion to Christian soldiers 192, note His suspicious account of two edicts of Iulianus and Marcus Antoninus in favour of the Christians 200
Tetragons the Roman laws for regulating 770 Colicils 711
Tetricus assumes the empire in Gaul at the instigation of Victor 120 Betrays his legions into the hands of Aurelian 16 Is led in triumph by Aurelian 104
Thabor mount dispute concerning the light of 1101
Thanes the island of, granted by Vortigern as a settlement for his Saxon auxiliaries 636
Theatrical entertainments of the Romans described 608
Theban legion the martyrdom of apocryphal 604 note
Theft the Roman laws relating to 773 775 776
Themes or military governments of the Greek empire, account of 946
Themistius the orator his encomium on religious education 388
Theodosia her birth and elevation to the throne of Italy 608 His discreditable treaties with the emperor Justinian and revolt against them, 609 His deposition and death 701
Theoderic king of the Franks in Austrasia joins the Goths in the siege and destruction of Milan 708 Invades Italy 16 His death 709
Theodoric a Gothic prince of Spain copy of his treaty of submission to the Saracens 960
Theodora empress her birth and early history 661 Her marriage with Justinian 667 Her tyranny 663 Her virtues 16 Her death 661 Her torture during the Nika sedition 660 Account of her palace and gardens of Hierum 676 Her pious concern for the conversion of Bulgaria 819
Theodora wife of the Greek emperor Theophilus her history 850 Restored the worship of images 857 Provokes the Paulicians to rebellion 1011
Theodora daughter of the Greek emperor Constantine I her history 863
Theodora widow of Balihvin III king of Jerusalem her adventures as the concubine of Andronicus Comnenus 671
Theodore Angelus despot of Epirus seizes Peter of Courtenay emperor of Constantinople prisoner 1132 Possesses himself of Thessalonica 1133
Theodore acquires the Gothic sceptre by the murder of his brother Torismoud 882 His character by Sidonius 1610 His expedition into Spain 883
Theodore the son of Alaric his prosperous reign over the Visigoths in Gaul 567 Unhappy fate of his daughters 568 Is prevailed on by Huns to join his forces against Attila 571 Is killed at the battle of Chalons 572
Theodore the Ostrogoth his birth and education 645 Is forced by his troops into a revolt against the emperor Zeno 647 He undertakes the conquest of Italy 16 Reduces and kills Odoacer 650 Is acknowledged king of Italy 650 Review of his administration 650 His visit to Rome and care of the public buildings 650 His religion 654 His remorse and death 658
Theodosopolis the city of, in Armenia built 544
Theodosius the Great his distinction between a Roman prince and a Parthian monarch 606 note The province of Mesia preserved by his valour 412 Is associated by tyrant as emperor of the east 434 His birth and character 16 His prudent and successful conduct of the Gothic war 435 Defeats an invasion of the Ostrogoths 437
 His treaty with Maximus 440 His baptism and edict to establish orthodox faith 441 Purges the city of Constantinople from Arianism 445 Enforces the Nicene doctrine throughout the east 446 Convences a council at Constantinople 446 His edicts are most heresy, 447 Receives the fugitive family of an Alamanian and marries his sister Callia 448 Defeats Maximus and visits Rome 16 His character 449 His lenity to the city of Antioch 450 His cruel treatment of Thessalonica 450 Submits to the penance imposed by St Ambrose for his severity to Thessalonica 457 Restores Valentinian 457 Coordinates John of Lycopolis the hermit on the intended war against Eugenius 459 Defeats Eugenius 460 His death 16 Procures a senatorial renunciation of the pagan religion 461 Abolishes pagan rites 465 Prohibits the pagan religion, 468
Theodosius the younger his birth 599 Is said to be left by his father Arcadius to the care of Jazdegard king of Persia 540 His education and character 511 His marriage with Iuliana 510 His war with Persia 543 His pious joy on the death of John the usurper of the west 515 His treaty with the Huns 533 His arms defeated by Attila 537 Is reduced to accept a peace dictated by Attila 539 Is oppressed by the embassies of Attila 560 Embassy of Maximian to Attila 561 Is privy to a scheme for the assassination of Attila 561 Attila's embassy to him on that occasion 16 His death 16
 His perplexity at the religious feuds between Cyril and Nestorius, 824 Banishes Nestorius 825

Theodosius 111 emperor of Constantinople 851
Theodorus the father of the emperor his successful expedition to Britain 404 Suppresses the revolt of Lirinus the Moor in Africa 406 Is beheaded at Carthage 16
Theodosius patriarch of Alexandria his competition with Cyprian how decided 841 His negotiations at the court of Byzantium 142
Theodosius the deacon, grandson of the emperor Heraclius, murdered by his brother Constantine 11848
Theodorus the lover of Antonina detected by Helianus 711 Turns monk to escape her, 16 His death 711
Theodorus president of the council of Hieropolis under Constantius his ridiculous flattery to that emperor 310
Theophrastus wife of the Greek emperor Romanus 11 poisons both him and his father 861 Her connexion with Nicephorus Phocas 16 His murder and her exile 860
Theophrastus emperor of Constantinople 855 His Amorin war with the egyptian Motasem, 888
Theophilus, archbishop of Alexandria, destroys the temple of Serapis and the Alexandrian library 407 Assists the persecution of St Chrysostom 538 His invective against him, 539, note
Theophilus his pious embassy from the emperor Constantius to the East Indies 300
Theophrastus the Persian, his unfortunate history 850
Theraputae or Essenians some account of 600
Thermopylae the straits of fortified by the emperor Justinian, 607
Thesalmica sedition and massacre there 455
Cruel treatment of the citizens 16 Penance of Theodosius in this severity 450
Theudinda princess of Bavaria married to Authari king of the Lombards 700
Theutant count of Champagne engages in the fourth crusade 1112
Thomas the Cappadocian his revolt against the Greek emperor Michael II and cruel punishment, 845
Thomas of Damascus his exploits against the Saracens with besieging Italy 614
Thomas abbot account of the Christians of India 887 Persecution of by the Portuguese 887
Thrace is colonised by the Hasmans in the reign of Probus, 133 The fugitive Goths permitted to settle there by the emperor Valens 194 Is ravaged by them 47 The Goths settled there by Theodosius 478
Thraumund king of the Vandals, his character, 612
Three Chapters the famous dispute concerning 839
Thundering Legion the story concerning of its pious veracity, 290
Tiberius is adopted by Augustus 60 30 Reduces the Parthians 16 Reduces 16 Captures 65 note Tiberius story of his edict in favour of the Christians 620
Tiberius is invested by Justin II as his successor in the empire of the east 785 His character and death 785 786
Tiberius master general of the army under the emperor Theodosius, is disgraced and exiled under Arcadius, 532
Timothy the Cat conspires the murder of Proterius archbishop of Alexandria and succeeds him 809
Tipsa miraculous gift of speech bestowed on the eunuchs whose tongues had been cut out there 615
Tiridates king of Armenia his character and history 146 Is restored to his kingdom by Diocletian 16 Is expelled by the Persians 147 Is restored again by treaty between the Romans and Persians 140 His conversion to Christianity and death 265 266
Titus admitted to share the imperial dignity with his father Vespasian 30
Toged Beg sultan of the Turks 114 reign and character 1060 He rescues the caliph of Bagdad from his enemies 1057
Tolosa taken by the Arabs under Tarik 965
Tolerant universal his happy effects in the Roman empire 12 What sects the most in tolerant 81 note
Tollus objections to his account of the vision of Antonius 296 note
Torismoud son of Theodoric king of the Visigoths attempts his father against Attila king of the Huns 571 Battle of Chalons 570 Is acknowledged king on the death of his father in the field 573 Is killed by his brother Theodoric 582
Torture how admitted in the criminal law of the Romans under the emperors 251
Titula is elected king of Italy by the Goths 731 His justice and moderation 735 Besieges and takes the city of Rome 730 Is induced to spare Rome from destruction at the instance of Belisarius 738 Takes Rome again 740 Plunders Sicily, 16 Battle of Iagroa 740 His death, 743
Toulundus the Saracen dynasty of 991
Tournaments preferable exhibitions to the Olympic games 1078
Tours battle of between Charles Martel and the Saracens 977
Tovandria in Germany is overrun and occupied by the Franks 734
Traditors to the primitive church who 227
Tragan emperor his conquest of Dacia 3 His conquests in the east 16 Contrast between the characters of him and Hadrian 16 His pillar described 10 Why adopted by the emperor Nerva 30 His instructions to Pliny the younger for his conduct towards the Christians 214 Description of his famous bridge 16 16

Tragan count his treacherous murder 16
Tragan king of Armenia 409
Transubstantiation the doctrine of when established, 1104
Trebizond the city of taken and plundered by the Goths, 105 The dukes of, become independent on the Greek empire, 1128 Is yielded to the Turks, 1240
Trigild the Ostrogoth his rebellion in Phrygia against the emperor Arcadius, 573
Trigild the office of explained 26
Trigild, his genius and character 761 Is employed by Justinian to reform the code of his laws 16
Trinity, the mysterious doctrine of, 310 Is violently agitated in the west 16 Is understood 310
Three systems of the doctrine of the council of Nice concerning 317 Different systems of doctrine, 327 First used in the Council of Nice 614
Tripoli the confederacy of 16 Is taken by the government of Constantinople 16
Trisagion religious war concerning 16
Tropis Rome in their discipline 16 When they first received pay, 630 Cause of their leaving them 218 See 16, 16, 16, 16
Trisagion bands
Trisagion the situation of that city and of the rest of the empire described 235
Turnus battle of between Constantine the Great and the henchmen of Maximian 107
Turand king of the Gephire his honourable reception of Alboin the Lombard, who had his son in battle 780
Turks their origin 717 Their primitive institutions 16 Their conquests 718 Their alliance with the emperor Justinian 719 Sent auxiliaries to Heraclius 813 grow powerful and licentious under the Saracens 881 Terrified by their menaces, 1002
Turpe 1021 Their military character, 1002
 They extend themselves over Asia 1003 Reclaim the Gazevids 16 Their manners and emigration, 1004
Turpe 1056 The conquest of the Seljuks, 16 They invade the provinces of the Greek empire, 1053
Reformation of the eastern calendar, 1061
 They conquer Asia Minor 1067
 Their capital city Nice taken by the crusaders 1080
 The seat of government removed to Iconium 1091 Valour and conquests of Zenghi, 1090
Charriar of sultan Nuraddin, 1090
Conquest of Egypt 16 Origin and history of the Ottomans 1171
 Their first passage into Europe, 1173
 Their education and discipline 1193
 Embassies from the emperor Sigismund 1202
 Take the city of Constantinople 1236
Turpin the romance of by whom, and when written 1060, note
Turpin review of the laws of 753 Their severity 774 How the criminal code of, sunk into disuse 16
Tyrants of Rome the popular conceit of the thirty, investigated 100
Tyre is besieged by Saladin, 1100
Tythes assumed to the clergy as well by Zoroaster as by Moses 81, note Were first granted to the church by Charlemagne 891
Uadamir prince of the Alemanni is sent prisoner to Spain by the emperor Julian 337 His son murdered by the Romans 400
Ualen general of the Illyrian frontier, receives the title of Caesar from Valentinian, 112
 Loses his new title and his life 173
Ualen, the brother of the emperor Valentinian, is associated with him to the empire 390 Obtains from his brother the eastern portion of the empire 16 His timidity on the revolt of Procopius 392 His character 391 Is baptized by Iulianus and patronizes the Arians 396 Is vindicated from the charge of persecution 16 His edict against the Egyptian monks 397 His war with the Goths 410 Receives the suppliant Goths into the Illyrian territories 424 His war with them 427 Is defeated and killed at the battle of Tladriacopolis 431 His eulogium by Iulianus 430
Ualen the Arian bishop of Mursa his crafty pretension to divine revelation 318
Valentinus a new province in Britain settled by Theodosius 404
Valentinian I his election to the empire and character 389 Associates his brother Valens with him 390 Divides the empire into the East and West and returns the latter, 16 His cruelty 393 His cruel insinuations 16 His edicts to restrain the abuses of the clergy 397 Chastises the Alemanni and forishes the Rhine 400 His expedition to Illyricum, and death 410 Is vindicated from the charge of polygamy 413
Valentinian II is invested with the imperial ornaments in his mother's arms on the death of his father 413 Is refused by St Ambrose the privilege of a church for him and his mother Iuliana on account of their Arian principles 440 His flight from the invasion of Maximian 451 Is restored by the emperor Theodosius, 457 His character 453 His death 16
Valentinian III is established emperor of the west by his cousin Theodosius the younger 51, is committed to the guardianship of his mother Placidia 546 Lies on the invasion of Italy by Attila 570 Sends an embassy to Attila to purchase his retreat, 576 Murders the patrician Aetius, 578 Ravishes the wife of Petronius Maximian 16 His death, and character, 16

santly hovered on the banks of the Danube, penetrated sometimes to the confines of Italy and Macedonia, their progress was commonly checked, or their return intercepted, by the imperial lieutenants.<sup>b</sup> But the great stream of the Gothic hostilities was diverted into a very different channel. The Goths, in their new settlement of the Ukraine, soon became masters of the northern coast of the Euxine to the south of that inland sea were situated the soft and wealthy provinces of Asia Minor, which possessed all that could attract, and nothing that could resist, a barbarian conqueror.

The banks of the Borysthenes are only sixty miles distant from the narrow entrance<sup>c</sup> of the peninsula of Crim Tartary, known to the ancients under the name of Chersonesus Taurica.<sup>d</sup> On that inhospitable shore, Euripedes, embellishing with exquisite art the tales of antiquity, has placed the scene of one of his most affecting tragedies.<sup>e</sup> The bloody sacrifices of Diana, the arrival of Orestes and Pylades, and the triumph of virtue and religion over savage fierceness, serve to represent an historical truth, that the Tauri, the original inhabitants of the peninsula, were in some degree reclaimed from their brutal manners, by a gradual intercourse with the Grecian colonies, which settled along the maritime coast. The little kingdom of Bosphorus, whose capital was situated on the Straits, through which the Mæotis communicates itself to the Euxine, was composed of degenerate Greeks, and half-civilized barbarians. It subsisted, as an independent state, from the time of the Peloponnesian war,<sup>f</sup> was at last swallowed up by the ambition of Mithridates,<sup>g</sup> and, with the rest of his dominions, sunk under the weight of the Roman arms. From the reign of Augustus,<sup>h</sup> the kings of Bosphorus were the humble, but not useless, allies of the empire. By presents, by arms, and by a slight fortification drawn across the isthmus, they effectually guarded against the roving plunderers of Sarmatia, the access of a country, which from its peculiar situation and convenient harbours, commanded the Euxine sea and Asia Minor.<sup>i</sup> As long as the sceptre was possessed by a lineal succession of kings, they acquitted themselves of their important charge with vigilance and success. Domestic factions, and the fears, or private interest, of obscure usurpers, who seized on the vacant throne admitted the Goths into the heart of Bosphorus. With the acquisition of a superfluous waste of fertile soil, the conquerors obtained the command of a naval force, sufficient to transport their armies to the coast of Asia.<sup>k</sup> The ships used in the navigation of the Euxine were <sup>who acquire a</sup> of a very singular construction. They <sup>naval force</sup> were slight flat-bottomed barks framed of timber only, without the least mixture of iron, and occasionally covered with a shelving roof, on the appearance of a tempest.<sup>l</sup> In these floating houses, the Goths carelessly trusted themselves to the mercy of an unknown sea, under the conduct of sailors pressed into the service, and whose skill and fidelity were equally suspicious. But the hopes of plunder had banished every idea of danger, and a natural fearlessness of temper supplied in their minds the more rational confidence, which is the just result of knowledge and experience. Warriors of such a daring spirit must have often murmured against the cowardice of their guides, who required the strongest assurances of a settled calm before they would venture to embark, and would scarcely ever be tempted to lose sight of the land. Such, at least, is the practice of the modern Turks,<sup>m</sup> and they are probably not inferior, in the art of navigation, to the ancient inhabitants of Bosphorus.

The fleet of the Goths, leaving the coast of Circassia on the left hand, first <sup>First naval expedition of the Goths</sup> appeared before Pityus,<sup>n</sup> the utmost limits of the Roman provinces, a city provided with a convenient port, and fortified with a strong wall. Here they met with a resistance more obstinate than they had reason to expect from the feeble garrison of a distant fortress. They were repulsed, and their disappointment seemed to diminish the terror of the Gothic name. As long as Successianus, an officer of superior rank and merit, defended that frontier, all their efforts were ineffectual, but as soon as he was removed by Valerian to a more honourable but less important station, they resumed the attack of Pityus, and, by the destruction of that city, obliterated the memory of their former disgrace.<sup>o</sup>

Circling round the eastern extremity of the Euxine sea, the navigation from Pityus to Trebizond is about three <sup>The Goths be seen, and take Trebizond</sup> hundred miles.<sup>p</sup> The course of the Goths carried them in sight of the country of Colchis, so famous by the expedition of the Argonauts, and they even attempted, though without success, to pillage a rich temple at the mouth of the river Phasis. Trebizond, celebrated in the retreat of the ten thousand as an ancient colony of Greeks,<sup>q</sup> derived its wealth and splendour from the munificence of the emperor Hadrian, who had constructed an artificial port on

<sup>b</sup> See the lives of Claudius, Aurelian and Probus in the Augustan History.

<sup>c</sup> It is about half a league in breadth. Genealogical History of the Tartars, p. 558.

<sup>d</sup> M. de Peyssonnel, who had been French Consul at Caffa, in his Observations sur les peuples barbares, qui ont habité les bords du Danube.

<sup>e</sup> Euripides in Iphigenia in Tauris.

<sup>f</sup> Strabo l. vii. p. 309. The first kings of Bosphorus were the allies of Athens.

<sup>g</sup> Appian in Mithridat.

<sup>h</sup> It was reduced by the arms of Agrippa. Orosius, vi. 21. Entropii, lvi. 9. The Romans once advanced within three days' march of the Iani. Tacit. Annal. xli. 17.

<sup>i</sup> See the Tetraxis of Iucrin, if we credit the sincerity and the virtues of the Scythian, who relates a great war of his nation against the kings of Bosphorus.

<sup>k</sup> Zosimus, l. i. p. 28.

<sup>l</sup> Strabo, l. xi. Tacit. Hist. iii. 47. They were called Camarae.

<sup>m</sup> See a very natural picture of the Euxine navigation, in the xviii. letter of Tournefort.

<sup>n</sup> Arrian places the frontier garrison at Dioscuria, or Sebastopolis, forty-four miles to the east of Pityus. The garrison of Phasis consisted in his time of only four hundred foot. See the Periplus of the Euxine.

<sup>o</sup> Zosimus, l. i. p. 30.

<sup>p</sup> Arrian (in Periplus Maris Euxin. p. 130) calls the distance 2610 stadia.

<sup>q</sup> Xenophon Anabasis, l. iv. p. 318. Edit. Hutchinson.

a coast left destitute by nature of secure harbours.<sup>r</sup> The city was large and populous, a double enclosure of walls seemed to defy the fury of the Goths, and the usual garrison had been strengthened by a reinforcement of ten thousand men. But there are not any advantages capable of supplying the absence of discipline and vigilance. The numerous garrison of Trebizond, dissolved in riot and luxury, disdained to guard their impregnable fortifications. The Goths soon discovered the supine negligence of the besieged, erected a lofty pile of fascines, ascended the walls in the silence of the night, and entered the defenceless city, sword in hand. A general massacre of the people ensued, whilst the affrighted soldiers escaped through the opposite gates of the town. The most holy temples, and the most splendid edifices, were involved in a common destruction. The booty that fell into the hands of the Goths was immense, the wealth of the adjacent countries had been deposited in Trebizond, as in a secure place of refuge. The number of captives was incredible, as the victorious barbarians ranged without opposition through the extensive province of Pontus.<sup>s</sup> The rich spoils of Trebizond filled a great fleet of ships that had been found in the port. The robust youth of the sea-coast were chained to the oar, and the Goths, satisfied with the success of their first naval expedition, returned in triumph to their new establishments in the kingdom of Bosphorus.<sup>t</sup>

The second expedition of the Goths

The second expedition of the Goths was undertaken with greater powers of men and ships, but they steered a different course, and, disdaining the exhausted provinces of Pontus followed the western coast of the Euxine, passed before the wide mouths of the Borysthenes, the Niester, and the Danube, and increasing their fleet by the capture of a great number of fishing barks, they approached the narrow outlet through which the Euxine sea pours its waters into the Mediterranean, and divides the continents of Europe and Asia. The garrison of Chalcædon was encamped near the temple of Jupiter Urius, on a promontory that commanded the entrance of the strait, and so inconsiderable were the dreaded invasions of the barbarians, that this body of troops surpassed in number the Gothic army. But it was in numbers alone that they surpassed it. They deserted with precipitation their advantageous post, and abandoned the town of Chalcædon, most plentifully stored with arms and money, to the discretion of the conquerors. Whilst they hesitated whether they should prefer the sea or land, Europe or Asia, for the scene of their hostilities, a perfidious

The plunder of the cities of Bithynia

<sup>r</sup> Arrian, p. 129. The general observation is Tournefort's.
<sup>s</sup> See an epistle of Gregory Thaumaturgus, bishop of Neo Cæsarea, quoted by Macan, v. 77.
<sup>t</sup> Zosimus, l. i. p. 32, 33.
<sup>u</sup> Itiner Hierosolym. p. 572. Wesseling.
<sup>v</sup> Zosimus, l. i. p. 32, 33.
<sup>w</sup> He besieged the place with 400 galleys, 150,000 foot, and a numerous cavalry. See Plutarch in Lucul. Appian in Mithridat. Cicero pro Lege Manliæ, c. 8.

fugitive pointed out Nicomedia, once the capital of the kings of Bithynia, as a rich and easy conquest. He guided the march, which was only sixty miles from the camp of Chalcædon,<sup>u</sup> directed the resistanceless attack, and partook of the booty, for the Goths had learned sufficient policy to reward the traitor, whom they detested. Nice, Prusa, Apamea, Cius, cities that had sometimes rivalled, or imitated, the splendour of Nicomedia, were involved in the same calamity, which in a few weeks, raged without control through the whole province of Bithynia. Three hundred years of peace, enjoyed by the soft inhabitants of Asia, had abolished the exercise of arms, and removed the apprehension of danger. The ancient walls were suffered to moulder away, and all the revenue of the most opulent cities was reserved for the construction of baths, temples, and theatres.<sup>x</sup>

When the city of Cyzicus withstood the utmost effort of Mithridates,<sup>y</sup> it was distinguished by wise laws, a naval power of two hundred galleys, and three arsenals, of arms, of military engines, and of corn.<sup>z</sup> It was still the seat of wealth and luxury, but of its ancient strength nothing remained except the situation, in a little island of the Propontis, connected with the continent of Asia only by two bridges. From the recent sack of Prusa, the Goths advanced within eighteen miles<sup>a</sup> of the city, which they had devoted to destruction, but the ruin of Cyzicus was delayed by a fortunate accident. The season was rainy, and the lake Apolloniates, the reservoir of all the springs of Mount Olympus, rose to an uncommon height. The little river of Rhyndæus, which issues from the lake, swelled into a broad and rapid stream, and stopped the progress of the Goths. Their retreat to the maritime city of Heraclæa, where the fleet had probably been stationed, was attended by a long train of waggons, laden with the spoils of Bithynia, and was marked by the flames of Nice and Nicomedia, which they wantonly burnt.<sup>b</sup> Some obscure hints are mentioned of a doubtful combat that secured their retreat.<sup>c</sup> But even a complete victory would have been of little moment, as the approach of the autumnal equinox summoned them to hasten their return. To navigate the Euxine before the month of May, or after that of September, is esteemed by the modern Turks the most unquestionable instance of rashness and folly.<sup>d</sup>

When we are informed that the third fleet equipped by the Goths in the ports of Bosphorus, consisted of five hundred sail of ships,<sup>e</sup> our ready imagination instantly computes and multiplies the formidable

Retreat of the Goths

Third naval expedition of the Goths

<sup>x</sup> Strabo l. xii. p. 573.
<sup>y</sup> Pocock's Description of the East, l. ii. c. 23, 24.
<sup>z</sup> Zosimus, l. i. p. 33.
<sup>a</sup> Syncellus tells an unintelligible story of Prince Odenathus, who defeated the Goths, and who was killed by Prince Odenathus.
<sup>b</sup> Voyages de Chardin, tom. i. p. 45. He sailed with the Turks from Constantinople to Caffa.
<sup>c</sup> Syncellus (p. 332.) speaks of this expedition as undertaken by the Heruli.

armament, but, as we are assured by the judicious Strabo<sup>f</sup>, that the piratical vessels used by the barbarians of Pontus and the Lesser Seythia, were not capable of containing more than twenty-five or thirty men, we may safely affirm, that fifteen thousand warriors, at the most, embarked in this great expedition. Impatient of the limits of the Euxine, they steered their destructive course from the Cimmerian to the Thracian Bosphorus. When they had almost gained the middle of the straits, they were suddenly driven back to the entrance of them, till a favourable wind, springing up the next day, carried them in a few hours into the placid sea, or rather lake, of the Propontis. Their landing on the little island of Cyzicus was attended with the ruin of that ancient and noble city. From thence issuing again through the narrow passage of the Hellespont, they pursued their winding navigation amidst the numerous islands scattered over the Archipelago, or the Ægean sea. The assistance of captives and deserters must have been very necessary to pilot their vessels, and to direct their various incursions, as well on the coast of Greece as on that of Asia. At length the Gothic fleet anchored in the port of Piræus, five miles distant from Athens, which had attempted to make some preparations for a vigorous defence. Cleodamus, one of the engineers employed by the emperor's orders to fortify the maritime cities against the Goths, had already begun to repair the ancient walls, fallen to decay since the time of Sylla. The efforts of his skill were ineffectual, and the barbarians became masters of the native seat of the muses and the arts. But while the conquerors abandoned themselves to the licence of plunder and intemperance, their fleet, that lay with a slender guard in the harbour of Piræus, was unexpectedly attacked by the brave Dexippus, who, flying with the engineer Cleodamus from the sack of Athens, collected a hasty band of volunteers, peasants as well as soldiers, and in some measure avenged the calamities of his country.<sup>h</sup>

<sup>They pass the Bosphorus and the Hellespont</sup>

<sup>Ravage Greece and threaten Italy</sup>

But this exploit, whatever lustre it might shed on the declining age of Athens, served rather to irritate than to subdue the undaunted spirit of the northern invaders. A general conflagration blazed out at the same time in every district of Greece. Thebes and Argos, Corinth and Sparta, which had formerly waged such memorable wars against each other, were now unable to bring an army into the field, or even to defend their ruined fortifications. The rage of war, both by land and by sea, spread from the eastern point of Sumum to the western coast of Epirus. The Goths had already advanced within sight of Italy, when the approach of such imminent danger awakened the indolent Gallienns from his dream of pleasure. The emperor appeared in arms, and his presence seems to have checked the ardour, and to have divided the strength, of the enemy. Naulobatus, <sup>Their divisions and retreat</sup> a chief of the Heruli, accepted an honourable capitulation, entered with a large body of his countrymen into the service of Rome, and was invested with the ornaments of the consular dignity, which had never before been profaned by the bands of a barbarian.<sup>i</sup> Great numbers of the Goths, disgusted with the perils and hardships of a tedious voyage, broke into Mæsia, with a design of forcing their way over the Danube to their settlements in the Ukraine. The wild attempt would have proved inevitable destruction, if the discord of the Roman generals had not opened to the barbarians the means of an escape.<sup>k</sup> The small remainder of this destroying host returned on board their vessels, and measuring back their way through the Hellespont and the Bosphorus, ravaged in their passage the shores of Troy, whose fame, immortalized by Homer, will probably survive the memory of the Gothic conquests. As soon as they found themselves in safety within the basin of the Euxine, they landed at Anchialus in Thrace, near the foot of Mount Hæmus, and, after all their toils, indulged themselves in the use of those pleasant and salutary hot baths. What remained of the voyage was a short and easy navigation.<sup>l</sup> Such was the various fate of this third and greatest of their naval enterprises. It may seem difficult to conceive, how the original body of fifteen thousand warriors could sustain the losses and divisions of so bold an adventure. But as their numbers were gradually wasted by the sword, by shipwrecks, and by the influence of a warm climate, they were perpetually renewed by troops of banditti and deserters, who flocked to the standard of plunder, and by a crowd of fugitive slaves, often of German or Sarmatian extraction, who eagerly seized the glorious opportunity of freedom and revenge. In these expeditions, the Gothic nation claimed a superior share of honour and danger, but the tribes that fought under the Gothic banners are sometimes distinguished and sometimes confounded in the imperfect histories of that age, and as the barbarian fleets seemed to issue from the mouth of the Tanais, the vague but familiar appellation of Seythians was frequently bestowed on the mixed multitude.<sup>m</sup>

In the general calamities of man- <sup>Ruin of the temple of Ephesus</sup> kind, the death of an individual, however exalted, the ruin of an edifice, however famous, are passed over with careless inattention. Yet we cannot forget that the temple of Diana at Ephesus, after having risen with increasing splendour from seven repeated misfortunes,<sup>n</sup> was finally burnt by the Goths in their third naval invasion. The

<sup>f</sup> Strabo l. xi. p. 493. <sup>g</sup> Plin. Hist. Natur. in 7. <sup>h</sup> Hist. August. p. 181. Victor. c. 33. Orosius vii. 42. Zosimus l. i. p. 30. Zonaras l. xii. p. 635. Syncellus, p. 382. It is not without some attention that we can explain and reconcile their imperfect limits. We can still discover some traces of the partiality of Dexippus, in the relation of his own and his countrymen's exploits. <sup>i</sup> Syncellus, p. 382. This body of Heruli was for a long time faithful and famous.

<sup>k</sup> Claudius who commanded on the Danube, thought with propriety and acted with spirit. His colleague was jealous of his fame. Hist. August. p. 181.

<sup>l</sup> Jornandes, c. 20.

<sup>m</sup> Zosimus and the Greeks (as the author of the Philopatri) give the name of Seythians to those whom Jornandes and the Latin writers constantly represent as Goths.

<sup>n</sup> Hist. Aug. p. 178. Jornandes, c. 20.

arts of Greece, and the wealth of Asia, had conspired to erect that sacred and magnificent structure. It was supported by an hundred and twenty-seven marble columns of the Ionic order. They were the gifts of devout monarchs, and each was sixty feet high. The altar was adorned with the masterly sculptures of Praxiteles, who had, perhaps, selected from the favourite legends of the place the birth of the divine children of Latona, the concealment of Apollo after the slaughter of the Cyclops, and the clemency of Bacchus to the vanquished Amazons.<sup>o</sup> Yet the length of the temple of Ephesus was only four hundred and twenty-five feet, about two-thirds of the measure of the church of St Peter's at Rome.<sup>p</sup> In the other dimensions, it was still more inferior to that sublime production of modern architecture. The spreading arms of a Christian cross require a much greater breadth than the oblong temples of the pagans, and the boldest artists of antiquity would have been startled at the proposal of raising in the air a dome of the size and proportions of the pantheon. The temple of Diana was, however, admired as one of the wonders of the world. Successive empires, the Persian, the Macedonian, and the Roman, had revered its sanctity, and enriched its splendour.<sup>q</sup> But the rude savages of the Baltic were destitute of a taste for the elegant arts, and they despised the ideal terrors of a foreign superstition.<sup>r</sup>

Conduct of the Goths at Athens. Another circumstance is related of these invasions, which might deserve our notice, were it not justly to be suspected as the fanciful conceit of a recent sophist. We are told, that in the sack of Athens the Goths had collected all the libraries, and were on the point of setting fire to this funeral pile of Grecian learning, had not one of their chiefs, of more refined policy than his brethren, dissuaded them from the design, by the profound observation, that as long as the Greeks were addicted to the study of books, they would never apply themselves to the exercise of arms.<sup>s</sup> The sagacious counsellor (should the truth of the fact be admitted) reasoned like an ignorant barbarian. In the most polite and powerful nations, genius of every kind has displayed itself about the same period, and the age of science has generally been the age of military virtue and success.

Conquest of Armenia by the Persians. IV The new sovereigns of Persia, Artaxerxes and his son Sapor, had triumphed (as we have already seen) over the house of Arsaces. Of the many princes of that ancient race, Chosroes, king of Armenia, had alone preserved both his life and his independence. He defended himself by the natural strength of his country, by the perpetual resort of fugitives and malecontents, by the alliance of the Romans, and, above all by his own courage. Invincible in arms during a thirty years war, he was at length assassinated by the emissaries of Sapor king of Persia. The patriotic satraps of Armenia, who asserted the freedom and dignity of the crown, implored the protection of Rome in favour of Tiridates the lawful heir. But the son of Chosroes was an infant, the allies were at a distance, and the Persian monarch advanced towards the frontier at the head of an irresistible force. Young Tiridates, the future hope of his country, was saved by the fidelity of a servant, and Armenia continued above twenty-seven years a reluctant province of the great monarchy of Persia.<sup>t</sup> Elated with this easy conquest, and presuming on the distresses or the degeneracy of the Romans, Sapor obliged the strong garrisons of Carrhæ and Nisibis to surrender, and spread devastation and terror on either side of the Euphrates.

The loss of an important frontier, the ruin of a faithful and natural ally, and the rapid success of Sapor's ambition, affected Rome with a deep sense of the insult as well as of the danger. Valerian flattered himself, that the vigilance of his lieutenants would sufficiently provide for the safety of the Rhine and of the Danube, but he resolved, notwithstanding his advanced age, to march in person to the defence of the Euphrates. During his progress through Asia Minor, the naval enterprises of the Goths were suspended, and the afflicted province enjoyed a transient and fallacious calm. He passed the Euphrates, encountered the Persian monarch near the walls of Edessa, was vanquished, and taken prisoner by Sapor. The particulars of this great event are darkly and imperfectly represented, yet, by the glimmering light which is afforded us, we may discover a long series of imprudence, of error, and of deserved misfortune on the side of the Roman emperor. He reposed an implicit confidence in Macrianns, his prætorian præfect.<sup>u</sup> That worthless minister rendered his master formidable only to the oppressed subjects, and contemptible to the enemies of Rome.<sup>v</sup> By his weak or wicked counsels, the imperial army was betrayed into a situation, where valour and military skill were equally unavailing.<sup>w</sup> The vigorous attempt of the Romans to cut their way through the Persian host was repulsed with great slaughter,<sup>x</sup> and Sapor, who encompassed the camp with superior numbers, patiently waited till the increasing rage of famine and pestilence had ensured his victory. The licentious murmurs of the legions

<sup>o</sup> Strabo l. xiv. p. 640. Vitruvius, l. i. c. 1. præfat. l. vii. Tacit. Annal. iii. 61. Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxi. 11.

<sup>p</sup> The length of St Peter's is 840 Roman palms, each palm is very little short of nine English inches. See Greaves's Miscellanies, vol. i. p. 233. On the Roman foot.

<sup>q</sup> The policy, however, of the Romans induced them to abridge the extent of the sanctuary or asylum, which by successive privileges had spread itself two stadia round the temple. Strabo, l. xiv. p. 641. Tacit. Annal. iii. 60, &c.

<sup>r</sup> They offered no sacrifices to the Grecian gods. See Epirot. Gre. for Thaumatz.

<sup>s</sup> Zonaras, l. xii. p. 635. Such an anecdote was perfectly suited to the taste of Montaigne. He makes use of it in his agreeable Essay on Pedantry, l. i. c. 24.

<sup>t</sup> Moses Chorenensis l. ii. c. 71, 73, 74. Zonaras, l. xii. p. 628. The authentic relation of the Armenian historian serves to rectify the confused account of the Greeks. The latter talks of the children of Tiridates, who at that time was himself an infant.

<sup>u</sup> Hist. Aug. p. 191. As Macrianns was an enemy to the Christians, they charged him with being a magician.

<sup>v</sup> Zonaras, l. i. p. 33.

<sup>w</sup> Victor in Cæsar. Eutropius, ix. 7.

<sup>x</sup> Victor in Cæsar. Eutropius, ix. 7.

soon accused Valerian as the cause of their calamities, their seditious clamours demanded an instant capitulation. An immense sum of gold was offered to purchase the permission of a disgraceful retreat. But the Persian, conscious of his superiority, refused the money with disdain, and detaining the deputies, advanced in order of battle to the foot of the Roman rampart, and insisted on a personal conference with the emperor. Valerian was reduced to the necessity of intrusting his life and dignity to the faith of an enemy. The interview ended as it was natural to expect. The emperor was made a prisoner, and his astonished troops laid down their arms. In such a moment of triumph, the pride and policy of Sapor prompted him to fill the vacant throne with a successor entirely dependent on his pleasure. Cyriades, an obscure fugitive of Antioch, stained with every vice, was chosen to dishonour the Roman purple, and the will of the Persian victor could not fail of being ratified by the acclamations, however reluctant, of the captive army.<sup>b</sup>

The imperial slave was eager to secure the favour of his master by an act of treason to his native country. He conducted Sapor over the Euphrates, and, by the way of Chalcis, to the metropolis of the East. So rapid were the motions of the Persian cavalry, that, if we may credit a very judicious historian,<sup>c</sup> the city of Antioch was surprised when the idle multitude was fondly gazing on the amusements of the theatre. The splendid buildings of Antioch, private as well as public, were either pillaged or destroyed, and the numerous inhabitants were put to the sword, or led away into captivity.<sup>d</sup> The tide of devastation was stopped for a moment by the resolution of the high priest of Emesa. Arrayed in his sacerdotal robes he appeared at the head of a great body of fanatic peasants, armed only with slings, and defended his god and his property from the sacrilegious hands of the followers of Zoroaster.<sup>e</sup> But the ruin of Tarsus, and of many other cities, furnishes a melancholy proof, that, except in this singular instance, the conquest of Syria and Cilicia scarcely interrupted the progress of the Persian arms. The advantages of the narrow passes of Mount Taurus were abandoned, in which an invader, whose principal force consisted in his cavalry, would have been engaged in a very unequal combat, and Sapor was permitted to form the siege of Casarea, the capital of Cappadocia, a city, though of the second rank, which was supposed to contain four hundred thousand inhabitants. Demosthenes commanded in the place, not so much by the commission of the emperor, as in the voluntary defence of his country. For a long time he deferred its fate, and, when at last Casarea was betrayed by the perfidy of a physician, he cut his way through the Persians, who had been ordered to exert their utmost diligence to take him alive. This heroic chief escaped the power of a foe, who might either have honoured or punished his obstinate valour, but many thousands of his fellow-citizens were involved in a general massacre, and Sapor is accused of treating his prisoners with wanton and unrelenting cruelty.<sup>f</sup> Much should undoubtedly be allowed for national animosity, much for humbled pride and impotent revenge, yet, upon the whole, it is certain, that the same prince, who, in Armenia, had displayed the mild aspect of a legislator, showed himself to the Romans under the stern features of a conqueror. He despaired of making any permanent establishment in the empire, and sought only to leave behind him a wasted desert, whilst he transported into Persia the people and the treasures of the provinces.<sup>g</sup>

At the time when the East trembled at the name of Sapor, he received a present not unworthy of the greatest kings, a long train of camels laden with the most rare and valuable merchandises. The rich offering was accompanied with an epistle, respectful but not servile, from Odenathus one of the noblest and most opulent senators of Palmyra. "Who is this Odenathus," (said the haughty victor, and he commanded that the presents should be cast into the Euphrates) "that he thus insolently presumes to write to his lord!" If he entertains a hope of mitigating his punishment, let him fall prostrate before the foot of our throne with his hands bound behind his back. Should he hesitate, swift destruction shall be poured on his head, on his whole race, and on his country."<sup>h</sup> The desperate extremity to which the Palmyrenian was reduced, called into action all the latent powers of his soul. He met Sapor, but he met him in arms. Infusing his own spirit into a little army collected from the villages of Syria,<sup>i</sup> and the tents of the desert,<sup>k</sup> he hovered round the Persian host, harassed their retreat, carried off part of the treasure, and what was dearer than any treasure, several of the women of the great king, who was at last obliged to repossess the Euphrates with some marks of haste and confusion.<sup>l</sup> By this exploit, Odenathus laid the foundations of his future fame and fortunes. The

<sup>a</sup> Zosimus i. p. 33. Zonaras, l. xii. p. 630. Peter Patricius, in the Excerpt. Legat. p. 29.

<sup>b</sup> Hist. August. p. 185. The reign of Cyriades appears in that collection prior to the death of Valerian, but I have preferred a probable series of events to the doubtful chronology of a most inaccurate writer.

<sup>c</sup> The sack of Antioch, anticipated by some historians, is assigned by the decisive testimony of Ammianus Marcellinus, to the reign of Gallienus. xxiii. c.

<sup>d</sup> Zosimus, l. i. p. 35.

<sup>e</sup> John Malala, tom. i. p. 391. He corrupts this probable event by some fabulous circumstances.

<sup>f</sup> Zonaras, l. xii. p. 630. Deep valleys were filled up with the slain

Crowds of prisoners were driven to water like beasts, and many perished for want of food.

<sup>g</sup> Zosimus i. p. 25 asserts that Sapor, had he not preferred spoil to conquest, might have remained master of Asia.

<sup>h</sup> Peter Patricius in Excerpt. Leg. p. 29.

<sup>i</sup> Syrorum agrestium manu. Sextus Rufus, c. 23. Rufus Victor, in the Augustin History, (p. 192) and several inscriptions agree in naming Odenathus a citizen of Palmyra.

<sup>k</sup> He possessed so powerful an interest among the wandering tribes, that Procopius (Bell. Persic. l. ii. c. 5) and John Malala (tom. i. p. 391) style him Prince of the Saracens.

<sup>l</sup> Peter Patricius, p. 25.

majesty of Rome, oppressed by a Persian, was protected by a Syrian or Arab of Palmyra Treatment of Valerian

The voice of history, which is often little more than the organ of hatred or flattery, reproaches Sapor with a proud abuse of the rights of conquest. We are told that Valerian, in chains, but invested with the imperial purple, was exposed to the multitude, a constant spectacle of fallen greatness, and that whenever the Persian monarch mounted on horseback, he placed his foot on the neck of a Roman emperor. Notwithstanding all the remonstrances of his allies, who repeatedly advised him to remember the vicissitude of fortune, to dread the returning power of Rome, and to make his illustrious captive the pledge of peace, not the object of insult, Sapor still remained inflexible. When Valerian sunk under the weight of shame and grief, his skin, stuffed with straw, and formed into the likeness of a human figure, was preserved for ages in the most celebrated temple of Persia, a more real monument of triumph, than the fancied trophies of brass and marble so often erected by Roman vanity.<sup>m</sup> The tale is moral and pathetic, but the truth of it may very fairly be called in question. The letters still extant from the princes of the east to Sapor, are manifest forgeries,<sup>n</sup> nor is it natural to suppose that a jealous monarch should, even in the person of a rival, thus publicly degrade the majesty of kings. Whatever treatment the unfortunate Valerian might experience in Persia, it is at least certain, that the only emperor of Rome who had ever fallen into the hands of the enemy, languished away his life in hopeless captivity.

Character and administration of Gallienus

The emperor Gallienus, who had long supported with impatience the censorial severity of his father and colleague, received the intelligence of his misfortunes with secret pleasure and avowed indifference. "I knew that my father was a mortal," said he, "and since he has acted as becomes a brave man, I am satisfied." Whilst Rome lamented the fate of her sovereign, the savage coldness of his son was extolled by the servile courtiers, as the perfect firmness of a hero and a stoic.<sup>o</sup> It is difficult to paint the light, the various, the inconstant character of Gallienus, which he displayed without constraint, as soon as he became sole possessor of the empire. In every art that he attempted, his lively genius enabled him to succeed, and as his genius was destitute of judgment, he attempted every art, except the important ones of war and government. He was a master of several curious but useless sciences, a ready orator, and elegant poet,<sup>p</sup> a skilful gardener, an excellent cook, and most contemptible prince. When the great emergencies of the state required his presence and attention, he was engaged in conversation with the philosopher Plotinus,<sup>q</sup> wasting his time in trifling or licentious pleasures, preparing his initiation to the Grecian mysteries, or soliciting a place in the Arcopagus of Athens. His profuse magnificence insulted the general poverty, the solemn ridicule of his triumphs impressed a deeper sense of the public disgrace.<sup>r</sup> The repeated intelligence of invasions, defeats, and rebellions, he received with a careless smile, and singling out, with affected contempt, some particular production of the lost province, he carelessly asked, Whether Rome must be ruined, unless it was supplied with linen from Egypt, and Arras cloth from Gaul? There were, however, a few short moments in the life of Gallienus, when, exasperated by some recent injury, he suddenly appeared the intrepid soldier, and the cruel tyrant, till, satiated with blood, or fatigued by resistance, he insensibly sunk into the natural mildness and indolence of his character.<sup>s</sup>

At a time when the reins of government were held with so loose a hand, it is not surprising, that a crowd of usurpers should start up in every province of the empire against the son of Valerian. It was probably some ingenious fancy, of comparing the thirty tyrants of Rome with the thirty tyrants of Athens, that induced the writers of the Augustan history to select that celebrated number, which has been gradually received into a popular appellation.<sup>t</sup> But in every light the parallel is idle and defective. What resemblance can we discover between a council of thirty persons, the united oppressors of a single city, and an uncertain list of independent rivals, who rose and fell in irregular succession through the extent of a vast empire? Nor can the number of thirty be completed, unless we include in the account the women and children who were honoured with the imperial title. The reign of Gallienus, distracted as it was, produced only nineteen pretenders to the throne, Cyriades, Macrianus, Balista, Odenathus, and Zenobia, in the East, in Gaul,

The thirty tyrants

Their real number was no more than nineteen

<sup>m</sup> The Pagin writers lament, the Christians insult, the misfortunes of Valerian. Their various testimonies are accurately collected by Tillemont, tom. iii. p. 739, &c. So little has been preserved of eastern history before Mahomet, that the modern Persians are totally ignorant of the victory of Sapor, an event so glorious to their nation. See Bibliothèque Orientale.

<sup>n</sup> One of these epistles is from Artavasdes, king of Armenia. Since Armenia was then a province in Persia, the king, the kingdom, and the epistle, must be fictitious.

<sup>o</sup> See his life in the Augustan History.

<sup>p</sup> There is still extant a very pretty Epithalamium, composed by Gallienus, for the nuptials of his nephews.

He ut, O Juvencs, pariter audite medullis
Omnibus, inter vos non murmura vestra columbar, Brachia non hederæ, non vincunt oscula encheiræ

<sup>q</sup> He was on the point of giving Plotinus a ruined city of Campania to try the experiment of realizing Plato's Republic. See the Life of Plotinus, by Porphyry, in Fabricius's Biblioth. Græc. l. iv.

<sup>r</sup> A medal which bears the head of Gallienus has perplexed the antiquarians by its legend and reverse, the former Gallienæ Augustæ, the latter Ubique Pax. M. Spruihem supposes that the coin was struck by some of the enemies of Gallienus, and was designed as a severe satire on that effeminate prince. But as the use of irony may seem unworthy of the gravity of the Roman mint. M. de Villamont has deduced from a passage of Prebinius Pollio (Hist. August. p. 198) an ingenious and natural solution. Gallienæ was first coined to the emperor. By delivering Africa from the usurper Celsus, she deserved the title of Augusta. On a medal in the French king's collection, we read a similar inscription of Laetitia Augusta round the head of Marcus Aurelius. With regard to the Ubique Pax, it is easily explained by the vanity of Gallienus who seized perhaps, the occasion of some momentary calm. See Notes des de la République des Lettres, Janvier 1700. p. 20—31.

<sup>s</sup> This singular character has, I believe, been fairly transmitted to us. The reign of his immediate successor was short and busy, and the historians who wrote before the elevation of the family of Constantine could not have the most remote interest to misrepresent the character of Gallienus.

<sup>t</sup> Pollio expresses the most minute anxiety to complete the number and the western provinces, Postumus, Lollius, Victorinus and his mother Victoria, Marius, and Tetricus. In Illyricum and the confines of the Danube, Ingenuus, Regilianus, and Aureolus, in Pontus,<sup>a</sup> Saturninus, in Isauria, Trebellianus Piso in Thessaly, Valens in Achaia, Æmilianus in Egypt, and Celsus in Africa. To illustrate the obscure monuments of the life and death of each individual, would prove a laborious task, alike barren of instruction and of amusement. We may content ourselves with investigating some general characters, that most strongly mark the condition of the times, and the manners of the men, their pretensions, their motives, their fate, and the destructive consequences of their usurpation.*

Character and merit of the tyrants

It is sufficiently known, that the odious appellation of Tyrant was often employed by the ancients to express the illegal seizure of supreme power, without any reference to the abuse of it. Several of the pretenders who raised the standard of rebellion against the emperor Gallienus, were shining models of virtue, and almost all possessed a considerable share of vigour and ability. Their merit had recommended them to the favour of Valerian, and gradually promoted them to the most important commands of the empire. The generals, who assumed the title of Augustus, were either respected by their troops for their able conduct and severe discipline, or admired for valour and success in war, or beloved for frankness and generosity. The field of victory was often the scene of their election, and even the armourer Marius, the most contemptible of all the candidates for the purple, was distinguished, however, by intrepid courage, matchless strength, and blunt honesty.† His mean and recent trade cast indeed an air of ridicule on his elevation,

Their obscure birth

but his birth could not be more obscure than was that of the greater part of his rivals, who were born of peasants, and enlisted in the army as private soldiers. In times of confusion, every active genius finds the place assigned him by nature. In a general state of war, military merit is the road to glory and to greatness. Of the nineteen tyrants, Tetricus only was a senator, Piso alone was a noble. The blood of Numa, through twenty-eight successive generations, ran in the veins of Calphurnius Piso,‡ who, by female alliances, claimed a right of exhibiting, in his house, the images of Crassus and of the great Pompey.§ His ancestors had been repeatedly dignified with all the honours which the commonwealth could bestow, and of all the ancient families of Rome, the Calphurnian alone had survived the tyranny of the Cæsars. The personal qualities of Piso added new lustre to his race. The usurper Valens, by whose order he was killed, confessed, with deep remorse, that even an enemy ought to have respected the sanctity of Piso, and although he died in arms against Gallienus, the senate, with the emperor's generous permission, decreed the triumphal ornaments to the memory of so virtuous a rebel.<sup>b</sup>

The lieutenants of Valerian were <sup>The causes of their rebellion</sup> grateful to the father, whom they esteemed. They disdained to serve the luxurious indolence of his unworthy son. The throne of the Roman world was unsupported by any principle of loyalty, and treason against such a prince might easily be considered as patriotism to the state. Yet if we examine with candour the conduct of these usurpers, it will appear, that they were much oftener driven into rebellion by their fears, than urged to it by their ambition. They dreaded the cruel suspicions of Gallienus, they equally dreaded the capricious violence of their troops. If the dangerous favour of the army had imprudently declared them deserving of the purple, they were marked for sure destruction, and even prudence would counsel them to secure a short enjoyment of empire, and rather to try the fortune of war than to expect the hand of an executioner. When the clamour of the soldiers invested the reluctant victims with the ensigns of sovereign authority, they sometimes mourned in secret their approaching fate. "You have lost," said Saturninus, on the day of his elevation, "you have lost a useful commander, and you have made a very wretched emperor."<sup>c</sup>

The apprehensions of Saturninus <sup>Their violent deaths</sup> were justified by the repeated experience of revolutions. Of the nineteen tyrants who started up under the reign of Gallienus, there was not one who enjoyed a life of peace, or a natural death. As soon as they were invested with the bloody purple, they inspired their adherents with the same fears and ambition which had occasioned their own revolt. Encompassed with domestic conspiracy, military sedition, and civil war, they trembled on the edge of precipices, in which, after a longer or shorter term of anxiety, they were inevitably lost. These precarious monarchs received, however, such honours, as the flattery of their respective armies and provinces could bestow; but their claim, founded on rebellion, could never obtain the sanction of law or history. Italy, Rome, and the senate, constantly adhered to the cause of Gallienus, and he alone was considered as the sovereign of the empire. That prince condescended, indeed, to acknowledge the victorious arms of <sup>a</sup> The place of his reign is somewhat doubtful; but there was a tyrant in Pontus, and we are acquainted with the seal of all the others.

† Tillemont, tom. iii. p. 1163 reckons them somewhat differently.

‡ See the speech of Marius, in the Augustan History, p. 197. The accidental identity of names was the only circumstance that could tempt Pollio to imitate Ballust.

§ Vol. O. Pompius sanguis is Horace's address to the Pisos. See Art. Poet. v. 222 with Dacier's and Sanadon's notes.

<sup>b</sup> Tacit. Annal. xv. 49. Hist. i. 15. In the former of these passages

we may venture to change paterna into materna. In every generation from Augustus to Alexander Severus one or more Pisos appear in consuls. A Piso was deemed worthy of the throne by Augustus. (Tacit. Annal. i. 13.) A second headed a formidable conspiracy against Nero, and a third was adopted and declared Cæsar by Galla.

<sup>c</sup> Hist. August. p. 105. The senate, in a moment of enthusiasm, seems to have presumed on the approbation of Gallienus.

<sup>d</sup> Hist. August. p. 106.

Odenathus, who deserved the honourable distinction by the respectful conduct which he always maintained towards the son of Valerian. With the general applause of the Romans, and the consent of Gallienus, the senate conferred the title of Augustus on the brave Palmyrenian, and seemed to intrust him with the government of the East, which he already possessed, in so independent a manner, that, like a private succession, he bequeathed it to his illustrious widow Zenobia.<sup>a</sup>

The rapid and perpetual transitions from the cottage to the throne, and from the throne to the grave, might have amused an indifferent philosopher, were it possible for a philosopher to remain indifferent amidst the general calamities of human kind. The election of these precarious emperors, their power and their death, were equally destructive to their subjects and adherents. The price of their fatal elevation was instantly discharged to the troops, by an immense donative drawn from the bowels of the exhausted people. However virtuous was their character, however pure their intentions, they found themselves reduced to the hard necessity of supporting their usurpation by frequent acts of rapine and cruelty. When they fell, they involved armies and provinces in their fall. There is still extant a most savage mandate from Gallienus to one of his ministers, after the suppression of Ingenius, who had assumed the purple in Illyrium. "It is not enough," says that soft but inhuman prince, "that you exterminate such as have appeared in arms: the chance of battle might have served me as effectually. The male sex of every age must be extirpated, provided that in the execution of the children and old men, you can contrive means to save our reputation. Let every one die who has dropt an expression, who has entertained a thought against me, against me, the son of Valerian, the father and brother of so many princes." Remember that Ingenius was made emperor: tear, kill, hew in pieces. I write to you with my own hand, and would inspire you with my own feelings." Whilst the public forces of the state were dissipated in private quarrels, the defenceless provinces lay exposed to every invader. The bravest usurpers were compelled, by the perplexity of their situation, to conclude ignominious treaties with the common enemy, to purchase with oppressive tributes the neutrality or services of the barbarians, and to introduce hostile and independent nations into the heart of the Roman monarchy.<sup>b</sup>

Such were the barbarians, and such the tyrants, who, under the reigns of Valerian and Gallienus, dismembered the provinces, and reduced the empire to the lowest pitch of disgrace and ruin, from whence it seemed impossible that it should ever emerge. As far as the barrenness of materials would permit, we have attempted to trace, with order and perspicuity, the general events of that calamitous period. There still remain some particular facts, I. The disorders of Sicily; II. The tumults of Alexandria, and, III. The rebellion of the Isaurians, which may serve to reflect a strong light on the horrid picture.

I. Whenever numerous troops of banditti, multiplied by success and impunity, publicly defy, instead of eluding, the justice of their country, we may safely infer, that the excessive weakness of the government is felt and abused by the lowest ranks of the community. The situation of Sicily preserved it from the barbarians, nor could the disarmed province have supported an usurper. The sufferings of that once flourishing and still fertile island, were inflicted by baser hands. A licentious crowd of slaves and peasants reigned for a while over the plundered country, and renewed the memory of the servile wars of more ancient times.<sup>c</sup> Devastations, of which the husbandman was either the victim or the accomplice, must have ruined the agriculture of Sicily, and as the principal estates were the property of the opulent senators of Rome, who often enclosed within a farm the territory of an old republic, it is not improbable, that this private injury might affect the capital more deeply than all the conquests of the Goths or the Persians.

II. The foundation of Alexandria was a noble design, at once conceived and executed by the son of Philip. The beautiful and regular form of that great city, second only to Rome itself, comprehended a circumference of fifteen miles;<sup>d</sup> it was peopled by three hundred thousand free inhabitants, besides at least an equal number of slaves.<sup>e</sup> The lucrative trade of Arabia and India flowed through the port of Alexandria to the capital and provinces of the empire. Idleness was unknown. Some were employed in blowing of glass, others in weaving of linen, others again manufacturing the papyrus. Either sex, and every age, was engaged in the pursuits of industry, nor did even the blind or the lame want occupations suited to their condition.<sup>f</sup> But the people of Alexandria, a various mixture of nations, united the vanity and inconstancy of the Greeks with the superstition and obstinacy of the Egyptians. The most trifling occasion, a transient scarcity of flesh or lentils, the neglect of an accustomed salutation, a mistake of precedency in the public baths, or even a religious dispute,<sup>g</sup> were at any time sufficient to

<sup>a</sup> The association of the brave Palmyrenian was the most popular act of the whole reign of Gallienus. Hist. August. p. 180.

<sup>b</sup> Gallienus had given the titles of Cæsar and Augustus to his son Saloninus, slain at Cologne by the usurper Posthumus. A second son of Gallienus succeeded to the name and rank of his elder brother. Valerian, the brother of Gallienus, was also associated to the empire several other brothers, sisters, nephews, and nieces of the emperor formed a very numerous royal family. See Tillmont, tom. iii. and M. de Brequigny in the Mémoires de l'Académie, tom. xxxii. p. 262.

<sup>c</sup> Hist. August. p. 180.

<sup>d</sup> Regillanus had some bands of Roxolani in his service. Posthumus a body of Franks. It was perhaps in the character of auxiliaries that the latter introduced themselves into Spain.

<sup>e</sup> The Augustan History, p. 177 calls it servile bellum. See Diodor. Sicul. l. xxxii. i. Plin. Hist. Natur. v. 10.

<sup>f</sup> Diodor. Sicul. l. xvii. p. 590. Edit. Wesseling.

<sup>g</sup> See a very curious letter of Hadrian, in the Augustan History, p. 245.

<sup>m</sup> Such as the sacrilegious murder of a divine calf. See Diodor. Sicul. l. i.

kindle a sedition among that vast multitude, whose resentments were furious and implacable.<sup>a</sup> After the captivity of Valerian and the insolence of his son had relaxed the authority of the laws, the Alexandrians abandoned themselves to the ungoverned rage of their passions, and their unhappy country was the theatre of a civil war, which continued (with a few short and suspicious truces) above twelve years.<sup>b</sup> All intercourse was cut off between the several quarters of the afflicted city, every street was polluted with blood, every building of strength converted into a citadel, nor did the tumults subside, till a considerable part of Alexandria was irretrievably ruined. The spacious and magnificent district of Bruchion, with its palaces and museum, the residence of the kings and philosophers of Egypt, is described above a century afterwards, as already reduced to its present state of dreary solitude.<sup>c</sup>

Rebellion of the Isaurians

III The obscure rebellion of Trebellianus, who assumed the purple in Isauria, a petty province of Asia Minor, was attended with strange and memorable consequences. The pageant of royalty was soon destroyed by an officer of Gallienus, but his followers, despairing of mercy, resolved to shake off their allegiance, not only to the emperor, but to the empire, and suddenly returned to the savage manners, from which they had never perfectly been reclaimed. Their craggy rocks, a branch of the wide extended Taurus protected their inaccessible retreat. The tillage of some fertile valleys<sup>d</sup> supplied them with necessaries, and a habit of rapine with the luxuries of life. In the heart of the Roman monarchy, the Isaurians long continued a nation of wild barbarians. Succeeding princes, unable to reduce them to obedience, either by arms or policy, were compelled to acknowledge their weakness, by surrounding the hostile and independent spot with a strong chain of fortifications,<sup>e</sup> which often proved insufficient to restrain the incursions of these domestic foes. The Isaurians, gradually extending their territory to the sea-coast, subdued the western and mountainous parts of Cilicia, formerly the nest of those daring pirates, against whom the republic had once been obliged to exert its utmost force, under the conduct of the great Pompey.<sup>f</sup>

Famine and pestilence

Our habits of thinking so fondly connect the order of the universe with the fate of man, that this gloomy period of history has been decorated with inundations, earthquakes, uncommon meteors, preternatural darkness, and a crowd of prodigies fictitious or exaggerated.<sup>g</sup> But a long and general famine was a calamity of a more serious kind. It was the inevitable consequence of rapine and oppression, which extirpated the produce of the present, and the hope of future harvests. Famine is almost always followed by epidemical diseases, the effect of scanty and unwholesome food. Other causes must, however, have contributed to the furious plague, which, from the year two hundred and fifty to the year two hundred and sixty-five, raged without interruption in every province, every city, and almost every family, of the Roman empire. During some time five thousand persons died daily in Rome, and many towns, that had escaped the hands of the barbarians, were entirely depopulated.<sup>h</sup>

We have the knowledge of a very curious circumstance, of some use perhaps in the melancholy calculation of human calamities. An exact register was kept at Alexandria of all the citizens entitled to receive the distribution of corn. It was found, that the ancient number of those comprised between the ages of forty and seventy, had been equal to the whole sum of claimants, from fourteen to fourscore years of age, who remained alive after the reign of Gallienus.<sup>i</sup> Applying this authentic fact to the most correct tables of mortality, it evidently proves, that above half the people of Alexandria had perished, and could we venture to extend the analogy to the other provinces, we might suspect, that war, pestilence, and famine, had consumed, in a few years, the moiety of the human species.<sup>j</sup>

CHAP XI

Reign of Claudius — Defeat of the Goths — Victories, triumph, and death of Aurelian

UNDER the deplorable reigns of Valerian and Gallienus, the empire was oppressed and almost destroyed by the soldiers, the tyrants, and the barbarians. It was saved by a series of great princes, who derived their obscure origin from the martial provinces of Illyricum. Within a period of about thirty years, Claudius, Aurelian, Probus, Diocletian, and his colleagues, triumphed over the foreign and domestic enemies of the state, re-established, with the military discipline, the strength of the frontiers, and deserved the glorious title of restorers of the Roman world.

The removal of an effeminate tyrant made way for a succession of heroes. The indignation of the people imputed all their calamities to Gallienus, and the far greater part were, indeed, the consequence of his dissolute manners and careless administration. He was even

<sup>a</sup> Aureolus invades Italy, is defeated and besieged at Milan

<sup>a</sup> Hist August p 177

<sup>b</sup> Hist August p 177 Zonaras l i p 24 Zonaras l xii p 623 Euseb Chronicon Victor in Epitom Victor in Caesar Eutropius, ix 5 Orosius, vii 21

<sup>c</sup> Euseb Hist Eccles vii 21 The fact is taken from the Letters of Dionysius who, in the time of those troubles, was bishop of Alexandria

<sup>d</sup> In a great number of parishes 11,000 persons were found between fourteen and eighty 536 between forty and seventy See Buffon, Histoire Naturelle, tom ii p 590

<sup>e</sup> Hist August p 195 This long and terrible sedition was first occasioned by a dispute between a soldier and a townsman about a pair of shoes

<sup>f</sup> Dionysius apud Euseb Hist Eccles xvi vii p 21 Ammian xxi 16

<sup>g</sup> Scyliger Animadver ad Euseb Chron p 258 Three dissertations of M Bonny, in the Mem de l'Academie, tom ix

<sup>h</sup> Strabo l xii p 569

<sup>i</sup> Hist August p 197

<sup>j</sup> See Cellarius Geogr Antiq tom ii p 137 upon the limits of Isauria

destitute of a sense of honour which so frequently supplies the absence of public virtue, and as long as he was permitted to enjoy the possession of Italy a victory of the barbarians, the loss of a province or the rebellion of a general, seldom disturbed the tranquil course of his pleasures. At length, a considerable army, stationed on the Upper Danube, invested with the imperial purple their leader Aureolus, who disdaining a confined and barren reign over the mountains of Rætia, passed the Alps, occupied Milan, threatened Rome, and challenged Gallienus to dispute in the field the sovereignty of Italy. The emperor, provoked by the insult, and alarmed by the instant danger, suddenly exerted that latent vigour, which sometimes broke through the indolence of his temper. Forcing himself from the luxury of the palace, he appeared in arms at the head of his legions, and advanced beyond the Po to encounter his competitor. The corrupted name of Pontirolo<sup>2</sup> still preserves the memory of a bridge, over the Adda, which, during the action, must have proved an object of the utmost importance to both armies. The Rætian usurper, after receiving a total defeat and a dangerous wound retired into Milan. The siege of that great city was immediately formed, the walls were battered with every engine in use among the ancients, and Aureolus, doubtful of his internal strength, and hopeless of foreign succours, already anticipated the fatal consequences of unsuccessful rebellion.

A D 268.

His last resource was an attempt to seduce the loyalty of the besiegers. He scattered libels through their camp, inviting the troops to desert an unworthy master, who sacrificed the public happiness to his luxury, and the lives of his most valuable subjects to the slightest suspicions. The arts of Aureolus diffused fears and discontent among the principal officers of his rival. A conspiracy was formed by Heraclianus, the prætorian præfect, by Mareian, a general of rank and reputation, and by Cecrops, who commanded a numerous body of Dalmatian guards. The death of Gallienus was resolved, and notwithstanding their desire of first terminating the siege of Milan, the extreme danger which accompanied every moment's delay obliged them to hasten the execution of their daring purpose. At a late hour of the night, but while the emperor still protracted the pleasures of the table, an alarm was suddenly given, that Aureolus, at the head of all his forces, had made a desperate sally from the town. Gallienus, who was never deficient in personal bravery, started from his silken couch, and without allowing himself time either to put on his armour, or to assemble his guards, he mounted on horseback, and rode full speed towards the supposed place of the attack. Encompassed by his declared or concealed enemies, he soon, amidst the nocturnal tumult, received a mortal dart from an uncertain hand. Before he expired a patriotic sentiment rising in the mind of Gallienus, induced him to name a

A D 268
March 20
Death of Gallienus

deserving successor, and it was his last request, that the imperial ornaments should be delivered to Claudius, who then commanded a detached army in the neighbourhood of Pavia. The report at least was diligently propagated, and the order cheerfully obeyed by the conspirators, who had already agreed to place Claudius on the throne. On the first news of the emperor's death, the troops expressed some suspicion and resentment, till the one was removed, and the other assuaged, by a donative of twenty pieces of gold to each soldier. They then ratified the election, and acknowledged the merit of their new sovereign.<sup>b</sup>

The obscurity which covered the origin of Claudius, though it was afterwards embellished by some flattering fictions,<sup>c</sup> sufficiently betrays the meanness of his birth. We can only discover that he was a native of one of the provinces bordering on the Danube, that his youth was spent in arms, and that his modest valour attracted the favour and confidence of Decius. The senate and people already considered him as an excellent officer, equal to the most important trusts, and censured the inattention of Valerian, who suffered him to remain in the subordinate station of a tribune. But it was not long before that emperor distinguished the merit of Claudius by declaring him general and chief of the Illyrian frontier, with the command of all the troops in Thracæ, Mæsia, Dacia, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, the appointments of the præfect of Egypt the establishment of the proconsul of Africa, and the sure prospect of the consulship. By his victories over the Goths, he deserved from the senate the honour of a statue, and excited the jealous apprehensions of Gallienus. It was impossible that a soldier could esteem so dissolute a sovereign, nor is it easy to conceal a just contempt. Some unguarded expressions which dropt from Claudius, were officially transmitted to the royal ear. The emperor's answer to an officer of confidence, describes in very lively colours his own character and that of the times. "There is not any thing capable of giving me more serious concern, than the intelligence contained in your last despatch,<sup>d</sup> that some malicious suggestions have indisposed towards us the mind of our friend and parent Claudius. As you regard your allegiance, use every means to appease his resent-

Character and
elevation of the emperor Claudius

blended them all but have chiefly followed Aurelius Victor, who seems to have had the best memoirs.

<sup>c</sup> Some supposed him oddly enough, to be a bastard of the younger Gordian. Others took advantage of the province of Dardania to deduce his origin from Dardanius and the ancient kings of Troy.

<sup>d</sup> Notitia a periodical and official despatch which the emperors received from the frumentarii, or agents dispersed through the provinces. Of these we may speak hereafter.

<sup>a</sup> Pons Aureoli, thirteen miles from Bergamo and thirty two from Milan. See Cluver Italia Antiq. tom. i. p. 245. Near this place in the year 1703 the obstinate battle of Cassano was fought between the French and Austrians. The excellent relation of the Chevalier de Folard, who was present, gives a very distinct idea of the ground. See Pol. de de Folard, tom. iii. p. 223—245.

<sup>b</sup> On the death of Gallienus see Trebellius Pollio in Hist. August. p. 181. Zonaras, l. x. p. 37. Zonaras, l. xii. p. 634. Eutrop. ix. 11. Aurelius Victor in Epitom. Victor in Cassar. I have compared and ment, but conduct your negotiation with secrecy, let it not reach the knowledge of the Dacian troops, they are already provoked, and it might inflame their fury. I myself have sent him some presents be it your care that he accept them with pleasure. Above all, let him not suspect that I am made acquainted with his imprudence. The fear of my anger might urge him to desperate counsels."<sup>e</sup> The presents which accompanied this humble epistle, in which the monarch solicited a reconciliation with his discontented subject, consisted of a considerable sum of money, a splendid wardrobe, and a valuable service of silver and gold plate. By such arts Gallienus softened the indignation, and dispelled the fears of his Illyrian general, and, during the remainder of that reign, the formidable sword of Claudius was always drawn in the cause of a master whom he despised. At last, indeed, he received from the conspirators the bloody purple of Gallienus, but he had been absent from their camp and counsels, and however he might applaud the deed, we may candidly presume that he was innocent of the knowledge of it.<sup>f</sup> When Claudius ascended the throne he was about fifty-four years of age.

Death of Aureolus. The siege of Milan was still continued, and Aureolus soon discovered, that the success of his artificers had only raised up a more determined adversary. He attempted to negotiate with Claudius a treaty of alliance and partition. Tell him," replied the intrepid emperor, "that such proposals should have been made to Gallienus, he, perhaps, might have listened to them with patience, and accepted a colleague as despicable as himself."<sup>g</sup> This stern refusal, and a last unsuccessful effort, obliged Aureolus to yield the city and himself to the discretion of the conqueror. The judgment of the army pronounced him worthy of death, and Claudius, after a feeble resistance, consented to the execution of the sentence. Nor was the zeal of the senate less ardent in the cause of their new sovereign. They ratified, perhaps with sincere transports of zeal, the election of Claudius, and as his predecessor had shown himself the personal enemy of their order, they exercised, under the name of justice, a severe revenge against his friends and family. The senate was permitted to discharge the ungrateful office of punishment, and the emperor reserved for himself the pleasure and merit of obtaining by his intercession a general act of indemnity.<sup>h</sup>

Such ostentatious clemency discovers less of the real character of Claudius, than a trifling circumstance in which he seems to have consulted only the dictates of his heart. The frequent rebellions of the provinces had involved almost every person in the guilt of treason, almost every estate in the case of confiscation, and Gallienus often displayed his liberality by distributing among his officers the property of his subjects. On the accession of Claudius, an old woman threw herself at his feet, and complained that a general of the late emperor had obtained an arbitrary grant of her patrimony. This general was Claudius himself, who had not entirely escaped the contagion of the times. The emperor blushed at the reproach, but deserved the confidence which she had reposed in his equity. The confession of his fault was accompanied with immediate and ample restitution.<sup>i</sup>

In the arduous task which Claudius had undertaken, of restoring the empire to its ancient splendour, it was first necessary to revive among his troops a sense of order and obedience. With the authority of a veteran commander, he represented to them, that the relaxation of discipline had introduced a long train of disorders, the effects of which were at length experienced by the soldiers themselves, that a people ruined by oppression, and indolent from despair, could no longer supply a numerous army with the means of luxury, or even of subsistence, that the danger of each individual had increased with the despotism of the military order, since princes who tremble on the throne will guard their safety by the instant sacrifice of every obnoxious subject. The emperor expatiated on the mischiefs of a lawless caprice which the soldiers could only gratify at the expense of their own blood, as their seditious elections had so frequently been followed by civil wars, which consumed the flower of the legions either in the field of battle, or in the cruel abuse of victory. He painted in the most lively colours the exhausted state of the treasury, the desolation of the provinces, the disgrace of the Roman name, and the insolent triumph of rapacious barbarians. It was against those barbarians, he declared, that he intended to point the first effort of their arms. Tetricus might reign for a while over the west, and even Zenobia might preserve the dominions of the east.<sup>k</sup> These usurpers were his personal adversaries, nor could he think of indulging any private resentment till he had saved an empire, whose impending ruin would, unless it was timely prevented, crush both the army and the people.

The various nations of Germany and Sarmatia, who fought under the Gothic standard, had already collected an armament more formidable than any which had yet issued from the Euxine. On the banks of the Niester, one of the great rivers that discharge themselves into that sea, they constructed a fleet of two

He undertakes the reformation of the army

<sup>A D 269</sup>
The Goths invade the empire

<sup>e</sup> Hist. August. p. 208. Gallienus describes the plate vestments, &c. like a man who loved and understood those splendid trifles.

<sup>f</sup> Julian (Orat. 1. p. 6.) affirms that Claudius acquired the empire in a just and even holy manner. But we may distrust the partiality of a kinsman.

<sup>g</sup> Hist. August. p. 203. There are some trifling differences concerning the circumstances of the last defeat and death of Aureolus.

<sup>h</sup> Aurelius Victor in Gallien. The people loudly prayed for the

damnation of Gallienus. The senate decreed that his relations and servants should be thrown down headlong from the Gemonian stairs. An obnoxious officer of the revenue had his eyes torn out whilst under examination.

<sup>i</sup> Zonaras, l. xii. p. 177.

<sup>k</sup> Zonaras on this occasion mentions Posthumus, but the registers of the senate (Hist. August. p. 203.) prove that Tetricus was already emperor of the western provinces.

thousand, or even of six thousand vessels,<sup>1</sup> numbers which, however incredible they may seem, would have been insufficient to transport their pretended army of three hundred and twenty thousand barbarians. Whatever might be the real strength of the Goths, the vigour and success of the expedition were not adequate to the greatness of the preparations. In their passage through the Bosphorus, the unskilful pilots were overpowered by the violence of the current, and while the multitude of their ships were crowded in a narrow channel, many were dashed against each other, or against the shore. The barbarians made several descents on the coasts both of Europe and Asia, but the open country was already plundered, and they were repulsed with shame and loss from the fortified cities which they assaulted. A spirit of discouragement and division arose in the fleet, and some of their chiefs sailed away towards the islands of Crete and Cyprus, but the main body, pursuing a more steady course, anchored at length near the foot of mount Athos, and assaulted the city of Thessalonica, the wealthy capital of all the Macedonian provinces. Their attacks, in which they displayed a fierce but artless bravery, were soon interrupted by the rapid approach of Claudius, hastening to a scene of action that deserved the presence of a warlike prince at the head of the remaining powers of the empire. Impatient for battle, the Goths immediately broke up their camp, relinquished the siege of Thessalonica, left their navy at the foot of mount Athos, traversed the hills of Macedonia, and pressed forwards to engage the last defence of Italy.

We still possess an original letter addressed by Claudius to the senate and people on this memorable occasion. "Conscript fathers," says the emperor, "know that three hundred and twenty thousand Goths have invaded the Roman territory. If I vanquish them, your gratitude will reward my services. Should I fall, remember that I am the successor of Gallienus. The whole republic is fatigued and exhausted. We shall fight after Valerian, after Ingenius, Regilianus, Lollianus, Posthumus, Celsus, and a thousand others, whom a just contempt for Gallienus provoked into rebellion. We are in want of darts, of spears, and of shields. The strength of the empire, Gaul, and Spain, are usurped by Tetricus, and we blush to acknowledge that the archers of the east serve under the banners of Zenobia. Whatever we shall perform, will be sufficiently great."<sup>m</sup> The melancholy firmness of this epistle announces a hero careless of his fate, conscious of his danger, but still deriving a well-grounded hope from the resources of his own mind.

The event surpassed his own expectations and those of the world. By the most signal victories he delivered the empire from this host of barbarians, and was distinguished by posterity under the glorious appellation of the Gothic Claudius. The imperfect historians of an irregular war<sup>n</sup> do not enable us to describe the order and circumstances of his exploits, but, if we could be indulged in the allusion, we might distribute into three acts this memorable tragedy. I. The decisive battle was fought near Naissus, a city of Dardania. The legions at first gave way, oppressed by numbers, and disunited by misfortunes. Their ruin was inevitable, had not the abilities of their emperor prepared a seasonable relief. A large detachment rising out of the secret and difficult passes of the mountains, which, by his orders, they had occupied, suddenly assailed the rear of the victorious Goths. The favourable instant was improved by the activity of Claudius. He revived the courage of his troops, restored their ranks, and pressed the barbarians on every side. Fifty thousand men are reported to have been slain in the battle of Naissus. Several large bodies of barbarians, covering their retreat with a movable fortification of waggons, retired, or rather escaped, from the field of slaughter. II. We may presume that some insurmountable difficulty, the fatigue, perhaps, or the disobedience, of the conquerors, prevented Claudius from completing in one day the destruction of the Goths. The war was diffused over the provinces of Mæsia, Thrace, and Macedonia, and its operations drawn out into a variety of marches, surprises, and tumultuary engagements, as well by sea as by land. When the Romans suffered any loss, it was commonly occasioned by their own cowardice or rashness, but the superior talents of the emperor, his perfect knowledge of the country, and his judicious choice of measures as well as officers, assured on most occasions the success of his arms. The immense booty, the fruit of so many victories, consisted for the greater part of cattle and slaves. A select body of the Gothic youth was received among the imperial troops, the remainder was sold into servitude, and so considerable was the number of female captives, that every soldier obtained to his share two or three women. A circumstance from which we may conclude, that the invaders entertained some designs of settlement as well as of plunder, since even in a naval expedition they were accompanied by their families. III. The loss of their fleet, which was either taken or sunk, had intercepted the retreat of the Goths. A vast circle of Roman posts, distributed with skill, supported with firmness, and gradually closing towards a common centre, forced the barbarians into the most inaccessible parts of Mount Hæmus, where they found a safe refuge, but a very scanty subsistence. During the course of a rigorous winter, in which they were besieged by the emperor's troops, famine and pestilence, desertion and the sword, continually diminished the im-

<sup>1</sup> The Augustan History mentions the smaller, Zonaras the larger, number, the lively fancy of Montesquieu induced him to prefer the latter.

<sup>m</sup> Trebell Pollio in Hist. August. p. 204.

<sup>n</sup> Hist. August. in Claud. Aurelianus et Prob. Zosimus, l. i. p. 38—42. Zonaras, l. xii. p. 638. Aurel. Victor in Epitom. Victor Junior in Cæsar. Eutrop. iv. 11. Fuscæ in Chron.

A D 270    prisoned multitude    On the return of spring, nothing appeared in arms except a hardy and desperate band, the remnant of that mighty host which had embarked at the mouth of the Neister

March    Death    The pestilence which swept away of the emperor    such numbers of the barbarians, at who recommended    length proved fatal to their conqueror Aurelian for his successor

After a short but glorious reign of two years, Claudius expired at Sirmium, amidst the tears and acclamations of his subjects. In his last illness, he convened the principal officers of the state and army, and in their presence recommended Aurelian, one of his generals, as the most deserving of the throne, and the best qualified to execute the great design which he himself had been permitted only to undertake. The virtues of Claudius, his valour, affability, justice, and temperance, his love of fame and of his country, place him in that short list of emperors who added lustre to the Roman purple. Those virtues, however, were celebrated with peculiar zeal and complacency by the courtly writers of the age of Constantine, who was the great grandson of Crispus, the elder brother of Claudius. The voice of flattery was soon taught to repeat, that the gods, who so hastily had snatched Claudius from the earth, rewarded his merit and piety by the perpetual establishment of the empire in his family.<sup>p</sup>

The attempt and    Notwithstanding these oracles, the fall of Quintilius    greatness of the Flavian family (a name which it had pleased them to assume) was deferred above twenty years, and the elevation of Claudius occasioned the immediate ruin of his brother Quintilius, who possessed not sufficient moderation or courage to descend into the private station to which the patriotism of the late emperor had condemned him. Without delay or reflection, he assumed the purple at Aquileia, where he commanded a considerable force and though his reign lasted only seventeen days, he had time to obtain the sanction of the senate, and to experience a mutiny of the troops. As soon as he was informed that the great army of the Danube had invested the well-known valour of Aurelian with imperial power, he sunk under the fame and merit of his rival, and ordering his veins to be opened, prudently withdrew himself from the unequal contest.<sup>q</sup>

Origin and services of Aurelian    The general design of this work will not permit us minutely to relate the actions of every emperor after he ascended the throne, much less to deduce the various fortunes of his private life. We shall only observe, that the father of Aurelian was a peasant of the territory of Sirmium, who occupied a small farm, the property of Aurelius, a rich senator. His warlike son enlisted in the troops as a common soldier, successively rose to the rank of a centurion, a tribune, the prefect of a legion, the inspector of the camp, the general, or, as it was then called, the duke, of a frontier; and at length, during the Gothic war, exercised the important office of commander in chief of the cavalry. In every station he distinguished himself by matchless valour, rigid discipline, and successful conduct. He was invested with the consulship by the emperor Valerian, who styles him, in the pompous language of that age, the deliverer of Illyrium, the restorer of Gaul, and the rival of the Scipios. At the recommendation of Valerian, a senator of the highest rank and merit, Ulpius Crinitus, whose blood was derived from the same source as that of Trajan, adopted the Pannonian peasant, gave him his daughter in marriage, and relieved with his ample fortune the honourable poverty which Aurelian had preserved inviolate.<sup>r</sup>

The reign of Aurelian lasted only Aurelian's successful reign four years and about nine months, but every instant of that short period was filled by some memorable achievement. He put an end to the Gothic war, chastised the Germans who invaded Italy, recovered Gaul, Spain, and Britain out of the hands of Tetricus, and destroyed the proud monarchy which Zenobia had erected in the east, on the ruins of the afflicted empire.

It was the rigid attention of Aurelian, even to the minutest articles of His severe discipline discipline, which bestowed such uninterrupted success on his arms. His military regulations are contained in a very concise epistle to one of his inferior officers, who is commanded to enforce them, as he wishes to become a tribune, or as he is desirous to live. Gaming, drinking, and the arts of divination, were severely prohibited. Aurelian expected that his soldiers should be modest, frugal, and laborious, that their armour should be constantly kept bright, their weapons sharp, their clothing and horses ready for immediate service, that they should live in their quarters with chastity and sobriety, without damaging the corn fields, without stealing even a sheep, a fowl, or a bunch of grapes, without exacting from their landlords, either salt, or oil, or wood. "The public allowance," continues the emperor, "is sufficient for their support, their wealth should be collected from the spoil of the enemy, not from the tears of the provincials."<sup>s</sup> A single instance will serve to display the rigour, and even cruelty, of

<sup>p</sup> According to Zonaras (l. xii. p. 638) Claudius before his death invested him with the purple, but this singular fact is rather contradicted than confirmed by other writers.

<sup>q</sup> See the life of Claudius by Pollio, and the orations of Mamertinus, Eumenius and Julian. See likewise the Caesars of Julian, p. 313. In Julian it was not adulation but superstition and vanity.

<sup>r</sup> Zonaras l. i. p. 42. Pollio (Hist. August. p. 207) allows him virtues and says that like Perinax he was killed by the licentious soldiers. According to Dexippus he died of a disease.

<sup>s</sup> Theodorus (as quoted in the Augustan History p. 211) affirms that in one day he killed with his own hand forty eight Sarmatians and in several subsequent engagements nine hundred and fifty. This heroic valour was admired by the soldiers and celebrated in their rude songs, the burthen of which was mille, mille, mille, occidit.

<sup>t</sup> Ausonius (ap. Hist. August. p. 213) describes the ceremony of the adoption as it was performed at Byzantium in the presence of the emperor and his great officers.

<sup>u</sup> Hist. August. p. 211. This laconic epistle is truly the work of a soldier. It abounds with military phrases and words some of which cannot be understood without difficulty. Ferramenta saminta is well explained by Salmassius. The former of the words means all weapons of offence and is contrasted with Arma, defensive armour. The latter signifies keen and well sharpened.

Aurelian One of the soldiers had seduced the wife of his host. The guilty wretch was fastened to two trees forcibly drawn towards each other, and his limbs were torn asunder by their sudden separation. A few such examples impressed a salutary consternation. The punishments of Aurelian were terrible, but he had seldom occasion to punish more than once the same offence. His own conduct gave a sanction to his laws, and the seditious legions dreaded a chief who had learned to obey, and who was worthy to command.

The death of Claudius had revived the fainting spirit of the Goths. The troops which guarded the passes of Mount Hæmus, and the banks of the Danube, had been drawn away by the apprehension of a civil war, and it seems probable that the remaining body of the Gothic and Vandalic tribes embraced the favourable opportunity, abandoned their settlements of the Ukraine, traversed the rivers, and swelled with new multitudes the destroying host of their countrymen. Their united numbers were at length encountered by Aurelian, and the bloody and doubtful conflict ended only with the approach of night.<sup>a</sup> Exhausted by so many calamities, which they had mutually endured and inflicted during a twenty years' war, the Goths and the Romans consented to a lasting and beneficial treaty. It was earnestly solicited by the barbarians, and cheerfully ratified by the legions, to whose suffrage the prudence of Aurelian referred the decision of that important question. The Gothic nation engaged to supply the armies of Rome with a body of two thousand auxiliaries, consisting entirely of cavalry, and stipulated in return an undisturbed retreat, with a regular market as far as the Danube, provided by the emperor's care, but at their own expense. The treaty was observed with such religious fidelity, that when a party of five hundred men straggled from the camp in quest of plunder, the king or general of the barbarians commanded that the guilty leader should be apprehended and shot to death with darts, as a victim devoted to the sanctity of their engagements. It is, however, not unlikely, that the precaution of Aurelian, who had exacted as hostages the sons and daughters of the Gothic chiefs, contributed something to this pacific temper. The youths he trained in the exercise of arms, and near his own person to the damsels he gave a liberal and Roman education, and by bestowing them in marriage on some of his principal officers, gradually introduced between the two nations the closest and most endearing connections.<sup>b</sup>

But the most important condition of peace was understood rather than expressed in the treaty. Aurelian withdrew the Roman forces from Dacia, and tacitly relinquished that great province to the Goths and Vandals.<sup>c</sup> His manly judgment convinced him of the solid advantages, and taught him to despise the seeming disgrace, of thus contracting the frontiers of the monarchy. The Dacian subjects, removed from those distant possessions which they were unable to cultivate or defend, added strength and populousness to the southern side of the Danube. A fertile territory, which the repetition of barbarous inroads had changed into a desert, was yielded to their industry, and a new province of Dacia still preserved the memory of Trajan's conquests. The old country of that name detained, however, a considerable number of its inhabitants, who dreaded exile more than a Gothic master.<sup>d</sup> These degenerate Romans continued to serve the empire, whose allegiance they had renounced, by introducing among their conquerors the first notions of agriculture, the useful arts, and the conveniences of civilized life. An intercourse of commerce and language was gradually established between the opposite banks of the Danube, and after Dacia became an independent state, it often proved the firmest barrier of the empire against the invasions of the savages of the north. A sense of interest attached the more settled barbarians to the alliance of Rome, and a permanent interest very frequently ripens into sincere and useful friendship. This various colony, which filled the ancient province, and was insensibly blended into one great people, still acknowledged the superior renown and authority of the Gothic tribe, and claimed the fancied honour of a Scandinavian origin. At the same time the lucky though accidental resemblance of the name of Gata, infused among the credulous Goths a vain persuasion, that, in a remote age, their own ancestors, already seated in the Dacian provinces, had received the instructions of Zamolxis, and checked the victorious arms of Sesostris and Darius.<sup>e</sup>

While the vigorous and moderate conduct of Aurelian restored the Illyrian frontier, the nation of the Alemanni<sup>f</sup> violated the conditions of peace, which either Gallienus had purchased, or Claudius had imposed, and, inflamed by their impatient youth, suddenly flew to arms. Forty thousand horse appeared in the field,<sup>g</sup> and the numbers of the infantry doubled those of the cavalry.<sup>h</sup> The first objects of their avarice were a few cities of the Rætian frontier, but their hopes soon maintained a short independence between the rivers Marisia and Crisia (Varos and Keres) which fell into the Teiss.

<sup>a</sup> Dexippus, p. 7—12. Zosimus, l. i. p. 43. Vopiscus on Aurelian in Hist. August. However these historians differ in names (Alemanni, Juthungi, and Marcomanni,) it is evident that they mean the same people, and the same war, but it requires some care to conciliate and explain them.

<sup>c</sup> Cantoclarus, with his usual accuracy, chooses to translate three hundred thousand. His version is equally repugnant to sense and to grammar.

<sup>d</sup> We may remark, as an instance of bad taste, that Dexippus applies to the light infantry of the Alemanni the technical term proper only to the Grecian phalanx.

<sup>a</sup> Zosim l. i. p. 45

<sup>b</sup> Dexippus (ap. Excerpta Legat. p. 12) relates the whole transaction under the name of Vandals. Aurelian married one of the Gothic ladies to his general Bononus, who was able to drink with the Goths and discover their secrets. Hist. August. p. 247.

<sup>c</sup> Hist. August. p. 222. Eutrop. iv. 15. Sexius Rufus, c. 9. Lactantius de Mortibus Persecutorum, c. 9.

<sup>d</sup> The Walachians still preserve many traces of the Latin language and have boasted, in every age, of their Roman descent. They are surrounded by, but not mixed with, the barbarians. See a Memoir of M. d'Auvill on ancient Dacia, in the Academy of Inscriptions, tom. xxx.

<sup>e</sup> See the first chapter of Jornandes. The Vandals, however, (c. 22)

rising with success, the rapid march of the Alemanni traced a line of devastation from the Danube to the Po.

A. D. 270
September The emperor was almost at the same time informed of the irruption, and of the retreat, of the barbarians. Collecting an active body of troops, he marched with silence and celerity along the skirts of the Hercynian forest, and the Alemanni, laden with the spoils of Italy, arrived at the Danube, without suspecting, that on the opposite bank, and in an advantageous post, a Roman army lay concealed and prepared to intercept their return. Aurelian indulged the fatal security of the barbarians, and permitted about half their forces to pass the river without disturbance and without precaution. Their situation and astonishment gave him an easy victory; his skilful conduct improved the advantage. Disposing the legions in a semi-circular form, he advanced the two horns of the crescent across the Danube, and wheeling them on a sudden towards the centre, inclosed the rear of the German host. The dismayed barbarians, on whatsoever side they cast their eyes, beheld with despair a wasted country, a deep and rapid stream, a victorious and implacable enemy.

Reduced to this distressed condition, the Alemanni no longer disdained to sue for peace. Aurelian received their ambassadors at the head of his camp, and with every circumstance of martial pomp that could display the greatness and discipline of Rome. The legions stood to their arms in well-ordered ranks and awful silence. The principal commanders, distinguished by the ensigns of their rank, appeared on horseback on either side of the imperial throne. Behind the throne, the consecrated images of the emperor, and his predecessors, the golden eagles, and the various titles of the legions, engraved in letters of gold, were exalted in the air on lofty pikes covered with silver. When Aurelian assumed his seat, his manly grace and majestic figure taught the barbarians to revere the person as well as the purple of their conqueror. The ambassadors fell prostrate on the ground in silence. They were commanded to rise, and permitted to speak. By the assistance of interpreters they extennated their perfidy, magnified their exploits, expatiated on the vicissitudes of fortune and the advantages of peace, and, with an ill-timed confidence, demanded a large subsidy, as the price of the alliance which they offered to the Romans. The answer of the emperor was stern and imperious. He treated their offer with contempt, and their demand with indignation, reproached the barbarians, that they were as ignorant of the arts of war as of the laws of peace, and finally dismissed them with the choice only of submitting to his unconditional mercy, or awaiting the utmost severity of his resentment.<sup>b</sup> Aurelian had resigned a distant province to the Goths, but it was dangerous to trust or to pardon these perfidious barbarians, whose formidable power kept Italy itself in perpetual alarms.

<sup>a</sup> In Dexippus we at present read Roodanus. M. de Valois very judiciously alters the word to Erdanous.

<sup>b</sup> The emperor Claudius was certainly of the number, but we are ignorant how far his name or respect was extended. If in Cesar and Augustus it may have produced a very awful spectacle, a long line of the mass of the world.

<sup>c</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 210.

Immediately after this conference, The Alemanni invade Italy it should seem that some unexpected emergency required the emperor's presence in Pannonia. He devolved on his lieutenants the care of finishing the destruction of the Alemanni, either by the sword, or by the surer operation of famine. But an active despair has often triumphed over the indolent assurance of success. The barbarians, finding it impossible to traverse the Danube and the Roman camp, broke through the posts in their rear, which were more feebly or less carefully guarded, and with incredible diligence, but by a different road, returned towards the mountains of Italy.<sup>c</sup> Aurelian, who considered the war as totally extinguished, received the mortifying intelligence of the escape of the Alemanni, and of the ravage which they already committed in the territory of Milan. The legions were commanded to follow, with as much expedition as those heavy bodies were capable of exerting, the rapid flight of an enemy, whose infantry and cavalry moved with almost equal swiftness. A few days afterwards the emperor himself marched to the relief of Italy, at the head of a chosen body of auxiliaries, (among whom were the hostages and cavalry of the Vandals,) and of all the pretorian guards who had served in the wars on the Danube.<sup>d</sup>

As the light troops of the Alemanni had spread themselves from the Alps to the Apennine, the incessant vigilance of Aurelian and his officers was exercised in the discovery, the attack, and the pursuit of the numerous detachments. Notwithstanding this desultory war, three considerable battles are mentioned, in which the principal force of both armies was obstinately engaged.<sup>e</sup> The success was various. In the first, fought near Placentia, the Romans received so severe a blow, that, according to the expression of a writer extremely partial to Aurelian, the immediate dissolution of the empire was apprehended.<sup>f</sup> The crafty barbarians, who had lined the woods, suddenly attacked the legions in the dusk of the evening, and, it is most probable, after the fatigue and disorder of a long march. The fury of their charge was irresistible, but at length, after a dreadful slaughter, the patient firmness of the emperor rallied his troops, and restored, in some degree the honour of his arms. The second battle was fought near Fano in Umbria, on the spot which, five hundred years before, had been fatal to the brother of Hannibal.<sup>g</sup> Thus far the successful Germans had advanced along the Æmilia and Fla-

<sup>h</sup> Dexippus gives them a subtle and prolix oration worthy of a Grecian sophist.

<sup>i</sup> Hist. August. p. 215.

<sup>k</sup> Dexippus, p. 12.

<sup>l</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 216.

<sup>m</sup> The little river, or rather torrent, of Metaurus near Fano has been immortalized by tracing such an historian as Livy, and such a poet as Horace.

and are at last vanquished by Aurelian

minian way, with a design of sacking the defenceless mistress of the world. But Aurelian, who, watchful for the safety of Rome, still hung on their rear, found in this place the decisive moment of giving them a total and irretrievable defeat.<sup>a</sup> The flying remnant of their host was exterminated in a third and last battle near Pavia, and Italy was delivered from the inroads of the Alemanni.

Superstitious ceremonies Fear has been the original parent of superstition, and every new calamity urges trembling mortals to deprecate the wrath of their invisible enemies. Though the best hope of the republic was in the valour and conduct of Aurelian, yet such was the public consternation, when the barbarians were hourly expected at the gates of Rome, that by a decree of the senate, the Sibylline books were consulted. Even the emperor himself, from a motive either of religion or of policy, recommended this salutary measure, chided the tardiness of the senate,<sup>b</sup> and offered to supply whatever expense, whatever animals, whatever captives of any nation, the gods should require. Notwithstanding this liberal offer, it does not appear that any human victims expiated with their blood the sins of the

A. D. 271 Jan 11 Roman people. The Sibylline books enjoined ceremonies of a more harmless nature, processions of priests in white robes attended by a chorus of youths and virgins, lustrations of the city and adjacent country, and sacrifices, whose powerful influence disabled the barbarians from passing the mystic ground on which they had been celebrated. However puerile in themselves, these superstitious arts were subservient to the success of the war, and if, in the decisive battle of Fano, the Alemanni fancied they saw an army of spectres combating on the side of Aurelian, he received a real and effectual aid from this imaginary reinforcement.<sup>c</sup>

Fortifications of Rome But whatever confidence might be placed in ideal ramparts, the experience of the past, and the dread of the future, induced the Romans to construct fortifications of a grosser and more substantial kind. The seven hills of Rome had been surrounded, by the successors of Romulus, with an ancient wall of more than thirteen miles.<sup>d</sup> The vast enclosure may seem disproportioned to the strength and numbers of the infant state. But it was necessary to secure an ample extent of pasture and arable land, against the frequent and sudden incursions of the tribes of Latium, the perpetual enemies of the republic. With the progress of Roman greatness, the city and its inhabitants gradually increased, filled up the vacant space, pierced through the useless walls, covered the field of Mars, and, on every side, followed the public highways in long and beautiful suburbs.<sup>e</sup> The extent of the new walls, erected by Aurelian, and finished in the reign of Probus, was magnified by popular estimation to near fifty,<sup>f</sup> but is reduced by accurate measurement to about twenty-one, miles.<sup>g</sup> It was a great but melancholy labour, since the defence of the capital betrayed the decline of the monarchy. The Romans of a more prosperous age, who trusted to the arms of the legions, the safety of the frontier camps,<sup>h</sup> were very far from entertaining a suspicion, that it would ever become necessary to fortify the seat of empire against the inroads of the barbarians.<sup>i</sup>

The victory of Claudius over the Goths, and the success of Aurelian against the Alemanni, had already restored to the arms of Rome their ancient superiority over the barbarous nations of the north. To eliasise domestic tyrants, and to reunite the dismembered parts of the empire, was a task reserved for the second of those warlike emperors. Though he was acknowledged by the senate and people, the frontiers of Italy, Africa, Illyricum, and Thrace, confined the limits of his reign. Gaul, Spain, and Britain, Egypt, Syria, and Asia Minor, were still possessed by two rebels who alone, out of so numerous a list, had hitherto escaped the dangers of their situation, and to complete the ignominy of Rome, these rival thrones had been usurped by women.

A rapid succession of monarchs had arisen and fallen in the provinces of Gaul. The rigid virtues of Posthumus served only to hasten his destruction. After suppressing a competitor, who had assumed the purple at Mentz, he refused to gratify his troops with the plunder of the rebellious city, and, in the seventh year of his reign, became the victim of their disappointed avarice.<sup>k</sup> The death of Victorinus, his friend and associate, was occasioned by a less worthy cause. The shining accomplishments<sup>l</sup> of that prince were stained by a licentious passion, which he indulged in acts of violence, with too little regard to the laws of society, or even to those of love.<sup>m</sup> He was slain

Aurelian suppresses the two usurpers

Succession of usurpers in Gaul

<sup>a</sup> It is recorded by an inscription found at Peraro. See Gruter cclxxvi. 3.

<sup>b</sup> One should imagine, he said, that you were assembled in a Christian church; not in the temple of all the gods.

<sup>c</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 215, 216 gives a long account of these ceremonies from the registers of the senate.

<sup>d</sup> Plin. Hist. Natur. iii. 5. To confirm our idea, we may observe, that for a long time Mount Caelius was a grove of oaks, and Mount Viminal was overrun with osiers. That, in the fourth century, the Aventine was a vacant and solitary retirement. That, till the time of Augustus, the Esquiline was an unwholesome burying-ground, and that the numerous inequalities, remarked by the ancients in the Quirinal, sufficiently prove that it was not covered with buildings. Of the seven hills, the Capitoline and Palatine only, with the adjacent valleys, were the primitive habitation of the Roman people. But this subject would require a dissertation.

<sup>e</sup> Explanantur lecta multis addidere urbes is the expression of Pliny. Hist. August. p. 222. Both Lipin and Isaac Vossius have eagerly embraced this measure.

<sup>u</sup> See Nardini, Roma Antica, l. i. c. 8.

<sup>x</sup> Tacit. Hist. iv. 23.

<sup>y</sup> For Aurelian's walls, see Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 216, 222. Zosimus, l. i. p. 43. Eutropius, iv. 15. Aurel. Victor in Aurelian. Victor Junior in Aurelian. Euseb. Hieronym. et Idrius in Chronicle.

<sup>z</sup> His competitor was Lollianus, or Zethanus; if, indeed, these names mean the same person. See Tillemont tom. iii. p. 1177.

<sup>a</sup> The character of this prince by Julius Aferianus (cp. Hist. August. p. 187) is worth transcribing, as it seems fair and impartial. Victorinus qui post Junium Posthumum Gallias rexit neminem exilimo præferendum, non in virtute Trajanum, non Antoninum in clementia non in gravitate Nervam non in gubernando terrore Vespasianum non in censure Lollii vitæ ac severitate militari Perlinacem vel Severinum. Sed omnia hæc hinc el cupiditas voluptatis mulierarie sic perdidit, ut nemo videat virtutes ejus in literas militare quem consilium omnium judicio meruisse putari.

<sup>b</sup> He married the wife of Albinus, an actuary, or army agent. Hist. August. p. 186. Aurel. Victor in Aurelian.

at Cologne, by a conspiracy of jealous husbands, whose revenge would have appeared more justifiable, had they spared the innocence of his son. After the murder of so many valiant princes, it is somewhat remarkable, that a female for a long time controlled the fierce legions of Gaul, and still more singular, that she was the mother of the unfortunate Victorinus. The arts and treasures of Victoria enabled her successively to place Marius and Tetricus on the throne, and to reign with a manly vigour under the name of those dependent emperors. Money of copper, of silver, and of gold, was coined in her name, she assumed the titles of Augusta and Mother of the Camps: her power ended only with her life, but her life was perhaps shortened by the ingratitude of Tetricus.<sup>c</sup>

The reign and
defeat of Tetricus

When, at the instigation of his ambitious patroness, Tetricus assumed the ensigns of royalty, he was governor of the peaceful province of Aquitaine, an employment suited to his character and education. He reigned four or five years over Gaul, Spain, and Britain, the slave and sovereign of a licentious army, whom he dreaded, and by whom he was despised. The valour and fortune of Aurelian at length opened the prospect of a deliverance. He ventured to disclose his melancholy situation, and conjured the emperor to hasten to the relief of his unhappy rival. Had this secret correspondence reached the ears of the soldiers, it would most probably have cost Tetricus his life, nor could he resign the sceptre of the west, without committing an act of treason against himself. He affected the appearances of a civil war, led his forces into the field against Aurelian, posted them in the most advantageous manner, betrayed his own counsels to the enemy, and with a few chosen friends deserted in the beginning of the action. The rebel legions, though disordered and dismayed by the unexpected treachery of their chief, defended themselves with desperate valour, till they were cut in pieces almost to a man, in this bloody and memorable battle, which was fought near Chalons in Champagne.<sup>d</sup> The retreat of the irregular auxiliaries, Franks and Batavians,<sup>e</sup> whom the conqueror soon compelled or persuaded to repass the Rhine, restored the general tranquillity, and the power of Aurelian was acknowledged from the wall of Antoninus to the columns of Hercules.

A. D. 271
Summer

As early as the reign of Claudius, the city of Autun, alone and unassisted, had ventured to declare against the legions of Gaul. After a siege of seven months, they stormed and plundered that unfortunate city, already wasted by famine.<sup>f</sup> Lyons, on the contrary, had resisted with obstinate disaffection the arms of Aurelian. We read of the punishment of Lyons,<sup>g</sup> but there is not any mention of the rewards of Autun. Such, indeed, is the policy of civil war severely to remember injuries, and to forget the most important services. Revenge is profitable, gratitude is expensive.

Aurelian had no sooner secured the person and provinces of Tetricus, than A. D. 272 Character of Zenobia he turned his arms against Zenobia, the celebrated queen of Palmyra and the east. Modern Europe has produced several illustrious women who have sustained with glory the weight of empire, nor is our own age destitute of such distinguished characters. But if we except the doubtful achievements of Semiramis, Zenobia is perhaps the only female whose superior genius broke through the servile indolence imposed on her sex by the climate and manners of Asia.<sup>h</sup> She claimed her descent from the Macedonian kings of Egypt, equalled in beauty her ancestor Cleopatra, and far surpassed that princess in chastity<sup>i</sup> and valour. Zenobia was esteemed the most lovely her beauty and learning, as well as the most heroic of her sex.

She was of a dark complexion (for, in speaking of a lady, these trifles become important). Her teeth were of a pearly whiteness, and her large black eyes sparkled with uncommon fire, tempered by the most attractive sweetness. Her voice was strong and harmonious. Her manly understanding was strengthened and adorned by study. She was not ignorant of the Latin tongue, but possessed in equal perfection the Greek, the Syriac, and the Egyptian languages. She had drawn up for her own use an epitome of oriental history, and familiarly compared the beauties of Homer and Plato under the tuition of the sublime Longinus.

This accomplished woman gave her her valour hand to Odenathus, who, from a private station, raised himself to the dominion of the East. She soon became the friend and companion of a hero. In the intervals of war, Odenathus passionately delighted in the exercise of hunting, he pursued with ardour the wild beasts of the desert, lions, panthers, and bears, and the ardour of Zenobia in that dangerous amusement was not inferior to his own. She had injured her constitution to fatigue, disdained the use of a covered carriage, generally appeared on horseback in a military habit, and sometimes marched several miles on foot at the head of the troops. The success of Odenathus was in a great measure ascribed to her incomparable prudence and fortitude. Their splendid victories over the great king, whom they twice pursued as far as the gates of Ctesiphon, laid the foundations of their united fame and power. The armies which some critics, without any reason, would fix alter the word to Ba- gaudica.

<sup>c</sup> Pollio assigns her an article among the thirty tyrants. Hist. Aug. just. p. 200.

<sup>d</sup> Pollio in Hist. Aug. just. p. 196. Vopiscus in Hist. Aug. just. p. 220. The two virtues, in the lives of Gallienus and Aurelian. Eutrop. ix. 13. Lusch. in Chron. Of all these writers only the two last (but with strong probability) place the fall of Tetricus before that of Zenobia. M. de Bosc (in the Academy of Inscriptions tom. xxx.) does not wish, and Tillemont (tom. iii. p. 1189) does not dare, to follow them. I have been fatter than the one and holier than the other.

<sup>e</sup> Victor Junior in Aurelian. Eumenius mentions Batavica,

<sup>f</sup> Eumen. in Vet. Panegy. li. 8.

<sup>g</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. Aug. just. p. 216. Autun was not restored till the reign of Diocletian. See Eumenius de restaurandis scholis.

<sup>h</sup> Almost every thing that is said of the manners of Odenathus and Zenobia is taken from their lives in the Augustan History, by Trebellian Pollio see p. 192, 193.

<sup>i</sup> She never admitted her husband's embraces but for the sake of posterity. If her hopes were baffled, in the ensuing month she reiterated the experiment.

they commanded, and the provinces which they had saved, acknowledged not any other sovereigns than their invincible chiefs. The senate and people of Rome revered a stranger who had avenged their captive emperor and even the insensible son of Valerian accepted Odenathus for his legitimate colleague.

She reveres her husband's death

After a successful expedition against the Gothic plunderers of Asia, the Palmyrenian prince returned to the city of Emesa in Syria. Invincible in war he was there cut off by domestic treason and his favourite amusement of hunting was the cause, or at least the occasion of his death.<sup>1</sup> His nephew, Maonius, presumed to dart his javelin before that of his uncle; and though admonished of his error, repeated the same insolence. As a monarch and as a sportsman, Odenathus was provoked, took away his horse a mark of ignominy among the barbarians, and chastised the rash youth by a short confinement. The offence was soon forgot, but the punishment was remembered, and Maonius, with a few daring associates, assassinated his uncle in the midst of a great entertainment. Herod, the son of Odenathus though not of Zenobia, a young man of a soft and effeminate temper<sup>2</sup> was killed with his father. But Maonius obtained only the pleasure of revenge by this bloody deed. He had scarcely time to assume the title of Augustus before he was sacrificed by Zenobia to the memory of her husband.<sup>3</sup> and wrote over the East and Egypt

With the assistance of his most faithful friends she immediately filled the vacant throne and governed with manly counsels Palmyra, Syria and the East, above five years. By the death of Odenathus that authority was at an end which the senate had granted him only as a personal distinction, but his martial widow, disdaining both the senate and Gallienus, obliged one of the Roman generals, who was sent against her, to retreat into Europe, with the loss of his army and his reputation.<sup>4</sup> Instead of the little passions which so frequently perplex a female reign, the steady administration of Zenobia was guided by the most judicious maxims of policy. If it was expedient to pardon, she could calm her resentment; if it was necessary to punish, she could impose silence on the voice of pity. Her strict economy was accused of avarice, yet on every proper occasion she appeared magnificent and liberal. The neighbouring states of Arabia, Armenia, and Persia, dreaded her enmity, and solicited her alliance. To the dominions of Odenathus, which extended from the Euphrates to the frontiers of Bithynia, his widow added the inheritance of her ancestors, the populous and fertile kingdom of Egypt. The emperor Claudius acknowledged her merit, and was content, that, while he pursued the Gothic war, she should assert the dignity of the empire in the east.<sup>5</sup> The conduct, however, of Zenobia was attended with some ambiguity, nor is it unlikely that she had conceived the design of erecting an independent and hostile monarchy. She blended with the popular manners of Roman princes the stately pomp of the courts of Asia, and exacted from her subjects the same adoration that was paid to the successors of Cyrus. She bestowed on her three sons<sup>6</sup> a Latin education and often showed them to the troops adorned with the imperial purple. For herself she reserved the diadem with the splendid but doubtful title of Queen of the East.

When Aurelian passed over into Asia, against an adversary whose sex alone could render her an object of

The expedition of Aurelian
A D 272

contempt, his presence restored obedience to the province of Bithynia, already shaken by the arms and intrigues of Zenobia.<sup>7</sup> Advancing at the head of his legions, he accepted the submission of Ancyra, and was admitted into Tyana, after an obstinate siege, by the help of a perfidious citizen. The generous though fierce temper of Aurelian abandoned the traitor to the rage of the soldiers: a superstitious reverence induced him to treat with lenity the countrymen of Apollonius the philosopher.<sup>8</sup> Antioch was deserted on his approach, till the emperor, by his salutary edicts, recalled the fugitives, and granted a general pardon to all who, from necessity rather than choice, had been engaged in the service of the Palmyrenian queen. The unexpected mildness of such a conduct reconciled the minds of the Syrians, and, as far as the gates of Emesa, the wishes of the people seconded the terror of his arms.<sup>9</sup>

Zenobia would have ill deserved her reputation, had she indolently permitted the emperor of the west to approach within an hundred miles of her capital. The fate of the east was decided in two great battles; so similar in almost every circumstance, that we can scarcely distinguish them from each other, except by observing that the first was fought near Antioch,<sup>10</sup> and the second near Emesa.<sup>11</sup> In both the queen of Palmyra animated the armies by her presence, and devolved the execution of her orders on Zabdas, who had already signalized his military talents by the conquest of Egypt. The

The emperor defeats the Palmyrenians in the battles of Antioch and Emesa

<sup>1</sup> Hist. A. ant. p. 192, 193. Zosimus L. i. p. 55. Zonaras, l. xii. p. 633. The last is clear and probable, the others confused and incorrect. The text of Syncellus, if not corrupt, is almost a nonsense.

<sup>2</sup> Oden thus and Zenobia often sent him from the walls of the city, p. 633. of gems and toys, which he received with infinite delight.

<sup>3</sup> See a Hist. August. p. 198. Aurelian's testimony to her merit, and the conquest of Egypt, Zosimus L. i. p. 59. 47.

<sup>4</sup> Timotheus, Hierocles and Vaballathus. It is supposed that the two last were already dead before the war. On the last, Aurelian bestowed a small province of Armenia with the title of king: several of his medals are still extant. See Tillemont, tom. i. l. p. 1199.

<sup>5</sup> Zosimus l. i. p. 44.

<sup>6</sup> Zonaras (in Hist. August. p. 217) gives us an authentic letter and a doubtful version of Aurelian. Apollonius of Tyana was born about the year 120, or 130, of Jesus Christ. His life (that of the former) is related in so fabulous a manner by his disciples that we are at a loss to discover whether he was a sage, an impostor or a fanatic.

<sup>7</sup> Zosimus l. i. p. 41.

<sup>8</sup> At a place called Immus. Eutropius, Sextus Rufus and Jerome, mention only the first battle.

<sup>9</sup> See Hist. August. p. 217 mentions only the second.

China, all remarkable by their rich or singular dresses, displayed the fame and power of the Roman emperor, who exposed likewise to the public view the presents that he had received, and particularly a great number of crowns of gold, the offerings of grateful cities. The victories of Aurelian were attested by the long train of captives who reluctantly attended his triumph, Goths, Vandals, Sarmatians, Alemanni, Franks, Gauls, Syrians, and Egyptians. Each people was distinguished by its peculiar inscription, and the title of Amazons was bestowed on ten martial heroines of the Gothic nation who had been taken in arms.<sup>1</sup> But every eye, disregarding the crowd of captives, was fixed on the emperor Tetricus, and the queen of the east. The former, as well as his son, whom he had created Augustus, was dressed in Gallic trousers,<sup>k</sup> a saffron tunic, and robe of purple. The beautiful figure of Zenobia was confined by fetters of gold, a slave supported the gold chain which encircled her neck, and she almost fainted under the intolerable weight of jewels. She preceded on foot the magnificent chariot in which she once hoped to enter the gates of Rome. It was followed by two other chariots, still more sumptuous, of Odenathus and of the Persian monarch. The triumphal car of Aurelian (it had formerly been used by a Gothic king) was drawn, on this memorable occasion, either by four stags or by four elephants.<sup>l</sup> The most illustrious of the senate, the people, and the army, closed the solemn procession. Unfeigned joy, wonder, and gratitude, swelled the acclamations of the multitude, but the satisfaction of the senate was clouded by the appearance of Tetricus, nor could they suppress a rising murmur, that the haughty emperor should thus expose to public ignominy the person of a Roman and a magistrate.<sup>m</sup>

His treatment of Tetricus and Zenobis

But however, in the treatment of his unfortunate rivals, Aurelian might indulge his pride, he behaved towards them with a generous clemency, which was seldom exercised by the ancient conquerors. Princes who, without success, had defended their throne or freedom, were frequently strangled in prison, as soon as the triumphal pomp ascended the capitol. These usurpers, whom their defeat had convicted of the crime of treason, were permitted to spend their lives in affluence and honourable repose. The emperor presented Zenobia with an elegant villa at Tibur, or Tivoli, about twenty miles from the capi-

<sup>1</sup> Among barbarous nations, women have often combated by the side of their husbands. But it is almost impossible that a society of Amazons should ever have existed either in the old or new world.

<sup>k</sup> The use of breeches, breeches or trousers was still considered in Italy as a Gallic and barbarian fashion. The Romans, however, had made great advances towards it. To incircle the legs and thighs with facies or bands was understood in the time of Pompey and Horace, to be a proof of ill health and effeminacy. In the time of Trajan, the custom was confined to the rich and luxurious. It gradually was adopted by the meanest of the people. See a very curious note of Casaubon ad Sueton. in August. c. 82.

<sup>l</sup> Most probably the former: the latter seen on the medals of Aurelian only denote (according to the learned Cardinal Noris) an oriental victory.

<sup>m</sup> The expression of Calpurnius (Ælog. i. 50) Nullo duce capitra triumpho, as applied to Rome, contains a very manifest allusion and censure.

tal, the Syrian queen insensibly sunk into a Roman matron, her daughters married into noble families, and her race was not yet extinct in the fifth century.<sup>n</sup> Tetricus and his son were reinstated in their rank and fortunes. They erected on the Cælian hill a magnificent palace, and as soon as it was finished, invited Aurelian to supper. On his entrance, he was agreeably surprised with a picture which represented their singular history. They were delineated offering to the emperor a civic crown and the sceptre of Gaul, and again receiving at his hands the ornaments of the senatorial dignity. The father was afterwards invested with the government of Lucania,<sup>o</sup> and Aurelian, who soon admitted the abdicated monarch to his friendship and conversation, familiarly asked him, Whether it were not more desirable to administer a province of Italy, than to reign beyond the Alps? The son long continued a respectable member of the senate, nor was there any of the Roman nobility more esteemed by Aurelian, as well as by his successors.<sup>p</sup>

So long and so various was the pomp of Aurelian's triumph, that although it opened with the dawn of day, the slow majesty of the procession ascended not the capitol before the ninth hour, and it was already dark when the emperor returned to the palace. The festival was protracted by theatrical representations, the games of the circus, the hunting of wild beasts, combats of gladiators, and naval engagements. Liberal donatives were distributed to the army and people, and several institutions, agreeable or beneficial to the city, contributed to perpetuate the glory of Aurelian. A considerable portion of his oriental spoils was consecrated to the gods of Rome, the capitol, and every other temple, glittered with the offerings of his ostentatious piety, and the temple of the sun alone received above fifteen thousand pounds of gold.<sup>q</sup> This last was a magnificent structure, erected by the emperor on the side of the Quirinal hill, and dedicated, soon after the triumph, to that deity whom Aurelian adored as the parent of his life and fortunes. His mother had been an inferior priestess in a chapel of the sun, a peculiar devotion to the god of light, was a sentiment which the fortunate peasant imbibed in his infancy, and every step of his elevation, every victory of his reign, fortified superstition by gratitude.<sup>r</sup>

The arms of Aurelian had vanquished the foreign and domestic foes. He suppressed a <sup>n</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 109. Hieronym in Chron. Prosper in Chron. Baronius supposes that Zenobius, bishop of Florence in the time of St. Ambrose, was of her family.

<sup>o</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 222. Eutropius ix. 13. Victor Junior. But Pollio in Hist. August. p. 196 says, that Tetricus was made corrector of all Italy.

<sup>p</sup> Hist. August. p. 197.

<sup>q</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. 222. Zosimus, l. i. p. 56. He placed in it the images of Belus and of the sun, which he had brought from Palmyra. It was dedicated in the fourth year of his reign (Fueh in Chron.) but was most assuredly begun immediately on his accession.

<sup>r</sup> See in the Augustan History, p. 210 the omens of his fortune. His devotion to the sun appears in his letters, on his medals, and is mentioned in the Cæsars of Julian. Commentaire de Spanheim, p. 103.

of the republic. We are assured, that, by his salutary rigour, crimes and factions, mischievous arts and pernicious connivance, the insupportable growth of a feeble and oppressive government, were eradicated throughout the Roman world.<sup>1</sup> But if we attentively reflect how much swifter is the progress of corruption than its cure, and if we remember that the years abandoned to public disorders exceeded the months allotted to the martial reign of Aurelian, we must confess that a few short intervals of peace were insufficient for the arduous work of reformation. Even his attempt to restore the integrity of the coin, was opposed by a formidable insurrection. The emperor's vexation breaks out in one of his private letters: "Surely," says he, "the gods have decreed that my life should be a perpetual warfare. A sedition within the walls has just now given birth to a very serious civil war. The workmen of the mint, at the instigation of Felicissimus a slave to whom I had intrusted an employment in the finances, have risen in rebellion. They are at length suppressed, but seven thousand of my soldiers have been slain in the contest, of those troops whose ordinary station is in Dacia, and the camps along the Danube." Other writers, who confirm the same fact, add likewise, that it happened soon after Aurelian's triumph: that the decisive engagement was fought on the Carian hill, that the workmen of the mint had adulterated the coin, and that the emperor restored the public credit, by delivering out good money in exchange for the bad, which the people was commanded to bring into the treasury.<sup>2</sup>

We might content ourselves with relating this extraordinary transaction, but we cannot dissemble how much in its present form it appears to us inconsistent and incredible.
 The debasement of the coin is indeed well suited to the administration of Gallienus, nor is it unlikely that the instruments of the corruption might dread the inflexible justice of Aurelian. But the guilt, as well as the profit, must have been confined to a few; nor is it easy to conceive by what arts they could arm a people whom they had injured against a monarch whom they had betrayed. We might naturally expect, that such miscreants should have shared the public detestation with the informers and the other ministers of oppression; and that the reformation of the coin should have been an action equally popular with the destruction of those obsolete accounts, which by the emperor's order were burnt in the forum of Trajan *. In an age when the principles of commerce were so imperfectly understood, the most desirable end might perhaps be effected by harsh and injudicious means, but a temporary grievance of such a nature can scarcely excite and support a serious civil war

The repetition of intolerable taxes, imposed either on the land or on the necessaries of life, may at last provoke those who will not, or who cannot, relinquish their country. But the case is far otherwise in every operation which by whatsoever expedients, restores the just value of money. The transient evil is soon obliterated by the permanent benefit, the loss is divided among multitudes, and if a few wealthy individuals experience a sensible diminution of treasure, with their riches, they at the same time lose the degree of weight and importance which they derived from the possession of them. However Aurélian might choose to disguise the real cause of the insurrection, his reformation of the coin could only furnish a faint pretence to a party already powerful and discontented. Rome, though deprived of freedom, was distracted by faction. The people, towards whom the emperor, himself a plebeian, always expressed a peculiar fondness, lived in perpetual dissension with the senate, the equestrian order, and the prætorian guards. Nothing less than the firm though secret conspiracy of those orders, of the authority of the first, the wealth of the second, and the arms of the third, could have displayed a strength capable of contending in battle with the veteran legions of the Danube, which, under the conduct of a martial sovereign, had achieved the conquest of the west and of the east.

Whatever was the cause or the object of this rebellion, imputed with so little probability to the workmen of the mint, Aurelian used his victory with unrelenting rigour.<sup>2</sup> He was naturally of a severe disposition. A peasant and a soldier, his nerves yielded not easily to the impressions of sympathy, and he could sustain without emotion the sight of tortures and death. Trained from his earliest youth in the exercise of arms, he set too small a value on the life of a citizen, chastised by military execution the slightest offences, and transferred the stern discipline of the camp into the civil administration of the laws. His love of justice often became a blind and furious passion: and whenever he deemed his own or the public safety endangered, he disregarded the rules of evidence, and the proportion of punishments. The unprovoked rebellion with which the Romans rewarded his services, exasperated his haughty spirit. The noblest families of the capital were involved in the guilt or suspicion of this dark conspiracy. A hasty spirit of revenge urged the bloody prosecution, and it proved fatal to one of the nephews of the emperor. The executioners (if we may use the expression of a contemporary poet) were fatigued, the prisons were crowded, and the unhappy senate lamented the death or absence of its most illustrious members.<sup>3</sup> Nor was the pride

x Voy was in Hst. August p. 221 x Hst. August p. 222. American calls three soldiers Hilbert Rypmaner Co ruzar and Desura x Hst. L P 55. Embassy at ix 16 April Votr-x Hst. August p. 222. April. Voyx Hst. August p. 222 before trip back return from Egypt. See Voy x and other notes in original to see Hst. August p. 222.

* Voprosy in II d. August, p 212. The two Vistula Entropies, ix. 14. Zvezda II, p. 43; mentions only three seasons and places the death before the civil war.

* Tel: 260 891 7215 Fax: 260 891 7216
Carriford Road, Llanelli, Carmarthenshire SA31 3PP
Inchmurrin Farm, Llanelli, Carmarthenshire SA31 3PP

his age and infirmities to succeed the martial vigour of Aurelian. "Are these limbs, conscript fathers, fitted to sustain the weight of armour, or to practise the exercises of the camp? The variety of climates, and the hardships of a military life, would soon oppress a feeble constitution, which subsists only by the most tender management. My exhausted strength scarcely enables me to discharge the duty of a senator, how insufficient would it prove to the arduous labours of war and government! Can you hope, that the legions will respect a weak old man, whose days have been spent in the shade of peace and retirement? Can you desire that I should ever find reason to regret the favourable opinion of the senate?"<sup>k</sup>

<sup>and accepts the purple</sup> The reluctance of Tacitus, and it might possibly be sincere, was encountered by the affectionate obstinacy of the senate. Five hundred voices repeated at once, in eloquent confusion, that the greatest of the Roman princes, Numa, Trajan, Hadrian, and the Antonines, had ascended the throne in a very advanced season of life, that the mind, not the body, a sovereign, not a soldier, was the object of their choice, and that they expected from him no more than to guide by his wisdom the valour of the legions. These pressing though tumultuary instances were seconded by a more regular oration of Metus Falconius, the next on the consular bench to Tacitus himself. He reminded the assembly of the evils which Rome had endured from the vices of headstrong and capricious youths, congratulated them on the election of a virtuous and experienced senator, and, with a manly, though perhaps a selfish, freedom, exhorted Tacitus to remember the reasons of his elevation, and to seek a successor, not in his own family, but in the republic. The speech of Falconius was enforced by a general acclamation. The emperor elect submitted to the authority of his country, and received the voluntary homage of his equals. The judgment of the senate was confirmed by the consent of the Roman people, and of the prætorian guards.<sup>l</sup>

<sup>Authority of the senate</sup> The administration of Tacitus was not unworthy of his life and principles. A grateful servant of the senate, he considered that national council as the author, and himself as the subject, of the laws.<sup>m</sup> He studied to heal the wounds which imperial pride, civil discord, and military violence, had inflicted on the constitution, and to restore, at least, the image of the ancient republic, as it had been preserved by the policy of Augustus, and the virtues of Trajan and the Antonines. It may not be useless to recapitulate some of the most important prerogatives which the senate appeared to have regained by the election of Tacitus.<sup>n</sup> 1 To invest one of their body, under the title of emperor, with the general command of the armies, and the government of the frontier provinces. 2 To determine the list, or, as it was then styled the college of consuls. They were twelve in number, who, in successive pairs, each, during the space of two months, filled the year, and represented the dignity of that ancient office. The authority of the senate, in the nomination of the consuls, was exercised with such independent freedom, that no regard was paid to an irregular request of the emperor in favour of his brother Florianus. "The senate," exclaimed Tacitus, with the honest transport of a patriot, "understand the character of a prince whom they have chosen." 3 To appoint the proconsuls and presidents of the provinces, and to confer on all the magistrates their civil jurisdiction. 4 To receive appeals through the intermediate office of the præfect of the city from all the tribunals of the empire. 5 To give force and validity by their decrees, to such as they should approve of by the emperor's edicts. 6 To these several branches of authority we may add some inspection over the finances, since, even in the stern reign of Aurelian, it was in their power to divert a part of the revenue from the public service.<sup>o</sup>

Circular epistles were sent, without <sup>Their joy and confidence</sup> delay, to all the principal cities of the empire, Treves, Milan, Aquileia, Thessalonica, Corinth, Athens, Antioch, Alexandria, and Carthage, to claim their obedience, and to inform them of the happy revolution which had restored the Roman senate to its ancient dignity. Two of these epistles are still extant. We likewise possess two very singular fragments of the private correspondence of the senators on this occasion. They discover the most excessive joy, and the most unbounded hopes. "Cast away your indolence," it is thus that one of the senators addresses his friend, "emerge from your retirements of Baïæ and Puteoli. Give yourself to the city, to the senate. Rome flourishes, the whole republic flourishes. Thanks to the Roman army, to an army truly Roman, at length we have recovered our just authority, the end of all our desires. We hear appeals, we appoint proconsuls, we create emperors, perhaps too we may restrain them—to the wise a word is sufficient."<sup>p</sup> These lofty expectations were, however, soon disappointed, nor, indeed, was it possible that the armies and the provinces should long obey the luxurious and unwarlike nobles of Rome. On the slightest touch, the unsupported fabric of their pride and power fell to the ground. The expiring senate displayed a sudden lustre, blazed for a moment, and was extinguished for ever.

<sup>k</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 227.

<sup>l</sup> Hist. August. p. 228. Tacitus addressed the prætorians by the appellation of sanctissimi milites, and the people by that of sacratissimi Quirites.

<sup>m</sup> In his munitions he never exceeded the number of an hundred, as limited by the Cambræ law which was enacted under Augustus, and at length repealed by Justinian. See Casaubon ad locum Vopisci.

<sup>n</sup> See the lives of Tacitus, Florianus and Probus. In the Augustan history we may be well assured, that whatever the soldier gave, the senator had already given.

<sup>o</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 216. The passage is perfectly clear yet both Casaubon and Salmagius wish to correct it.

<sup>p</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 230, 232, 233. The senators celebrated the happy restoration with hymns and public rejoicings.

A. D 276
Tacitus is acknowledged by the army

All that had yet passed at Rome was no more than a theatrical representation, unless it was ratified by the more substantial power of the legions. Leaving the senators to enjoy their dream of freedom and ambition, Tacitus proceeded to the Thracian camp, and was there, by the prætorian præfect, presented to the assembled troops, as the prince whom they themselves had demanded, and whom the senate had bestowed. As soon as the præfect was silent, the emperor addressed himself to the soldiers with eloquence and propriety. He gratified their avarice by a liberal distribution of treasure, under the names of pay and donative. He engaged their esteem by a spirited declaration, that although his age might disable him from the performance of military exploits, his counsels should never be unworthy of a Roman general, the successor of the brave Aurchian.

The Alani invade Asia, and are repulsed by Tacitus

Whilst the deceased emperor was making preparations for a second expedition into the East, he had negotiated with the Alani, a Scythian people, who pitched their tents in the neighbourhood of the lake Mæotis. Those barbarians, allured by presents and subsidies, had promised to invade Persia with a numerous body of light cavalry. They were faithful to their engagements, but when they arrived on the Roman frontier, Aurchian was already dead: the design of the Persian war was at least suspended, and the generals, who, during their interregnum, exercised a doubtful authority, were unprepared either to receive or to oppose them. Provoked by such treatment, which they considered as trifling and perfidious, the Alani had recourse to their own valour for their payment and revenge, and as they moved with the usual swiftness of Tartars, they had soon spread themselves over the provinces of Pontus, Cappadocia, Cilicia, and Galatia. The legions, who from the opposite shores of the Bosphorus could almost distinguish the flames of the cities and villages, impatiently urged their general to lead them against the invaders. The conduct of Tacitus was suitable to his age and station. He convinced the barbarians of the faith, as well as of the power, of the empire. Great numbers of the Alani, appeased by the punctual discharge of the engagements which Aurchian had contracted with them, relinquished their booty and captives, and quietly retreated to their own deserts, beyond the Phasis. Against the remainder who refused peace, the Roman emperor waged, in person, a successful war. Seconded by an army of brave and experienced veterans, in a few weeks he delivered the provinces of Asia from the terror of the Scythian invasion.

q Hist August p 228
r Vopiscus in Hist. August. p 230 Zosimus, l. i. p 57 Zonaras, l. xii. p 636 Two passages in the life of Probus (p 236, 238) convince me, that these Scythian invaders of Pontus were Alani. If we may believe Zosimus, (l. i. p 58) Florianus pursued them as far as the Cimmerian Bosphorus. But he had scarcely time for so long and difficult an expedition.
s Lutropius and Aurelius Victor only say that he died, Victor

But the glory and life of Tacitus were of short duration. Transported, in the depth of winter, from the soft retirement of Campania to the foot of mount Caucasus, he sunk under the unaccustomed hardships of a military life. The fatigues of the body were aggravated by the cares of the mind. For a while, the angry and selfish passions of the soldiers had been suspended by the enthusiasm of public virtue. They soon broke out with redoubled violence, and raged in the camp, and even in the tent, of the aged emperor. His mild and amiable character served only to inspire contempt, and he was incessantly tormented with factions which he could not assuage, and by demands which it was impossible to satisfy. Whatever flattering expectations he had conceived of reconciling the public disorders, Tacitus soon was convinced, that the licentiousness of the army disdained the feeble restraint of laws, and his last hour was hastened by anguish and disappointment. It may be doubtful whether the soldiers imbrued their hands in the blood of this innocent prince. It is certain that their insolence was the cause of his death. He expired at Tyana in Cappadocia, after a reign of only six months and about twenty days.

Death of the emperor Tacitus

A. D 276 April 12

The eyes of Tacitus were scarcely closed, before his brother Florianus showed himself unworthy to reign, by the hasty usurpation of the purple, without expecting the approbation of the senate. The reverence for the Roman constitution, which yet influenced the camp and the provinces, was sufficiently strong to dispose them to censure, but not to provoke them to oppose, the precipitate ambition of Florianus. The discontent would have evaporated in idle murmurs, had not the general of the east, the heroic Probus, boldly declared himself the avenger of the senate. The contest, however, was still unequal, nor could the most able leader, at the head of the effeminate troops of Egypt and Syria, encounter, with any hopes of victory, the legions of Europe, whose irresistible strength appeared to support the brother of Tacitus. But the fortune and activity of Probus triumphed over every obstacle. The hardy veterans of his rival, accustomed to cold climates, sickened and consumed away in the sultry heats of Cilicia, where the summer proved remarkably unwholesome. Their numbers were diminished by frequent desertion, the passes of the mountains were feebly defended, Tarsus opened its gates, and the soldiers of Florianus, when they had permitted him to enjoy the imperial title about three months, delivered the empire from civil war by the easy sacrifice of a prince whom they despised.

July

Junior adds that it was of a fever. Zosimus and Zonaras affirm, that he was killed by the soldiers. Vopiscus mentions both accounts, and seems to hesitate. Yet surely these jarring opinions are easily reconciled.
r According to the two Victors, he reigned exactly two hundred days.
s Hist August p 231 Zosimus, l. i. p 58 Zonaras, l. xii. p 637 Aurelius Victor says, that Probus assumed the empire in Illyri and carries his arms into Germany

Since the expedition of Maximin, the Roman generals had confined their ambition to a defensive war against the nations of Germany, who perpetually pressed on the frontiers of the empire. The more daring Probus pursued his Gallic victories, passed the Rhine, and displayed his invincible eagles on the banks of the Elbe and the Necker. He was fully convinced that nothing could reconcile the minds of the barbarians to peace, unless they experienced in their own country the calamities of war. Germany, exhausted by the ill success of the last emigration, was astonished by his presence. Nine of the most considerable princes repaired to his camp, and fell prostrate at his feet. Such a treaty was humbly received by the Germans, as it pleased the conqueror to dictate. He exacted a strict restitution of the effects and captives which they had carried away from the provinces, and obliged their own magistrates to punish the more obstinate robbers who presumed to detain any part of the spoil. A considerable tribute of corn, cattle, and horses, the only wealth of barbarians, was reserved for the use of the garrisons which Probus established on the limits of their territory. He even entertained some thoughts of compelling the Germans to relinquish the exercise of arms, and to trust their differences to the justice, their safety to the power, of Rome. To accomplish these salutary ends, the constant residence of an imperial governor, supported by a numerous army, was indispensably requisite. Probus therefore judged it more expedient to defer the execution of so great a design, which was indeed rather of specious than solid utility. Had Germany been reduced into the state of a province, the Romans, with immense labour and expense, would have acquired only a more extensive boundary to defend against the fiercer and more active barbarians of Scythia.

He builds a wall from the Rhine to the Danube.

Instead of reducing the warlike natives of Germany to the condition of subjects, Probus contented himself with the bumble expedient of raising a bulwark against their inroads. The country, which now forms the circle of Swabia, had been left desert in the age of Augustus by the emigration of its ancient inhabitants. The fertility of the soil soon attracted a new colony from the adjacent provinces of Gaul. Crowds of adventurers, of a roving temper and of desperate fortunes, occupied the doubtful possession, and acknowledged, by the payment of tithes, the majesty of the empire. To protect these new subjects, a line of frontier garrisons was gradually extended from the Rhine to the Danube. About the reign of Hadrian, when that mode of defence began to be practised, these garrisons were connected and covered by a strong entrenchment of trees and palisades. In the place of so rude a bulwark, the emperor Probus constructed a stone wall of a considerable height, and strengthened it by towers at convenient distances. From the neighbourhood of Newstadt and Ratisbon on the Danube, it stretched across hills, valleys, rivers, and morasses, as far as the Wimpfen on the Necker, and at length terminated on the banks of the Rhine, after a winding course of near two hundred miles. This important barrier, uniting the two mighty streams that protected the provinces of Europe, seemed to fill up the vacant space through which the barbarians, and particularly the Alemanni, could penetrate with the greatest facility into the heart of the empire. But the experience of the world, from China to Britain, has exposed the vain attempt of fortifying any extensive tract of country. An active enemy, who can select and vary his points of attack, must, in the end, discover some feeble spot, or some unguarded moment. The strength, as well as the attention, of the defenders is divided, and such are the blind effects of terror on the firmest troops, that a line broken in a single place is almost instantly deserted. The fate of the wall which Probus erected, may confirm the general observation. Within a few years after his death, it was overthrown by the Alemanni. Its scattered ruins, universally ascribed to the power of the Dæmon, now serve only to excite the wonder of the Swabian peasant.

Among the useful conditions of peace imposed by Probus on the van-<sup>Introduction and settlement of the barbarians</sup> quished nations of Germany, was the obligation of supplying the Roman army with sixteen thousand recruits, the bravest and most robust of their youth. The emperor dispersed them through all the provinces, and distributed this dangerous reinforcement in small bands, of fifty or sixty each, among the national troops, judiciously observing, that the aid which the republic derived from the barbarians, should be felt but not seen. Their aid was now become necessary. The feeble elegance of Italy and the internal provinces could no longer support the weight of arms. The hardy frontier of the Rhine and Danube still produced minds and bodies equal to the labours of the camp, but a perpetual series of wars had gradually diminished their numbers. The infrequency of marriage, and the ruin of agriculture, affected the principles of population, and not only destroyed the strength of the present, but intercepted the hope of future genera-

* Hist. August. p. 238, 239. Vopiscus quotes a letter from the emperor to the senate in which he mentions his design of reducing Germany into a province.

* Strabo l. vii. According to Velleius Paterculus, (ii. 108.) Maroboduus led his Marcomanni into Bohemia. Cluverius (German. Antiq. iii. 8.) proves that it was from Swabia.

† These settlers, from the payment of tithes, were denominated Decimati. Tacit. Germania, c. 29.

‡ See notes de l'Abbe de la Bletterie a la Germanie de Tacite. p. 183. His account of the wall is chiefly borrowed (as he says himself) from the Alsatia Illustrata of Schæpfelin.

× See Recherches sur les Chinois et les Egyptiens, tom. ii. p. 81—102. The anonymous author is well acquainted with the globe in general and with Germany in particular. With regard to the latter, he quotes a work of M. Hanselman, but he seems to confound the wall of Probus, designed against the Alemanni, with the fortification of the Mattiæ constructed in the neighbourhood of Frankfort against the Galli.

† He distributed about fifty or sixty barbarians to a Numerus, as it was then called: a corps, with whose established number we are not exactly acquainted.

tions The wisdom of Probus embraced a great and beneficial plan of replenishing the exhausted frontiers, by new colonies of captive or fugitive barbarians, on whom he bestowed lands, cattle, instruments of husbandry, and every encouragement that might engage them to educate a race of soldiers for the service of the republic Into Britain, and most probably into Cambridgeshire,<sup>a</sup> he transported a considerable body of Vandals The impossibility of an escape reconciled them to their situation, and in the subsequent troubles of that island, they approved themselves the most faithful servants of the state • Great numbers of Franks and Gepidæ were settled on the banks of the Danube and Rhine A hundred thousand Bastarnæ, expelled from their own country, cheerfully accepted an establishment in Thrace, and soon imbibed the manners and sentiments of Roman subjects<sup>b</sup> But the expectations of Probus were too often disappointed The impatience and idleness of the barbarians could ill brook the slow labours of agriculture Their unconquerable love of freedom, rising against despotism, provoked them into hasty rebellions, alike fatal to themselves and to the provinces,<sup>c</sup> nor could these artificial supplies, however repeated by succeeding emperors, restore the important limit of Gaul and Illyricum to its ancient and native vigour

<sup>d</sup> During enterprise of the Franks. Of all the barbarians who abandoned their new settlements, and disturbed the public tranquillity, a very small number returned to their own country For a short season they might wander in arms through the empire, but in the end they were surely destroyed by the power of a warlike emperor The successful rashness of a party of Franks was attended, however, with such memorable consequences, that it ought not to be passed unnoticed They had been established by Probus on the sea-coast of Pontus, with a view of strengthening the frontier against the inroads of the Alani A fleet stationed in one of the harbours of the Euxine, fell into the hands of the Franks, and they resolved, through unknown seas, to explore their way from the mouth of the Phasis to that of the Rhine They easily escaped through the Bosphorus and the Hellespont, and cruising along the Mediterranean, indulged their appetite for revenge and plunder, by frequent descents on the unsuspecting shores of Asia, Greece, and Africa The opulent city of Syracuse, in whose port the navies of Athens and Carthage had formerly been sunk, was sacked by a handful of barbarians, who massacred the greatest part of the trembling inhabitants From the island of Sicily, the Franks proceeded to the columns of Hercules, trusted themselves to the ocean, coasted round Spain and Gaul, and steering their triumphant course through the British channel,

<sup>a</sup> Camden's Britannia, Introduction, p 136 but he speaks from a very doubtful conjecture

<sup>b</sup> Zosimus, l i p 62. According to Vopiscus, another body of Vandals was less faithful

<sup>c</sup> Hist August p 240 They were probably expelled by the Goths

<sup>d</sup> Zosim l i p 66

<sup>e</sup> Hist August p 245, 246 The unfortunate orator had

at length finished their surprising voyage, by landing in safety on the Batavian or Frisian shores<sup>d</sup> The example of their success, instructing their countrymen to conceive the advantages, and to despise the dangers, of the sea, pointed out to their enterprising spirit a new road to wealth and glory

Notwithstanding the vigilance and activity of Probus, it was almost impossible that he could at once retain in obedience every part of his wide extended dominions The barbarians, who broke their chains, had seized the favourable opportunity of a domestic war When the emperor marched to the relief of Gaul, he devolved the command of the east on Saturninus That general, a man of merit and experience, was driven into rebellion by the absence of his sovereign, the levity of the Alexandrian people, the pressing instances of his friends, and his own fears, but from the moment of his elevation, he never entertained a hope of empire, or even of life “Alas!” he said, “the republic has lost a useful servant, and the rashness of an hour has destroyed the services of many years You know not,” continued he, “the misery of sovereign power, a sword is perpetually suspended over our head We dread our very guards, we distrust our companions The choice of action or of repose is no longer in our disposition, nor is there any age, or character, or conduct, that can protect us from the censure of envy In thus exalting me to the throne, you have doomed me to a life of cares, and to an untimely fate The only consolation which remains is, the assurance that I shall not fall alone”<sup>e</sup> But as the former part of his prediction was verified by the victory, so the latter was disappointed by the clemency, of Probus That amiable prince attempted even to save the unhappy Saturninus from the fury of the soldiers He had more than once solicited the usurper himself, to place some confidence in the mercy of a sovereign who so highly esteemed his character, that he had punished, as a malicious informer, the first who related the improbable news of his defection<sup>f</sup> Saturninus might, perhaps, have embraced the generous offer, had he not been restrained by the obstinate distrust of his adherents Their guilt was deeper, and their hopes more sanguine, than those of their experienced leader

The revolt of Saturninus was scarcely extinguished in the east, before new troubles were excited in the west, by the rebellion of Bonosus and Proculus, in Gaul The most distinguished merit of those two officers, was their respective prowess, of the one in the combats of Bacchus, of the other in those of Venus,<sup>g</sup> yet neither of them were destitute of courage and studied rhetoric at Carthage and was therefore more probably a Moor (Zosim l i p 60) than a Gaul, as Vopiscus calls him

<sup>f</sup> Zosimus l xii p 638

<sup>g</sup> A very surprising instance is recorded of the prowess of Proculus He had taken one hundred Sarmatian virgins The rest of the story he must relate in his own language Ex his una nocte decem milia, omnes tamen, quod in me erat, mulieres intra dies quindecim reddidi

Vopiscus in Hist August p 246.

capacity, and both sustained, with honour, the august character which the fear of punishment had engaged them to assume, till they sunk at length beneath the superior genius of Probus. He used the victory with his accustomed moderation, and spared the fortunes as well as the lives of their innocent families.<sup>b</sup>

A D 281
Triumph of the emperor Probus

The arms of Probus had now suppressed all the foreign and domestic enemies of the state. His mild but steady administration confirmed the re-establishment of the public tranquillity, nor was there left in the provinces a hostile barbarian, a tyrant, or even a robber, to revive the memory of past disorders. It was time that the emperor should re-visit Rome, and celebrate his own glory and the general happiness. The triumph due to the valour of Probus was conducted with a magnificence suitable to his fortune, and the people who had so lately admired the trophies of Aurelian, gazed with equal pleasure on those of his heroic successor.<sup>1</sup> We cannot, on this occasion, forget the desperate courage of about fourscore gladiators, reserved with near six hundred others, for the inhuman sports of the amphitheatre. Disdaining to shed their blood for the amusement of the populace, they killed their keepers, broke from the place of their confinement, and filled the streets of Rome with blood and confusion. After an obstinate resistance, they were overpowered and cut in pieces by the regular forces, but they obtained at least an honourable death, and the satisfaction of a just revenge.<sup>k</sup>

His discipline.

The military discipline which reigned in the camps of Probus, was less cruel than that of Aurelian, but it was equally rigid and exact. The latter had punished the irregularities of the soldiers with unrelenting severity, the former prevented them by employing the legions in constant and useful labours. When Probus commanded in Egypt, he executed many considerable works for the splendour and benefit of that rich country. The navigation of the Nile, so important to Rome itself, was improved, and temples, bridges, porticoes, and palaces, were constructed by the hands of the soldiers, who acted by turns as architects, as engineers, and as husbandmen.<sup>1</sup> It was reported of Hannibal, that, in order to preserve his troops from the dangerous temptations of idleness, he had obliged them to form large plantations of olive trees along the coast of Africa.<sup>m</sup> From a similar principle, Probus exercised his legions in covering, with rich vineyards, the hills of Gaul and Pannonia, and two considerable spots are described, which were entirely dug and planted by military labour.<sup>n</sup> One

<sup>b</sup> Proculus, who was a native of Albenga on the Genoese coast, armed two thousand of his own slaves. His riches were great, but they were acquired by robbery. It was afterwards a saying of his family, Nec latrones e, nec principes sibi placere. Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 247.

<sup>1</sup> Hist. August. p. 240.

<sup>1</sup> Hist. August. p. 236.

<sup>m</sup> Aurel. Victor in Prob. But the policy of Hannibal, unnoticed by any more ancient writer, is irreconcilable with the history of his life. He left Africa when he was nine years old, returned to it when he was forty-five, and immediately lost his army in the decisive battle of Zama.

135

<sup>k</sup> Zosim. l. i. p. 65.

of these, known under the name of Mount Almo, was situated near Sirmium, the country where Probus was born, for which he ever retained a partial affection, and whose gratitude he endeavoured to secure, by converting into tillage a large and unhealthy tract of marshy ground. An army thus employed, constituted perhaps the most useful, as well as the bravest, portion of Roman subjects.

But in the prosecution of a favourite scheme, the best of men, satisfied with the rectitude of their intentions, are subject to forget the bounds of moderation, nor did Probus himself sufficiently consult the patience and disposition of his fierce legionaries.<sup>o</sup> The dangers of the military profession seem only to be compensated by a life of pleasure and idleness, but if the duties of the soldier are incessantly aggravated by the labours of the peasant, he will at last sink under the intolerable burthen, or shake it off with indignation. The imprudence of Probus is said to have inflamed the discontent of his troops. More attentive to the interests of mankind than to those of the army, he expressed the vain hope, that, by the establishment of universal peace, he should soon abolish the necessity of a standing army and mercenary force.<sup>p</sup> The unguarded expression proved fatal to him. In one of the hottest days of summer, as he severely urged the unwholesome labour of draining the marshes of Sirmium, the soldiers, impatient of fatigue, on a sudden threw down their tools, grasped their arms, and broke out into a furious mutiny. The emperor, conscious of his danger, took refuge in a lofty tower, constructed for the purpose of surveying the progress of the work.<sup>q</sup> The tower was instantly forced, and a thousand swords were plunged at once into the bosom of the unfortunate Probus. The rage of the troops subsided as soon as it had been gratified. They then lamented their fatal rashness, forgot the severity of the emperor whom they had massacred, and hastened to perpetuate, by an honourable monument, the memory of his virtues and victories.<sup>r</sup>

A D 282
August.

When the legions had indulged their grief and repentance for the death of Probus, their unanimous consent declared Carus, his prætorian præfect, the most deserving of the imperial throne. Every circumstance that relates to this prince appears of a mixed and doubtful nature. He gloried in the title of Roman citizen, and affected to compare the purity of his blood, with the foreign and even barbarous origin of the preceding emperors, yet the most inquisitive of his contemporaries, very far from admitting his claim, have variously deduced his own birth, or that of his

Election and character of Carus

<sup>n</sup> Hist. August. p. 240. Eutrop. ix. 17. Aurel. Victor in Prob. Victor Junior. He revoked the prohibition of Domitian, and granted a general permission of planting vines to the Gauls, the Britons, and the Pannonians.

<sup>o</sup> Julian bestows a severe, and indeed excessive, censure on the rigour of Probus, who, as he thinks, almost deserved his fate.

<sup>p</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 241. He laments on this idle hope a large stock of very foolish eloquence.

<sup>q</sup> Turris ferrata. It seems to have been a movable tower, and cased with iron.

<sup>r</sup> Probus, et vere probus situs est. Victor omnium gentium Barbararum victor etiam tyrannorum.

parents, from Illyricum, from Gaul, or from Africa * Though a soldier, he had received a learned education, though a senator, he was invested with the first dignity of the army, and in an age, when the civil and military professions began to be irrecoverably separated from each other, they were united in the person of Carus. Notwithstanding the severe justice which he exercised against the assassins of Probus, to whose favour and esteem he was highly indebted, he could not escape the suspicion of being accessory to a deed from whence he derived the principal advantage. He enjoyed, at least before his elevation, an acknowledged character of virtue and abilities; but his austere temper insensibly degenerated into moroseness and cruelty, and the imperfect writers of his life almost hesitate whether they shall not rank him in the number of Roman tyrants. When Carus assumed the purple, he was about sixty years of age, and his two sons, Carinus and Numerian, had already attained the season of manhood *.

The authority of the senate expired with Probus, nor was the repentance of the soldiers displayed by the same dutiful regard for the civil power, which they had testified after the unfortunate death of Aurelian. The election of Carus was decided without expecting the approbation of the senate, and the new emperor contented himself with announcing, in a cold and stately epistle, that he had ascended the vacant throne. A behaviour so very opposite to that of his amiable predecessor, afforded no favourable presage of the new reign, and the Romans, deprived of power and freedom, asserted their privilege of licentious murmurs. The voice of congratulation and flattery was not however silent, and we may still peruse, with pleasure and contempt, an eclogue, which was composed on the accession of the emperor Carus. Two shepherds, avoiding the noontide heat, retire into the cave of Faunus. On a spreading beech they discover some recent characters. The rural deity had described, in prophetic verses, the felicity promised to the empire under the reign of so great a prince. Faunus hails the approach of that hero, who, receiving on his shoulders the sinking weight of the Roman world, shall extinguish war and faction, and once again restore the innocence and security of the golden age *.

It is more than probable, that these elegant trifles never reached the ears of a veteran general, who, with the consent of the legions, was preparing to execute

* Yet all this may be conciliated. He was born at Narbonne in Illyricum, conformed by Eutropius with the more famous city of that name in Gaul. His father might be an African, and his mother a noble Roman. Carus himself was educated in the capital. See Scaliger, Animadversiones ad Euseb. Chron. p. 241.

* Probus had requested of the senate an equestrian statue and a marble palace, at the public expense, as a just recompense of the singular merit of Carus. Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 249.

* Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 242, 249. Julian excludes the emperor Carus and both his sons from the banquet of the Caesars.

* John Malala, tom. i. p. 401. But the authority of that ignorant Greek is very slight. He ridiculously derives from Carus, the city of Carrire, and the province of Caria, the latter of which is mentioned by Homer.

the long suspended design of the Persian war. Before his departure for this distant expedition, Carus conferred on his two sons Carinus and Numerian, the title of Cæsar, and investing the former with almost an equal share of the imperial power, directed the young prince, first to suppress some troubles which had arisen in Gaul, and afterwards to fix the seat of his residence at Rome, and to assume the government of the western provinces. The safety of Illyricum was confirmed by a memorable defeat of the Sarmatians, sixteen thousand of those barbarians remained on the field of battle, and the number of captives amounted to twenty thousand. The old emperor, animated with the fame and prospect of victory, pursued his march, in the midst of winter, through the countries of Thrace and Asia Minor, and at length, with his younger son Numerian, arrived on the confines of the Persian monarchy. There, encamping on the summit of a lofty mountain, he pointed out to his troops the opulence and luxury of the enemy whom they were about to invade.

The successor of Artaxerxes, Vahag, though he had subdued the Segestans, one of the most warlike nations of Upper Asia, was alarmed at the approach of the Romans, and endeavoured to retard their progress by a negotiation of peace. His ambassadors entered the camp about sunset, at the time when the troops were satisfying their hunger with a frugal repast. The Persians expressed their desire of being introduced to the presence of the Roman emperor. They were at length conducted to a soldier, who was seated on the grass. A piece of stale bacon and a few hard pence composed his supper. A coarse woollen garment of purple was the only circumstance that announced his dignity. The conference was conducted with the same disregard of courtly elegance. Carus, taking off a cap which he wore to conceal his baldness, assured the ambassadors, that, unless their master acknowledged the superiority of Rome, he would speedily render Persia as naked of trees, as his own head was destitute of hair. Notwithstanding some traces of art and preparation, we may discover in this scene the manners of Carus, and the severe simplicity which the martial princes, who succeeded Gallienus, had already restored in the Roman camps. The ministers of the great king trembled and retired.

The threats of Carus were not without effect. He ravaged Mesopotamia, cut in pieces whatever opposed his * Hist. August. p. 249. Carus congratulated the senate, that one of their own order was made emperor.

* Hist. August. p. 242.

* See the first eclogue of Calpurnius. The design of it is preferred by Fontenelle to that of Virgil's Pollio. See tom. iii. p. 148.

* Hist. August. p. 353. Eutropius, ix. 18. Pagi, Annal.

* Agathias, l. iv. p. 135. We find one of his sayings in the Bibliothèque Orientale of M. d'Herbelot. "The definition of humanity includes all other virtues."

* Synesius tells this story of Carinus, and it is much more natural to understand it of Carus, than (as Petavius and Tillemont choose to do) of Probus.

A D 283
He gives audience to the Persian ambassadors

His victories and extraordinary death passage, made himself master of the great cities of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, (which seemed to have surrendered without resistance,) and carried his victorious arms beyond the Tigris.<sup>a</sup> He had seized the favourable moment for an invasion. The Persian councils were distracted by domestic factions, and the greater part of their forces were detained on the frontiers of India. Rome and the east received with transport the news of such important advantages. Flattery and hope painted, in the most lively colours, the fall of Persia, the conquest of Arabia, the submission of Egypt, and a lasting deliverance from the inroads of the Scythian nations.<sup>f</sup> But the reign of Carus was destined to expose the vanity of predictions. They were scarcely uttered before they were contradicted by his death, an event attended with such ambiguous circumstances, that it may be related in a letter from his own secretary to the præfect of the city "Carus," says he, "our dearest emperor, was confined by sickness to his bed, when a furious tempest arose in the camp. The darkness which overspread the sky was so thick, that we could no longer distinguish each other, and the incessant flashes of lightning took from us the knowledge of all that passed in the general confusion. Immediately after the most violent clap of thunder, we heard a sudden cry, that the emperor was dead, and it soon appeared, that his chamberlains, in a rage of grief, had set fire to the royal pavilion, a circumstance which gave rise to the report that Carus was killed by lightning. But, as far as we have been able to investigate the truth, his death was the natural effect of his disorder."<sup>g</sup>

He is succeeded by his two sons Carinus and Numerian

The vacancy of the throne was not productive of any disturbance. The ambition of the aspiring generals was checked by their mutual fears, and young Numerian with his absent brother Carinus were unanimously acknowledged as Roman emperors. The public expected that the successor of Carus would pursue his father's footsteps, and, without allowing the Persians to recover from their consternation, would advance sword in hand to the palaces of Susa and Ecbatana.<sup>h</sup> But the legions, however strong in numbers and discipline, were dismayed by the most abject superstition. Notwithstanding all the arts that were practised to disguise the manner of the late emperor's death, it was found impossible to remove the opinion of the multitude, and the power of opinion is irresistible. Places or persons struck with lightning were considered by the ancients with pious horror, as singularly devoted to the wrath of heaven.<sup>i</sup> An oracle was remembered, which marked the river Tigris as the fatal boundary of the Roman arms. The troops, terrified with the fate of Carus and with their own danger, called aloud on young Numerian to obey the will of the gods, and to lead them away from this inauspicious scene of war. The feeble emperor was unable to subdue their obstinate prejudice, and the Persians wondered at the unexpected retreat of a victorious enemy.<sup>k</sup>

The intelligence of the mysterious fate of the late emperor was soon carried from the frontiers of Persia to Rome, and the senate, as well as the provinces, congratulated the accession of the sons of Carus. These fortunate youths were strangers, however, to that conscious superiority, either of birth or of merit, which can alone render the possession of a throne easy, and as it were natural. Born and educated in a private station, the election of their father raised them at once to the rank of princes, and his death, which happened about sixteen months afterwards, left them the unexpected legacy of a vast empire. To sustain with temper this rapid elevation, an uncommon share of virtue and prudence was requisite, and Carinus, the elder of the brothers, was more than commonly deficient in those qualities. In the Gallic war, he discovered some degree of personal courage,<sup>l</sup> but from the moment of his arrival at Rome, he abandoned himself to the luxury of the capital, and to the abuse of his fortune. He was soft, yet cruel, devoted to pleasure, but destitute of taste, and though exquisitely susceptible of vanity, indifferent to the public esteem. In the course of a few months, he successively married and divorced nine wives, most of whom he left pregnant, and notwithstanding this legal inconstancy, found time to indulge such a variety of irregular appetites, as brought dishonour on himself and on the noblest houses of Rome. He beheld with inveterate hatred all those who might remember his former obscurity, or censure his present conduct. He banished, or put to death, the friends and counsellors whom his father had placed about him, to guide his inexperienced youth, and he persecuted with the meanest revenge his school-fellows and companions, who had not sufficiently respected the latent majesty of the emperor. With the senators, Carinus affected a lofty and regal demeanour, frequently declaring, that he designed to distribute their estates among the populace of Rome. From the dregs of that populace, he selected his favourites, and even his ministers. The palace, and even the imperial table, was filled with singers, dancers, prostitutes, and all the various retinue of vice and folly. One of his door-keepers<sup>m</sup> he intrusted with the government of the city. In the room of the prætorian præfect, Places struck by lightning were surrounded with a wall things were buried with mysterious ceremony.

<sup>k</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 250. Aurelius Victor seems to believe the prediction, and to approve the retreat.

<sup>l</sup> Nemesianus Cynegeticus, v. 60. He was a contemporary, but a poet in Caracallarius. This word, so humble in its origin, has by a singular fortune risen into the title of the first great office of state in the monarchies of Europe. See Casaubon and Salmasius, ad Hist. August. p. 253.

<sup>a</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 250. Lutatius, ix. 18. The two victors.

<sup>f</sup> To the Persian victory of Carus. I refer the dialogue of the Philostratus which has so long been an object of dispute among the learned. But to explain and justify my opinion, would require a dissertation.

<sup>g</sup> Hist. August. p. 250. Yet Lutatius, Festus, Rufus, the two Victor, Jerome, Sidonius Apollinaris, Socrates, and Zonaras, all ascribe the death of Carus to lightning.

<sup>h</sup> See Nemesianus Cynegeticus v. 71. &c.

<sup>i</sup> and his commentators, on the word Scribonianum.

whom he put to death, Carinus substituted one of the ministers of his looser pleasures. Another who possessed the same, or even a more infamous, title to favour, was invested with the consulship. A confidential secretary, who had acquired uncommon skill in the art of forgery, delivered the indolent emperor, with his own consent, from the irksome duty of signing his name.

When the emperor Carus undertook the Persian war, he was induced, by motives of affection as well as policy, to secure the fortunes of his family, by leaving in the hands of his eldest son the armies and provinces of the west. The intelligence which he soon received of the conduct of Carinus, filled him with shame and regret, nor had he concealed his resolution of satisfying the republic by a severe act of justice, and of adopting, in the place of an unworthy son, the brave and virtuous Constantius, who at that time was governor of Dalmatia. But the elevation of Constantius was for a while deferred, and as soon as the father's death had released Carinus from the control of fear or decency, he displayed to the Romans the extravagances of Elagabalus, aggravated by the cruelty of Domitian.<sup>a</sup>

He celebrates the Roman games The only merit of the administration of Carinus that history could record, or poetry celebrate, was the uncommon splendour with which, in his own and his brother's name he exhibited the Roman games of the theatre, the circus, and the amphitheatre. More than twenty years afterwards, when the courtiers of Diocletian represented to their frugal sovereign the fame and popularity of his munificent predecessor, he acknowledged, that the reign of Carinus had indeed been a reign of pleasure.<sup>b</sup> But this vain prodigality, which the prudence of Diocletian might justly despise, was enjoyed with surprise and transport by the Roman people. The oldest of the citizens, recollecting the spectacles of former days, the triumphal pomp of Probus or Aurelian, and the secular games of the emperor Philip, acknowledged that they were all surpassed by the superior magnificence of Carinus.<sup>c</sup>

Spectacles of Rome. The spectacles of Carinus may therefore be best illustrated by the observation of some particulars, which history has condescended to relate concerning those of his predecessors. If we confine ourselves solely to the hunting of wild beasts, however we may censure the vanity of the design or the cruelty of the execution, we are obliged to confess, that neither before nor since the time of the Romans, so much art and expense have ever been lavished for the amusement of the people.<sup>d</sup> By the order of Probus, <sup>a</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 253. 254. Eutropius, ix. 19. Victor Junior. The reign of Diocletian indeed was so long and prosperous, that it must have been very unfavourable to the reputation of Carinus.

<sup>b</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 254. He calls him Carus, but the sense is sufficiently obvious, and the words were often confounded.
<sup>c</sup> See Calpurnius Eclog. vii. 42. We may observe that the spectacles of Probus were still recent, and that the poet is seconded by the historian.

<sup>d</sup> The philosopher Montaigne (Essays, l. iii. 6.) gives a very just and lively view of Roman magnificence in these spectacles.
<sup>e</sup> Vopiscus in Hist. August. p. 240.

<sup>f</sup> They are called Unagri, but the number is too inconsiderable for a great quantity of large trees, torn up by the roots, were transplanted into the midst of the circus. The spacious and shady forest was immediately filled with a thousand ostriches, a thousand stags, a thousand fallow deer, and a thousand wild boars, and all this variety of game was abandoned to the riotous impetuosity of the multitude. The tragedy of the succeeding day consisted in the massacre of an hundred lions, an equal number of lionesses, two hundred leopards, and three hundred bears.<sup>e</sup> The collection prepared by the younger Gordian for his triumph, and which his successor exhibited in the secular games, was less remarkable by the number than by the singularity of the animals. Twenty zebras displayed their elegant forms and variegated beauties to the eyes of the Roman people.<sup>f</sup> Ten elks, and as many camelopards, the loftiest and most harmless creatures that wander over the plains of Sarmatia and Ethiopia, were contrasted with thirty African hyænas, and ten Indian tigers, the most implacable savages of the torrid zone. The unoffending strength with which nature has endowed the greater quadrupeds was admired in the rhinoceros, the hippopotamus of the Nile,<sup>g</sup> and a majestic troop of thirty-two elephants.<sup>h</sup> While the populace gazed with stupid wonder on the splendid show, the naturalist might indeed observe the figure and properties of so many different species, transported from every part of the ancient world into the amphitheatre of Rome. But this accidental benefit, which science might derive from folly, is surely insufficient to justify such a wanton abuse of the public riches. There occurs, however, a single instance in the first Punic war, in which the senate wisely connected this amusement of the multitude with the interest of the state. A considerable number of elephants, taken in the defeat of the Carthaginian army, were driven through the circus by a few slaves, armed only with blunt javelins.<sup>i</sup> The useful spectacle served to impress the Roman soldier with a just contempt for those unwieldy animals, and he no longer dreaded to encounter them in the ranks of war.

The hunting or exhibition of wild beasts was conducted with a magnificence suitable to a people who styled themselves the masters of the world, nor was the edifice appropriated to that entertainment less expressive of Roman greatness. Posterity admires, and will long admire, the awful remains of the amphitheatre of Titus, which so well deserved the epithet of colossal.<sup>j</sup> It was a building of an elliptic figure, five hundred and sixty-four feet in length, and four hundred and sixty-seven in breadth, founded mere wild asses. Cuper (de Elephantis Exercit. ii. 7.) has proved from Oppian, Dion, and an anonymous Greek, that zebras had been seen at Rome. They were brought from some island of the ocean, perhaps Madagascar.

The amphitheatre

<sup>e</sup> Carinus gave an hippopotamus (see Calpurnius Eclog. vii. 66.) In the latter spectacles I do not recollect any crocodiles of which Augustus once exhibited thirty-six.—Dion Cassius l. iv. p. 781.

<sup>f</sup> Capitolinus in Hist. August. p. 161. 165. We are not acquainted with the number which he calls archeleontes, some read argoleontes, others agroleontes—both corrections are very nugatory.

<sup>g</sup> Plin. Hist. Natur. viii. 6. from the annals of Piso.

<sup>h</sup> See Masini, Verona Illustrata, p. iv. l. i. c. 2.

that he soon acquired an office of scribe, which was commonly exercised by persons of his condition.<sup>b</sup> Favourable oracles, or rather the consciousness of superior merit, prompted his aspiring son to pursue the profession of arms and the hopes of fortune, and it would be extremely curious to observe the gradation of arts and accidents which enabled him in the end to fulfil those oracles, and to display that merit to the world. Diocletian was successively promoted to the government of Mæsia, the honours of the consulship, and the important command of the guards of the palace. He distinguished his abilities in the Persian war, and, after the death of Numerian, the slave, by the confession and judgment of his rivals, was declared the most worthy of the imperial throne. The malice of religious zeal, whilst it arraigns the savage fierceness of his colleague Maximian, has affected to cast suspicions on the personal courage of the emperor Diocletian. It would not be easy to persuade us of the cowardice of a soldier of fortune, who acquired and preserved the esteem of the legions, as well as the favour of so many warlike princes. Yet even calumny is sagacious enough to discover and to attack the most vulnerable part. The valour of Diocletian was never found inadequate to his duty, or to the occasion, but he appears not to have possessed the daring and generous spirit of a hero, who courts danger and fame, disdains artifice, and boldly challenges the allegiance of his equals. His abilities were useful rather than splendid, a vigorous mind, improved by the experience and study of mankind, dexterity and application in business, a judicious mixture of liberality and economy, of mildness and rigour, profound dissimulation under the disguise of military frankness, steadiness to pursue his ends, flexibility to vary his means, and, above all, the great art of submitting his own passions, as well as those of others, to the interest of his ambition, and of colouring his ambition with the most specious pretences of justice and public utility. Like Augustus, Diocletian may be considered as the founder of a new empire. Like the adopted son of Cæsar, he was distinguished as a statesman rather than as a warrior, nor did either of those princes employ force, whenever their purpose could be effected by policy.

The victory of Diocletian was remarkable for its singular mildness. A people accustomed to applaud the clemency of the conqueror, if the usual punishments of death, exile, and confiscation, were inflicted with any de-properly called Docia, from a small tribe of Illyrians (see Cellarius, Geograph. Antiqua tom. i. p. 333.) and the original name of the fortunate slave was probably Docles. He first lengthened it to the Grecian harmony of Diocles, and at length to the Roman majesty of Diocletianus. He likewise assumed the palæstine name of Valerius, and it is usually given him by Aurelius Victor.

<sup>b</sup> See Dacier on the sixth satire of the second book of Horace. Corneil Nepos in Vit. Pumei c. 1.

<sup>c</sup> Lactantius (for whoever was the author of the little treatise De Mortibus Persecutorum) accuses Diocletian of timidity in two places.

<sup>d</sup> 8. In chap. 9. he says of him, "erat in omni tumultu melitiosus et animi tergellus."

<sup>e</sup> In this encomium Aurelius Victor seems to convey a just though indirect censure of the cruelty of Constantius. It appears from the Facts, that Aristobolus remained prefect of the city, and that he ended

gree of temper and equity, beheld, with the most pleasing astonishment, a civil war, the flames of which were extinguished in the field of battle. Diocletian received into his confidence Aristobolus, the principal minister of the house of Carus, respected the lives, the fortunes, and the dignity of his adversaries, and even continued in their respective stations the greater number of the servants of Carinus.<sup>a</sup> It is not improbable that motives of prudence might assist the humanity of the artful Dalmatian, of these servants, many had purchased his favour by secret treachery, in others, he esteemed their grateful fidelity to an unfortunate master. The discerning judgment of Aurelian, of Probus, and of Carus, had filled the several departments of the state and army with officers of approved merit, whose removal would have injured the public service, without promoting the interest of the successor. Such a conduct, however, displayed to the Roman world the fairest prospect of the new reign, and the emperor affected to confirm this favourable prepossession, by declaring, that, among all the virtues of his predecessors, he was the most ambitious of imitating the humane philosophy of Marcus Antoninus.<sup>a</sup>

The first considerable action of his reign seemed to evince his sincerity as well as his moderation. After the example of Marcus, he gave himself a colleague in the person of Maximian, on whom he bestowed at first the title of Cæsar, and afterwards that of Augustus.<sup>f</sup> But the motives of his conduct, as well as the object of his choice, were of a very different nature from those of his admired predecessor. By investing a luxurious youth with the honours of the purple, Marcus had discharged a debt of private gratitude, at the expense, indeed, of the happiness of the state. By associating a friend and a fellow-soldier to the labours of government, Diocletian, in a time of public danger, provided for the defence both of the east and of the west. Maximian was born a peasant, and, like Aurelian, in the territory of Sirmium. Ignorant of letters, careless of laws, the rusticity of his appearance and manners still betrayed in the most elevated fortune the meanness of his extraction. War was the only art which he professed. In a long course of service, he had distinguished himself on every frontier of the empire, and though his military talents were formed to obey rather than to command, though, perhaps, he never attained the skill of a consummate general, he was capable, by his valour, constancy, with Diocletian, the consulship which he had commenced with Carinus.

Association and character of Maximian, A. D. 296 April 1

<sup>e</sup> Aurelius Victor styles Diocletian, "Parentem potius quam dominum." See II. l. August. p. 30.

<sup>f</sup> The question of the time when Maximian received the honours of Cæsar and Augustus has divided modern critics, and given occasion to a great deal of learned wrangling. I have followed M. de Tillemont, (Histoire des Empereurs, tom. iv. p. 500-505) who has weighed the several reasons and difficulties with his scrupulous accuracy.

<sup>g</sup> In an oration delivered before him (Panegyric, Vol. II. 8.) Maxentius expresses a doubt, whether his hero in imitating the conduct of Hannibal and Scipio, had ever heard of their names. From thence we may fairly infer, that Maximian was more desirous of being considered as a soldier than as a man of letters, and it is in this manner that we can often translate the language of flattery into that of truth.

and experience, of executing the most arduous undertakings. Nor were the vices of Maximian less useful to his benefactor. Insensible to pity, and fearless of consequences, he was the ready instrument of every act of cruelty which the policy of that artful prince might at once suggest and disclaim. As soon as a bloody sacrifice had been offered to prudence or to revenge, Diocletian, by his seasonable intercession, saved the remaining few whom he had never designed to punish, gently censured the severity of his stern colleague, and enjoyed the comparison of a golden and an iron age, which was universally applied to their opposite maxims of government. Notwithstanding the difference of their characters, the two emperors maintained, on the throne, that friendship which they had contracted in a private station. The haughty turbulent spirit of Maximian, so fatal afterwards to himself and to the public peace, was accustomed to respect the genius of Diocletian, and confessed the ascendant of reason over brutal violence.<sup>b</sup> From a motive either of pride or superstition, the two emperors assumed the titles, the one of Jovius, the other of Hercules. Whilst the motion of the world (such was the language of their venal orators) was maintained by the all-seeing wisdom of Jupiter, the invincible arm of Hercules purged the earth from monsters and tyrants.<sup>c</sup>

Association of two Cæsars,
Galerius and Constantius,
A. D. 292
March 1

But even the omnipotence of Jovius and Hercules was insufficient to sustain the weight of the public administration. The prudence of Diocletian discovered, that the empire, assailed on every side by the barbarians, required on every side the presence of a great army, and of an emperor. With this view, he resolved once more to divide his unwieldy power, and with the inferior title of Cæsars, to confer on two generals of approved merit an equal share of the sovereign authority.<sup>d</sup> Galerius, surnamed Armentarius, from his original profession of a herdsman, and Constantius, who from his pale complexion had acquired the denomination of Chlorus,<sup>e</sup> were the two persons invested with the second honours of the imperial purple. In describing the country, extraction, and manners of Hercules, we have already delineated those of Galerius, who was often, and not improperly, styled the younger Maximian, though in many instances both of virtue and ability, he appears to have possessed a manifest superiority over the elder. The birth of Constantius was less obscure than that of his colleagues. Eutropius, his father, was one of the most <sup>b</sup> Lactantius de M. P. c. 8. Aurelius Victor. As among the Panegyrics, we find orations pronounced in the praise of Maximian, and others which flatter his adversaries at his expense, we derive some knowledge from the contrast.

<sup>c</sup> See the second and third Panegyrics, particularly in 3, 10, 14 but it would be tedious to copy the diffuse and affected expressions of their false eloquence. With regard to the titles, consult Aurel. Victor. Lactantius de M. P. c. 52. Spanheim de Usu Numismatum, &c. Dissertat. xii. § 8.

<sup>d</sup> Aurelius Victor. Victor in Epitome. Eutrop. ix. 22. Lactantius de M. P. c. 8. Hieronymus in Chron.

<sup>e</sup> It is only among the modern Greeks that Tillemont can discover his appellation of Chlorus. Any remarkable degree of paleness seems inconsistent with the ruber mentioned in Panegyric v. 19.

<sup>m</sup> Julian, the grandson of Constantius, boasts that his family was considerable nobles of Dardania, and his mother was the niece of the emperor Claudius.<sup>m</sup> Although the youth of Constantius had been spent in arms, he was endowed with a mild and amiable disposition, and the popular voice had long since acknowledged him worthy of the rank which he at last attained. To strengthen the bonds of political, by those of domestic, union, each of the emperors assumed the character of a father to one of the Cæsars, Diocletian to Galerius, and Maximian to Constantius, and each, obliging them to repudiate their former wives, bestowed his daughter in marriage on his adopted son.<sup>n</sup> These four princes distributed among themselves the wide extent of the Roman empire. The defence of Gaul, Spain,<sup>o</sup> and Britain, was intrusted to Constantius. Galerius was stationed on the banks of the Danube, as the safeguard of the Illyrian provinces. Italy and Africa were considered as the department of Maximian, and for his peculiar portion, Diocletian reserved Thrace, Egypt, and the rich countries of Asia. Every one was sovereign within his own jurisdiction, but their united authority extended over the whole monarchy, and each of them was prepared to assist his colleagues with his counsels or presence. The Cæsars, in their exalted rank, revered the majesty of emperors, and the three younger princes invariably acknowledged, by their gratitude and obedience, the common parent of their fortunes. The suspicious jealousy of power found not any place among them, and the singular happiness of their union has been compared to a chorus of music, whose harmony was regulated and maintained by the skilful hand of the first artist.<sup>p</sup>

Departments and harmony of the four princes

This important measure was not carried into execution till about six years

Series of events

after the association of Maximian, and that interval of time had not been destitute of memorable incidents. But we have preferred, for the sake of perspicuity, first to describe the more perfect form of Diocletian's government, and afterwards to relate the actions of his reign, following rather the natural order of the events, than the dates of a very doubtful chronology.

The first exploit of Maximian, though it is mentioned in a few words by our imperfect writers, deserves, from its singularity, to be recorded in a history of human manners. He suppressed the peasants of Gaul, who, under the appellation of Bagaudæ,<sup>q</sup> had risen in a general insurrection, very similar to those,

A. D. 287
State of the peasants of Gaul derived from the warlike Mæsans. Misopogon, p. 348. The Dardaniæ dwelt on the edge of Mæsia.

<sup>n</sup> Galerius married Valeria, the daughter of Diocletian. If we speak with strictness Theodora, the wife of Constantius, was daughter only to the wife of Maximian. Spanheim Dissertat. xi. 2.

<sup>o</sup> This division agrees with that of the four præfectures, yet there is some reason to doubt whether Spain was not a province of Maximian. See Tillemont tom. iv. p. 517.

<sup>p</sup> Julian in Cæsar p. 315. Spanheim's notes to the French translation, p. 122.

<sup>q</sup> The general name of Bagaudæ (in the signification of rebels) continued till the fifth century in Gaul. Some critics derive it from a Celtic word Bagad, a tumultuous assembly. Scaliger ad Euseb. Du Can. Glossar.

revolution, which, after a separation of ten years, restored Britain to the body of the Roman empire.<sup>h</sup>

Defence of the frontiers. Britain had none but domestic enemies to dread, and as long as the governors preserved their fidelity, and the troops their discipline, the incursions of the naked savages of Scotland or Ireland could never materially affect the safety of the province. The peace of the continent, and the defence of the principal rivers which bounded the empire, were objects of far greater difficulty and importance. The policy of Diocletian, which inspired the councils of his associates, provided for the public tranquillity, by encouraging a spirit of dissension among the barbarians, and by

Fortifications. strengthening the fortifications of the Roman limit. In the east he fixed a line of camps from Egypt to the Persian dominions, and, for every camp, he instituted an adequate number of stationary troops, commanded by their respective officers, and supplied with every kind of arms, from the new arsenals which he had formed at Antioch, Emesa, and Damascus.<sup>i</sup> Nor was the precaution of the emperor less watchful against the well-known valour of the barbarians of Europe. From the mouth of the Rhine to that of the Danube, the ancient camps, towns, and citadels, were diligently re-established, and, in the most exposed places, new ones were skilfully constructed, the strictest vigilance was introduced among the garrisons of the frontier, and every expedient was practised that could render the long chain of fortifications firm and impenetrable.<sup>k</sup> A barrier so respectable was seldom violated, and the barbarians often turned against each other their disappointed

Disensions of the barbarians. The Goths, the Vandals, the Gepidæ, the Burgundians, the Alemanni, wasted each other's strength by destructive hostilities, and whosoever vanquished, they vanquished the enemies of Rome. The subjects of Diocletian enjoyed the bloody spectacle, and congratulated each other, that the mischiefs of civil war were now experienced only by the barbarians.<sup>l</sup>

Conduct of the emperors. Notwithstanding the policy of Diocletian, it was impossible to maintain an equal and undisturbed tranquillity during a reign of twenty years, and along the frontier of many hundred miles. Sometimes the barbarians suspended their domestic animosities, and the relaxed vigilance of the garrisons sometimes gave a passage to their strength or dexterity. Whenever the provinces were invaded, Diocletian conducted himself with that calm dignity which he always affected or possessed, reserved his presence for such occasions as were worthy of his interposition, never exposed his person or reputation to any unnecessary danger, ensured his success by every means that prudence could suggest, and displayed, with ostentation, the consequences of his victory. In wars of a more difficult nature, and more doubtful event, he employed the rough valour of Maximian, and that faithful soldier was content to ascribe his own victories to the wise counsels and auspicious influence of his benefactor. But after the Valour of the Cæsars adoption of the two Cæsars, the emperors themselves, retiring to a less laborious scene of action, devolved on their adopted sons the defence of the Danube and of the Rhine. The vigilant Galerius was never reduced to the necessity of vanquishing an army of barbarians on the Roman territory.<sup>m</sup> The brave and active Constantius delivered Gaul from a very furious inroad of the Alemanni, and his victories of Langres and Vindonissa appear to have been actions of considerable danger and merit. As he traversed the open country with a feeble guard, he was encompassed on a sudden by the superior multitude of the enemy. He retreated with difficulty towards Langres, but, in the general consternation, the citizens refused to open their gates, and the wounded prince was drawn up the wall by the means of a rope. But, on the news of his distress, the Roman troops hastened from all sides to his relief, and before the evening he had satisfied his honour and revenge by the slaughter of six thousand Alemanni.<sup>n</sup> From the monuments of those times, the obscure traces of several other victories over the barbarians of Sarmatia and Germany might possibly be collected, but the tedious search would not be rewarded either with amusement or with instruction.

Treatment of the barbarians. The conduct which the emperor Probus had adopted in the disposal of the vanquished, was imitated by Diocletian and his associates. The captive barbarians, exchanging death for slavery, were distributed among the provincials, and assigned to those districts (in Gaul, the territories of Amiens, Beauvais, Cambrai, Treves, Langres, and Troyes, are particularly specified<sup>o</sup>) which had been depopulated by the calamities of war. They were usefully employed as shepherds and husbandmen, but were denied the exercise of arms, except when it was found expedient to enrol them in the military service. Nor did the emperors refuse the property of lands, with a less servile tenure, to such of the barbarians as solicited the protection of Rome. They granted a settlement to several colonies of the Carpi, the Bastarnæ, and the Sarmatians, and, by a dangerous indulgence, permitted them in some measure to retain their national manners and independence.<sup>p</sup> Among the provincials, it was a subject of flattering exultation, that the

<sup>h</sup> With regard to the recovery of Britain, we obtain a few hints from Aurelius Victor and Eutropius.

<sup>i</sup> John Malch. in Chron. Antiochen. tom. i. p. 409. 409.

<sup>k</sup> Zoum. l. i. p. 7. That partial historian seems to celebrate the vigilance of Diocletian with a design of exposing the negligence of Constantine. We may, however, listen to an orator, "Nam quid egnum alarum et cohortum castri persequamur? tolo Rhem et Itri et Euphratis limite restitula." Paneg. x. Vel. iv. 18.

<sup>l</sup> Inunt omnes in sanguinem unum populi quibus non continet esse Romanis, Christiana que feratilis potestas nunc sponte persolvunt. Paneg.

Vel. iii. 16. Mamertinus illustrates the fact, by the example of almost all the nations of the world.

<sup>m</sup> He complained, though not with the strictest truth, "Jam sinisse annos quindecim in quibus in Illyrico ad ripam Danubii relegatus cum gentibus barbaris inelaret. Laclant de M. p. c. 18."

<sup>n</sup> In the Greek text of Euseb. we read six thousand a number which I have preferred to the sixty thousand of Jerome, Orsius Eutropius, and his Greek translator Pæanian.

<sup>o</sup> Pinc. 3r. Vel. vii. 21.

<sup>p</sup> There was a settlement of Sarmatians in the neighbourhood of barbarian, so lately an object of terror, now cultivated their lands, drove their cattle to the neighbouring fair, and contributed by his labour to the public plenty. They congratulated their masters on the powerful accession of subjects and soldiers, but they forgot to observe, that multitudes of secret enemies, insolent from favour, or desperate from oppression, were introduced into the heart of the empire.<sup>a</sup>

Wars of Africa and Egypt

While the Cæsars exercised their valour on the banks of the Rhine and Danube, the presence of the emperors was required on the southern confines of the Roman world. From the Nile to mount Atlas, Africa was in arms. A confederacy of five Moorish nations issued from their deserts to invade the peaceful provinces. Julian had assumed the purple at Carthage,<sup>b</sup> Achilles at Alexandria, and even the Blemmyes renewed, or rather continued, their incursions into the Upper Egypt. Scarcely any circumstances have been preserved of the exploits of Maximian in the western parts of Africa, but it appears by the event, that the progress of his arms was rapid and decisive, that he vanquished the fiercest barbarians of Mauritania, and that he removed them from the mountains, whose inaccessible strength had inspired their inhabitants with a lawless confidence, and habituated them to a life of rapine and violence.<sup>c</sup>

A D 296
Conduct of Diocletian in Egypt

Diocletian, on his side, opened the campaign in Egypt by the siege of Alexandria, cut off the aqueducts which conveyed the waters of the Nile into every quarter of that immense city,<sup>d</sup> and rendering his camp impregnable to the sallies of the besieged multitude, he pushed his reiterated attacks with caution and vigour. After a siege of eight months, Alexandria, wasted by the sword and by fire, implored the clemency of the conqueror, but it experienced the full extent of his severity. Many thousands of the citizens perished in a promiscuous slaughter, and there were few obnoxious persons in Egypt who escaped a sentence either of death, or at least of exile.<sup>e</sup> The fate of Busiris and of Coptos was still more melancholy than that of Alexandria, those proud cities, the former distinguished by its antiquity, the latter enriched by the passage of the Indian trade, were utterly destroyed by the arms and by the severe order of Diocletian.<sup>f</sup> The character of the Egyptian nation, insensible to kindness, but extremely susceptible of fear, could alone justify this excessive rigour. The seditions of Alexandria had often affected the tranquillity and subsistence of Rome itself. Since the usurpation of Firmus, the province of Upper Egypt, incessantly relapsing into rebellion, had embraced the alliance of the savages of Æthiopia. The number of the Blemmyes, scattered between the island of Meroe and the Red sea, was very inconsiderable, their disposition was unwarlike, their weapons rude and inoffensive.<sup>g</sup> Yet in the public disorders these barbarians, whom antiquity, shocked with the deformity of their figure, had almost excluded from the human species, presumed to rank themselves among the enemies of Rome.<sup>h</sup> Such had been the unworthy allies of the Egyptians, and while the attention of the state was engaged in more serious wars, their vexatious incursions might again harass the repose of the province. With a view of opposing to the Blemmyes a suitable adversary, Diocletian persuaded the Nobatæ, or people of Nubia, to remove from their ancient habitations in the deserts of Lybia, and resigned to them an extensive but unprofitable territory above Syene and the cataracts of the Nile, with the stipulation, that they should ever respect and guard the frontier of the empire. The treaty long subsisted, and till the establishment of christianity introduced stricter notions of religious worship, it was annually ratified by a solemn sacrifice in the isle of Elephantine, in which the Romans, as well as the barbarians, adored the same visible or invisible powers of the universe.<sup>i</sup>

At the same time that Diocletian chastised the past crimes of the Egyptians, he provided for their future safety and happiness by many wise regulations, which were confirmed and enforced under the succeeding reigns.<sup>j</sup> One very remarkable edict, which he published, instead of being condemned as the effect of jealous tyranny, deserves to be applauded as an act of prudence and humanity. He caused a diligent inquiry to be made for all the ancient books which treated of the admirable art of making gold and silver, and without pity committed them to the flames, apprehensive, as we are assured, lest the opulence of the Egyptians should inspire them with confidence to rebel against the empire.<sup>k</sup> But if Diocletian had been convinced of the reality of that valuable art, far from extinguishing the memory, he would have converted the operation of it to the benefit of the public revenue. It is much more likely, that his good sense discovered to him the folly of such magnificent pretensions, and that he

He suppresses
books of alchemy

Treves, which seems to have been deserted by those lazy barbarians. Ausonius speaks of them in his Moselle, Unde iter ingrediens nemorosa per avia solum,
Et nulla humani spectans vestigia cultus

Arvæque Sauromatum nuper metata colonis
There was a town of the Carpi in the Lower Mæsia

<sup>a</sup> See the rhetorical exaltation of Emmerius Panegyric vii 9
<sup>b</sup> Scaliger (Animadversæ ad Enseb. p. 213) decides in his usual manner, that the Quinque gentianæ, or five African nations, were the five great cities, the Pentapolis of the inoffensive province of Cyrene

<sup>c</sup> After his defeat, Julian stabbed himself with a dagger, and immediately leaped into the flames. Victor in Epitome

<sup>d</sup> Tu feroissimos Mauritanie populos inaccessis montium jugis et naturalî munitione fidentes, expugnasti, recepisti, transulisti. Paneg. Vet. vi 8

<sup>u</sup> See the description of Alexandria in Hirtius de Bell. Alexandrinæ c. 5
<sup>x</sup> Eutrop. ix 24. Orosius, vii 25. John Malela in Chron. Antioch. p. 409, 410. Yet Eumenius assures us that Egypt was pacified by the clemency of Diocletian

<sup>y</sup> Eusebius (in Chron.) places their destruction several years sooner, and at a time when Egypt itself was in a state of rebellion against the Romans

<sup>z</sup> Strabo, l. xvii p. 1, 172. Pomponius Meli. l. i c. 4. His words are curious, "Intra si credere libet, vix homines inagisque semiferi Ægyptines, et Blemmyes, et Satyræ"

<sup>a</sup> Ausus sese inserere fortunæ et provocare arma Romanæ

<sup>b</sup> See Procopius de Bell. Persie l. i c. 19

<sup>c</sup> He fixed the public allowance of corn for the people of Alexandria, at two millions of medimni, about four hundred thousand quarters. Chron. Paschal. p. 276. Procop. Hist. Ærean. c. 226

<sup>d</sup> John Antioch. in Excerpt. Valerian. p. 834. Suidas in Diocletian

was desirous of preserving the reason and fortunes of his subjects from the mischievous pursuit. It may be remarked, that these ancient books, so liberally ascribed to Pythagoras, to Solomon, or to Hermias, were the pious frauds of more recent adepts. The Greeks were inattentive either to the use or to the abuse of chemistry. In that immense register, where Pliny has deposited the discoveries, the arts, and the errors of mankind, there is not the least mention of the transmutation of metals, and the persecution of Diocletian is the first authentic event in the history of alchemy. The conquest of Egypt by the Arabs diffused that vain science over the globe. Congenial to the avarice of the human heart, it was studied in China as in Europe, with equal eagerness, and with equal success. The darkness of the middle ages ensured a favourable reception to every tale of wonder, and the revival of learning gave new vigour to hope, and suggested more specious arts of deception. Philosophy, with the aid of experience, has at length banished the study of alchemy, and the present age, however desirous of riches, is content to seek them by the humbler means of commerce and industry.

The Persian war
The reduction of Egypt was immediately followed by the Persian war. It was reserved for the reign of Diocletian to vanquish that powerful nation, and to extort a confession from the successors of Artaxerxes, of the superior majesty of the Roman empire.

Tridates the Armenian
We have observed under the reign of Valerian, that Armenia was subdued by the perfidy and the arms of the Persians, and that, after the assassination of Chosroes, his son Tridates, the infant heir of the monarchy, was saved by the fidelity of his friends, and educated under the protection of the emperor. Tridates derived from his exile such advantages as he could never have obtained on the throne of Armenia, the early knowledge of adversity, of mankind, and of the Roman discipline. He signalized his youth by deeds of valour, and displayed a matchless dexterity, as well as strength, in every martial exercise, and even in the less honourable contests of the Olympian games. Those qualities were more nobly exerted in the defence of his benefactor Licinius.

A D 282.
officer, in the sedition which occasioned the death of Probus, was exposed to the most imminent danger, and the enraged soldiers were forcing their way into his tent, when they were checked by the single arm of the Armenian prince. The gratitude of Tridates contributed soon afterwards to his restoration. Licinius was in every station the friend and companion of Galerius, and the merit of Galerius, long before he was raised to the dignity of Caesar, had been known and esteemed by Diocletian. In the third year of that emperor's reign, Tridates was invested with the kingdom of Armenia. The justice of the measure was not less evident than its expediency. It was time to rescue from the usurpation of the Persian monarch an important territory, which, since the reign of Nero, had been always granted under the protection of the empire to a younger branch of the house of Arsaces.

When Tridates appeared on the frontiers of Armenia, he was received with an unfeigned transport of joy and loyalty. During twenty-six years, the country had experienced the real and imaginary hardships of a foreign yoke. The Persian monarchs adorned their new conquest with magnificent buildings, but those monuments had been erected at the expense of the people, and were abhorred as badges of slavery. The apprehension of a revolt had inspired the most rigorous precautions, oppression had been aggravated by insult, and the consciousness of the public hatred had been productive of every measure that could render it still more implacable. We have already remarked the intolerant spirit of the Magian religion. The statues of the deified kings of Armenia, and the sacred images of the sun and moon, were broke in pieces by the zeal of the conqueror, and the perpetual fire of Ormuzd was kindled and preserved upon an altar erected on the summit of Mount Bagavan.

It was natural, that a people exasperated by so many injuries should arm with zeal in the cause of their independence, their religion, and their hereditary sovereign. The torrent bore down every obstacle, and the Persian garrisons retreated before its fury. The nobles of Armenia flew to the standard of Tridates, all alleging their past merit, offering their future service, and soliciting from the new king those honours and rewards from which they had been excluded with disdain under the foreign government. The command of the army was bestowed on Artavasdes, whose father had saved the infancy of Tridates and whose family had been massacred for that generous action. The brother of Artavasdes obtained the government of a province. One of the first military dignities was conferred on the satrap Otas, a man of singular temperance and fortitude, who presented to the king, his sister and a consider-

<sup>e</sup> See a short history and confutation of Alchemy, in the works of that philosophical compiler La Mettrie le Vayer, tom. i. p. 327-353.

<sup>f</sup> See the education and strength of Tridates in the Armenian history of Moses of Chorene, l. ii. c. 70. He could seize two wild bulls by the horns, and break them off with his hands.

<sup>g</sup> If we give credit to the younger Velleius, who supposes that in the year 323 Licinius was only sixty years of age, he could scarcely be the same person as the patron of Tridates; but we know from much better authority (Cassell Hist. Ecclesiast. l. x. c. 8) that Licinius was at that time in the 11th period of his age: sixteen years before, he is represented with grey hairs and as the contemporary of Caligula. See Lactantius c. 32. Licinius was probably born about the year 210.

<sup>h</sup> See the sixty-second and sixty-third books of Dion Cassius.

<sup>i</sup> Moses of Chorene Hist. Armen. l. ii. c. 74. The statues had been erected by Valaraces, who reigned in Armenia about 130 years before Christ, and was the first king of the family of Arsaces (See Moses Hist. Armen. l. ii. c. 3). The dedication of the Arsacides is mentioned by Justin (xli. 5) and by Ammianus Marcellinus (xxiii. 6).

<sup>k</sup> The Armenian nobility was numerous and powerful. Moses mentions many families which were distinguished under the reign of Valaraces (l. ii. 7) and which still subsisted to his own time, about the middle of the fifth century. See the preface of his edition.

<sup>l</sup> She was named Chosroductehla and had not the os patulum like other women (Hist. Armen. l. ii. c. 79). I do not understand the expression.

able treasure, both of which, in a sequestered fortress, Otas had preserved from violation. Among the Armenian nobles appeared an ally, whose Story of Mamgo fortunes are too remarkable to pass unnoticed. His name was Mamgo, his origin was Scythian, and the horde which acknowledged his authority, had encamped a very few years before on the skirts of the Chinese empire,<sup>m</sup> which at that time extended as far as the neighbourhood of Sogdiana.<sup>n</sup> Having incurred the displeasure of his master, Mamgo, with his followers, retired to the banks of the Oxus, and implored the protection of Sapor. The emperor of China claimed the fugitive, and alleged the rights of sovereignty. The Persian monarch pleaded the laws of hospitality, and with some difficulty avoided a war, by the promise that he would banish Mamgo to the uttermost parts of the west, a punishment, as he described it, not less dreadful than death itself. Armenia was chosen for the place of exile, and a large district was assigned to the Scythian horde, on which they might feed their flocks and herds, and remove their encampment from one place to another, according to the different seasons of the year. They were employed to repel the invasion of Tiridates, but their leader, after weighing the obligations and injuries which he had received from the Persian monarch, resolved to abandon his party. The Armenian prince, who was well acquainted with the merit as well as power of Mamgo, treated him with distinguished respect, and, by admitting him into his confidence, acquired a brave and faithful servant, who contributed very effectually to his restoration.<sup>o</sup>

The Persians recover Armenia.

For a while, fortune appeared to favour the enterprising valour of Tiridates. He not only expelled the enemies of his family and country from the whole extent of Armenia, but in the prosecution of his revenge he carried his arms, or at least his incursions, into the heart of Assyria. The historian, who has preserved the name of Tiridates from oblivion, celebrates, with a degree of national enthusiasm, his personal prowess, and, in the true spirit of eastern romance, describes the giants and the elephants that fell beneath his invincible arm. It is from other information that we discover the distracted state of the Persian monarchy, to which the king of Armenia was indebted for some part of his advantages. The throne was disputed by the ambition of contending brothers, and Hormuz, after exerting without success the strength of his own party, had recourse to the dangerous assistance of the barbarians who inhabited the banks of the Caspian sea.<sup>p</sup> The civil war was, however, soon terminated, either by a victory, or by a reconciliation, and Narses, who was universally acknowledged as king of Persia, directed his whole force against the foreign enemy. The contest then became too unequal, nor was the valour of the hero able to withstand the power of the monarch Tiridates, a second time expelled from the throne of Armenia, once more took refuge in the court of the emperors. Narses soon re-established his authority over the revolted province, and loudly complaining of the protection afforded by the Romans to rebels and fugitives, aspired to the conquest of the east.<sup>q</sup>

Neither prudence nor honour could permit the emperors to forsake the War between the Persians and the Romans, cause of the Armenian king, and it A D 296 was resolved to exert the force of the empire in the Persian war. Diocletian, with the calm dignity which he constantly assumed, fixed his own station in the city of Antioch, from whence he prepared and directed the military operations.<sup>r</sup> The conduct of the legions was intrusted to the intrepid valour of Galerius, who, for that important purpose, was removed from the banks of the Danube to those of the Euphrates. The armies soon encountered each other in the plains of

Defeat of Galerius

Mesopotamia, and two battles were fought with various and doubtful success. But the third engagement was of a more decisive nature, and the Roman army received a total overthrow, which is attributed to the rashness of Galerius, who, with an inconsiderable body of troops, attacked the innumerable host of the Persians.<sup>s</sup> But the consideration of the country that was the scene of action, may suggest another reason for his defeat. The same ground on which Galerius was vanquished, had been rendered memorable by the death of Crassus, and the slaughter of ten legions. It was a plain of more than sixty miles, which extended from the hills of Carrhæ to the Euphrates, a smooth and barren surface of sandy desert, without a hillock, without a tree, and without a spring of fresh water.<sup>t</sup> The steady infantry of the Romans, fainting with heat and thirst, could neither hope for victory if they preserved their ranks, nor break their ranks without exposing themselves to the most imminent danger. In this situation they were gradually encompassed by the superior numbers, harassed by the rapid evolutions, and destroyed by the arrows of the bar-

<sup>p</sup> In the Armenian history, (l. ii. p. 78) as well as in the Geography, (p. 367) China is called Zenia or Zenastan. It is characterized by the production of silk by the opulence of the natives, and by the love of peace above all the other nations of the earth.

<sup>q</sup> You ti, the first emperor of the seventh dynasty, who then reigned in China, had political transactions with Persia, a province of Sogdiana, and is said to have received a Roman embassy (Histoire des Huns, tom. i. p. 38). In those ages the Chinese kept a garrison at Kashgar, and one of their generals, about the time of Trajan, marched as far as the Caspian Sea. With regard to the intercourse between China and the western countries, a curious memoir of M. de Guignes may be consulted in the Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xxii. p. 355.

<sup>r</sup> See Hist. Armen. l. ii. c. 81.

<sup>s</sup> Ipsos Persas ipsamque regem assilus Saces, et Rucis, et Gellis petit frater Ormies. Panegyric. Vel. iii. 1. The Sacæ were a nation of wandering Scythians, who encamped towards the sources of the Oxus.

and the Javartes. The Gelli were the inhabitants of Ghilan along the Caspian sea, and who so long, under the name of Dilemites, infested the Persian monarchy. See d'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale.

<sup>t</sup> Moses of Chorene takes no notice of this second revolution, which I have been obliged to collect from a passage of Ammianus Marcellinus (l. xxiii. c. 5). Lactantius speaks of the ambition of Narses, "Concitatatus domesticis exemplis, ut sui Saporis ad occupandum orientem magnis copis inibat." De Mort. Persecut. c. 9.

<sup>u</sup> We may readily believe, that Lactantius ascribes to cowardice the conduct of Diocletian. Julian in his oration, says, that he remained with all the forces of the empire, a very hyperbolic expression.

<sup>v</sup> Our five abbreviators, Eutropius, Festus, the two Victors, and Orosius, all relate the last and great battle, but Orosius is the only one who speaks of the two former.

<sup>w</sup> The nature of the country is finely described by Plutarch, in the life of Crassus, and by Xenophon, in the first book of Anabasis.

barian cavalry. The king of Armenia had signalized his valour in the battle, and acquired personal glory by the public misfortune. He was pursued as far as the Euphrates, his horse was wounded, and it appeared impossible for him to escape the victorious enemy. In this extremity Tiridates embraced the only refuge which he saw before him: he dismounted and plunged into the stream. His armour was heavy, the river very deep, and at those parts at least half a mile in breadth, yet such was his strength and dexterity, that he reached in safety the opposite bank. With regard to the Roman general, we are ignorant of the circumstances of his escape, but when he returned to Antioch, Diocletian received

His reception by him, not with the tenderness of a friend Diocletian and colleague, but with the indignation of an offended sovereign. The haughtiest of men, clothed in his purple, but humbled by the sense of his fault and misfortune, was obliged to follow the emperor's chariot above a mile on foot, and to exhibit, before the whole court, the spectacle of his disgrace.

As soon as Diocletian had indulged his private resentment, and asserted the majesty of supreme power, he yielded to the submissive entreaties of the Cæsars, and permitted him to retrieve his own honour, as well as that of the Roman arms. In the room of the unwarlike troops of Asia, which had most probably served in the first expedition, a second army was drawn from the veterans and new levies of the Illyrian frontier, and a considerable body of Gothic auxiliaries were taken into the imperial pay. At the head of a chosen army of twenty-five thousand men, Galerius again passed the Euphrates, but, instead of exposing his legions in the open plains of Mesopotamia, he advanced through the mountains of Armenia, where he found the inhabitants devoted to his cause, and the country as favourable to the operations of infantry, as it was inconvenient for the motions of the cavalry. Adversity had confirmed the Roman discipline, while the barbarians, elated by success, were become so negligent and remiss, that in the moment when they least expected it, they were surprised by the active conduct of Galerius, who, attended only by two horsemen, had with his own eyes secretly examined the state and position of their camp. A surprise, especially in the night-time, was for the most part fatal to a Persian army. "Their horses were tied, and generally shackled, to prevent their running away, and if an alarm happened, a Persian had his housing to fix, his horse to bridle, and his corselet to put on, before he could mount." On this occasion, the impetuous attack of Galerius spread disorder and dismay over the camp of the barbarians. A slight resistance was followed by a dreadful carnage, and, in the general confusion, the wounded monarch (for Narses commanded his armies in person) fled towards the deserts of Media. His sumptuous tents, and those of his satraps, afforded an immense booty to the conqueror, and an incident is mentioned, which proves the rustic but martial ignorance of the legions in the elegant superfluities of life. A bag of shining leather, filled with pearls, fell into the hands of a private soldier, he carefully preserved the bag, but he threw away its contents, judging that whatever was of no use could not possibly be of any value. The principal and behaviour to loss of Narses was of a much more his royal captive affecting nature. Several of his wives, his sisters, and children, who had attended the army, were made captives in the defeat. But though the character of Galerius had in general very little affinity with that of Alexander, he imitated, after his victory, the amiable behaviour of the Macedonian towards the family of Darius. The wives and children of Narses were protected from violence and rapine, conveyed to a place of safety, and treated with every mark of respect and tenderness, that was due from a generous enemy, to their age, their sex, and their royal dignity.

While the east anxiously expected Negotiation for the decision of this great contest, the peace emperor Diocletian, having assembled in Syria a strong army of observation, displayed from a distance the resources of the Roman power, and reserved himself for any future emergency of the war. On the intelligence of the victory, he condescended to advance towards the frontier, with a view of moderating, by his presence and counsels, the pride of Galerius. The interview of the Roman princes at Nisibis, was accompanied with every expression of respect on one side, and of esteem on the other. It was in that city that they soon afterwards gave audience to the ambassador of the great king. The power, or at least the spirit, of Narses, had been broken by his last defeat, and he considered an immediate peace as the only means that could stop the progress of the Roman arms. He despatched Apharban, a servant who possessed his favour and confidence, with a commission to negotiate a treaty, or rather to receive whatever conditions the conqueror should impose. Apharban opened the conference by expressing his master's gratitude for the generous treatment of his family, and by

<sup>a</sup> See Foster's Dissertation in the second volume of the translation of the Anabasis by Spelman, which I will venture to recommend as one of the best versions extant.

<sup>b</sup> Hist. Armen. l. ii. c. 70. I have transferred this exploit of Tiridates from an imaginary defeat to the real one of Galerius.

<sup>c</sup> Ammian. Marcellin. l. xiv. The mile in the hands of Eutropius, (ix. 23.) of Festus, (c. 2.) and of Orosius, (vii. 2.) easily increased to several miles.

<sup>d</sup> Aurelius Victor. Jornandes de Rebus Geticis. c. 21.

<sup>e</sup> Aurelius Victor says: "Per Armeniam in hostes contendit quæ ferme sola, seu facilius incendi vi est." He followed the conduct of Trajan and the idea of Julius Cæsar.

<sup>b</sup> Xenophon's Anabasis, l. iii. For that reason the Persian cavalry encamped sixty stadia from the enemy.

<sup>c</sup> The story is told by Ammianus, l. xxii. Instead of saccum some read scutum.

<sup>d</sup> The Persians confessed the Roman superiority in morals as well as in arms. Eutrop. ix. 24. But this respect and gratitude of enemies is very seldom to be found in their own accounts.

<sup>e</sup> The account of the negotiation is taken from the fragments of Peter the patrician, in the Excerpta Legationum, published in the Byzantine Collection. Peter lived under Justinian, but it is very evident, by the nature of his materials, that they are drawn from the most authentic and accurate sources.

soliciting the liberty of those illustrious captives. He celebrated the valour of Galerius, without degrading the reputation of Narses, and thought it no dishonour to confess the superiority of the victorious Cæsar, over a monarch who had surpassed in glory all the princes of his race. Notwithstanding the justice of the Persian cause, he was empowered to submit the present differences to the decision of the emperors themselves, convinced as he was, that, in the midst of prosperity, they would not be unmindful of the vicissitudes of fortune. Apharban concluded his discourse in the style of eastern allegory, by observing that the Roman and Persian monarchies were the two eyes of the world, which would remain imperfect and mutilated if either of them should be put out.

Answer of Galerius.

"It well becomes the Persians," replied Galerius, with a transport of fury, which seemed to convulse his whole frame, "it well becomes the Persians to expatiate on the vicissitudes of fortune, and calmly to read us lectures on the virtues of moderation. Let them remember their own moderation towards the unhappy Valerian. They vanquished him by fraud, they treated him with indignity. They detained him till the last moment of his life in shameful captivity, and after his death they exposed his body to perpetual ignominy." Softening, however, his tone, Galerius insinuated to the ambassador, that it had never been the practice of the Romans to trample on a prostrate enemy, and that, on this occasion, they should consult their own dignity rather than the Persian merit. He dismissed Apharban with a hope, that Narses would soon be informed on what conditions he might obtain, from the clemency of the emperors, a lasting peace, and the restoration of his wives and children. In this conference we may discover the secret passions of Galerius, as well as his deference to the superior wisdom and authority of Diocletian. The ambition of the former grasped at the conquest of the east, and had proposed to reduce Persia into the state of a province. The prudence of the latter, who adhered to the moderate policy of Augustus and the Antonines, embraced the favourable opportunity of terminating a successful war by an honourable and advantageous peace.

Moderation of Diocletian.

Conclusion,

In pursuance of their promise, the emperors soon afterwards appointed Sitorius Probus, one of their secretaries, to acquaint the Persian court with their final resolution. As the minister of peace, he was received with every mark of politeness and friendship, but, under the pretence of allowing him the necessary repose after so long a journey, the audience of Probus was deferred from day to day, and he attended the slow motions of the king, till at length he was admitted to his presence, near the river Asprudus in Media. The secret motive of Narses in this delay, had been to collect such a military force as might enable him, though sincerely desirous of peace, to negotiate with the greater weight and dignity. Three persons only assisted at this important conference, the minister Apharban, the præfect of the guards, and an officer who had commanded on the Armenian frontier. The first condition proposed by the ambassador, is not at present of a very intelligible nature, that the city of Nisibis might be established for the place of mutual exchange, or, as we should formerly have termed it, for the staple of trade, between the two empires. There is no difficulty in conceiving the intention of the Roman princes to improve their revenue by some restraints upon commerce, but as Nisibis was situated within their own dominions, and as they were masters both of the imports and exports, it should seem, that such restraints were the objects of an internal law, rather than of a foreign treaty. To render them more effectual, some stipulations were probably required on the side of the king of Persia, which appeared so very repugnant either to his interest or to his dignity, that Narses could not be persuaded to subscribe them. As this was the only article to which he refused his consent, it was no longer insisted on, and the emperors either suffered the trade to flow in its natural channels, or contented themselves with such restrictions, as it depended on their own authority to establish.

As soon as this difficulty was re- and articles of moved, a solemn peace was concluded the treaty and ratified between the two nations. The conditions of a treaty so glorious to the empire, and so necessary to Persia, may deserve a more peculiar attention, as the history of Rome presents very few transactions of a similar nature, most of her wars having either been terminated by absolute conquest, or waged against barbarians ignorant of the use of letters. I The Aboras, or, as it is The Aboras fixed called by Xenophon, the Araxes, was as the limits be-fixed as the boundary between the two ples monarchies.<sup>a</sup> That river, which rose near the Tigris, was increased a few miles below Nisibis, by the little stream of the Mygdonius, passed under the walls of Singara, and fell into the Euphrates at Circesium, a frontier town, which, by the care of Diocletian, was very strongly fortified.<sup>b</sup> Mesopotamia, the object of so many wars, was ceded to the empire, and the Persians, by this treaty, renounced all pretensions to that great province. II They relinquished to the Romans five pro- Cession of five vinces beyond the Tigris.<sup>c</sup> Their provinces beyond situation formed a very useful barrier, the Tigris and their natural strength was soon improved by

<sup>a</sup> Adeo Victor (says Aurelius) ut in Valerius, cuius nulli omnia gere buntur, abnucci, Romani facies in provinciam novam ferrentur. Verum pars terrarum tamen nobis utilior quædam.

<sup>b</sup> He had been governor of Sumlum (Pet. Patricius in Excerpt. I. egat. p. 30.) This province seems to be mentioned by Moses of Chorene, (Geo. cap. p. 360) and lay to the east of mount Ararat.

<sup>c</sup> By an error of the geographer Ptolemy, the position of Singara is removed from the Aboras to the Tigris, which may have produced the mistake of Peter, in assigning the latter river for the boundary, instead of the former. The line of the Roman frontier traversed, but never followed, the course of the Tigris.

<sup>d</sup> Procopius de Edificiis, l. ii. c. 6.

<sup>e</sup> Three of the provinces, Zabdicene, Arzanene, and Carduene, are allowed on all sides. But instead of the other two, Peter (in Excerpt.

art and military skill Four of these, to the north of the river, were districts of obscure fame and inconsiderable extent, Intiline, Zabdicene, Arzanene, and Mozoene but on the east of the Tigris, the empire acquired the large and mountainous territory of Carduene, the ancient seat of the Carduchians, who preserved for many ages their manly freedom in the heart of the despotic monarchies of Asia The ten thousand Greeks traversed their country, after a painful march, or rather engagement, of seven days, and it is confessed by their leader, in his incomparable relation of the retreat, that they suffered more from the arrows of the Carduchians, than from the power of the great king<sup>1</sup> Their posterity, the Kurds, with very little alteration either of name or manners, acknowledged the nominal sovereignty of the Turkish sultan III

Armenia

It is almost needless to observe, that Tiridates, the faithful ally of Rome, was restored to the throne of his fathers, and that the rights of the imperial supremacy were fully asserted and secured The limits of Armenia were extended as far as the fortress of Sintha in Media, and this increase of dominion was not so much an act of liberality as of justice Of the provinces already mentioned beyond the Tigris, the four first had been dismembered by the Parthians from the crown of Armenia,<sup>m</sup> and when the Romans acquired the possession of them, they stipulated, at the expense of the usurpers, an ample compensation, which invested their ally with the extensive and fertile country of Atropatene Its principal city, in the same situation perhaps as the modern Tauris, was frequently honoured with the residence of Tiridates, and as it sometimes bore the name of Ecbatana, he imitated, in the buildings and fortifications, the splendid capital of the Medes<sup>n</sup>

Iberia.

IV The country of Iberia was barren, its inhabitants rude and savage But they were accustomed to the use of arms, and they separated from the empire barbarians much fiercer and more formidable than themselves The narrow defiles of mount Caucasus were in their hands, and it was in their choice, either to admit or to exclude the wandering tribes of Sarmatia, whenever a rapacious spirit urged them to penetrate into the richer climes of the south<sup>o</sup> The nomination of the kings of Iberia, which was resigned by the Persian monarch to the emperors, contributed to the strength and security of the Roman power in Asia<sup>p</sup> The first enjoyed a profound tranquillity during forty years, and the treaty between the rival monarchies was strictly observed till the death of Tiridates, when a new generation, animated with different views and different passions, succeeded to the government of the world, and the grandson of Narses undertook a long and memorable war against the princes of the house of Constantine

The arduous work of rescuing the <sup>Triumph of Diocletian and Maximian,</sup> distressed empire from tyrants and barbarians, had now been completely <sup>A D 303 Nov 20</sup> achieved by a succession of Illyrian peasants As soon as Diocletian entered into the twentieth year of his reign, he celebrated that memorable era, as well as the success of his arms, by the pomp of a Roman triumph<sup>q</sup> Maximian, the equal partner of his power, was his only companion in the glory of that day The two Cæsars had fought and conquered, but the merit of their exploits was ascribed, according to the rigour of ancient maxims, to the auspicious influence of their fathers and emperors<sup>r</sup> The triumph of Diocletian and Maximian was less magnificent perhaps, than those of Aurelian and Probus, but it was dignified by several circumstances of superior fame and good fortune Africa and Britain, the Rhine, the Danube, and the Nile, furnished their respective trophies, but the most distinguished ornament was of a more singular nature, a Persian victory followed by an important conquest The representations of rivers, mountains, and provinces, were carried before the imperial car The images of the captive wives, the sisters, and the children of the great king, afforded a new and grateful spectacle to the vanity of the people<sup>s</sup> In the eyes of posterity this triumph is remarkable, by a distinction of a less honourable kind It was the last that Rome ever beheld Soon after this period, the emperors ceased to vanquish, and Rome ceased to be the capital of the empire

The spot on which Rome was founded, had been consecrated by ancient <sup>Long absence of the emperors from Rome</sup> ceremonies and imaginary miracles

The presence of some god, or the memory of some hero, seemed to animate every part of the city, and the empire of the world had been promised to the capitol<sup>t</sup> The native Romans felt and confessed the power of this agreeable illusion It was derived from their ancestors, had grown up with their earliest habits of life, and was protected, in some measure, by the opinion of political utility The form and the seat of government were intimately blended together, nor was it esteemed possible to

<sup>Leg p 30</sup> inserts Rehimene and Sophene I have preferred Ammanus (l. xxxv 7) because it might be proved that Sophene was never in the hands of the Persians, either before the reign of Diocletian, or after that of Jovian For want of correct maps, like those of M d Anville almost all the moderns, with Tillamont and Valesius at their head have imagined that it was in respect to Persia and not to Rome, that the five provinces were situate beyond the Tigris

<sup>1</sup> Xenophon s Anabasis, l iv Their bows were three cubits in length their arrows two they rolled down stones that were each a wagon load The Greeks found a great many villages in that rude country

<sup>m</sup> According to Luitropius (vi 9 as the text is represented by the best MSS) the city of Tigranocerta was in Arzanene The names and situation of the other three may be faintly traced

<sup>n</sup> Compare Herodotus l i c 97 with Moses Choroneus Hist. Armen l ii c 84 and the map of Armenia given by his editors

<sup>o</sup> Iberi, locorum potiores, Caspia via Sarmatam in Armenios

captivum effundunt Tacit. Annal vi 34 See Strabon Geograph l vi p 764

<sup>q</sup> Peter Patrieius (in Excerpt Leg p 30) is the only writer who mentions the Iberian article of the treaty

<sup>r</sup> Euseb in Chron Fagi ad annum Till the discovery of the treatise De Mortibus Perscentiorum, it was not certain that the triumph and the Vincenalia were celebrated at the same time

<sup>s</sup> At the time of the Vincenalia, Galerius seems to have kept his station on the Danube See Laetant. de M P e 38

<sup>t</sup> Entropius (ix 27) mentions them as a part of the triumph As the persons had been restored to Narses, nothing more than their images could be exhibited

<sup>u</sup> Livy gives us a speech of Camillus on that subject, (i 51—55) full of eloquence and sensibility, in opposition to a design of removing the seat of government from Rome to the neighbouring city of Veii transport the one without destroying the other.<sup>a</sup> But the sovereignty of the capital was gradually annihilated in the extent of conquest, the provinces rose to the same level, and the vanquished nations acquired the name and privileges, without imbibing the partial affections, of Romans. During a long period, however, the remains of the ancient constitution, and the influence of custom, preserved the dignity of Rome. The emperors, though perhaps of African or Illyrian extraction, respected their adopted country, as the seat of their power, and the centre of their extensive dominions. The emergencies of war very frequently required their presence on the frontiers, but Diocletian and Maximian were the first Roman princes who fixed, in time of peace, their ordinary residence in the provinces, and their conduct, however it might be suggested by private motives, was justified by very specious considerations of policy. The court of

<sup>Their residence at Milan,</sup> the emperor of the west was, for the most part, established at Milan, whose situation, at the foot of the Alps, appeared far more convenient than that of Rome, for the important purpose of watching the motions of the barbarians of Germany. Milan soon assumed the splendour of an imperial city. The houses are described as numerous and well-built, the manners of the people as polished and liberal. A circus, a theatre, a mint, a palace, baths, which bore the name of their founder Maximian, porticoes adorned with statues, and a double circumference of walls, contributed to the beauty of the new capital, nor did it seem oppressed even by the proximity of

Rome.* To rival the majesty of Rome was the ambition likewise of Diocletian, who employed his leisure, and the wealth of the east, in the embellishment of Nicomedia, a city placed on the verge of Europe and Asia, almost at an equal distance between the Danube and the Euphrates. By the taste of the monarch, and at the expense of the people, Nicomedia acquired, in the space of a few years, a degree of magnificence which might appear to have required the labour of ages, and became inferior only to Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, in extent or populousness.† The life of Diocletian and Maximian was a life of action, and a considerable portion of it was spent in camps, or in their long and frequent marches, but whenever the public business allowed them any relaxation, they seem to have retired with pleasure to their favourite residences of Nicomedia and <sup>a</sup> Julius Cæsar was reproached with the intention of removing the empire to Ilium or Alexandria. See Sueton in Cæsar c. 79. According to the ingenious conjecture of Le Fevre and Dreier, the third ode of the third book of Horace was intended to divert Augustus from the execution of a similar design.

† See Aurelius Victor, who likewise mentions the buildings erected by Maximian at Carthage, probably during the Moorish war. We shall insert some verses of Ausonius de Clar. Urb. v.

Et Mediolani miræ omnia copia rerum,
Innumerae enitæque domus, facundæ irorum
Ingeni et moris læti, tum duplices muros
Amplificata loci species populique voluptas
Circus et inclusi moles eunæthe Theatri
Templa, Palatinæque arces, opulensque Moneta, Et Regio Hercules celebri sub honore lavaeri
Cunæque marmoreis ornata Peristylia signis,

Milan. Till Diocletian, in the twentieth year of his reign, celebrated his Roman triumph, it is extremely doubtful whether he ever visited the ancient capital of the empire. Even on that memorable occasion his stay did not exceed two months. Disgusted with the licentious familiarity of the people, he quitted Rome with precipitation thirteen days before it was expected that he should have appeared in the senate, invested with the ensigns of the consular dignity.*

The dislike expressed by Diocletian towards Rome and Roman freedom, <sup>Debasement of Rome and of the senate</sup> was not the effect of momentary caprice, but the result of the most artful policy. That crafty prince had framed a new system of imperial government, which was afterwards completed by the family of Constantine, and as the image of the old constitution was religiously preserved in the senate, he resolved to deprive that order of its small remains of power and consideration. We may recollect, about eight years before the elevation of Diocletian, the transient greatness, and the ambitious hopes, of the Roman senate. As long as that enthusiasm prevailed, many of the nobles imprudently displayed their zeal in the cause of freedom, and after the successors of Probus had withdrawn their countenance from the republican party, the senators were unable to disguise their impotent resentment. As the sovereign of Italy, Maximian was intrusted with the care of extinguishing this troublesome, rather than dangerous, spirit, and the task was perfectly suited to his cruel temper. The most illustrious members of the senate, whom Diocletian always affected to esteem, were involved, by his colleague, in the accusation of imaginary plots, and the possession of an elegant villa, or a well-cultivated estate, was interpreted as a convincing evidence of guilt.* The camp of the prætorians, which had so long oppressed, began to protect, the majesty of Rome, and as those haughty troops were conscious of the decline of their power, they were naturally disposed to unite their strength with the authority of the senate. By the prudent measures of Diocletian, the numbers of the prætorians were insensibly reduced, their privileges abolished,<sup>b</sup> and their place supplied by two faithful legions of <sup>New bodies of guards: Jovians and Herculians</sup> Illyrium, who, under the new titles of Jovians and Herculians, were appointed to perform the service of the imperial guards.<sup>c</sup> But the most fatal though secret wound,

Mœniaque in valli formam circumdata labro,
Omnia quæ magni operum velint æmuli formis
Excellunt, nec juncti premit vicinia Romæ

<sup>y</sup> Lactant de M. P. c. 17. Libanius, Orat. viii. p. 203.

<sup>z</sup> Lactant de M. P. c. 17. On a similar occasion, Ammianus mentions the dicacitas plebis, as not very agreeable to an imperial ear (See l. xvi. c. 10).

<sup>a</sup> Lactantius accuses Maximian of destroying fictis criminationibus luminis senatus (De M. P. c. 8). Aurelius Victor speaks very doubtfully of the faith of Diocletian towards his friends.

<sup>b</sup> Truncatæ vires urbis, imminutæ prætoriarum cohortum atque in armis vulgi numero. Aurelius Victor. Lactantius attributes to Galerius the prosecution of the same plan (c. 26).

<sup>c</sup> They were old corps stationed in Illyrium, and according to the ancient establishment, they each consisted of six thousand men. They had acquired much reputation by the use of the plumbata, or darts.

which the senate received from the hands of Diocletian and Maximian, was inflicted by the inevitable operation of their absence. As long as the emperors resided at Rome, that assembly might be oppressed, but it could scarcely be neglected. The successors of Augustus exercised the power of dictating whatever laws their wisdom or caprice might suggest, but those laws were ratified by the sanction of the senate. The model of ancient freedom was preserved in its deliberations and decrees, and wise princes, who respected the prejudices of the Roman people, were in some measure obliged to assume the language and behaviour suitable to the general and first magistrate of the republic. In the armies and in the provinces, they displayed the dignity of monarchs, and when they fixed their residence at a distance from the capital, they for ever laid aside the dissimulation which Augustus had recommended to his successors. In the exercise of the legislative as well as the executive power, the sovereign advised with his ministers, instead of consulting the great council of the nation. The name of the senate was mentioned with honour till the last period of the empire, the vanity of its members was still flattered with honorary distinctions,<sup>a</sup> but the assembly which had so long been the source, and so long the instrument, of power, was respectfully suffered to sink into oblivion. The senate of Rome, losing all connexion with the imperial court and the actual constitution, was left a venerable but useless monument of antiquity on the Capitoline hill.

Civil magistrates laid aside When the Roman princes had lost sight of the senate and of their ancient capital, they easily forgot the origin and nature of their legal power. The civil offices of consul, of proconsul, of censor, and of tribune, by the union of which it had been formed, betrayed to the people its republican extraction. Those modest titles were laid aside,<sup>b</sup> and if they still distinguished their high station by the appellation of emperor, or imperator, that word was understood in a new and more dignified sense, and no longer denoted the general of the Roman armies, but the sovereign of the Roman world. The name of Imperial dignity and titles emperor, which was at first of a military nature, was associated with another of a more servile kind. The epithet of Dominus, or lord, in its primitive signification, was expressive, not of the authority of a prince over his subjects, or of a commander over his soldiers, but of the despotic power of a master over his domestic slave.<sup>c</sup> Viewing it in that odious light, it had been rejected with abhorrence by the first Cæsars. Their resistance loaded with lead. Each soldier carried five of these which he darted from a considerable distance, with great strength and dexterity. See Vegetius: 17.

<sup>a</sup> See the Theodosian Code, l. vi. tit. ii. with Godefroy's commentary.

<sup>b</sup> See the twelfth dissertation in Spinnheim's excellent work de Usu Numismatum. From medals, inscriptions, and historians, he examines every title separately, and traces it from Augustus to the moment of its disappearing.

<sup>c</sup> Pliny (in Panegyric c. 25 &c.) speaks of dominus with execration as synonymous to tyrant and opposite to prince. And the same Pliny regulates that title (in the tenth book of the epistles) to his insensibly became more feeble, and the name less odious, till at length the style of our lord and emperor was not only bestowed by flattery, but was regularly admitted into the laws and public monuments. Such lofty epithets were sufficient to elate and satisfy the most excessive vanity, and if the successors of Diocletian still declined the title of king, it seems to have been the effect not so much of their moderation as of their delicacy. Wherever the Latin tongue was in use, (and it was the language of government throughout the empire,) the imperial title, as it was peculiar to themselves, conveyed a more respectable idea than the name of king, which they must have shared with a hundred barbarian chieftains, or which, at the best, they could derive only from Romulus or from Tarquin. But the sentiments of the east were very different from those of the west. From the earliest period of history, the sovereigns of Asia had been celebrated in the Greek language by the title of basileus, or king, and since it was considered as the first distinction among men, it was soon employed by the servile provincials of the east, in their humble addresses to the Roman throne.<sup>e</sup> Even the attributes, or at least the titles, of the Divinity, were usurped by Diocletian and Maximian, who transmitted them to a succession of Christian emperors.<sup>f</sup> Such extravagant compliments, however, soon lose their impiety by losing their meaning, and when the ear is once accustomed to the sound, they are heard with indifference, as vague, though excessive, professions of respect.

From the time of Augustus to that of Diocletian, the Roman princes con-sumes the diadem and introduces the Persian ceremonial sumed the diadem and introduced the Persian ceremonial, versing in a familiar manner among their fellow-citizens, were saluted only with the same respect that was usually paid to senators and magistrates. Their principal distinction was the imperial or military robe of purple, whilst the senatorial garment was marked by a broad, and the equestrian by a narrow, band or stripe of the same honourable colour. The pride, or rather the policy, of Diocletian, engaged that artful prince to introduce the stately magnificence of the court of Persia.<sup>g</sup> He ventured to assume the diadem, an ornament detested by the Romans as the odious ensign of royalty, and the use of which had been considered as the most desperate act of the madness of Caligula. It was no more than a broad white fillet set with pearls, which encircled the emperor's head. The sumptuous robes of Diocletian and his successors were of silk and gold, and it is remarked with indignation, that even their shoes were studded with the most precious gems.

friend rather than master, the virtuous Trajan. This strange contradiction puzzles the commentators, who think, and the translators, who can write

<sup>g</sup> Synesius de Regno. Edit. Petav. p. 15. I am indebted for this quotation to the Abbé de la Bletterie.

<sup>h</sup> See Vendale de Consecratione, p. 354, &c. It was customary for the emperors to mention (in the preamble of laws) their numen, sacred majesty, divine oracles, &c. According to Tillemont, Gregory of Nazianzen complains most bitterly the profanation, especially when it was practised by an Arian emperor.

<sup>i</sup> See Spanheim de Usu Numismal. Dissertat. xii.

The access to their sacred person was every day rendered more difficult, by the institution of new forms and ceremonies. The avenues of the palace were strictly guarded by the various schools, as they began to be called, of domestic officers. The interior apartments were intrusted to the jealous vigilance of the eunuchs, the increase of whose numbers and influence was the most infallible symptom of the progress of despotism. When a subject was at length admitted to the imperial presence, he was obliged, whatever might be his rank, to fall prostrate on the ground, and to adore, according to the eastern fashion, the divinity of his lord and master.<sup>k</sup> Diocletian was a man of sense, who, in the course of private as well as public life, had formed a just estimate both of himself and of mankind. nor is it easy to conceive, that in substituting the manners of Persia to those of Rome, he was seriously actuated by so mean a principle as that of vanity. He flattered himself, that an ostentation of splendour and luxury would subdue the imagination of the multitude, that the monarch would be less exposed to the rude licence of the people and the soldiers, as his person was secluded from the public view, and that habits of submission would insensibly be productive of sentiments of veneration. Like the modesty affected by Augustus, the state maintained by Diocletian was a theatrical representation, but it must be confessed, that of the two comedies, the former was of a much more liberal and manly character than the latter. It was the aim of the one to disguise, and the object of the other to display, the unbounded power which the emperors possessed over the Roman world.

New form of administration two Augusti, and two Cæsars

Ostentation was the first principle of the new system instituted by Diocletian. The second was division. He divided the empire, the provinces, and every branch of the civil as well as military administration. He multiplied the wheels of the machine of government, and rendered its operations less rapid but more secure. Whatever advantages and whatever defects might attend these innovations, they must be ascribed in a very great degree to the first inventor, but as the new frame of policy was gradually improved and completed by succeeding princes, it will be more satisfactory to delay the consideration of it till the season of its full maturity and perfection.<sup>l</sup> Reserving, therefore, for the reign of Constantine a more exact picture of the new empire, we shall content ourselves with describing the principal and decisive outline, as it was traced by the hand of Diocletian. He had associated three colleagues in the exercise of the supreme power, and as he was convinced that the abilities of a single man were inadequate to the public defence, he considered the joint administration of four princes not as a temporary expedient, but as a fundamental law of the constitution. It was his intention, that the two elder princes should be distinguished by the use of the diadem, and the title of Augusti; that, as affection or esteem might direct their choice, they should regularly call to their assistance two subordinate colleagues, and that the Cæsars, rising in their turn to the first rank, should supply an uninterrupted succession of emperors. The empire was divided into four parts. The east and Italy were the most honourable, the Danube and the Rhine the most laborious stations. The former claimed the presence of the Augusti, the latter were intrusted to the administration of the Cæsars. The strength of the legions was in the hands of the four partners of sovereignty, and the despair of successively vanquishing four formidable rivals, might intimidate the ambition of an aspiring general. In their civil government, the emperors were supposed to exercise the undivided power of the monarch, and their edicts, inscribed with their joint names, were received in all the provinces, as promulgated by their mutual councils and authority. Notwithstanding these precautions, the political union of the Roman world was gradually dissolved, and a principle of division was introduced, which in the course of a few years, occasioned the perpetual separation of the eastern and western empires.

The system of Diocletian was accompanied with another very material <sup>Increase of taxes</sup> disadvantage, which cannot even at present be totally overlooked, a more expensive establishment, and consequently an increase of taxes, and the oppression of the people. Instead of a modest family of slaves and freedmen, such as had contented the simple greatness of Augustus and Trajan, three or four magnificent courts were established in the various parts of the empire, and as many Roman kings contended with each other and with the Persian monarch for the vain superiority of pomp and luxury. The number of ministers, of magistrates, of officers, and of servants, who filled the different departments of the state, was multiplied beyond the example of former times, and (if we may borrow the warm expression of a contemporary,) "when the proportion of those who received exceeded the proportion of those who contributed, the provinces were oppressed by the weight of tributes."<sup>m</sup> From this period to the extinction of the empire, it would be easy to deduce an uninterrupted series of clamours and complaints. According to his religion and situation, each writer chooses either Diocletian, or Constantine, or Valens, or Theodosius, for the object of his invectives, but they unanimously agree in representing the burthen of the public impositions, and particularly the land-tax and capitation, as the intolerable and increasing grievance of their own times. From such a concurrence, an impartial historian, who is obliged to

<sup>k</sup> Aurelius Victor. Eutropius, ix. 26. It appears by the ceremony that the Romans were soon reconciled to the name and ceremony of adoration.

<sup>l</sup> The innovations introduced by Diocletian, are chiefly deduced, <sup>1st</sup>, from some very strong passages in Tacitus, and, 2dly, from the new and various offices, which, in the Theodosian code, appear already established in the beginning of the reign of Constantine.

<sup>m</sup> Laclut de M. P. c. 7.

extract truth from satire, as well as from panegyric, will be inclined to divide the blame among the princes whom they accuse, and to ascribe their exactions much less to their personal vices, than to the uniform system of their administration. The emperor Diocletian was indeed the author of that system, but during his reign, the growing evil was confined within the bounds of modesty and discretion, and he deserves the reproach of establishing pernicious precedents, rather than of exercising actual oppression.<sup>a</sup> It may be added, that his revenues were managed with prudent economy, and that after all the current expenses were discharged, there still remained in the imperial treasury an ample provision either for judicious liberality or for any emergency of the state.

It was in the twenty-first year of his reign that Diocletian executed his memorable resolution of abdicating the empire, an action more naturally to have been expected from the elder or the younger Antoninus, than from a prince who had never practised the lessons of philosophy either in the attainment or in the use of supreme power. Diocletian acquired the glory of giving to the world the first example of a resignation,<sup>b</sup> which has not been very frequently imitated by succeeding monarchs. The parallel of Charles the fifth, however, will naturally offer itself to our mind, not only since the eloquence of a modern historian has rendered that name so familiar to an English reader, but from the very striking resemblance between the characters of the two emperors, whose political abilities were superior to their military genius, and whose specious virtues were much less the effect of nature than of art. The abdication of Charles appears to have been hastened by the vicissitudes of fortune, and the disappointment of his favourite schemes urged him to relinquish a power which he found inadequate to his ambition. But the reign of Diocletian had flowed with a tide of uninterrupted success, nor was it till after he had vanquished all his enemies, and accomplished all his designs, that he seems to have entertained any serious thoughts of resigning the empire. Neither Charles nor Diocletian were arrived at a very advanced period of life, since the one was only fifty-five, and the other was no more than fifty-nine, years of age, but the active life of those princes, their wars and journeys, the cares of royalty, and their application to business, had already impaired their constitution, and brought on the infirmities of a premature old age.<sup>c</sup>

Notwithstanding the severity of a very cold and rainy winter, Diocletian left Italy soon after the ceremony of his triumph, and began his progress towards the east, round the circuit of the Illyrian provinces. From the inclemency of the weather, and the fatigue of the journey, he soon contracted a slow illness, and though he made easy marches, and was generally carried in a close litter, his disorder, before he arrived at Nicomedia, about the end of summer, was become very serious and alarming. During the whole winter he was confined to his palace, his danger inspired a general and unaffected concern, but the people could only judge of the various alterations of his health from the joy or consternation which they discovered in the countenances and behaviour of his attendants. The rumour of his death was for some time universally believed, and it was supposed to be concealed, with a view to prevent the troubles that might have happened during the absence of the Cæsar Galerius. At length, however, on the first of March, Diocletian once more appeared in public, but so pale and emaciated, that he could scarcely have been recognised by those to whom his person was the most familiar. It was time to put an end to the painful struggle, which

His prudence he had sustained during more than a year, between the care of his health and that of his dignity. The former required indulgence and relaxation, the latter compelled him to direct, from the bed of sickness, the administration of a great empire. He resolved to pass the remainder of his days in honourable repose, to place his glory beyond the reach of fortune, and to relinquish the theatre of the world to his younger and more active associates.<sup>d</sup>

The ceremony of his abdication was performed in a spacious plain, about three miles from Nicomedia. The emperor ascended a lofty throne, and in a speech, full of reason and dignity, declared his intention, both to the people and to the soldiers who were assembled on this extraordinary occasion. As soon as he had divested himself of the purple, he withdrew from the gazing multitude, and traversing the city in a covered chariot, proceeded, without delay, to the favourite retirement which he had chosen in his native country of Dalmatia. On the same day, which was the first of May,<sup>e</sup> Maximian, as it had been previously concerted, made his resignation of the imperial dignity at Milan. Even in the splendour of the Roman triumph, Diocletian had meditated his design of abdicating the government. As he wished to secure the obedience of Maximian, he exacted from him, either a general assurance that he would submit his actions to the authority of his benefactor, or

A. D. 301
Long illness of Diocletian

<sup>a</sup> Indicta lex nova quæ sane illorum temporum modestiâ tolerabilis in perniciosum processit. Aurel. Victor, who has treated the character of Diocletian with good sense though in bad Latin.

<sup>b</sup> Solus omnium post conditum Romanum imperium qui ex tanto fasti, to sponte ad privatæ vitæ statum civilitatemque remearet. Putrop. ix. 28.

<sup>c</sup> The particulars of the journey and illness are taken from Lactantius, (c. 17) who may sometimes be admitted as an evidence of public facts though very seldom of private anecdotes.

<sup>d</sup> Aurelius Victor ascribes the abdication, which had been so variously accounted for to two causes. 1st. Diocletian's contempt of ambition and 2dly, His apprehension of impending troubles. One of the panegyrics (vi. 9) mentions the age and infirmities of Diocletian, as a very natural reason for his retirement.

<sup>e</sup> The difficulties as well as mistakes attending the dates both of the year and of the day of Diocletian's abdication, are perfectly cleared up by Tillemont (Hist. des Empereurs, tom. iv. p. 325 note 19) and by Pagi ad annum.

a particular promise that he would descend from the throne, whenever he should receive the advice and the example. This engagement, though it was confirmed by the solemnity of an oath before the altar of the Capitoline Jupiter,* would have proved a feeble restraint on the fierce temper of Maximian, whose passion was the love of power, and who neither desired present tranquillity nor future reputation. But he yielded, however reluctantly, to the ascendant which his wiser colleague had acquired over him, and retired, immediately after his abdication, to a villa in Lucania, where it was almost impossible that such an impatient spirit could find any lasting tranquillity.

Retirement of Dioeletian at Sa-
lona. Dioeletian, who, from a servile origin, had raised himself to the throne, passed the nine last years of his life in a private condition. Reason had dictated, and content seems to have accompanied, his retreat, in which he enjoyed for a long time the respect of those princes to whom he had resigned the possession of the world†. It is seldom that minds, long exercised in business, have formed any habits of conversing with themselves, and in the loss of power they principally regret the want of occupation. The amusements of letters and of devotion, which afford so many resources in solitude, were incapable of fixing the attention of Dioeletian, but he had preserved, or at least he soon recovered, a taste for the most innocent as well as natural pleasures, and his leisure hours were sufficiently employed in building, planting, and gardening. His answer to Maximian is deservedly celebrated. He was solicited by that restless old man His philosophy, to re-assume the reins of government, and the imperial purple. He rejected the temptation with a smile of pity, calmly observing, that if he could show Maximian the cabbages which he had planted with his own hands at Salona, he should no longer be urged to relinquish the enjoyment of happiness for the pursuit of power‡. In his conversations with his friends, he frequently acknowledged, that of all arts, the most difficult was the art of reigning, and he expressed himself on that favourite topic with a degree of warmth which could be the result only of experience. "How often," was he accustomed to say, "is it the interest of four or five ministers to combine together to deceive their sovereign! Secluded from mankind by his exalted dignity, the truth is concealed from his knowledgo, he can see only with their eyes, he hears nothing but their misrepresentations. He confers the most important offices upon vice and weakness, and disgraces the most virtuous and deserving among his subjects. By such infamous arts," added Dioeletian, "the best and wisest princes are sold to the venal corruption of their courtiers"§. A just estimate of greatness, and the assurance of immortal fame, improve our relish for the pleasures of retirement, but the Roman emperor had filled too important a character in the world, to enjoy without alloy the comforts and security of a private condition. It was impossible that he could remain ignorant of the troubles which afflicted the empire after his abdication. It was impossible that he could be indifferent to their consequences. Fear, sorrow, and discontent, sometimes pursued him into the solitude of Salona. His tenderness, or at least his pride, was deeply wounded by the misfortunes of his wife and daughter, and the last moments of Dioeletian were embittered by some affronts, which Licinius and Constantine might have spared the father of so many emperors, and the first author of their own fortune. A report, though of a very and death,

A D 313 doubtful nature, has reached our times, that he prudently withdrew himself from their power by a voluntary death¶.

Before we dismiss the consideration Description of Salona and the adjacent country of the life and character of Dioeletian, we may, for a moment, direct our view to the place of his retirement. Salona, a principal city of his native province of Dalmatia, was near two hundred Roman miles (according to the measurement of the public highways) from Aquileia and the confines of Italy, and about two hundred and seventy from Surmum, the usual residence of the emperors whenever they visited the Illyrian frontier*. A miserable village still preserves the name of Salona, but so late as the sixteenth century, the remains of a theatre, and a confused prospect of broken arches and marble columns, continued to attest its ancient splendour†. About six or seven miles from the city, Dioeletian constructed a magnificent palace, and we may infer, from the greatness of the work, how long he had meditated his design of abdicating the empire. The choice of a spot which united all that could contribute either to health or to luxury, did not require the partiality of a native. "The soil was dry and fertile, the air is pure and wholesome, and though extremely hot during the summer months, this country seldom feels those sultry and noxious winds, to which the coasts of Istria and some parts of Italy are exposed. The views from the palace are no less beautiful than the soil and climate were inviting. Towards the west lies the fertile shore that stretches along the Hadriatic, in which a number of small islands

* See Panegy. Veter. vi. 9. The oration was pronounced after Maximian had reassumed the purple.

† Lumenius pays him a very fine compliment. "At enim divinum illum virum, qui primus imperium et partemavit et posuit, consili et freti sui non periclit, nec amisisse ac putat quod sponte transcripsit felix beatissime vere quoniam vestra, laetorum principum, colunt obsequia privatum." Panegy. Vet. vii. 15.

‡ We are obliged to the younger Velleius for this celebrated bon mot. Eutropius mentions the thing in a more general manner.

§ Hist. August. p. 223, 224. Vopiscus had learned this conversation from his father.

¶ The younger Velleius slightly mentions the report. But as Dioeletian had disobliterated a powerful and successful party, his memory has been loaded with every crime and misfortune. It has been affirmed, that he died raving mad, that he was condemned as a criminal by the Roman senate, &c.

* See the Itiner. p. 269, 272. Edit. Wesel.

† The Abate Fortis, in his Viaggio in Dalmazia, p. 43 (printed at Venice in the year 1774, in two small volumes in quarto), quotes a MS. account of the antiquities of Salona, composed by Grimbatisia Giustiani about the middle of the sixteenth century.

are scattered in such a manner, as to give this part of the sea the appearance of a great lake. On the north side lies the bay, which led to the ancient city of Salona, and the country beyond it, appearing in sight, forms a proper contrast to that more extensive prospect of water, which the Adriatic presents both to the south and to the east. Towards the north, the view is terminated by high and irregular mountains, situated at a proper distance, and, in many places, covered with villages, woods, and vineyards."b

Of Diocletian's palace Though Constantine, from a very obvious prejudice, affects to mention the palace of Diocletian with contempt,c yet one of their successors, who could only see it in a neglected and mutilated state, celebrates its magnificence in terms of the highest admirationd. It covered an extent of ground consisting of between nine and ten English acres. The form was quadrangular, flanked with sixteen towers. Two of the sides were near six hundred, and the other two near seven hundred, feet in length. The whole was constructed of a beautiful free-stone, extracted from the neighbouring quarries of Trau, or Tragutium, and very little inferior to marble itself. Four streets, intersecting each other at right angles, divided the several parts of this great edifice, and the approach to the principal apartment was from a very stately entrance, which is still denominated the Golden Gate. The approach was terminated by a peristylum of granite columns, on one side of which we discover the square temple of Æsculapius, on the other the octagon temple of Jupiter. The latter of those deities Diocletian revered as the patron of his fortunes, the former as the protector of his health. By comparing the present remains with the precepts of Vitruvius, the several parts of the building, the baths, bed-chamber, the atrium, the basilica, and the Cyclicene, Corinthian, and Egyptian halls have been described with some degree of precision, or at least of probability. Their forms were various, their proportions just, but they were all attended with two imperfections, very repugnant to our modern notions of taste and convenience. These stately rooms had neither windows nor chimneys. They were lighted from the top, (for the building seems to have consisted of no more than one story,) and they received their heat by the help of pipes that were conveyed along the walls. The range of principal apartments was protected towards the south-west by a portico five hundred and seventeen feet long, which must have formed a very noble and delightful walk, when the beauties of painting and sculpture were added to those of the prospect.

b Adams's Antiquities of Diocletian's palace at Spalatro p. 6. We may add a circumstance or two from the Abate Fortis: the little stream of the Ilyzer mentioned by Lucan, produces most excellent trout, which a sagacious writer perhaps a monk, supposes to have been one of the principal reasons that determined Diocletian in the choice of his retirement. Fortis p. 45. The same author (p. 38) observes, that a taste for agriculture is reviving at Spalatro: and that an experimental farm has lately been established near the city, by a society of gentlemen.

c Constantin Orat. ad Cælium Sanet. c. 23. In this sermon the emperor or the bishop who composed it for him, affects to relate the miserable end of all the persecutors of the church.

Had this magnificent edifice remained in a solitary country, it would have been exposed to the ravages of time, but it might, perhaps, have escaped the rapacious industry of man. The village of Aspalathus,e and, long afterwards, the provincial town of Spalatio, have grown out of its ruins. The Golden Gate now opens into the market-place. St John the Baptist has usurped the honours of Æsculapius, and the temple of Jupiter, under the protection of the Virgin, is converted into the cathedral church. For this account of Diocletian's palace we are principally indebted to an ingenious artist of our own time and country, whom a very liberal curiosity carried into the heart of Dalmatia.f But there is room to suspect, that the elegance of his designs and engraving has somewhat flattered the objects which it was their purpose to represent. We are informed by a <sup>Decline of the arts</sup> more recent and very judicious traveller, that the awful ruins of Spalatro are not less expressive of the decline of the arts than of the greatness of the Roman empire in the time of Diocletian.g If such was indeed the state of architecture, we must naturally believe that painting and sculpture had experienced a still more sensible decay. The practice of architecture is directed by a few general and even mechanical rules. But sculpture, and, above all, painting, propose to themselves the imitation not only of the forms of nature, but of the characters and passions of the human soul. In those sublime arts, the dexterity of the hand is of little avail, unless it is animated by fancy, and guided by the most correct taste and observation.

It is almost unnecessary to remark, <sup>Of letters</sup> that the civil distractions of the empire, the licence of the soldiers, the inroads of the barbarians, and the progress of despotism, had proved very unfavourable to genius, and even to learning. The succession of Illyrian princes restored the empire, without restoring the sciences. Their military education was not calculated to inspire them with the love of letters, and even the mind of Diocletian, however active and capacious in business, was totally uninformed by study or speculation. The professions of law and physic are of such common use and certain profit, that they will always secure a sufficient number of practitioners, endowed with a reasonable degree of abilities and knowledge, but it does not appear that the students in those two faculties appeal to any celebrated masters who have flourished within that period. The voice of poetry was silent. History was reduced to dry and confused abridgments, alike destitute of amusement and instruction. A languid and affected

d Constantin Porphyre de Statu Imper. p. 86.

e D'Anville Geographic Ancienne tom. i. p. 162.

f Messieurs Adrien and Chriscian attended by two draughtsmen, visited Spalatro in the month of July 1727. The magnificent work which their journey produced was published in London seven years afterwards.

g I shall quote the words of the Abate Fortis. "E'risvolmente nota, li amatori dell' architettura e dell' antichità l'opera del Signor Adams che a donato molto a que superlu vestigi coll' abituale eleganza del suo tocchiar e del bulino. In generale la rozzezza del calpello, e l'alto gusto del secolo 17. garezza lano coll' magnificenza del fabricato. See viaggio in Dalmazia, p. 40.

eloquence was still retained in the pay and service of the emperors, who encouraged not any arts except those which contributed to the gratification of their pride, or the defence of their power <sup>b</sup>

The new Platonists

The declining age of learning and of mankind is marked, however, by the rise and rapid progress of the new Platonists. The school of Alexandria silenced those of Athens, and the ancient sects enrolled themselves under the banners of the more fashionable teachers, who recommended their system by the novelty of their method, and the austerity of their manners. Several of these masters, Ammonius, Plotinus, Amelius, and Porphyry,<sup>1</sup> were men of profound thought and intense application, but by mistaking the true object of philosophy, their labours contributed much less to improve than to corrupt the human understanding. The knowledge that is suited to our situation and powers, the whole compass of moral, natural, and mathematical science, was neglected by the new Platonists, while they exhausted their strength in the verbal disputes of metaphysics, attempted to explore the secrets of the invisible world, and studied to reconcile Aristotle with Plato, on subjects of which both these philosophers were as ignorant as the rest of mankind. Consuming their reason in these deep but unsubstantial meditations, their minds were exposed to illusions of fancy. They flattered themselves that they possessed the secret of disengaging the soul from its corporeal prison, claimed a familiar intercourse with demons and spirits, and, by a singular revolution, converted the study of philosophy into that of magic. The ancient sages had derided the popular superstition, after disguising its extravagance by the thin pretence of allegory, the disciples of Plotinus and Porphyry became its most zealous defenders. As they agreed with the Christians in a few mysterious points of faith, they attacked the remainder of their theological system with all the fury of civil war. The new Platonists would scarcely deserve a place in the history of science, but in that of the church the mention of them will very frequently occur.

CHAP. XIV

Troubles after the abdication of Diocletian—Death of Constantius—Elevation of Constantine and Maxentius—Six emperors at the same time—Death of Maximian and Galerius—Victories of <sup>b</sup> The orator Lumenius was secretary to the emperors Maximian and Constantius, and professor of rhetoric in the college of Anlun. His salary was six hundred thousand sesterces, which, according to the lowest computation of that age, must have exceeded three thousand pounds a year. He generously requested the permission of employing it in rebuilding the college. See his Oration De Restaurandis Scholis, which, though not exempt from vanity, may atone for his panegyric.

<sup>1</sup> Porphyry died about the time of Diocletian's abdication. The life of his master Plotinus, which he composed, will give us the most complete idea of the genius of the sect, and the manners of its professors. This very curious piece is inserted in Fabricius, Bibliotheca Græca, tom. iv. p. 88—148.

Constantine over Maxentius and Licinius—Reunion of the empire under the authority of Constantine

THE balance of power established by Diocletian subsisted no longer than while it was sustained by the firm and dexterous hand of the founder. It required such a fortunate mixture of different tempers and abilities, as could scarcely be found, or even expected, a second time, two emperors without jealousy, two Cæsars without ambition, and the same general interest invariably pursued by four independent princes. The abdication of Diocletian and Maximian was succeeded by eighteen years of discord and confusion. The empire was afflicted by five civil wars, and the remainder of the time was not so much a state of tranquillity as a suspension of arms between several hostile monarchs, who, viewing each other with an eye of fear and hatred, strove to increase their respective forces at the expense of their subjects.

Period of civil wars and confusion,
A D 305—323

As soon as Diocletian and Maximian had resigned the purple, their station, according to the rules of the new constitution, was filled by the two Cæsars, Constantius and Galerius, who immediately assumed the title of Augustus.<sup>a</sup> The honours of seniority and precedence were allowed to the former of those princes, and he continued, under a new appellation, to administer his ancient department of Gaul, Spain, and Britain. The government of those ample provinces was sufficient to exercise his talents, and to satisfy his ambition. Clemency, temperance, and moderation, distinguished the amiable character of Constantius, and his fortunate subjects had frequently occasion to compare the virtues of their sovereign with the passions of Maximian, and even with the arts of Diocletian.<sup>b</sup> Instead of imitating their eastern pride and magnificence, Constantius preserved the modesty of a Roman prince. He declared, with unaffected sincerity, that his most valued treasure was in the hearts of his people, and that, whenever the dignity of the throne, or the danger of the state, required any extraordinary supply, he could depend with confidence on their gratitude and liberality.<sup>c</sup> The provincials of Gaul, Spain, and Britain, sensible of his worth, and of their own happiness, reflected with anxiety on the declining health of the emperor Constantius, and the tender age of his numerous family, the issue of his second marriage with the daughter of Maximian.

Character and situation of Constantius

<sup>a</sup> M. de Montesquieu (Considerations sur la Grandeur et la Dérade des Romains, c. 17) supposes, on the authority of Orosius and Eusebius, that, on this occasion, the empire, for the first time, was really divided into two parts. It is difficult, however, to discover in what respect the plan of Galerius differed from that of Diocletian.

<sup>b</sup> Ille non modo amabilis, sed etiam venerabilis Gallis fuit præcipue quod Diocletiani suspectam prudentiam, et Maximiani sanguinariam violentiam imperio ejus evaserint. Eutrop. Breviar. c. 1.

<sup>c</sup> Divitis Provincialium (mel. provincialium) ac privatorum studentes, fisci commodi non admodum officians, dicensque melius publicæ opes a privatis haberi, quam intra unum claustrum reservari. Id. ibid. He carried this maxim so far, that whenever he gave an entertainment, he was obliged to borrow a service of plate.

Of Galerius

The stern temper of Galerius was cast in a very different mould, and while he commanded the esteem of his subjects, he seldom condescended to solicit their affections. His fame in arms, and above all, the success of the Persian war, had elated his haughty mind, which was naturally impatient of a superior, or even of an equal. If it were possible to rely on the partial testimony of an injudicious writer, we might ascribe the abdication of Diocletian to the menaces of Galerius, and relate the particulars of a private conversation between the two princes, in which the former discovered as much pusillanimity as the latter displayed ingratitude and arrogance.<sup>d</sup> But these obscure anecdotes are sufficiently refuted by an impartial view of the character and conduct of Diocletian. Whatever might otherwise have been his intentions, if he had apprehended any danger from the violence of Galerius, his good sense would have instructed him to prevent the ignominious contest, and as he had held the sceptre with glory, he would have resigned it without disgrace.

The two Cæsars, Severus and Maximian

After the elevation of Constantius and Galerius to the rank of Augusti, two new Cæsars were required to supply their place, and to complete the system of the imperial government. Diocletian was sincerely desirous of withdrawing himself from the world, he considered Galerius, who had married his daughter, as the firmest support of his family and of the empire, and he consented, without reluctance, that his successor should assume the merit as well as the envy of the important nomination. It was fixed without consulting the interest or inclination of the princes of the west. Each of them had a son who was arrived at the age of manhood, and who might have been deemed the most natural candidates for the vacant honour. But the impotent resentment of Maximian was no longer to be dreaded, and the moderate Constantius, though he might despise the dangers, was humanely apprehensive of the calamities, of civil war. The two persons whom Galerius promoted to the rank of Cæsar, were much better suited to serve the views of his ambition, and their principal recommendation seems to have consisted in the want of merit or personal consequence. The first of these was Daza, or, as he was afterwards called, Maximin, whose mother was the sister of Galerius. The unexperienced youth still betrayed by his manners and language his rustic education, when, to his own astonishment, as well as that of the world, he was invested by Diocletian with the purple, exalted to the dignity of Cæsar, and intrusted with the sovereign command of Egypt and Syria. At the same time, Severus, a faithful servant, addicted to pleasure, but not incapable of business, was sent to Milan, to receive, from the reluctant hands of Maximian, the Cæsarian ornaments, and the possession of Italy and Africa. According to the forms of the constitution, Severus acknowledged the supremacy of the western emperor, but he was absolutely devoted to the commands of his benefactor Galerius, who, reserving to himself the intermediate countries from the confines of Italy to those of Syria, firmly established his power over three-fourths of the monarchy. In the full confidence, that the approaching death of Constantius would leave him sole master of the Roman world, we are assured that he had arranged in his mind a long succession of future princes, and that he meditated his own retreat from public life, after he should have accomplished a glorious reign of about twenty years.<sup>e</sup>

But within less than eighteen months, two unexpected revolutions overturned the ambitious schemes of Galerius. The hopes of uniting the western provinces to his empire were disappointed by the elevation of Constantine, whilst Italy and Africa were lost by the successful revolt of Maxentius.

I The fame of Constantine has rendered posterity attentive to the most minute circumstances of his life and actions. The place of his birth, as well as the condition of his mother Helena, have been the subject not only of literary but of national disputes. Notwithstanding the recent tradition, which assigns for her father a British King, we are obliged to confess, that Helena was the daughter of an innkeeper,<sup>f</sup> but, at the same time, we may defend the legality of her marriage, against those who have represented her as the concubine of Constantine.<sup>g</sup> The great Constantine was most probably born at Naissus, in Dacia,<sup>h</sup> and it is not surprising, that in a family and province distinguished only by the profession

Ambition of Galerius disappointed by two revolutions

Birth, education and escape of Constantine, A D 274

<sup>d</sup> Lactantius de Mort. Persecutor. c. 18. Were the particulars of this conference more consistent with truth and decency, we might still ask, how they came to the knowledge of an obscure rhetorician? But there are many historians who put us in mind of the admirable saying of the great Conde to cardinal de Retz: "Ces coquins nous font parler et agir comme ils veulent sans nous en rendre compte."

<sup>e</sup> Sublatus nuper a pectoribus et silvis (says Lactantius de M. P. c. 19) statim secularis continuo protectoris moribus tribuitur postmodum Cæsar accepit Orientem. Aurelius Victor is too liberal in giving him the whole portion of Diocletian.

<sup>f</sup> His diligence and fidelity are acknowledged even by Lactantius, de M. P. c. 18.

<sup>g</sup> These schemes, however, rest only on the very doubtful authority of Lactantius, de M. P. c. 20.

<sup>h</sup> This tradition unknown to the contemporaries of Constantine was invented in the darkness of monasteries was embellished by Jeffrey of Monmouth and the writers of the twelfth century, has been defended by our antiquarians of the last age, and is seriously related in the ponderous History of England compiled by Mr. Carte (vol. 1. p. 147). He transports, however, the kingdom of Coil, the imaginary father of Helena from Essex to the wall of Antoninus.

<sup>i</sup> Eutropius (x. 2) expresses, in a few words, the real truth, and the occasion of the error, "ex obscuriori matrimonio ejus filius." Zosimus (l. ii. p. 78.) eagerly seized the most unfavorable report, and is followed by Orosius (vii. 25) whose authority is oddly enough overlooked by the indefatigable but partial Tillemont. By insisting on the divorce of Helena Diocletian acknowledged his marriage.

<sup>k</sup> There are three opinions with regard to the place of Constantine's birth. 1. Our English antiquarians were used to dwell with rapture on the words of his panegyrist: "Britannias ille arando nobiles fecerit." But this celebrated passage may be referred with as much propriety to the accession as to the activity of Constantine. 2. Some of the modern Greeks have ascribed the honour of his birth to Drepanum a town on the gulf of Nicomedia, (Cellarius, tom. ii. p. 174) which Constantine dignified with the name of Helenopolis and Justinian adorned with many splendid buildings, (Procop. de Edificiis v. 2) It is indeed probable enough, that Helena's father kept an inn at Drepanum and that Constantine might lodge there when he returned from a Persian embassy in the reign of Aurelian. But in the wandering life of a soldier, the place of his marriage and the places where his children are born, have very little connexion with each other. 3. The claim of Naissus is supported by the anonymous writer, published at the end of Ammianus p. 710 and who in general copied very good materials and it is confirmed by Julius Firmicus, (de Astrologia, l. i.

of arms, the youth should discover very little inclination to improve his mind by the acquisition of knowledge<sup>1</sup> He was about eighteen years of age when his father was promoted to the rank of Cæsar, but that fortunate event was attended with his mother's divorce, and the splendour of an imperial alliance reduced the son of Helena to a state of disgrace and humiliation Instead of following Constantius in the west, he remained in the service of Diocletian, signalized his valour in the wars of Egypt and Persia, and gradually rose to the honourable station of a tribune of the first order The figure of Constantine was tall and majestic, he was dexterous in all his exercises, intrepid in war, affable in peace, in his whole conduct, the active spirit of truth was tempered by habitual prudence, and while his mind was engrossed by ambition, he appeared cold and insensible to the allurements of pleasure The favour of the people and soldiers, who had named him as a worthy candidate for the rank of Cæsar, served only to exasperate the jealousy of Galerius, and though prudence might restrain him from exercising any open violence, an absolute monarch is seldom at a loss how to execute a sure and secret revenge<sup>m</sup> Every hour increased the danger of Constantine, and the anxiety of his father, who, by repeated letters, expressed the warmest desire of embracing his son For some time the policy of Galerius supplied him with delays and excuses, but it was impossible long to refuse so natural a request of his associate, without maintaining his refusal by arms The permission of the journey was reluctantly granted, and whatever precautions the emperor might have taken to intercept a return, the consequences of which he, with so much reason, apprehended, they were effectually disappointed by the incredible diligence of Constantine<sup>n</sup> Leaving the palace of Nicomedia in the night, he travelled post through Bithynia, Thrace, Dacia, Pannonia, Italy, and Gaul, and amidst the joyful acclamations of the people, reached the port of Boulogne, in the very moment when his father was preparing to embark for Britain<sup>o</sup>

Death of Constantius, and elevation of Constantine
A D 306 July 25

The British expedition, and an easy victory over the barbarians of Calcedonia, were the last exploits of the reign of Constantius He ended his life in the imperial palace of York, fifteen months after he had received the title of Augustus, and almost fourteen years and a half after he had been promoted to the rank of Cæsar His death was immediately succeeded by the elevation of Constantine The ideas of inheritance and succession are so very familiar, that the generality of mankind consider them as founded, not only in reason, but in nature itself Our imagination readily transfers the same principles from private property to public dominion and whenever a virtuous father leaves behind him a son whose merit seems to justify the esteem, or even the hopes, of the people, the joint influence of prejudice and of affection operates with irresistible weight The flower of the western armies had followed Constantius into Britain, and the national troops were reinforced by a numerous body of Alemanni, who obeyed the orders of Clovis, one of their hereditary chieftains<sup>p</sup> The opinion of their own importance, and the assurance that Britain, Gaul, and Spain would acquiesce in their nomination, were diligently inculcated to the legions by the adherents of Constantine The soldiers were asked, whether they could hesitate a moment between the honour of placing at their head the worthy son of their beloved emperor, and the ignominy of tamely expecting the arrival of some obscure stranger, on whom it might please the sovereign of Asia to bestow the armies and provinces of the west? It was insinuated to them, that gratitude and liberality held a distinguished place among the virtues of Constantine, nor did that artful prince show himself to the troops, till they were prepared to salute him with the names of Augustus and emperor The throne was the object of his desires, and had he been less actuated by ambition, it was his only means of safety He was well acquainted with the character and sentiments of Galerius, and sufficiently apprized, that if he wished to live he must determine to reign The decent and even obstinate resistance which he chose to affect,<sup>q</sup> was contrived to justify his usurpation, nor did he yield to the acclamations of the army, till he had provided the proper materials for the letter, which he immediately despatched to the emperor of the east Constantine informed him of the melancholy event of his father's death, modestly asserted his natural claim to the succession, and respectfully lamented, that the affectionate violence of his troops had not permitted him to solicit the imperial purple in the regular and constitutional manner The first emotions of Galerius were those of surprise, disappointment, and rage, and as he could seldom restrain his passions, he loudly threatened, that he would commit to the flames both the letter and the messenger But his resentment insensibly subsided, and

e 4) who flourished under the reign of Constantine himself Some objections have been raised against the integrity of the text, and the application of the passage of Firmianus but the former is established by the best MSS and the latter is very ably defended by Lipsius de Magnitudine Romæ, l. 11 c. 11 et Supplement

<sup>1</sup> Literis minus instructus. Anonymi ad Ammian. p. 710
<sup>m</sup> Galerius, or perhaps his own courage, exposed him to single combat with a Sarmatian (Anonymi p. 710) and with a monstrous lion See Praxagoras apud Photium p. 63 Praxagoras, an Athenian philosopher, had written a life of Constantine, in two books, which are now lost He was a contemporary

<sup>n</sup> Zosimus, l. 11 p. 78 79 Lactantius de M. P. c. 24 The former tells a very foolish story, that Constantine caused all the post horses, which he had used, to be hamstringed Such a bloody execution, without preventing a pursuit, would have scattered suspicions, and might have stopped his journey

<sup>o</sup> Anonymi p. 710 Panegyri Veter. vii. 4 But Zosimus l. 11 p. 79 Eusebius de Vit. Constant. l. 1 c. 21 and Lactantius de M. P. c. 24 suppose, with less accuracy, that he found his father on his death bed p. Cunctis qui aderant annitentibus, sed præcipue Croco (alu. Eroco) Alemannorum rege, auxilii gratia Constantium comitato, imperium cepit Victor Junior, c. 41 This is perhaps the first instance of a barbarian king, who assisted the Roman arms with an independent body of his own subjects The practice grew familiar, and at last became fatal

<sup>q</sup> His panegyrist Eumenius (vii. 8) ventures to affirm, in the presence of Constantine, that he put spurs to his horse, and tried, but in vain, to escape from the hands of his soldiers

He is acknowledged by Græci, who gives him only the title of Cæsar, and that of Augustus to Severus.

when he recollected the doubtful chance of war, when he had weighed the character and strength of his adversary, he consented to embrace the honourable accommodation which the prudence of Constantine had left open to him. Without either condemning or ratifying the choice of the British army, Galerius accepted the son of his deceased colleague, as the sovereign of the provinces beyond the Alps, but he gave him only the title of Cæsar, and the fourth rank among the Roman princes, whilst he conferred the vacant place of Augustus on his favourite Severus. The apparent harmony of the empire was still preserved, and Constantine, who already possessed the substance, expected, without impatience, an opportunity of obtaining the honours, of supreme power.

The children of Constantius by his second marriage were six in number, three of either sex, and whose imperial descent might have solicited a preference over the meaner extraction of the son of Helena. But Constantine was in the thirty-second year of his age, in the full vigour both of mind and body, at the time when the eldest of his brothers could not possibly be more than thirteen years old. His claim of superior merit had been allowed and ratified by the dying emperor. In his last moments, Constantius bequeathed to his eldest son the care of the safety as well as greatness of the family, conjuring him to assume both the authority and the sentiments of a father with regard to the children of Theodora. Their liberal education, advantageous marriages, the secure dignity of their lives, and the first honours of the state with which they were invested, attest the fraternal affection of Constantine, and as those princes possessed a mild and grateful disposition, they submitted without reluctance to the superiority of his genius and fortune.

II The ambitious spirit of Galerius was scarcely reconciled to the disappointment of his views upon the Gallic provinces, before the unexpected loss of Italy wounded his pride as well as power in a still more sensible part. The long absence of the emperors had filled Rome with discontent and indignation, and the people gradually discovered, that the preference given to Nicomedia and Milan, was not to be ascribed to the particular inclination of Diocletian, but to the permanent form of government which he had instituted. It was in vain that, a few months after his abdication, his successors dedicated, under his name, those magnificent baths, whose ruins still supply the ground as well as the materials for so many churches and convents. The tranquillity of those elegant recesses of ease and luxury was disturbed by the impatient murmurs of the Romans, and a report was insensibly circulated, that the sums expended in erecting those buildings would soon be required at their hands. About that time the avarice of Galerius, or perhaps the exigencies of the state, had induced him to make a very strict and rigorous inquisition into the property of his subjects, for the purpose of a general taxation, both on their lands and on their persons. A very minute survey appears to have been taken of their real estates, and wherever there was the slightest suspicion of concealment, torture was very freely employed to obtain a sincere declaration of their personal wealth. The privileges which had exalted Italy above the rank of the provinces, were no longer regarded, and the officers of the revenue already began to number the Roman people, and to settle the proportion of the new taxes. Even when the spirit of freedom had been utterly extinguished, the tamest subjects have sometimes ventured to resist an unprecedented invasion of their property, but on this occasion the injury was aggravated by the insult, and the sense of private interest was quickened by that of national honour. The conquest of Macedonia, as we have already observed, had delivered the Roman people from the weight of personal taxes. Though they had experienced every form of despotism, they had now enjoyed that exemption near five hundred years, nor could they patiently brook the insolence of an Illyrian peasant, who, from his distant residence in Asia, presumed to number Rome among the tributary cities of his empire. The rising fury of the people was encouraged by the authority, or at least the connivance, of the senate, and the feeble remains of the prætorian guards, who had reason to apprehend their own dissolution, embraced so honourable a pretence, and declared their readiness to draw their swords in the service of their oppressed country. It was the wish, and it soon became the hope, of every citizen, that after expelling from Italy their foreign tyrants, they should elect a prince who, by the place of his residence, and by his maxims of government, might once more deserve the title of Roman emperor. The name, as well as the situation, of Maximian, determined in his favour the popular enthusiasm.

Maximian was the son of the emperor Maximian, and he had married the daughter of Galerius. His birth and alliance seemed to offer him the fairest promise of succeeding to the empire, but his Maximian declared emperor at Rome A. D. 306. Oct. 28.

* Laetantius de M. P. e. 25. Eumenius (vii. 8) gives a rhetorical turn to the whole transaction.

* The choice of Constantine by his dying father, which is warranted by reason, and insinuated by Eumenius, seems to be confirmed by the most unexceptionable authority, the concurring evidence of Laetantius (de M. P. e. 24) and of Libanius (Oration 1) of Eusebius (in Vit. Constantini i. e. 18, 21) and of Julian (Oration 1).

* Of the three sisters of Constantine, Constantia married the emperor Licinius, Anastasia the Cæsar Basilianus, and Eutropia the consul Nepotianus. The three brothers were Dalmatius, Julius Constantius, and Anibalbanus, of whom we shall have occasion to speak hereafter.

* See Gruter Inscript. p. 178. The six princes are all mentioned, Diocletian and Maximian as the senior Augusti and fathers of the emperor. They jointly dedicate for the use of their own Romans, this magnificent edifice. The architects have delineated the ruins of these thermæ and the antiquarians particularly Dionatus and Nardini, have ascertained the ground which they covered. One of the great rooms is now the Carthusian church, and even one of the porticoes is sufficient to form another church, which belongs to the Fezziliani.

* See Laetantius de M. P. e. 26, 31.

weakness and incapacity procured him the same exclusion from the dignity of Cæsar, which Constantine had deserved by a dangerous superiority of merit. The policy of Galerius preferred such associates, as would never disgrace the choice, nor dispute the commands, of their benefactor. An obscure stranger was therefore raised to the throne of Italy, and the son of the late emperor of the west was left to enjoy the luxury of a private fortune in a villa a few miles distant from the capital. The gloomy passions of his soul, shame, vexation, and rage, were inflamed by envy on the news of Constantine's success, but the hopes of Maxentius revived with the public discontent, and he was easily persuaded to unite his personal injury and pretensions with the cause of the Roman people. Two prætorian tribunes and a commissary of provisions undertook the management of the conspiracy, and as every order of men was actuated by the same spirit, the immediate event was neither doubtful nor difficult. The præfect of the city, and a few magistrates, who maintained their fidelity to Severus, were massacred by the guards, and Maxentius, invested with the imperial ornaments, was acknowledged by the applauding senate and people as the protector of the Roman freedom and dignity. It is uncertain whether Maximian was previously acquainted with the conspiracy, but as soon as the standard of rebellion was erected at Rome, the old emperor broke from the retirement where the authority of Diocletian had condemned him to pass a life of melancholy solitude, and concealed his returning ambition under the disguise of paternal tenderness. At the request of his son and of the senate, he condescended to re-assume the purple. His ancient dignity, his experience, and his fame in arms, added strength as well as reputation to the party of Maxentius.*

According to the advice, or rather the orders, of his colleague, the emperor Severus immediately hastened to Rome, in the full confidence, that, by his unexpected celerity, he should easily suppress the tumult of an unwarlike populace, commanded by a licentious youth. But he found on his arrival the gates of the city shut against him, the walls filled with men and arms, an experienced general at the head of the rebels, and his own troops without spirit or affection. A large body of Moors deserted to the enemy, allured by the promise of a large donative, and, if it be true that they had been led by Maximian in his African war, preferring the natural feelings of gratitude to the artificial ties of allegiance. Anulinus, the prætorian præfect, declared himself in favour of Maxentius, and drew after him the most considerable part of the troops, accustomed to obey his commands. Rome, according to the expression of an orator, recalled her armies, and the unfortunate Severus, destitute of force and of counsel, retired, or rather fled, with precipitation, to Ravenna. Here he might for some time have been safe. The fortifications of Ravenna were able to resist the attempts, and the morasses that surrounded the town were sufficient to prevent the approach, of the Italian army. The sea, which Severus commanded with a powerful fleet, secured him an inexhaustible supply of provisions, and gave a free entrance to the legions, which, on the return of spring, would advance to his assistance from Illyricum and the east. Maximian, who conducted the siege in person, was soon convinced that he might waste his time and his army in the fruitless enterprise, and that he had nothing to hope either from force or famine. With an art more suitable to the character of Diocletian than to his own, he directed his attack, not so much against the walls of Ravenna, as against the mind of Severus. The treachery which he had experienced, disposed that unhappy prince to distrust the most sincere of his friends and adherents. The emissaries of Maximian easily persuaded his credulity, that a conspiracy was formed to betray the town, and prevailed upon his fears not to expose himself to the discretion of an irritated conqueror, but to accept the faith of an honourable capitulation. He was at first received with humanity, and treated with respect. Maximian conducted the captive emperor to Rome, and gave him the most solemn assurances that he had secured his life by the resignation of the purple. But Severus could obtain only an easy death and an imperial funeral. When the sentence was signified to him, the manner of executing it was left to his own choice, he preferred the favourite mode of the ancients, that of opening his veins, and as soon as he expired, his body was carried to the sepulchre which had been constructed for the family of Gallienus.*

Though the characters of Constantine and Maxentius had very little affinity with each other, their situation and interest were the same, and prudence seemed to require that they should unite their forces against the common enemy. Notwithstanding the superiority of his age and dignity, the indefatigable Maximian passed the Alps, and courting a personal interview with the sovereign of Gaul, carried with him his daughter Fausta as a pledge of the new alliance. The marriage was celebrated at Arles with every circumstance of magnificence, and the ancient colleague of Diocletian, who again asserted his claim to the western empire, conferred on his son-in-law and ally the title of Augustus. By consenting to receive that honour from Maximian, Constantine seemed to embrace the cause of Rome and of the senate, but

* The sixth Panegyric represents the conduct of Maximian in the most favourable light, and the ambiguous expression of Aurelius Victor, "retrahente diti," may signify, either that he contrived, or that he opposed, the conspiracy. See Zosimus l. ii. p. 79 and Lactantius, de M. p. c. 26.

* The circumstances of this war, and the death of Severus, are very doubtfully and variously told in our ancient fragments, (see Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. iv. p. 1. p. 555.) I have endeavoured to extract from them a consistent and probable narration.

his professions were ambiguous, and his assistance slow and ineffectual. He considered with attention the approaching contest between the masters of Italy and the emperor of the east, and was prepared to consult his own safety or ambition in the event of the war.<sup>a</sup>

Galerius invades
Italy

The importance of the occasion called for the presence and abilities of Galerius. At the head of a powerful army collected from Illyricum and the east, he entered Italy, resolved to revenge the death of Severus, and to chastise the rebellious Romans, or, as he expressed his intentions, in the furious language of a barbarian, to extirpate the senate, and to destroy the people by the sword. But the skill of Maximian had concerted a prudent system of defence. The invader found every place hostile, fortified, and inaccessible, and though he forced his way as far as Narni, within sixty miles of Rome, his dominion in Italy was confined to the narrow limits of his camp. Sensible of the increasing difficulties of his enterprise, the haughty Galerius made the first advances towards a reconciliation, and despatched two of his most considerable officers to tempt the Roman princes by the offer of a conference, and the declaration of his paternal regard for Maxentius, who might obtain much more from his liberality than he could hope from the doubtful chance of war.<sup>b</sup> The offers of Galerius were rejected with firmness, his perfidious friendship refused with contempt, and it was not long before he discovered, that, unless he provided for his safety by a timely retreat, he had some reason to apprehend the fate of Severus. The wealth, which the Romans defended against his rapacious tyranny, they freely contributed for his destruction. The name of Maximian, the popular arts of his son, the secret distribution of large sums, and the promise of still more liberal rewards, checked the ardour, and corrupted the fidelity, of the Illyrian legions, and when Galerius at length gave the signal of the retreat, it was with some difficulty that he could prevail on his veterans not to desert a banner which had so often conducted them to victory and honour. A contemporary writer assigns two other causes for the failure of the expedition, but they are both of such a nature, that a cautious historian will scarcely venture to adopt them. We are told that Galerius, who had formed a very imperfect notion of the greatness of Rome by the cities of the east, with which he was acquainted, found his forces inadequate to the siege of that immense capital. But the extent of a city serves only to render it more accessible to the enemy, Rome had long since been accustomed to submit on the approach of a conqueror, nor could the temporary enthusiasm of the people have long contended against the discipline and valour of the legions. We are likewise informed, that the legions themselves were struck with horror and remorse, and that those pious sons of the republic refused to violate the sanctity of their venerable parent.<sup>c</sup> But when we recollect with how much ease, in the more ancient civil wars, the zeal of party, and the habits of military obedience, had converted the native citizens of Rome into her most implacable enemies, we shall be inclined to distrust this extreme delicacy of strangers and barbarians, who had never beheld Italy, till they entered it in a hostile manner. Had they not been restrained by motives of a more interested nature, they would probably have answered Galerius in the words of Caesar's veterans: "If our general wishes to lead us to the banks of the Tiber, we are prepared to trace out his camp. Whatever walls he has determined to level with the ground, our hands are ready to work the engines, nor shall we hesitate, should the name of the devoted city be Rome itself." These are indeed the expressions of a poet, but of a poet who has been distinguished, and even censured, for his strict adherence to the truth of history.<sup>d</sup>

The legions of Galerius exhibit a very melancholy proof of their disposition, by the ravages which they committed in their retreat. They murdered, they ravaged, they plundered, they drove away the flocks and herds of the Italians, they burnt the villages through which they passed, and they endeavoured to destroy the country which it had not been in their power to subdue. During the whole march, Maxentius hung on their rear, but he very prudently declined a general engagement with those brave and desperate veterans. His father had undertaken a second journey into Gaul, with the hope of persuading Constantine, who had assembled an army on the frontier, to join the pursuit, and to complete the victory. But the actions of Constantine were guided by reason, and not by resentment. He persisted in the wise resolution of maintaining a balance of power in the divided empire, and he no longer hated Galerius, when that aspiring prince had ceased to be an object of terror.<sup>e</sup>

The mind of Galerius was the most susceptible of the sterner passions, but it was not, however, incapable of a sincere and lasting friendship. Licinius, whose manners as well as character were not unlike his own, seems to have engaged both his affection and esteem. Their intimacy had com-

His retreat.

Elevation of Licinius to the rank of Augustus
A. D. 307
Nov. 11

<sup>a</sup> The sixth panegyric was pronounced to celebrate the elevation of Constantine. But the prudent orator avoids the mention either of Galerius or of Maxentius. He introduces only one slight allusion to the actual troubles and to the majesty of Rome.

<sup>b</sup> With regard to this negotiation, see the fragments of an anonymous historian published by Valesius at the end of his edition of Ammianus Marcellinus p. 711. These fragments have furnished us with several curious and as it should seem, authentic anecdotes.

<sup>c</sup> Lactantius de M. P. c. 28. The former of these reasons is probably taken from Virgil's shepherd: "Illam ego hinc nostrae similem Meliboe pulavi," &c. Lactantius delights in these poetical allusions.

<sup>d</sup> *Castra super Tusci ponere Tyhridis undas, (Jubeas)
Hesperios audire vocem metalorum in agris.
Tu quocumque volas in planum offendere muros
His aries aëlis disperget saxa lacertis,
Illa licet penitus tolli quam jussisset urbem
Roma sui* Lucan Pharsal. i. 331

<sup>e</sup> Lactantius de M. P. c. 27. Zosim. l. ii. p. 82. The latter implies that Constantine, in his interview with Maximian, had promised to declare war against Galerius.

menced in the happier period perhaps of their youth and obscurity. It had been cemented by the freedom and dangers of a military life, they had advanced almost by equal steps through the successive honours of the service, and as soon as Galerius was invested with the imperial dignity, he seems to have conceived the design of raising his companion to the same rank with himself. During the short period of his prosperity, he considered the rank of Caesar as unworthy of the age and merit of Licinius, and rather chose to reserve for him the place of Constantius, and the empire of the west. While the emperor was employed in the Italian war, he intrusted his friend with the defence of the Danube, and immediately after his return from that unfortunate expedition, he invested Licinius with the vacant purple of Severus, resigning to his immediate command the provinces of Illyricum

The news of his promotion was no sooner carried into the east, than Maximin, who governed, or rather oppressed, the countries of Egypt and Syria, betrayed his envy and discontent, disdained the inferior name of Caesar, and, notwithstanding the prayers as well as arguments of Galerius, exacted, almost by violence, the equal title of Augustus. For the first, and indeed for the last time, the Roman world was administered by six emperors.

In the west Constantine and Maxentius affected to reverence their father Maximian. In the east, Licinius and Maximin honoured with more real consideration their benefactor Galerius. The opposition of interest, and the memory of a recent war, divided the empire into two great hostile powers; but their mutual fears produced an apparent tranquillity, and even a feigned reconciliation, till the death of the elder princes, of Maximian, and more particularly of Galerius, gave a new direction to the views and passions of their surviving associates.

When Maximian had reluctantly abdicated the empire, the venal orators of the times applauded his philosophic moderation. When his ambition excited, or at least encouraged, a civil war, they returned thanks to his generous patriotism, and gently censured that love of ease and retirement which had withdrawn him from the public service. But it was impossible that minds like those of Maximian and his son Maxentius considered himself as the legal sovereign of Italy, elected by the Roman senate and people; nor would he endure the control of the father, who <sup>f</sup> M. de Tillemont (Hist. des Empereurs, tom. iv. part. i. p. 593) has proved, that Licinius, without passing through the intermediate rank of Caesar, was declared Augustus the 11th of November, A. D. 307 after the return of Galerius from Italy.

<sup>g</sup> Lactantius de M. P. c. 32. When Galerius declared Licinius Augustus with himself, he tried to satisfy his younger associates by investing for Constantine and Maximin (not Maxentius, see Bahr, p. 81) the new title of sons of the Augusti. But when Maximin acknowledged him that he had been related Augustus by the army, Galerius was obliged to acknowledge him, as well as Constantine, as equal associates to the imperial dignity.

<sup>h</sup> See Panegyric. V. 49. Audi doloris nostri liberam vocem, &c.

arrogantly declared, that by his name and abilities the rash youth had been established on the throne. The cause was solemnly pleaded before the prætorian guards, and those troops, who dreaded the severity of the old emperor, espoused the party of Maxentius. The life and freedom of Maximian were however respected, and he retired from Italy into Illyricum, affecting to lament his past conduct, and secretly contriving new mischiefs. But Galerius, who was well acquainted with his character, soon obliged him to leave his dominions, and the last refuge of the disappointed Maximian was the court of his son-in-law Constantine. He was received with respect by that artful prince, and with the appearance of filial tenderness by the empress Fausta. That he might remove every suspicion, he resigned the imperial purple a second time, professing himself at length convinced of the vanity of greatness and ambition. Had he persevered in this resolution, he might have ended his life with less dignity, indeed, than in his first retirement, yet, however, with comfort and reputation. But the near prospect of a throne brought back to his remembrance the state from whence he was fallen, and he resolved, by a desperate effort, either to reign or to perish. An incursion of the Franks had summoned Constantine, with a part of his army, to the banks of the Rhine, the remainder of the troops were stationed in the southern provinces of Gaul, which lay exposed to the enterprises of the Italian emperor, and a considerable treasure was deposited in the city of Arles. Maximian either craftily invented, or hastily credited, a vain report of the death of Constantine. Without hesitation he ascended the throne, seized the treasure, and scattering it with his accustomed profusion among the soldiers, endeavoured to awake in their minds the memory of his ancient dignity and exploits. Before he could establish his authority, or finish the negotiation which he appears to have entered into with his son Maxentius, the celerity of Constantine defeated all his hopes. On the first news of his perfidy and ingratitude, that prince returned by rapid marches from the Rhine to the Saone, embarked on the last-mentioned river at Chalons, and at Lyons trusting himself to the rapidity of the Rhone, arrived at the gates of Arles, with a military force which it was impossible for Maximian to resist, and which scarcely permitted him to take refuge in the neighbouring city of Marseilles. The narrow neck of land which joined that place to the continent was fortified against the besiegers, whilst the sea was open, either for the escape of Maximian, or

The whole passage is imagined with artful flattery, and expressed with an easy flow of eloquence.

<sup>i</sup> Lactantius de M. P. c. 28. Zosim. l. ii. p. 82. A report was spread, that Maxentius was the son of some obscure Syrian, and had been substituted by the wife of Maximian to her own child. See Aurelian. Victor, Anonym. Valesian. and Prætor. V. 19. 3, 4.

<sup>k</sup> Ab urbe pulsam, ab Italia fugatam, ab Illyrico repudiatam, tunc provinciam tuam cepisti, tuos palatium recepisti. Lactantius in Panegyric. V. 11.

<sup>l</sup> Lactantius de M. P. c. 29. Yet after the resignation of the purple, Constantine still continued to Maximian the poorness and honour of the imperial dignity, and, on all public occasions, gave the right hand place to his father-in-law. Panegyric. V. 11. 15.

for the succours of Maxentius, if the latter should choose to disguise his invasion of Gaul, under the honourable pretence of defending a distressed, or, as he might allege, an injured father. Apprehensive of the fatal consequences of delay, Constantine gave orders for an immediate assault, but the scaling-ladders were found too short for the height of the walls, and Marseilles might have sustained as long a siege as it formerly did against the arms of Cæsar, if the garrison, conscious either of their fault or of their danger, had not purchased their pardon by delivering up the city and person of

His death,
A. D. 310
February

Maximian. A secret but irrevocable sentence of death was pronounced against the usurper, he obtained only the same favour which he had indulged to Severus, and it was published to the world, that, oppressed by the remorse of his repeated crimes, he strangled himself with his own hands. After he had lost the assistance, and disdained the moderate counsels, of Diocletian, the second period of his active life was a series of public calamities and personal mortifications, which were terminated, in about three years, by an ignominious death. He deserved his fate, but we should find more reason to applaud the humanity of Constantine, if he had spared an old man, the benefactor of his father, and the father of his wife. During the whole of this melancholy transaction, it appears that Fausta sacrificed the sentiments of nature to her conjugal duties.<sup>m</sup>

Death of Galerius
A. D. 311
May

The last years of Galerius were less shameful and unfortunate, and though he had filled with more glory the subordinate station of Cæsar than the superior rank of Augustus, he preserved, till the moment of his death, the first place among the princes of the Roman world. He survived his retreat from Italy about four years, and wisely relinquishing his views of universal empire, he devoted the remainder of his life to the enjoyment of pleasure, and to the execution of some works of public utility, among which we may distinguish the discharging into the Danube the superfluous waters of the lake Pelso, and the cutting down the immense forests that encompassed it, an operation worthy of a monarch, since it gave an extensive country to the agriculture of his Pannonian subjects.<sup>n</sup> His death was occasioned by a very painful and lingering disorder. His body, swelled by an intemperate course of life to an unwieldy corpulence, was covered with ulcers, and devoured by innumerable swarms of those insects who have given their name to a most loathsome disease,<sup>o</sup> but as Galerius had offended a very zealous and powerful party among his subjects, his sufferings, instead of exciting their compassion, have been celebrated as the visible effects of divine justice.<sup>p</sup> He had no sooner expired in his palace of Nicomedia, than the two emperors who were indebted for their purple to his favour, <sup>His dominion shared between Maximin and Licinius</sup> began to collect their forces, with the intention either of disputing or of dividing, the dominions which he had left without a master. They were persuaded, however, to desist from the former design, and to agree in the latter. The provinces of Asia fell to the share of Maximin, and those of Europe augmented the portion of Licinius. The Hellespont and the Thracian Bosphorus formed their mutual boundary, and the banks of those narrow seas, which flowed in the midst of the Roman world, were covered with soldiers, with arms, and with fortifications. The deaths of Maximian and of Galerius reduced the number of emperors to four. The sense of their true interest soon connected Licinius and Constantine, a secret alliance was concluded between Maximin and Maxentius, and their unhappy subjects expected, with terror, the bloody consequences of their inevitable dissensions, which were no longer restrained by the fear or the respect which they had entertained for Galerius.<sup>q</sup>

Among so many crimes and misfortunes, occasioned by the passions of <sup>Administration of Constantine in Gaul, A. D. 306-312.</sup> the Roman princes, there is some pleasure in discovering a single action which may be ascribed to their virtue. In the sixth year of his reign, Constantine visited the city of Autun, and generously remitted the arrears of tribute, reducing at the same time the proportion of their assessment from twenty-five to eighteen thousand heads, subject to the real and personal capitation.<sup>r</sup> Yet even this indulgence affords the most unquestionable proof of the public misery. This tax was so extremely oppressive, either in itself or in the mode of collecting it, that whilst the revenue was increased by extortion, it was diminished by despair: a considerable part of the territory of Autun was left uncultivated, and great numbers of the provincials rather chose to live as exiles and outlaws, than to support the weight of civil society. It is but too probable, that the bountiful emperor relieved, by a partial act of liberality, one among the many evils which he had caused by his general maxims of administration. But even those maxims were less the effect of choice than of necessity. And if we except <sup>m</sup> Zosim. l. ii. p. 82. Eumenius in Panegy. Vet. vii. 16-21. The latter of these has undoubtedly represented the whole affair in the most favourable light for his sovereign. Yet even from this partial narrative we may conclude that the repeated clemency of Constantine and the reiterated treasons of Maximian as they are described by Laetantius (de M. P. c. 29-30) and copied by the moderns, are destitute of any historical foundation.

<sup>n</sup> Aurelius Victor. c. 40. But that lake was situated on the Upper Pannonia, near the borders of Noricum and the province of Valeria (a name which the wife of Galerius gave to the drained country) undoubtedly lay between the Drave and the Danube (Sextus Rufus, c. 9). I should therefore suspect that Victor has confounded the lake Pelso with the Volturnus marshes or as they are now called, the lake Sibatou. It is placed in the heart of Valeria, and its present extent is not less than 12 Hungarian miles (about 70 English) in length, and two in breadth. See Severini Pannonia, l. i. c. 9.

<sup>o</sup> Laetantius (de M. P. c. 33) and Eusebius (l. viii. c. 16) describe the symptoms and progress of his disorder with singular accuracy and apparent pleasure.

<sup>p</sup> If any (like the late Dr. Jorin, Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. ii. p. 307-356) still delight in recording the wonderful deaths of the persecutors, I would recommend to their perusal an admirable passage of Grotius, (Hist. l. vii. p. 332) concerning the last illness of Philip II. of Spain.

<sup>q</sup> See Eusebius, l. ix. c. 10. Laetantius de M. P. c. 36. Zosimus is less exact, and evidently confounds Maximian with Maximin.

<sup>r</sup> See the eighth Panegy. in which Eumenius displays in the presence of Constantine, the misery and the gratitude of the city of Autun.

the death of Maximian, the reign of Constantine in Gaul seems to have been the most innocent and even virtuous period of his life. The provinces were protected by his presence from the inroads of the barbarians, who either dreaded or experienced his active valour. After a signal victory over the Franks and Alemanni, several of their princes were exposed by his order to the wild beasts in the amphitheatre of Treves, and the people seem to have enjoyed the spectacle without discovering, in such a treatment of royal captives, any thing that was repugnant to the laws of nations or of humanity.*

Tyranny of Max-entius in Italy and Africa, A.D. 306-312. The virtues of Constantine were rendered more illustrious by the vices of Maxentius. Whilst the Gallic provinces enjoyed as much happiness as the condition of the times was capable of receiving, Italy and Africa groaned under the dominion of a tyrant, as contemptible as he was odious. The zeal of flattery and faction has indeed too frequently sacrificed the reputation of the vanquished to the glory of their successful rivals, but even those writers who have revealed, with the most freedom and pleasure, the faults of Constantine, unanimously confess, that Maxentius was cruel, rapacious, and profligate. He had the good fortune to suppress a slight rebellion in Africa. The governor and a few adherents had been guilty, the province suffered for their crime. The flourishing cities of Cirthea and Carthage, and the whole extent of that fertile country, were wasted by fire and sword. The abuse of victory was followed by the abuse of law and justice. A formidable army of sycophants and delators invaded Africa, the rich and the noble were easily convicted of a connexion with the rebels, and those among them who experienced the emperor's clemency, were only punished by the confiscation of their estates. So signal a victory was celebrated by a magnificent triumph, and Maxentius exposed to the eyes of the people the spoils and captives of a Roman province. The state of the capital was no less deserving of compassion than that of Africa. The wealth of Rome supplied an inexhaustible fund for his vain and prodigal expenses, and the ministers of his revenue were skilled in the arts of rapine. It was under his reign that the method of exacting a free gift from the senators was first invented, and as the sum was insensibly increased, the pretences of buying it, a victory, a birth, a marriage, or an imperial consulship, were proportionably multiplied. Maxentius had imbibed the same implacable aversion to the senate which had characterized most of the former tyrants of Rome nor was it possible for his ungrateful temper to forgive the generous fidelity which had raised him to the throne, and supported him against all his enemies. The lives of the senators were exposed to his jealous suspicions, the dishonour of their wives and daughters heightened the gratification of his sensual passions. It may be presumed, that an imperial lover was seldom reduced to sigh in vain, but whenever persuasion proved ineffectual, he had recourse to violence, and there remains one memorable example of a noble matron, who preserved her chastity by a voluntary death. The soldiers were the only order of men whom he appeared to respect, or studied to please. He filled Rome and Italy with armed troops, connived at their tumults, suffered them with impunity to plunder, and even to massacre, the defenceless people,<sup>2</sup> and indulging them in the same licentiousness which their emperor enjoyed, Maxentius often bestowed on his military favourites the splendid villa, or the beautiful wife, of a senator. A prince of such a character, alike incapable of governing either in peace or in war, might purchase the support, but he could never obtain the esteem, of the army. Yet his pride was equal to his other vices. Whilst he passed his indolent life, either within the walls of his palace, or in the neighbouring gardens of Sallust, he was repeatedly heard to declare, that he alone was emperor, and that the other princes were no more than his lieutenants, on whom he had devolved the defence of the frontier provinces, that he might enjoy without interruption the elegant luxury of the capital. Rome, which had so long regretted the absence, lamented, during the six years of his reign, the presence of her sovereign.<sup>3</sup>

Though Constantine might view the conduct of Maxentius with abhorrence, and the situation of the Romans with compassion, we have no reason to presume that he would have taken up arms to punish the one, or to relieve the other. But the tyrant of Italy rashly ventured to provoke a formidable enemy, whose ambition had been hitherto restrained by considerations of prudence, rather than by principles of justice.<sup>4</sup> After the death of Maximian, his titles, according to the established custom, had been erased, and his statues thrown down with ignominy. His son, who had persecuted and deserted him when alive, affected to display the most pious regard to his memory, and gave orders that a similar treatment should be immediately inflicted on all the statues that had been erected in Italy

* Entropius x. 3. Panegyric Victor vii. 10-12. A great number of the French youth were likewise exposed to the same cruel and ignominious death.

† Julian excludes Maxentius from the language of the Cæsars with abhorrence and contempt, and Zosimus (l. ii. p. 85) accuses him of every kind of cruelty and profligacy.

‡ Zosimus, l. ii. p. 83-85. Aurelius Victor. The passage of Aurelius Victor should be read in the following manner: Primis instituto pessimo munus specie, palres oratores que pecuniam conferre prodigii, sibi co, cret.

§ Panegyric Vet. ix. 3. Lucius Hist. Eccles. viii. 14 et in VII. Constant. i. 33, 34. Rufinus, c. 17. The virtuous matron, who stabled herself to escape the violence of Maxentius, was a christian, wife to the præfect of the city, and her name was Sophronia. It still remains a question among the casuists, Whether, on such occasions, suicide is justifiable?

‡ Prætorium cædem vul., quondam annueret, is the vague expression of Aurelius Victor. See more particular, though somewhat different, accounts of a tumult and massacre which happened at Rome, in Eusebius, (l. viii. c. 14) and in Zosimus (l. ii. p. 84).

§ See in the Panegyrics, (ix. 14) a lively description of the indolence and vain pride of Maxentius. In another place, the orator observes, that the riches which Rome had accumulated in a period of 1060 years were lavished by the tyrant on his mercenary bands redemptis ad civile lalrociniū manibus ingesserit.

¶ After the victory of Constantine, it was universally allowed, that and Africa to the honour of Constantine. That wise prince, who sincerely wished to decline a war, with the difficulty and importance of which he was sufficiently acquainted, at first dissembled the insult, and sought for redress by the milder expedients of negotiation, till he was convinced that the hostile and ambitious designs of the Italian emperor made it necessary for him to arm in his own defence. Maxentius, who openly avowed his pretensions to the whole monarchy of the west, had already prepared a very considerable force to invade the Gallie provinces on the side of Rhætia, and though he could not expect any assistance from Licinius, he was flattered with the hope that the legions of Illyricum, allured by his presents and promises, would desert the standard of that prince, and unanimously declare themselves his soldiers and subjects. Constantine no longer hesitated. He had deliberated with caution, he acted with vigour. He gave a private audience to the ambassadors, who, in the name of the senate and people, conjured him to deliver Rome from a detested tyrant, and, without regarding the timid remonstrances of his council, he resolved to prevent the enemy, and to carry the war into the heart of Italy.<sup>a</sup>

The enterprise was as full of danger as of glory, and the unsuccessful event of two former invasions was sufficient to inspire the most serious apprehensions. The veteran troops who revered the name of Maximian, had embraced in both those wars the party of his son, and were now restrained by a sense of honour, as well as of interest, from entertaining an idea of a second desertion. Maxentius, who considered the prætorian guards as the firmest defence of his throne, had increased them to their ancient establishment, and they composed, including the rest of the Italians who were enlisted into his service, a formidable body of fourscore thousand men. Forty thousand Moors and Carthaginians had been raised since the reduction of Africa. Even Sicily furnished its proportion of troops, and the armies of Maxentius amounted to one hundred and seventy thousand foot, and eighteen thousand horse. The wealth of Italy supplied the expenses of the war, and the adjacent provinces were exhausted, to form immense magazines of corn and every other kind of provisions.

The whole force of Constantine consisted of ninety thousand foot and eight thousand horse,<sup>a</sup>

the motive of delivering the republic from a detested tyrant, would, at any time, have justified his expedition into Italy. Euseb. in Vit. Constantini l. i. c. 26. Panegyric Vet. ix. 2.

<sup>a</sup> Zosimus, l. ii. p. 84, 85. Nazarius in Panegyric x. 7—13. See Panegyric Vet. ix. 2. Omnibus fere his comitibus et ducibus non solum tacite missantibus, sed etiam aperte inveniuntur contra consilia hominum contra haruspicium monitiones perirent liberandæ et urbis tempus venire sentientes. The embassy of the Romans is mentioned only by Zonaras, (l. xii.) and by Cædrenus (in Compend. Hist. p. 270.) But those modern Greeks had the opportunity of consulting many writers, which have since been lost, among which we may reckon the life of Constantine by Prætorius Photius (p. 63) has made a short extract from that historical work.

<sup>b</sup> Zosimus (l. ii. p. 86) has given us this curious account of the forces on both sides. He makes no mention of any naval armaments, though we are assured (Panegyric Vet. ix. 25) that the war was carried on by sea as well as by land, and that the fleet of Constantine took possession of Sardinia, Corsica, and the ports of Italy.

and as the defence of the Rhine required an extraordinary attention during the absence of the emperor, it was not in his power to employ above half his troops in the Italian expedition, unless he sacrificed the public safety to his private quarrel. At the head of about forty thousand soldiers he marched to encounter an enemy whose numbers were at least four times superior to his own. But the armies of Rome, placed at a secure distance from danger, were enervated by indulgence and luxury. Habituated to the baths and theatres of Rome, they took the field with reluctance, and were chiefly composed of veterans who had almost forgotten, or of new levies who had never acquired, the use of arms, and the practice of war. The hardy legions of Gaul had long defended the frontiers of the empire against the barbarians of the north, and in the performance of that laborious service, their valour was exercised, and their discipline confirmed. There appeared the same difference between the leaders as between the armies. Caprice or flattery had tempted Maxentius with the hopes of conquest, but these aspiring hopes soon gave way to the habits of pleasure and the consciousness of his inexperience. The intrepid mind of Constantine had been trained from his earliest youth to war, to action, and to military command.

When Hannibal marched from Gaul into Italy, he was obliged, first to discover, and then to open, a way over mountains and through savage nations, that had never yielded a passage to a regular army.<sup>a</sup> The Alps were then guarded by nature, they are now fortified by art. Citadels constructed with no less skill than labour and expense, command every avenue into the plain, and on that side render Italy almost inaccessible to the enemies of the king of Sardinia.<sup>b</sup> But in the course of the intermediate period, the generals, who have attempted the passage, have seldom experienced any difficulty or resistance. In the age of Constantine, the peasants of the mountains were civilized and obedient subjects, the country was plentifully stocked with provisions, and the stupendous highways, which the Romans had carried over the Alps, opened several communications between Gaul and Italy.<sup>c</sup> Constantine preferred the road of the Cottian Alps, or, as it is now called, of mount Cenis, and led his troops with such active diligence, that he descended into the plain of Piedmont before the court of Maxentius had received any certain intelligence of his departure from the banks of the Rhine. The city of Susa, however, which is situated at the foot of mount Cenis, was surrounded with walls, and provided with a garrison sufficiently numerous to check the progress of an invader, but the impatience of Constantine's troops disdained the tedious forms of a siege. The same day that they appeared before Susa, they applied fire to the gates, and ladders to the walls, and mounting to the assault amidst a shower of stones and arrows, they entered the place sword in hand, and cut in pieces the greatest part of the garrison. The flames were extinguished by the care of Constantine, and the remains of Susa preserved from total destruction. About forty miles from thence, a more severe

<sup>a</sup> Panegyric Vet. ix. 3. It is not surprising that the orator should diminish the numbers with which his sovereign achieved the conquest of Italy, but it appears somewhat singular that he should esteem the tyrant's army at no more than 100,000 men.

<sup>b</sup> The three principal passages of the Alps between Gaul and Italy, are those of mount St. Bernard, mount Cenis, and mount Genevre. Tradition and a resemblance of names, (Alpes Pennine), had assigned the first of these for the march of Hannibal (see Simler de Alpibus.) The Chevalier de Folard, (Polyb. tom. ii.) and M. d'Anville, have led him over mount Genevre. But notwithstanding the authority of an experienced officer and a learned geographer, the pretensions of mount Cenis are supported in a specious, not to say a convincing, manner by M. Greyet. Observations sur l'Italie tom. i. p. 40 &c.

<sup>c</sup> La Brunette near Susse, Demont, Lixles, Finesrelles, Com, &c. See Ammian. Marcellin. xv. 10. His description of the road over the Alps is clear, lively, and accurate.

Battle of Turin

contest awaited him. A numerous army of Italians was assembled under the lieutenants of Maxentius, in the plains of Turin. Its principal strength consisted in a species of heavy cavalry, which the Romans, since the decline of their discipline, had borrowed from the nations of the east. The horses, as well as the men, were clothed in complete armour, the joints of which were artfully adapted to the motions of their bodies. The aspect of this cavalry was formidable, their weight almost irresistible, and as, on this occasion, their generals had drawn them up in a compact column or wedge, with a sharp point, and with spreading flanks, they flattered themselves that they should easily break and trample down the army of Constantine. They might, perhaps, have succeeded in their design, had not their experienced adversary embraced the same method of defence, which in similar circumstances had been practised by Aurelian. The skilful evolutions of Constantine divided and baffled this massy column of cavalry. The troops of Maxentius fled in confusion towards Turin, and as the gates of the city were shut against them, very few escaped the sword of the victorious pursuers. By this important service, Turin deserved to experience the clemency and even favour of the conqueror. He made his entry into the imperial palace of Milan, and almost all the cities of Italy between the Alps and the Po not only acknowledged the power, but embraced with zeal the party, of Constantine.<sup>1</sup>

Siege and battle of Verona

From Milan to Rome, the Æmilian and Flaminian highways offered an easy march of about four hundred miles, but though Constantine was impatient to encounter the tyrant, he prudently directed his operations against another army of Italians, who, by their strength and position, might either oppose his progress, or in case of a misfortune, might intercept his retreat. Ruricius Pompeianus, a general distinguished by his valour and ability, had under his command the city of

Verona, and all the troops that were stationed in the province of Venetia. As soon as he was informed that Constantine was advancing towards him, he detached a large body of cavalry, which was defeated in an engagement near Brescia, and pursued by the Gallic legions as far as the gates of Verona. The necessity, the importance, and the difficulties of the siege of Verona, immediately presented themselves to the sagacious mind of Constantine.<sup>1</sup> The city was accessible only by a narrow peninsula towards the west, as the other three sides were surrounded by the Adige, a rapid river which covered the province of Venetia, from whence the besieged derived an inexhaustible supply of men and provisions. It was not without great difficulty, and after several fruitless attempts, that Constantine found means to pass the river at some distance above the city, and in a place where the torrent was less violent. He then encompassed Verona with strong lines, pushed his attacks with prudent vigour, and repelled a desperate sally of Pompeianus. That intrepid general, when he had used every means of defence that the strength of the place or that of the garrison could afford, secretly escaped from Verona, anxious not for his own but for the public safety. With indefatigable diligence he soon collected an army sufficient either to meet Constantine in the field, or to attack him if he obstinately remained within his lines. The emperor, attentive to the motions, and informed of the approach, of so formidable an enemy, left a part of his legions to continue the operations of the siege, whilst, at the head of those troops on whose valour and fidelity he more particularly depended, he advanced in person to engage the general of Maxentius. The army of Gaul was drawn up in two lines, according to the usual practice of war, but their experienced leader, perceiving that the numbers of the Italians far exceeded his own, suddenly changed his disposition, and, reducing the second, extended the front of his first line to a just proportion with that of the enemy. Such evolutions, which only veteran troops can execute without confusion in a moment of danger, commonly prove decisive. But as this engagement began towards the close of the day, and was contested with great obstinacy during the whole night, there was less room for the conduct of the generals than for the courage of the soldiers. The return of light displayed the victory of Constantine, and a field of carnage covered with many thousands of the vanquished Italians. Their general, Pompeianus, was found among the slain, Verona immediately surrendered at discretion, and the garrison was made prisoners of war.<sup>2</sup> When the officers of the victorious army congratulated their master on this important success, they ventured to add some respectful complaints, of such a nature, however,

<sup>1</sup> Zosimus as well as Eusebius hasten from the passage of the Alps to the decisive action near Rome. We must apply to the two Panegyrics, for the intermediate actions of Constantine.

<sup>2</sup> The Marquis Maffei has examined the siege and battle of Verona with that degree of attention and accuracy which was due to a memorable action that happened in his native country. The fortifications of that city, constructed by Gallienus, were less extensive than the modern walls, and the amphitheatre was not included within their circumference. See Verona Illustrata, part i. p. 142, 150.

<sup>3</sup> They wanted chains for so great a multitude of captives, and the whole council was at a loss, but the sagacious conqueror imagined the happy expedient of converting into fetters the swords of the vanquished Panegyri. Vol. ix. 11.

as the most jealous monarchs will listen to without displeasure. They represented to Constantine, that, not contented with performing all the duties of a commander, he had exposed his own person with an excess of valour which almost degenerated into rashness, and they conjured him for the future to pay more regard to the preservation of a life, in which the safety of Rome and of the empire was involved.<sup>a</sup>

While Constantine signalized his conduct and valour in the field, the sovereign of Italy appeared insensible of the calamities and danger of a civil war which raged in the heart of his dominions. Pleasure was still the only business of Maxentius. Concealing, or at least attempting to conceal, from the public knowledge the misfortunes of his arms,<sup>b</sup> he indulged himself in a vain confidence, which deferred the remedies of the approaching evil, without deferring the evil itself.<sup>c</sup> The rapid progress of Constantine<sup>d</sup> was scarcely sufficient to awaken him from this fatal security, he flattered himself, that his well-known liberality, and the majesty of the Roman name, which had already delivered him from two invasions, would dissipate with the same facility the rebellious army of Gaul. The officers of experience and ability, who had served under the banners of Maximian, were at length compelled to inform his effeminate son of the imminent danger to which he was reduced, and, with a freedom that at once surprised and convinced him, to urge the necessity of preventing his ruin, by a vigorous exertion of his remaining power. The resources of Maxentius, both of men and money, were still considerable. The prætorian guards felt how strongly their own interest and safety were connected with his cause, and a third army was soon collected, more numerous than those which had been lost in the battles of Turin and Verona. It was far from the intention of the emperor to lead his troops in person. A stranger to the exercises of war, he trembled at the apprehension of so dangerous a contest, and as fear is commonly superstitious, he listened with melancholy attention to the rumours of omens and presages which seemed to menace his life and empire. Shame at length supplied the place of courage, and forced him to take the field. He was unable to sustain the contempt of the Roman people. The circus resounded with their indignant clamours, and they tumultuously besieged the gates of the palace, reproaching the pusillanimity of their indolent sovereign, and celebrating the heroic spirit of Constantine.<sup>e</sup> Before Maxentius left Rome, he consulted the Sibylline books. The guardians of these ancient oracles were as well versed in the arts of this world as they were ignorant of the secrets of fate, and they returned him a very prudent answer, which might adapt itself to the event, and secure their reputation whatever should be the chance of arms.<sup>f</sup>

The celerity of Constantine's march has been compared to the rapid conquest of Italy by the first of the Cæsars, nor is the flattering parallel repugnant

Victory of Constantine near Rome, A. D. 312 28th Oct

to the truth of history, since no more than fifty-eight days elapsed between the surrender of Verona and the final decision of the war. Constantine had always apprehended that the tyrant would consult the dictates of fear, and perhaps of prudence, and that, instead of risking his last hopes in a general engagement, he would shut himself up within the walls of Rome. His ample magazines secured him against the danger of famine, and as the situation of Constantine admitted not of delay, he might have been reduced to the sad necessity of destroying with fire and sword the imperial city, the noblest reward of his victory, and the deliverance of which had been the motive, or rather indeed the pretence, of the civil war.<sup>g</sup> It was with equal surprise and pleasure, that on his arrival at a place called Saxa Rubra, about nine miles from Rome,<sup>h</sup> he discovered the army of Maxentius prepared to give him battle.<sup>i</sup> Their long front filled a very spacious plain, and their deep array reached to the banks of the Tyber, which covered their rear, and forbade their retreat. We are informed, and we may believe, that Constantine disposed his troops with consummate skill and that he chose for himself the post of honour and danger. Distinguished by the splendour of his arms, he charged in person the cavalry of his rival, and his irresistible attack determined the fortune of the day. The cavalry of Maxentius was principally composed either of unwieldy cuirassiers, or of light Moors and Numidians. They yielded to the vigour of the Gallic horse, which possessed more activity than the one, more firmness than the other. The defeat of the two wings left the infantry without any protection on its flanks, and the undisciplined Italians fled without reluctance from the standard of a tyrant whom they had always hated, and whom they no longer feared. The prætorians, conscious that their offences were beyond the reach of mercy, were animated by revenge and despair. Notwithstanding their repeated efforts, those brave veterans were unable to recover the victory they obtained, however, an honourable death, and it

<sup>a</sup> Panegyri Vet ix 10

<sup>b</sup> Literis calamitatum suarum indices suppresserat Panegyri Vet ix 15

<sup>c</sup> Remedia malorum potius quam mala differebat i.e. the fine censure which Tacitus presses on the supine indolence of Vitellius

<sup>d</sup> The Marquis Maffei has made it extremely probable that Constantine was still at Verona the 1st of September, A. D. 312, and that the memorable era of the indictions was dated from his conquest of the Cisalpine Gaul

<sup>e</sup> See Panegyri Vet xi 16. Laetantibus de M. P. c. 44

<sup>f</sup> Illo die hostem Romanorum esse peritum The vanquished prince became of course the enemy of Rome

<sup>g</sup> See Panegyri Vet ix 16 x 27 The former of these orators magnifies the hoards of corn which Maxentius had collected from Africa and the islands. And yet, if there is any truth in the scarcity mentioned by Eusebius, (in Vit Constantini l. i c. 36) the imperial granaries must have been open only to the soldiers

<sup>h</sup> Maxentius tandem urbe in Saxa Rubra, milia ferme novem re-errantem progressus Aurelius Victor See Cellarius Geographi Antiqui tom. i p. 463 Saxa Rubra was in the neighbourhood of the Cremera a trifling rivulet illustrated by the valour and glorious death of the three hundred Fabii was observed that their bodies covered the same ground which had been occupied by their ranks.<sup>a</sup> The confusion then became general, and the dismayed troops of Maxentius, pursued by an implacable enemy, rushed by thousands into the deep and rapid stream of the Tyber. The emperor himself attempted to escape back into the city over the Milvian bridge, but the crowds which pressed together through that narrow passage, forced him into the river, where he was immediately drowned by the weight of his armour.<sup>b</sup> His body, which had sunk very deep into the mud, was found with some difficulty the next day. The sight of his head, when it was exposed to the eyes of the people, convinced them of their deliverance, and admonished them to receive with acclamations of loyalty and gratitude, the fortunate Constantine, who thus achieved by his valour and ability the most splendid enterprise of his life.<sup>c</sup>

<sup>i</sup> The post which Maxentius had taken with the Tyber in his rear, is very clearly described by the two Panegyristæ, ix 16 x. 28

In the use of victory, Constantine <sup>His reception,</sup> neither deserved the praise of clemency, nor incurred the censure of immoderate rigour.<sup>b</sup> He inflicted the same treatment, to which a defeat would have exposed his own person and family, put to death the two sons of the tyrant, and carefully extirpated his whole race. The most distinguished adherents of Maxentius must have expected to share his fate, as they had shared his prosperity and his crimes, but when the Roman people loudly demanded a greater number of victims, the conqueror resisted, with firmness and humanity, those servile clamours, which were dictated by flattery as well as by resentment. Informers were punished and discouraged, the innocent, who had suffered under the late tyranny, were recalled from exile, and restored to their estates. A general act of oblivion quieted the minds and settled the property of the people, both in Italy and in Africa.<sup>c</sup> The first time that Constantine honoured the senate with his presence, he recapitulated his own services and exploits in a modest oration, assured that illustrious order of his sincere regard, and promised to re-establish its ancient dignity and privileges. The grateful senate repaid these unmeaning professions by the empty titles of honour, which it was yet in their power to bestow, and without presuming to ratify the authority of Constantine, they passed a decree to assign him the first rank among the three Augusti, who governed the Roman world.<sup>d</sup> Games and festivals were instituted to preserve the fame

<sup>a</sup> Excepit litrocinu illius primis auctoribus qui, desperata venia, locum quem pugnae sumperant texere corporibus Panegy. Vet. ix. 17.
<sup>b</sup> A very idle rumour soon prevailed, that Maxentius, who had not taken any precaution for his own retreat, had contrived a very artful snare to destroy the army of the pursuers, but that the wooden bridge which was to have been loosened on the approach of Constantine, unluckily broke down under the weight of the flying Italians. M. de Tillemont (Hist. des Empereurs, tom. ii. part. i. p. 576) very seriously examines whether, in contradiction to common sense, the testimony of Eusebius and Zosimus ought to prevail over the silence of Lactantius, Nazarius and the anonymous but contemporary orator, who composed the ninth Panegyric.
<sup>c</sup> Zosimus, l. ii. p. 86—88, and the two Panegyrics, the former of which was pronounced a few months afterwards afford the clearest notion of this great battle. Lactantius, Eusebius, and even the Epitomes, supply several useful hints.

<sup>d</sup> Zosimus the enemy of Constantine, allows (l. ii. p. 88.) that only a few of the friends of Maxentius were put to death, but we may remark the expressive passage of Nazarius, (Panegy. Vet. x. 6.) Omnibus qui of his victory, and several edifices, raised at the expense of Maxentius, were dedicated to the honour of his successful rival. The triumphal arch of Constantine still remains a melancholy proof of the decline of the arts, and a singular testimony of the meanest vanity. As it was not possible to find in the capital of the empire a sculptor who was capable of adorning that public monument, the arch of Trajan, without any respect either for his memory or for the rules of propriety, was stripped of its most elegant figures. The difference of times and persons, of actions and characters, was totally disregarded. The Parthian captives appear prostrate at the feet of a prince who never carried his arms beyond the Euphrates, and curious antiquarians can still discover the head of Trajan on the trophies of Constantine. The new ornaments which it was necessary to introduce between the vacancies of ancient sculpture, are executed in the rudest and most unskilful manner.<sup>e</sup>

The final abolition of the prætorian <sup>and conducted at Rome</sup> guards was a measure of prudence as well as of revenge. Those haughty troops, whose numbers and privileges had been restored, and even augmented, by Maxentius, were for ever suppressed by Constantine. Their fortified camp was destroyed, and the few prætorians who had escaped the fury of the sword, were dispersed among the legions, and banished to the frontiers of the empire, where they might be serviceable without again becoming dangerous.<sup>f</sup> By suppressing the troops which were usually stationed in Rome, Constantine gave the fatal blow to the dignity of the senate and people, and the disarmed capital was exposed without protection to the insults or neglect of its distant master. We may observe, that in this last effort to preserve their expiring freedom, the Romans, from the apprehension of a tribute, had raised Maxentius to the throne. He exacted that tribute from the senate under the name of a free gift. They implored the assistance of Constantine. He vanquished the tyrant, and converted the free gift into a perpetual tax. The senators, according to the declaration which was required of their property, were divided into several classes. The most opulent paid annually eight pounds of gold, the next class paid four, the last two, and those whose poverty might have claimed an exemption, were assessed however at seven pieces of gold. Besides the regular members of the senate, their sons, their descendants, and even liberæ etati statum ejus poterant eum stirpe deletis. The other orator (Panegy. Vet. ix. 20, 21) contents himself with observing, that Constantine, when he entered Rome, did not imitate the cruel massacres of Cinna of Marius or of Sylla.

<sup>e</sup> See the two Panegyrics, and the laws of this and the ensuing year, in the Theodosian Code.

<sup>d</sup> Panegy. Vet. ix. 20. Lactantius de M. P. c. 44. Maximin, who was confessedly the eldest Cæsar, claimed, with some show of reason, the first rank among the Augusti.

<sup>e</sup> Adhuc cuncta opera quæ magnifice construxerat, urbis finem, atque basilicam, Flavii meritis patres æservare. Aurelius Victor. With regard to the theft of Trajan's trophies, consult Th. Mommsen's Vita, apud Mommsen, Diarium Italicum, p. 250 and Antiquit. Explicque of the title, tom. ii. p. 171.

<sup>f</sup> Prætoriarum legionum ac subsidia factionibus optiora quam urbi Romæ, sublatâ penitus simul arma atque usus indumenti militaris. Aurelius Victor. Zosimus (l. ii. p. 89) mentions this fact as an historian, and it is very pompously celebrated in the ninth Panegyric.

their relations, enjoyed the vain privileges, and supported the heavy burthens, of the senatorial order, nor will it longer excite our surprise, that Constantine should be attentive to increase the number of persons who were included under so useful a description<sup>g</sup>. After the defeat of Maxentius, the victorious emperor passed no more than two or three months in Rome, which he visited twice during the remainder of his life, to celebrate the solemn festivals of the tenth and of the twentieth years of his reign. Constantine was almost perpetually in motion to exercise the legions, or to inspect the state of the provinces. Treves, Milan, Aquilcia, Sirmium, Naissus, and Thessalonica, were the occasional places of his residence, till he founded a NEW ROME on the confines of Europe and Asia<sup>h</sup>.

His alliance with Licinius
A. D. 313
March Before Constantine marched into Italy, he had secured the friendship, or at least the neutrality, of Licinius, the Illyrian emperor. He had promised his sister Constantia in marriage to that prince, but the celebration of the nuptials was deferred till after the conclusion of the war, and the interview of the two conquerors at Milan, which was appointed for that purpose, appeared to cement the union of their families and interests<sup>i</sup>. In the midst of the public festivity they were suddenly obliged to take leave of each other. An inroad of the Franks summoned Constantine to the Rhine, and the hostile approach of the sovereign of Asia demanded the immediate

War between Maximin and Licinius
A. D. 313 presence of Licinius. Maximin had been the secret ally of Maxentius, and without being discouraged by his fate, he resolved to try the fortune of a civil war. He moved out of Syria, towards the frontiers of Bithynia, in the depth of winter. The season was severe and tempestuous, great numbers of men as well as horses perished in the snow, and as the roads were broken up by incessant rains, he was obliged to leave behind him a considerable part of the heavy baggage, which was unable to follow the rapidity of his forced marches. By this extraordinary effort of diligence, he arrived, with a harassed but formidable army, on the banks of the Thracian Bosphorus, before the lieutenants of Licinius were apprised of his hostile intentions. Byzantium surrendered to the power of Maximin, after a siege of eleven days. He was detained some days under the walls of Heraclea, and he had no sooner taken possession of that city, than he was alarmed by the intelligence, that Licinius had pitched his camp at the distance of only eighteen miles. After a fruit-

The defeat,
April 30 less negotiation, in which the two princes attempted to seduce the fidelity of each other's adherents, they had recourse to arms. The emperor of the east commanded a disciplined and veteran army of above seventy thousand men, and Licinius, who had collected about thirty thousand Illyrians, was at first oppressed by the superiority of numbers. His military skill, and the firmness of his troops, restored the day, and obtained a decisive victory. The incredible speed which Maximin exerted in his flight, is much more celebrated than his prowess in the battle. Twenty-four hours afterwards he was seen pale, trembling, and without his imperial ornaments, at Nicomedia, one hundred and sixty miles from the place of his defeat. The wealth of Asia was yet unexhausted, and though the flower of his veterans had fallen in the late action, he had still power, if he could obtain time, to draw very numerous levies from Syria and Egypt. But he survived his misfortunes and death of the former, August only three or four months. His death, which happened at Tarsus, was variously ascribed to despair, to poison, and to the divine justice. As Maximin was alike destitute of abilities and of virtue, he was lamented neither by the people nor by the soldiers. The provinces of the east, delivered from the terrors of civil war, cheerfully acknowledged the authority of Licinius<sup>k</sup>.

The vanquished emperor left behind Cruelty of J 161
him. him two children, a boy of about eight, and a girl of about seven, years old. Their inoffensive age might have excited compassion, but the compassion of Licinius was a very feeble resource, nor did it restrain him from extinguishing the name and memory of his adversary. The death of Severianus will admit of less excuse, as it was dictated neither by revenge nor by policy. The conqueror had never received any injury from the father of that unhappy youth, and the short and obscure reign of Severus, in a distant part of the empire, was already forgotten. But the execution of Candidianus was an act of the blackest cruelty and ingratitude. He was the natural son of Galerius, the friend and benefactor of Licinius. The prudent father had judged him too young to sustain the weight of a diadem, but he hoped that, under the protection of princes who were indebted to his favour for the imperial purple, Candidianus might pass a secure and honourable life. He was now advancing towards the twentieth year of his age, and the royalty of his birth, though unsupported either by merit or ambition, was sufficient to exasperate the jealous mind of Licinius<sup>l</sup>. To these innocent and illustrious victims of his tyranny, we must add the wife and daughter of the emperor Diocletian. When that prince conferred on Gale-

Constantine had been betrothed to Licinius. According to the younger Victor, Diocletian was invited to the nuptials, but having ventured to plead his age and infirmities, he received a second letter filled with reproaches for his supposed partiality to the cause of Maxentius and Maximin.

<sup>k</sup> Zosimus mentions the defeat and death of Maximin as ordinary events, but Laetantius expatiates on them (de M. P. c. 45-50) ascribing them to the miraculous interposition of heaven. Licinius at that time was one of the protectors of the church.

<sup>l</sup> Laetantius de M. P. c. 50. Aurelius Victor touches on the different conduct of Licinius, and of Constantine, in the use of victory.

<sup>g</sup> Ex omnibus provinciis optimates viros eique tunc pignaveris, ut senatus dignitas ex totius orbis flore consisteret. Nazarius in Paneg. yr. Vet. x. 35. The word pignaveris might almost seem maliciously chosen. Concerning the senatorial list, see Zosimus, l. ii. p. 115 the second title of the sixth book of the Theodosian Code, with Codefroy's Commentary, and Memoires de l'Academie des Inscriptions tom. xxviii. p. 726.

<sup>h</sup> From the Theodosian Code we may now begin to trace the motions of the emperors but the dates both of time and place have frequently been altered by the carelessness of transcribers.

<sup>i</sup> Zosimus (l. ii. p. 89) observes, that before the war the sister of

rius the title of Cæsar, he had given him in marriage his daughter Valeria, whose melancholy adventures might furnish a very singular subject for tragedy. She had fulfilled and

Unfortunate fate of the empress Valeria and her mother

even surpassed the duties of a wife. As she had not any children herself, she condescended to adopt the illegitimate son of her husband, and invariably displayed towards the unhappy Candidianus the tenderness and anxiety of a real mother. After the death of Galerius, her ample possessions provoked the avarice, and her personal attractions excited the desires, of his successor Maximin<sup>m</sup>. He had a wife still alive, but divorce was permitted by the Roman law, and the fierce passions of the tyrant demanded an immediate gratification. The answer of Valeria was such as became the daughter and widow of emperors, but it was tempered by the prudence which her defenceless condition compelled her to observe. She represented to the persons whom Maximin had employed on this occasion, "that even if honour could permit a woman of her character and dignity to entertain a thought of second nuptials, decency at least must forbid her to listen to his addresses at a time when the ashes of her husband and his benefactor were still warm, and while the sorrows of her mind were still expressed by her mourning garments. She ventured to declare, that she could place very little confidence in the professions of a man, whose cruel inconstancy was capable of repudiating a faithful and affectionate wife."<sup>a</sup> On this repulse, the love of Maximin was converted into fury, and as witnesses and judges were always at his disposal, it was easy for him to cover his fury with an appearance of legal proceedings, and to assault the reputation as well as the happiness of Valeria. Her estates were confiscated, her eunuchs and domestics devoted to the most inhuman tortures, and several innocent and respectable matrons, who were honoured with her friendship, suffered death, on a false accusation of adultery. The empress herself, together with her mother Prisca, was condemned to exile, and as they were ignominiously hurried from place to place before they were confined to a sequestered village in the deserts of Syria, they exposed their shame and distress to the provinces of the east, which, during thirty years, had respected their august dignity. Diocletian made several ineffectual efforts to alleviate the misfortunes of his daughter, and, as the last return that he expected for the imperial purple, which he had conferred upon Maximin, he entreated that Valeria might be permitted to share his retirement of Salona, and to close the eyes of her afflicted father<sup>o</sup>. He entreated, but as he could no longer threaten, his prayers were received with coldness and disdain, and the pride of Maximin was gratified, in treating Diocletian as a suppliant, and his daughter as a criminal. The death of Maximin seemed to assure the empresses of a favourable alteration to their fortune. The public disorders relaxed the vigilance of their guard, and they easily found means to escape from the place of their exile, and to repair, though with some precaution, and in disguise, to the court of Licinius. His behaviour, in the first days of his reign, and the honourable reception which he gave to young Candidianus, inspired Valeria with a secret satisfaction, both on her own account, and on that of her adopted son. But these grateful prospects were soon succeeded by horror and astonishment, and the bloody executions which stained the palace of Nicomedia, sufficiently convinced her, that the throne of Maximin was filled by a tyrant more inhuman than himself. Valeria consulted her safety by a hasty flight, and, still accompanied by her mother Prisca, they wandered above fifteen months<sup>p</sup> through the provinces, concealed in the disguise of plebeian habits. They were at length discovered at Thessalonica, and as the sentence of their death was already pronounced, they were immediately beheaded, and their bodies thrown into the sea. The people gazed on the melancholy spectacle, but their grief and indignation were suppressed by the terrors of a military guard. Such was the unworthy fate of the wife and daughter of Diocletian. We lament their misfortunes, we cannot discover their crimes, and whatever idea we may justly entertain of the cruelty of Licinius, it remains a matter of surprise, that he was not contented with some more secret and decent method of revenge<sup>q</sup>.

The Roman world was now divided Quarrel between Constantine and Licinius, A D 314 between Constantine and Licinius, the former of whom was master of the west, and the latter of the east. It might perhaps have been expected that the conquerors, fatigued with civil war, and connected by a private as well as public alliance, would have renounced, or at least would have suspended, any further designs of ambition. And yet a year had scarcely elapsed after the death of Maximin, before the victorious emperors turned their arms against each other. The genius, the success, and the aspiring temper of Constantine, may seem to mark him out as the aggressor, but the perfidious character of Licinius justifies the most unfavourable suspicions, and by the faint light

<sup>m</sup> The sensual appetites of Maximin were gratified at the expense of his subjects. His eunuchs, who forced away wives and virgins, examined their naked charms with anxious curiosity, lest any part of their body should be found unworthy of the royal embraces. Covetous and disdain were considered as treason, and the obstinate fair one was condemned to be drowned. A custom was gradually introduced that no person should marry a wife without the permission of the emperor, "ut ipse in omnibus nuptiis præiudicator esset." Lactantius de M P c 38.

<sup>n</sup> Lactantius de M P c 39.

<sup>o</sup> Diocletian at last sent cognatum suum quendam militem ne potentem virum, to intercede in favour of his daughter (Lactantius de M

P c 41) We are not sufficiently acquainted with the history of these times, to point out the person who was employed.

<sup>p</sup> Valeria quoque per varias provincias quindecim mensibus plebeio cultu pervagata. Lactantius de M P c 51. There is some doubt whether we should compute the fifteen months from the moment of her exile, or from that of her escape. The expression of pervagata seems to denote the latter, but in that case we must suppose that the treatise of Lactantius was written after the first civil war between Licinius and Constantine. See Cuper, p 254.

<sup>q</sup> Ita illis pudicitia et conditio exitio fuit. Lactantius de M P c 51. He relates the misfortunes of the innocent wife and daughter of Diocletian with a very natural mixture of pity and exultation.

which history reflects on this transaction,* we may discover a conspiracy fomented by his arts against the authority of his colleague. Constantine had lately given his sister Anastasia in marriage to Bassianus, a man of a considerable family and fortune, and had elevated his new kinsman to the rank of Cæsar. According to the system of government instituted by Diocletian, Italy, and perhaps Africa, were designed for his departments in the empire. But the performance of the promised favour was either attended with so much delay, or accompanied with so many unequal conditions, that the fidelity of Bassianus was alienated rather than secured by the honourable distinction which he had obtained. His nomination had been ratified by the consent of Licinius, and that artful prince, by the means of his emissaries, soon contrived to enter into a secret and dangerous correspondence with the new Cæsar, to irritate his discontents, and to urge him to the rash enterprise of extorting by violence what he might in vain solicit from the justice of Constantine. But the vigilant emperor discovered the conspiracy before it was ripe for execution, and, after solemnly renouncing the alliance of Bassianus, despoiled him of the purple, and inflicted the deserved punishment on his treason and ingratitude. The haughty refusal of Licinius, when he was required to deliver up the criminals, who had taken refuge in his dominions, confirmed the suspicions already entertained of his perfidy, and the indignities offered at Æmona, on the frontiers of Italy, to the statues of Constantine, became the signal of discord between the two princes.

First civil war between them

The first battle was fought near Cibalis, a city of Pannonia, situated on the river Save, about fifty miles from Sirmium.

Battle of Cibalis
A. D. 315
8th Oct.

From the inconsiderable forces which in this important contest two such powerful monarchs brought into the field, it may be inferred, that the one was suddenly provoked, and that the other was unexpectedly surprised. The emperor of the west had only twenty thousand, and the sovereign of the east no more than five and thirty thousand, men. The inferiority of number was, however, compensated by the advantage of the ground. Constantine had taken post in a defile about half a mile in breadth, between a steep hill and a deep morass, and in that situation he steadily expected and repulsed the first attack of the enemy. He pursued his success, and advanced into the plain. But the veteran legions of Illyricum rallied under the standard of a leader who had been trained to arms in the school of Probus and Diocletian. The missile weapons on both sides were soon exhausted, the two armies, with equal valour, rushed to a closer engagement of swords and spears, and the doubtful contest had already lasted from the dawn of the day to a late hour of the evening, when the right wing, which Constantine led in person, made a vigorous and decisive charge. The judicious retreat of Licinius saved the remainder of his troops from a total defeat, but when he computed his loss, which amounted to more than twenty thousand men, he thought it unsafe to pass the night in the presence of an active and vigorous enemy. Abandoning his camp and magazines, he marched away with secrecy and diligence at the head of the greatest part of his cavalry, and was soon removed beyond the danger of a pursuit. His diligence preserved his wife, his son, and his treasures, which he had deposited at Sirmium. Licinius passed through that city, and breaking down the bridge on the Save hastened to collect a new army in Dacia and Thrace. In his flight he bestowed the precarious title of Cæsar on Valens, his general of the Illyrian frontier.

The plain of Mardia in Thrace was the theatre of a second battle no less

Battle of Mardia.

obstinate and bloody than the former. The troops on both sides displayed the same valour and discipline, and the victory was once more decided by the superior abilities of Constantine, who directed a body of five thousand men to gain an advantageous height, from whence, during the heat of the action, they attacked the rear of the enemy, and made a very considerable slaughter. The troops of Licinius, however, presenting a double front, still maintained their ground, till the approach of night put an end to the combat, and secured their retreat towards the mountains of Macedonia. The loss of two battles, and of his bravest veterans, reduced the fierce spirit of Licinius to sue for peace. His ambassador Mistrianus was admitted to the audience of Constantine, he expatiated on the common topics of moderation and humanity, which are so familiar to the eloquence of the vanquished, represented, in the most insinuating language, that the event of the war was still doubtful, whilst its inevitable calamities were alike pernicious to both the contending parties, and declared, that he was authorized to propose a lasting and honourable peace in the name of the two emperors his masters. Constantine received the mention of Valens with indignation and contempt. "It was not for such a purpose," he sternly replied, "that we have advanced from the shores of the western ocean in an uninterrupted course of combats and victories, that, after rejecting an ungrateful kinsman, we should of Illyricum and about one hundred from Taurunum, or Belgæde, and the conflux of the Danube and the Save. The Roman garrisons and cities on the rivers are finely illustrated by M. d'Anville, in a memoir inserted in l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xxviii.

* Zosimus, (l. ii. p. 90, 91) gives a very particular account of this battle, but the descriptions of Zosimus are rhetorical rather than military.

† Zosimus, l. ii. p. 92, 93. Anonym. Valesian, p. 713. The Epitomes furnish some circumstances, but they frequently confound the two wars between Licinius and Constantine.

* The curious reader, who consults the Valesian Fragment p. 713 will perhaps accuse me of giving a bold and licentious paraphrase. But if he considers it with attention, he will acknowledge that my interpretation is probable and consistent.

† The situation of Æmona, or, as it is now called Laybach in Carinthia, (D'Anville Géographie Ancienne tom. i. p. 187) may suggest a conjecture. As it lay to the north east of the Julian Alps, that important territory became a natural object of dispute between the sovereigns of Italy and of Illyricum.

‡ Cibalis or Cibale (whose name is still preserved in the obscure ruins of Swiler) was situated about fifty miles from Sirmium, the capital accept for our colleague a contemptible slave The abdication of Valens is the first article of the treaty<sup>1</sup> It was necessary to accept this humiliating condition, and the unhappy Valens, after a reign of a few days, was deprived of the purple and of his life As soon as this obstacle was removed, the tranquillity of the Roman world was easily restored The successive defeats of Licinius had ruined his forces, but they had displayed his courage and abilities His situation was almost desperate, but the efforts of despair are sometimes formidable, and the good sense of Constantine preferred a great and certain advantage to a third trial of the chance of arms He consented to leave his rival, or, as he again styled Licinius, his friend and brother, in the possession of Thrace, Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt, but the provinces of Pannonia, Dalmatia, Dacia, Macedonia, and Greece, were yielded to the western empire, and the dominions of Constantine now extended from the confines of Caledonia to the extremity of Peloponnesus It was stipulated by the same treaty, that three royal youths, the sons of the emperors, should be called to the hopes of the succession Crispus and the young Constantine were soon afterwards declared Cæsars in the west, while the younger Licinius was invested with the same dignity in the east In this double proportion of honours, the conqueror asserted the superiority of his arms and power<sup>2</sup>

The reconciliation of Constantine and Licinius, though it was imbibited by resentment and jealousy, by the remembrance of recent injuries, and by the apprehension of future dangers, maintained, however, above eight years, the tranquillity of the Roman world As a very regular series of the imperial laws commences about this period, it would not be difficult to transcribe the civil regulations which employed the leisure of Constantine But the most important of his institutions are intimately connected with the new system of policy and religion, which was not perfectly established till the last and peaceful years of his reign There are many of his laws, which, as far as they concern the rights and property of individuals, and the practice of the bar, are more properly referred to the private than to the public jurisprudence of the empire, and he published many edicts of so local and temporary a nature, that they would ill deserve the notice of a general history Two laws, however, may be selected from the crowd, the one for its importance, the other for its singularity, the former for its remarkable benevolence, the latter

General peace and laws of Constantine
A D 315-323.

<sup>1</sup> Petrus Patricius in Excerpt Legal. p 27 If it should be thought that γαμφορ signifies more properly a son in law we might conjecture, that Constantine assuming the name as well as the duties of a father, had adopted his younger brothers and sisters the children of Theodora But in the best authors γαμφορ sometimes signifies a husband sometimes a father in law, and sometimes a kinsman in general See Spanheim Observat. ad Julian. Oral. l. p 72.
<sup>2</sup> Zorimur, l. ii p 93 Anonym. Valesian p 713 Eutropius τ. v. Aurelius Victor Putsch in Chron. Sozomen, l. i c 2. Four of these writers affirm that the promotion of the Cæsars was an article of the treaty It is however certain, that the younger Constantine and for its excessive severity 1 The horrid practice, so familiar to the ancients, of exposing or murdering their new-born infants, was become every day more frequent in the provinces, and especially in Italy It was the effect of distress, and the distress was principally occasioned by the intolerable burthen of taxes, and by the vexatious as well as cruel prosecutions of the officers of the revenue against their insolvent debtors The less opulent or less industrious part of mankind, instead of rejoicing in an increase of family, deemed it an act of paternal tenderness to release their children from the impending miseries of a life which they themselves were unable to support The humanity of Constantine, moved, perhaps, by some recent and extraordinary instances of despair, engaged him to address an edict to all the cities of Italy, and afterwards of Africa, directing immediate and sufficient relief to be given to those parents who should produce before the magistrates the children whom their own poverty would not allow them to educate But the promise was too liberal, and the provision too vague, to effect any general or permanent benefit<sup>a</sup> The law, though it may merit some praise, served rather to display than to alleviate the public distress It still remains an authentic monument to contradict and confound those venal orators, who were too well satisfied with their own situation to discover either vice or misery under the government of a generous sovereign<sup>b</sup> 2 The laws of Constantine against rapes were dictated with very little indulgence for the most amiable weaknesses of human nature, since the description of that crime was applied not only to the brutal violence which compelled, but even to the gentle seduction which might persuade, an unmarried woman, under the age of twenty-five, to leave the house of her parents "The successful ravisher was punished with death, and as if simple death was inadequate to the enormity of his guilt, he was either burnt alive, or torn in pieces by wild beasts in the amphitheatre The virgin's declaration, that she had been carried away with her own consent, instead of saving her lover, exposed her to share his fate The duty of a public prosecution was intrusted to the parents of the guilty or unfortunate maid, and if the sentiments of nature prevailed on them to dissemble the injury, and to repair by a subsequent marriage the honour of their family, they were themselves punished by exile and confiscation The slaves, whether male or female, who were convicted of having been accessory to the rape or seduction, were burnt alive, or put to death by the ingenious torture of pouring down their throats

Licinius were not yet born and it is highly probable that the promotion was made the 1st of March, A D 317 The treaty had probably stipulated that the two Cæsars might be created by the western, and one only by the eastern emperor, but each of them reserved to himself the choice of the person<sup>a</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Codex Theodosian l. xi tit 27 tom iv p 188 with Godefroy's Observations See likewise l. i tit 7-8

<sup>b</sup> Omnia foris placita, domi prospera, annonæ ubertate fructuum copia &c Panegyric Vet x 38 This oration of Nazarius was pronounced on the day of the Quinquennalia of the Cæsars, the 1st of March, A D 321

a quantity of melted lead. As the crime was of a public kind, the accusation was permitted even to strangers. The commencement of the action was not limited to any term of years, and the consequences of the sentence were extended to the innocent offspring of such an irregular union. But whenever the offence inspires less horror than the punishment, the rigour of penal law is obliged to give way to the common feelings of mankind. The most odious parts of this edict were softened or repealed in the subsequent reigns,<sup>d</sup> and even Constantine himself very frequently alleviated, by partial acts of mercy, the stern temper of his general institutions. Such, indeed, was the singular humour of that emperor, who showed himself as indulgent, and even remiss, in the execution of his laws, as he was severe, and even cruel, in the enacting of them. It is scarcely possible to observe a more decisive symptom of weakness, either in the character of the prince, or in the constitution of the government.<sup>e</sup>

The Gothic war,
A D 322

The civil administration was sometimes interrupted by the military defence of the empire. Crispus, a youth of the most amiable character, who had received with the title of Cæsar the command of the Rhine, distinguished his conduct, as well as valour, in several victories over the Franks and Alemanni, and taught the barbarians of that frontier to dread the eldest son of Constantine, and the grandson of Constantius.<sup>f</sup> The emperor himself had assumed the more difficult and important province of the Danube. The Goths, who in the time of Claudius and Aurelian had felt the weight of the Roman arms, respected the power of the empire, even in the midst of its intestine divisions. But the strength of that warlike nation was now restored by a peace of near fifty years, a new generation had arisen, who no longer remembered the misfortunes of ancient days. The Sarmatians of the lake Mæotis followed the Gothic standard either as subjects or as allies, and their united force was poured upon the countries of Illyricum, Campona, Margus and Bononia, appear to have been the scenes of several memorable sieges and battles,<sup>g</sup> and though Constantine encountered a very obstinate resistance, he prevailed at length in the contest, and the Goths were compelled to purchase an ignominious retreat, by restoring the booty and prisoners which they had taken. Nor was this advantage sufficient to satisfy the indignation of the emperor. He resolved to chastise as well as to repulse the insolent barbarians who had dared to invade the territories of Rome. At the head of his legions he passed the Danube, after repairing the bridge which had been constructed by Trajan, penetrated into the strongest recesses of Dacia,<sup>h</sup> and when he had inflicted a severe revenge, condescended to give peace to the suppliant Goths, on condition that, as often as they were required, they should supply his armies with a body of forty thousand soldiers.<sup>i</sup> Exploits like these were no doubt honourable to Constantine, and beneficial to the state, but it may surely be questioned, whether they can justify the exaggerated assertion of Eusebius, that all Scythia, as far as the extremity of the north, divided as it was into so many names and nations of the most various and savage manners, had been added by his victorious arms to the Roman empire.<sup>k</sup>

In this exalted state of glory it was impossible that Constantine should any longer endure a partner in the empire. Confiding in the superiority of his genius and military power, he determined, without any previous injury, to exert them for the destruction of Licinius, whose advanced age and unpopular vices seemed to offer a very easy conquest.<sup>l</sup> But the old emperor, awakened by the approaching danger, deceived the expectations of his friends, as well as of his enemies. Calling forth that spirit and those abilities by which he had deserved the friendship of Galerius and the imperial purple, he prepared himself for the contest, collected the forces of the east, and soon filled the plains of Hadrianople with his troops, and the straits of the Hellespont with his fleet. The army consisted of one hundred and fifty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse, and as the cavalry was drawn, for the most part, from Phrygia and Cappadocia, we may conceive a more favourable opinion of the beauty of the horses, than of the courage and dexterity of their riders. The fleet was composed of three hundred and fifty galleys of three ranks of oars. An hundred and thirty of these were furnished by Egypt, and the adjacent coast of Africa. An hundred and ten sailed from the ports of Phœnicia and the isle of Cyprus, and the maritime countries of Bithynia, Ionia, and Caria, were likewise obliged to provide an hundred and ten galleys. The troops of Constantine were ordered to rendezvous at Thessalonica, they amounted to above an hundred and twenty thousand horse and foot.<sup>m</sup> Their emperor was satisfied with

Second civil war between Constantine and Licinius
A D 323

<sup>e</sup> See the edict of Constantine addressed to the Roman people, in the Theodosian Code l. ix. tit. 24. tom. iii. p. 189.

<sup>d</sup> His son very fairly assigns the true reason of the repeal, "Ne sub specie atrocioris judicii aliqui in ulciscendo crimine dilatio nasceretur." Cod. Theod. tom. iii. p. 193.

<sup>e</sup> Eusebius (in Vita Constant. l. iii. c. 1.) chooses to affirm that in the reign of this hero the sword of justice hung idle in the hands of the magistrates. Lusebiniolum. self (l. ii. c. 29, 54.) and the Theodosian Code will inform us that this excessive lenity was not owing to the want either of atrocious criminals or of penal laws.

<sup>f</sup> Nazarius in Panegyric Vet. x. The victory of Crispus over the Alemanni is expressed on some medals.

<sup>g</sup> See Zosimus l. ii. p. 93, 94. (though the narrative of that historian is neither clear nor consistent. The Panegyric of Opatianus (c. 23.) mentions the alliance of the Sarmatians with the Carpi and Getæ, and points out the several fields of battle. It is supposed that the Sarmatian games celebrated in the month of November, derived their origin from the success of this war.

<sup>h</sup> In the Cæsars of Julian, (p. 329. Commentaire de Spanheim, p. 252.) Constantine boasts that he had recovered the province (Dacia) which Trajan had subdued. But it is insinuated by Silius that the conquests of Constantine were like the gardens of Adonis, which fade and wither almost the moment they appear.

<sup>i</sup> Jornandes de Rebus Geticis, c. 21. I know not whether we may entirely depend on his authority. Such an alliance has a very recent air, and scarcely is suited to the maxims of the beginning of the fourth century.

<sup>k</sup> Eusebius in Vita Constant. l. i. c. 8. This passage, however, is taken from a general declamation on the greatness of Constantine, and not from any particular account of the Gothic war.

<sup>l</sup> Constantinus tamen vir ingens et omnia efficeret nitens quæ animo præparasset, simul principatum totius orbis affectans. Licinio bellum intulit. Eutropius x. 5. Zosimus, l. ii. p. 89. The reasons which they have assigned for the first civil war may, with more propriety, be applied to the second.

<sup>m</sup> Zosimus l. ii. p. 94, 95.

their martial appearance, and his army contained more soldiers, though fewer men, than that of his eastern competitor. The legions of Constantine were levied in the warlike provinces of Europe, action had confirmed their discipline, victory had elevated their hopes, and there were among them a great number of veterans, who, after seventeen glorious campaigns under the same leader, prepared themselves to deserve an honourable dismissal by a last effort of their valour.<sup>n</sup> But the naval preparations of Constantine were in every respect much inferior to those of Licinius. The maritime cities of Greece sent their respective quotas of men and ships to the celebrated harbour of Piræus, and their united forces consisted of no more than two hundred small vessels—a very feeble armament, if it is compared with those formidable fleets which were equipped and maintained by the republic of Athens during the Peloponnesian war.<sup>o</sup> Since Italy was no longer the seat of government, the naval establishments of Misenum and Ravenna had been gradually neglected, and as the shipping and mariners of the empire were supported by commerce rather than by war, it was natural that they should the most abound in the industrious provinces of Egypt and Asia. It is only surprising that the eastern emperor, who possessed so great a superiority at sea, should have neglected the opportunity of carrying an offensive war into the centre of his rival's dominions.

Battle of Hadrianople
A.D. 323
July 3.

Instead of embracing such an active resolution, which might have changed the whole face of the war, the prudent Licinius expected the approach of his rival in a camp near Hadrianople, which he had fortified with an anxious care that betrayed his apprehension of the event. Constantine directed his march from Thessalonica towards that part of Thrace, till he found himself stopped by the broad and rapid stream of the Hebrus, and discovered the numerous army of Licinius, which filled the steep ascent of the hill, from the river to the city of Hadrianople. Many days were spent in doubtful and distant skirmishes, but at length the obstacles of the passage and the attack were removed by the intrepid conduct of Constantine. In this place we might relate a wonderful exploit of Constantine, which, though it can scarcely be paralleled either in poetry or romance, is celebrated, not by a venal orator devoted to his fortune, but by an historian, the partial enemy of his fame. We are assured that the valiant emperor threw himself into the river Hebrus, accompanied only by twelve horsemen, and that by the effort or terror of his invincible arm, he broke, slaughtered, and put to flight a host of an <sup>n</sup> Constantine was very attentive to the privileges and comforts of his fellow veterans, (Cousiderani) as he now began to style them. See the Theodosian Code, l. vii. tit. 20. tom. ii. p. 419, 429.

<sup>o</sup> Whilst the Athenians maintained the empire of the sea, their fleet consisted of three, and afterwards of four, hundred galleys of three ranks of oars, all completely equipped and ready for immediate service. The arsenal in the port of Piræus had cost the republic a thousand talents about two hundred and sixteen thousand pounds. See Thucydides de Bel. Pelopon. l. ii. c. 13 and Mursinus de Fortunâ Atticâ, c. 19.

<sup>p</sup> Zosimus, l. ii. p. 93, 96. This great battle is described in the Vale

hundred and fifty thousand men. The credulity of Zosimus prevailed so strongly over his passion, that among the events of the memorable battle of Hadrianople, he seems to have selected and embellished, not the most important, but the most marvellous. The valour and danger of Constantine are attested by a slight wound which he received in the thigh, but it may be discovered even from an imperfect narration, and perhaps a corrupted text, that the victory was obtained no less by the conduct of the general than by the courage of the hero, that a body of five thousand archers marched round to occupy a thick wood in the rear of the enemy, whose attention was diverted by the construction of a bridge, and that Licinius, perplexed by so many artful evolutions, was reluctantly drawn from his advantageous post to combat on equal ground in the plain. The contest was no longer equal. His confused multitude of new levies was easily vanquished by the experienced veterans of the west. Thirty-four thousand men are reported to have been slain. The fortified camp of Licinius was taken by assault the evening of the battle, the greater part of the fugitives, who had retired to the mountains, surrendered themselves next day to the discretion of the conqueror, and his rival, who could no longer keep the field, confined himself within the walls of Byzantium.<sup>r</sup>

The siege of Byzantium, which was immediately undertaken by Constantine, was attended with great labour

Siege of Byzantium, and rival victory of Crispus and uncertainty. In the late civil wars, the fortifications of that place so justly considered as the key of Europe and Asia, had been repaired and strengthened, and as long as Licinius remained master of the sea, the garrison was much less exposed to the danger of famine than the army of the besiegers. The naval commanders of Constantine were summoned to his camp, and received his positive orders to force the passage of the Hellespont, as the fleet of Licinius, instead of seeking and destroying their feeble enemy, continued inactive in those narrow straits where its superiority of numbers was of little use or advantage. Crispus, the emperor's eldest son, was intrusted with the execution of this daring enterprise, which he performed with so much courage and success, that he deserved the esteem, and most probably excited the jealousy, of his father. The engagement lasted two days, and in the evening of the first, the contending fleets, after a considerable and mutual loss, retired into their respective harbours of Europe and Asia. The second day about noon a strong south wind<sup>s</sup> sprang up, which carried the vessels of Crispus against the enemy, and as the casual advantage was improved by his sim fragment (p. 714) in a clear though concise manner. "Licinius vero circum Hadrianopolim maximo exercitu latera ardui montis impleverat illuc toto agmine Constantinus inflexit. Cum bellum terrarumque irriteretur, quamvis per arduum suis nitentibus, attrunc disciplinâ militari et felicitate, Constantinus Licinium confusum et sine ordine agentem viâ circumvenit leviter femore sauciatus."

<sup>r</sup> Zosimus, l. ii. p. 97, 98. The current always sets out of the Hellespont and when it is assisted by a north wind no vessel can attempt the passage. A south wind renders the force of the current almost imperceptible. See Tournefort's Voyage au Levant, Let. xi.

skilful intrepidity, he soon obtained a complete victory. An hundred and thirty vessels were destroyed, five thousand men were slain, and Amandus, the admiral of the Asiatic fleet, escaped with the utmost difficulty to the shores of Chalcedon. As soon as the Hellespont was open, a plentiful convoy of provisions flowed into the camp of Constantine, who had already advanced the operations of the siege. He constructed artificial mounds of earth of an equal height with the ramparts of Byzantium. The lofty towers which were erected on that foundation, galled the besieged with large stones and darts from the military engines, and the battering rams had shaken the walls in several places. If Licinius persisted much longer in the defence, he exposed himself to be involved in the ruin of the place. Before he was surrounded he prudently removed his person and treasures to Chalcedon in Asia, and as he was always desirous of associating companions to the hopes and dangers of his fortune, he now bestowed the title of Cæsar on Martinianus, who exercised one of the most important offices of the empire.*

Such were still the resources, and such the abilities, of Licinius, that, after so many successive defeats, he collected in Bithynia a new army of fifty or sixty thousand men, while the activity of Constantine was employed in the siege of Byzantium. The vigilant emperor did not however neglect the last struggles of his antagonist. A considerable part of his victorious army was transported over the Bosphorus in small vessels, and the decisive engagement was fought soon after their landing on the heights of Chrysopolis, or, as it is now called, of Scutari. The troops of Licinius, though they were lately raised, ill armed, and worse disciplined, made head against their conquerors with fruitless but desperate valour, till a total defeat, and the slaughter of five and twenty thousand men, irretrievably determined the fate of their leader.* He retired to Nicomedia, rather with the view of gaining some time for negotiation, than with the hope of any effectual defence. Constantia, his wife and the sister of Constantine, interceded with her brother in favour of her husband, and obtained from his policy rather than from his compassion, a solemn promise, confirmed by an oath, that after the sacrifice of Martinianus, and the resignation of the purple, Licinius himself should be permitted to pass the remainder of his life in peace and affluence. The behaviour of Constantia, and her relation to the contending parties, naturally recalls the remembrance of that virtuous matron who was the sister of Augustus, and the wife of Antony. But the temper of mankind was altered, and it was no longer esteemed infamous for a Roman to survive his honour and independence. Licinius solicited and accepted the pardon of his offences, laid himself and his purple at the feet of his lord and master, was raised from the ground with insulting pity, was admitted the same day to the imperial banquet, and soon afterwards was sent away to Thessalonica, which had been chosen for the place of his confinement.<sup>1</sup> His confinement was soon terminated by death, and it is doubtful whether a tumult of the soldiers, or a decree of the senate, was suggested as a motive for his execution. According to the rules of tyranny, he was accused of forming a conspiracy, and of holding a treasonable correspondence with the barbarians, but as he was never convicted, either by his own conduct, or by any legal evidence, we may perhaps be allowed, from his weakness, to presume his innocence.<sup>2</sup> The memory of Licinius was branded with infamy, his statues were thrown down, and, by a hasty edict, of such mischievous tendency that it was almost immediately corrected, all his laws, and all the judicial proceedings of his reign, were at once abolished.* By this victory of Constantine, the Roman world was again united under the authority of one emperor, thirty-seven years after Diocletian had divided his power and provinces with his associate Maximian.

The successive steps of the elevation of Constantine, from his first assuming the purple at York, to the resignation of Licinius at Nicomedia, have been related with some minuteness and precision, not only as the events are in themselves both interesting and important, but still more, as they contributed to the decline of the empire by the expense of blood and treasure, and by the perpetual increase, as well of the taxes, as of the military establishment. The foundation of Constantinople, and the establishment of the christian religion, were the immediate and memorable consequences of this revolution.

Re union of the empire
A. D. 324

CHAP. XV

The progress of the christian religion, and the sentiments, manners, numbers, and condition, of the primitive christians

A CANDID but rational inquiry into the progress and establishment of Christianity, may be considered as a very essential part of the history of the Roman empire. While that great body was invaded by open violence, or undermined by slow decay, a pure and humble religion

Importance of the inquiry

* Aurelius Victor Zosimus l. ii. p. 98. According to the latter Martinianus was Minister Officiorum (he uses the Latin appellation in Creck). Some medals seem to intimate that during his short reign he received the title of Augustus.

* Eusebius (in Vita Constantin. l. ii. c. 16. 17.) ascribes this decisive victory to the pious prayers of the emperor. The Valesian fragment (p. 714.) mentions a body of Gothic auxiliaries under their chief Aliphar, who adhered to the party of Licinius.

* Zosimus l. ii. p. 102. Victor Junior in Eptome. Anonym. Vale. sen. p. 714.

* Contra religionem sacramenti Thessalonien. privatus ocerus est Fulropius x. 6. and his evidence is confirmed by Jerome, (in Chronie.) as well as by Zosimus, l. ii. p. 102. The Valesian writer is the only one who mentions the soldiers. Good it is Zosimus alone who calls in the assistance of the senate. Eusebius prudently slides over this delicate transaction. But Sozomen a century afterwards ventures to assert the treasonable practices of Licinius.

* See the Theodosian Code l. xv. tit. 15. tom. i. p. 404. 405. These edicts of Constantine betray a degree of passion and precipitancy very unbecoming the character of a lawgiver.

gently insinuated itself into the minds of men, grew up in silence and obscurity, derived new vigour from opposition, and finally erected the triumphant banner of the cross on the ruins of the capitol. Nor was the influence of Christianity confined to the period or to the limits of the Roman empire. After a revolution of thirteen or fourteen centuries, that religion is still professed by the nations of Europe, the most distinguished portion of human kind in arts and learning as well as in arms. By the industry and zeal of the Europeans, it has been widely diffused to the most distant shores of Asia and Africa, and by the means of their colonies has been firmly established from Canada to Chili, in a world unknown to the ancients.

But this inquiry, however useful or entertaining, is attended with two peculiar difficulties. The scanty and suspicious materials of ecclesiastical history seldom enable us to dispel the dark cloud that hangs over the first age of the church. The great law of impartiality too often obliges us to reveal the imperfections of the uninspired teachers and believers of the gospel, and, to a careless observer, then faults may seem to cast a shade on the faith which they professed. But the scandal of the pious christian, and the fallacious triumph of the infidel, should cease as soon as they recollect not only by whom, but likewise to whom, the divine revelation was given. The theologian may indulge the pleasing task of describing religion as she descended from heaven, arrayed in her native purity. A more melancholy duty is imposed on the historian. He must discover the inevitable mixture of error and corruption, which she contracted in a long residence upon earth, among a weak and degenerate race of beings.

Five causes of the growth of christianity

Our curiosity is naturally prompted to inquire by what means the christian faith obtained so remarkable a victory over the established religions of the earth. To this inquiry, an obvious but satisfactory answer may be returned, that it was owing to the convincing evidence of the doctrine itself, and to the ruling providence of its great Author. But as truth and reason seldom find so favourable a reception in the world, and as the wisdom of Providence frequently condescends to use the passions of the human heart, and the general circumstances of mankind, as instruments to execute its purpose, we may still be permitted, though with becoming submission, to ask, not indeed what were the first, but what were the secondary, causes of the rapid growth of the christian church. It will perhaps appear, that it a Dum Assyrios penes, Medosque, et Persas Oriens fuit, despectissima pars servitium. Tacit. Hist. v. 8. Herodotus, who visited Asia, whilst it obeyed the last of those empires slightly mentions the Syrians of Palestine, who according to their own confession, had received from Egypt the rite of circumcision. See l. ii. c. 104.

b Diodorus Siculus, l. xi. Dion Cassius, l. xxxvii. p. 121. Tacit. Hist. i. 1-9. Justin. xxxvi. 2, 3.

c Tradidit arcano quæcumque volumine Moses, Non monstrare viæ eadem nisi sacra colenti, Quæsitæ ad fontes solos ducere verpæ.

The letter of this law is not to be found in the present volume of Moses. But the wise the humane Maimonides openly teaches that if an idolater fall into the water a Jew ought not to save him from instant death. See Basnage Histoire des Juifs, l. vi. c. 28.

was most effectually favoured and assisted by the five following causes. I The inflexible, and, if we may use the expression, the intolerant zeal of the christians, derived, it is true, from the Jewish religion, but purified from the narrow and unsocial spirit, which, instead of inviting, had deterred the Gentiles from embracing the law of Moses. II The doctrine of a future life, improved by every additional circumstance which could give weight and efficacy to that important truth. III The miraculous powers ascribed to the primitive church. IV The pure and austere morals of the christians. V The union and discipline of the christian republic, which gradually formed an independent and increasing state in the heart of the Roman empire.

I We have already described the religious harmony of the ancient world, and the facility with which the most different and even hostile nations embraced, or at least respected, each other's superstitions. A single people refused to join in the common intercourse of mankind. The Jews, who, under the Assyrian and Persian monarchies, had languished for many ages the most despised portion of their slaves, emerged from obscurity under the successors of Alexander, and as they multiplied to a surprising degree in the east, and afterwards in the west, they soon excited the curiosity and wonder of other nations. The sullen obstinacy with which they maintained their peculiar rites and unsocial manners, seemed to mark them out a distinct species of men, who boldly professed, or who faintly disguised, their implacable hatred to the rest of human-kind. Neither the violence of Antiochus, nor the arts of Herod, nor the example of the circumjacent nations, could ever persuade the Jews to associate with the institutions of Moses the elegant mythology of the Greeks. According to the maxims of universal toleration, the Romans protected a superstition which they despised. The polite Augustus condescended to give orders, that sacrifices should be offered for his prosperity in the temple of Jerusalem, while the meanest of the posterity of Abraham, who should have paid the same homage to the Jupiter of the capitol, would have been an object of abhorrence to himself and to his brethren. But the moderation of the conquerors was insufficient to appease the jealous prejudices of their subjects, who were alarmed and scandalized at the ensigns of paganism, which necessarily introduced themselves into a Roman province. The mad attempt of Caligula to place his own statue in the temple of Jerusalem, was

d A Jewish sect which indulged themselves in a sort of occasional conformity, derived from Herod, by whose example and authority they had been seduced, the name of Herodians. But their numbers were so inconsiderable, and their duration so short, that Josephus has not thought them worthy of his notice. See Prideaux's Connection, vol. ii. p. 285.

e Cicero pro Flacco c. 28.

f Philo de Legatione. Augustus left a foundation for a perpetual sacrifice. Yet he approved of the regleet which his grandson Caius expressed towards the temple of Jerusalem. See Sueton in August. c. 90 and Casaubon's notes on that passage.

g See, in particular, Joseph. Antiquitat. xii. 6. xiii. 3 and De Bel. Judææ i. 33 and ii. 9. Edit. Havercamp.

defeated by the unanimous resolution of a people who dreaded death much less than such an idolatrous profanation<sup>b</sup>. Their attachment to the law of Moses was equal to their detestation of foreign religions. The current of zeal and devotion, as it was contracted into a narrow channel, ran with the strength, and sometimes with the fury, of a torrent.

<sup>Its gradual increase</sup> This inflexible perseverance, which appeared so odious or so ridiculous to the ancient world, assumes a more awful character, since providence has deigned to reveal to us the mysterious history of the chosen people. But the devout and even scrupulous attachment to the Mosatic religion, so conspicuous among the Jews who lived under the second temple, becomes still more surprising, if it is compared with the stubborn incredulity of their forefathers. When the law was given in thunder from mount Sinai, when the tides of the ocean and the course of the planets were suspended for the convenience of the Israelites, and when temporal rewards and punishments were the immediate consequences of their piety or disobedience, they perpetually relapsed into rebellion against the visible majesty of their Divine King, placed the idols of the nations in the sanctuary of Jehovah, and imitated every fantastic ceremony that was practised in the tents of the Arabs, or in the cities of Phœnicia<sup>c</sup>. As the protection of Heaven was deservedly withdrawn from the ungrateful race, their faith acquired a proportionable degree of vigour and purity. The contemporaries of Moses and Joshua had beheld with careless indifference the most amazing miracles. Under the pressure of every calamity, the belief of those miracles has preserved the Jews of a later period from the universal contagion of idolatry, and in contradiction to every known principle of the human mind, that singular people seems to have yielded a stronger and more ready assent to the traditions of their remote ancestors, than to the evidence of their own senses<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>Their religion better suited to defence than to conquest</sup>

The Jewish religion was admirably fitted for defence, but it was never designed for conquest, and it seems probable that the number of proselytes was never much superior to that of apostates. The divine promises were originally made, and the distinguishing rite of circumcision was enjoined, to a single family. When the posterity of Abraham had multiplied like the sands of the sea, the Deity, from whose mouth they received a system of laws and ceremonies, declared himself the proper and as it were the national God of Israel, and with the most jealous care separated his favourite people from the rest of mankind. The conquest of the land of Can-naan was accompanied with so many wonderful and with so many bloody circumstances, that the victorious Jews were left in a state of irreconcilable hostility with all their neighbours. They had been commanded to extirpate some of the most idolatrous tribes, and the execution of the Divine will had seldom been retarded by the weakness of humanity. With the other nations they were forbidden to contract any marriages or alliances, and the prohibition of receiving them into the congregation, which in some cases was perpetual, almost always extended to the third, to the seventh, or even to the tenth generation. The obligation of preaching to the Gentiles the faith of Moses, had never been inculcated as a precept of the law, nor were the Jews inclined to impose it on themselves as a voluntary duty.

In the admission of new citizens, that unsocial people was actuated by the selfish vanity of the Greeks, rather than by the generous policy of Rome. The descendants of Abraham were flattered by the opinion, that they alone were the heirs of the covenant, and they were apprehensive of diminishing the value of their inheritance, by sharing it too easily with the strangers of the earth. A larger acquaintance with mankind, extended their knowledge without correcting their prejudices, and whenever the God of Israel acquired any new votaries, he was much more indebted to the inconstant humour of polytheism than to the active zeal of his own missionaries<sup>e</sup>. The religion of Moses seems to be instituted for a particular country as well as for a single nation, and if a strict obedience had been paid to the order, that every male, three times in the year, should present himself before the Lord Jehovah, it would have been impossible that the Jews could ever have spread themselves beyond the narrow limits of the promised land<sup>f</sup>. That obstacle was indeed removed by the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem, but the most considerable part of the Jewish religion was involved in its destruction, and the pagans, who had long wondered at the strange report of an empty sanctuary,<sup>g</sup> were at a loss to discover what could be the object, or what could be the instruments, of a worship which was destitute of temples and of altars, of priests and of sacrifices. Yet even in their fallen state, the Jews, still asserting their lofty and exclusive privileges, shunned, instead of courting, the society of strangers. They still insisted with inflexible rigour on those parts of the law which it was in their power to practise. Their peculiar distinctions of days, of meats, and a variety of trivial though burdensome observances, were so many objects of disgust and (Numbers, xiv. 11.) It would be easy, but it would be unbecoming, to justify the complaint of the Deity from the whole tenor of the Mosiac history.

<sup>1</sup> All that relates to the Jewish proselytes has been very ably treated by Rasseigne Hist. des Juifs l. vi. c. 6. 7.

<sup>2</sup> See Exod. xxiv. 23. Deut. xxi. 16. the commentators, and a very sensible note in the Universal History, vol. i. p. 603. edit. fol.

<sup>3</sup> When Pompey, using, or abusing, the right of conquest entered into the Holy of Holies, it was observed with amazement 'Nulla intus Deum effugit, vacuum sedem et thronum ream.' Freit. Hist. v. 9.

<sup>4</sup> It was a popular saying with regard to the Jews, Nil preter umbas et eceli nomen adorant.

<sup>b</sup> Juvenal's Can. Cæsare, effugim equi in templo locre armipotius sumptere. Tacit. Hist. i. 9. Philo and Josephus give a very circumstantial but a very rhetorical account of this transaction which exceedingly perplexed the governor of Syria. At the first mention of this infamous proposal King Agrippa fainted away and did not recover his senses till the third day.

<sup>c</sup> For the enumeration of the Syrian and Arabian deities it may be observed that Milon has comprised in one hundred and thirty very beautiful lines the two large and learned syntagmas which Selden had composed on that obscure subject.

<sup>d</sup> 'How long will this people provoke me? and how long will it be ere they believe me, for all the signs which I have shown among them?'

aversion for the other nations, to whose habits and prejudices they were diametrically opposite. The painful and even dangerous rite of circumcision was alone capable of repelling a willing proselyte from the door of the synagogue.

Under these circumstances, christianity offered itself to the world, armed with the strength of the Mosaic law, and delivered from the weight of its fetters. An exclusive zeal for the truth of religion, and the unity of God, was as carefully inculcated in the new as in the ancient system, and whatever was now revealed to mankind concerning the nature and designs of the Supreme Being, was fitted to increase their reverence for that mysterious doctrine. The divine authority of Moses and the prophets was admitted, and even established, as the firmest basis of christianity. From the beginning of the world, an uninterrupted series of predictions had announced and prepared the long expected coming of the Messiah, who, in compliance with the gross apprehensions of Jews, had been more frequently represented under the character of a king and conqueror, than under that of a prophet, a martyr, and the Son of God. By his expiatory sacrifice, the imperfect sacrifices of the temple were at once consummated and abolished. The ceremonial law, which consisted only of types and figures, was succeeded by a pure and spiritual worship, equally adapted to all climates, as well as to every condition of mankind, and to the initiation of blood, was substituted a more harmless initiation of water. The promise of divine favour, instead of being partially confined to the posterity of Abraham, was universally proposed to the freeman and the slave, to the Greek and to the barbarian, to the Jew and to the Gentile. Every privilege that could raise the proselyte from earth to heaven, that could exalt his devotion, secure his happiness, or even gratify that secret pride, which, under the semblance of devotion, insinuates itself into the human heart, was still reserved for the members of the christian church, but at the same time all mankind was permitted, and even solicited, to accept the glorious distinction, which was not only proffered as a favour, but imposed as an obligation. It became the most sacred duty of a new convert to diffuse among his friends and relations the inestimable blessing which he had received, and to warn them against a refusal that would be severely punished as a criminal disobedience to the will of a benevolent but all-powerful Deity.

Obstancy, and reasons of the believing Jews

The enfranchisement of the church from the bonds of the synagogue, was a work, however of some time and of some difficulty. The Jewish converts, who acknowledged Jesus in the character of the Messiah foretold by their ancient oracles, respected him as a prophetic teacher of virtue and religion, but they obstinately adhered to the ceremonies of their ancestors, and were desirous of imposing them on the Gentiles, who continually augmented the number of believers. These judaizing christians seem to have argued with some degree of plausibility from the divine origin of the Mosaic law, and from the immutable perfections of its great Author. They affirmed, that if the Being, who is the same through all eternity, had designed to abolish those sacred rites which had served to distinguish his chosen people, the repeal of them would have been no less clear and solemn than their first promulgation. that, instead of those frequent declarations, which either suppose or assert the perpetuity of the Mosaic religion, it would have been represented as a provisional scheme intended to last only till the coming of the Messiah, who should instruct mankind in a more perfect mode of faith and of worship. that the Messiah himself, and his disciples who conversed with him on earth, instead of authorizing by their example the most minute observances of the Mosaic law,<sup>q</sup> would have published to the world the abolition of those useless and obsolete ceremonies, without suffering christianity to remain during so many years obscurely confounded among the sects of the Jewish church. Arguments like these appear to have been used in the defence of the expiring cause of the Mosaic law, but the industry of our learned divines has abundantly explained the ambiguous language of the Old Testament, and the ambiguous conduct of the apostolic teachers. It was proper gradually to unfold the system of the gospel, and to pronounce, with the utmost caution and tenderness, a sentence of condemnation so repugnant to the inclination and prejudices of the believing Jews.

<sup>o</sup> A second kind of circumcision was inflicted on a Samaritan or Egyptian proselyte. The sullen indifference of the Talmudists, with respect to the entry of men of strangers, may be seen in Barnage, Histoire des Juifs l. vi. c. 6.

<sup>p</sup> These arguments were urged with great ingenuity by the Jew Origen and refuted with equal ingenuity and candour by the christian Limborch. See the Amica Collatio, (it well deserves that name,) on account of the dispute between them.

<sup>q</sup> Jesus—circumciscus erit, et bis utebatur Judaicis, vestitu simili purgatus scabie mittebat ad sacerdotes. Paschalis et alios dies festos

The history of the church of Jerusalem affords a lively proof of the necessity of those precautions, and of the deep impression which the Jewish religion had made on the minds of its sectaries. The first fifteen bishops of Jerusalem were all circumcised Jews, and the congregation over which they presided, united the law of Moses with the doctrine of Christ. It was natural that the primitive tradition of a church which was founded only forty days after the death of Christ, and was governed almost as many years under the immediate inspection of his apostle, should be received as the standard of orthodoxy. The distant churches very frequently appealed to the authority of their venerable parent, and relieved her distresses by a liberal contribution of alms.

The Nazarene church of Jerusalem

religiose observant. Si quos sancti sabbatho, ostendit non tantum ex lege, sed et exceptis sententis lata opera sabbatho, non interdicta. Grotius de Veritate Religionis Christianae, l. i. c. 7. A little afterwards (c. 12) he expatiates on the condemnation of the apostles.

<sup>r</sup> Pene omnes Christum Deum sub legis observatione credebant. Sulpicius Severus, ii. 31. See Eusebius Hist. Ecclesiast. l. iv. c. 5.

<sup>s</sup> Mosheim de Rebus Christianis ante Constantinum Magnum, p. 153. In this masterly performance, which I shall often have occasion to quote, he enters much more fully into the state of the primitive church, than he has an opportunity of doing in his General History.

But when numerous and opulent societies were established in the great cities of the empire, in Antioch, Alexandria, Ephesus, Corinth, and Rome, the reverence which Jerusalem had inspired to all the christian colonies insensibly diminished. The Jewish converts, or, as they were afterwards called, the Nazarenes, who had laid the foundations of the church, soon found themselves overwhelmed by the increasing multitudes, that from all the various religions of polytheism enlisted under the banner of Christ and the Gentiles, who, with the approbation of their peculiar apostle, had rejected the intolerable weight of the Mosaic ceremonies, at length refused to their more scrupulous brethren the same toleration which at first they had humbly solicited for their own practice. The ruin of the temple, of the city, and of the public religion of the Jews, was severely felt by the Nazarenes, as in their manners, though not in their faith, they maintained so intimate a connexion with their impious countrymen, whose misfortunes were attributed by the pagans to the contempt, and more justly ascribed by the christians to the wrath, of the Supreme Deity. The Nazarenes retired from the ruins of Jerusalem to the little town of Pella beyond the Jordan, where that ancient church languished above sixty years in solitude and obscurity.<sup>c</sup> They still enjoyed the comfort of making frequent and devout visits to the Holy City, and the hope of being one day restored to those seats which both nature and religion taught them to love as well as to revere. But at length, under the reign of Hadrian, the desperate fanaticism of the Jews filled up the measure of their calamities, and the Romans, exasperated by their repeated rebellions, exercised the rights of victory with unusual rigour. The emperor founded, under the name of Ælia Capitolina, a new city on mount Sion,<sup>a</sup> to which he gave the privileges of a colony, and denouncing the severest penalties against any of the Jewish people who should dare to approach its precincts, he fixed a vigilant garrison of a Roman cohort to enforce the execution of his orders. The Nazarenes had only one way left to escape the common proscription, and the force of truth was on this occasion assisted by the influence of temporal advantages. They elected Marcus for their bishop, a prelate of the race of the Gentiles, and most probably a native either of Italy or of some of the Latin provinces. At his persuasion, the most considerable part of the congregation renounced the Mosaic law, in the practice of which they had persevered above a century. By this sacrifice of their habits and prejudices, they purchased a free admission into the colony of Hadrian, and more firmly cemented their union with the catholic church.*

When the name and honours of the church of Jerusalem had been restored <sup>The Ebionites</sup> to mount Sion, the crimes of heresy and schism were imputed to the obscure remnant of the Nazarenes, which refused to accompany their Latin bishop. They still preserved their former habitation of Pella, spread themselves into the villages adjacent to Damascus, and formed an inconsiderable church in the city of Beroea, or, as it is now called, of Aleppo, in Syria.<sup>7</sup> The name of Nazarenes was deemed too honourable for those christian Jews, and they soon received from the supposed poverty of their understanding, as well as of their condition, the contemptuous epithet of Ebionites.<sup>2</sup> In a few years after the return of the church of Jerusalem, it became a matter of doubt and controversy, whether a man who sincerely acknowledged Jesus as the Messiah, but who still continued to observe the law of Moses, could possibly hope for salvation. The humane temper of Justin Martyr inclined him to answer this question in the affirmative, and though he expressed himself with the most guarded diffidence, he ventured to determine in favour of such an imperfect christian, if he were content to practise the Mosaic ceremonies, without pretending to assert their general use or necessity. But when Justin was pressed to declare the sentiment of the church, he confessed that there were very many among the orthodox christians, who not only excluded their judaizing brethren from the hope of salvation, but who declined any intercourse with them in the common offices of friendship, hospitality, and social life.<sup>8</sup> The more rigorous opinion prevailed, as it was natural to expect, over the milder, and an eternal bar of separation was fixed between the disciples of Moses and those of Christ. The unfortunate Ebionites, rejected from one religion as apostates, and from the other as heretics, found themselves compelled to assume a more decided character, and although some traces of that obsolete sect may be discovered as late as the fourth century, they insensibly melted away either into the church or the synagogue.<sup>b</sup>

While the orthodox church preserved a just medium between excessive <sup>The Gnostics.</sup> veneration and improper contempt for the law of <sup>c</sup> Eusebius, l. iii. c. 5. Le Clerc Hist. Ecclesiast. p. 605. During this occasional absence, the bishop and church of Pella still retained the title of Jerusalem. In the same manner, the Roman pontiffs resided seventy years at Avignon, and the patriarchs of Alexandria have long since transferred their episcopal seat to Cairo.

<sup>a</sup> Dion Cassius l. lxxix. The exile of the Jewish nation from Jerusalem is attested by Aristo of Pella (supra Euseb. l. iv. c. 6.) and is mentioned by several ecclesiastical writers. Through some of them too hastily extend this interdiction to the whole country of Palestine.

<sup>2</sup> Eusebius l. iv. c. 6. Sulpicius Severus l. 31. By comparing their unsatisfactory accounts, Mosheim (p. 327, &c.) has drawn out a very distinct representation of the circumstances and motives of this revolution.

<sup>7</sup> Le Clerc (Hist. Ecclesiast. p. 477, 535) seems to have collected from Pseudo-Jerome, Epiphanius, and other writers all the principal circumstances that relate to the Nazarenes or Ebionites. The nature of their opinions soon divided them into a stricter and a milder sect, and there is some reason to conjecture, that the family of Jesus Christ remained members, at least, of the latter and more moderate party.

<sup>8</sup> Some writers have been pleased to create an Ebion, the imaginary author of their sect and name. But we can more safely rely on the learned Eusebius than on the vehement Tertullian, or the credulous Epiphanius. According to Le Clerc the Hebrew word Ebionim may be translated into Latin by that of Pauperes. See Hist. Ecclesiast. p. 477.

<sup>a</sup> See the very curious Dialogue of Justin Martyr with the Jew Trypho. The conference between them was held at Ephesus, in the reign of Antoninus Pius, and about twenty years after the return of the church of Pella to Jerusalem. For this date consult the accurate note of Tillemont Mémoires Ecclesiastiques tom. ii. p. 511.

<sup>b</sup> Of all the systems of christianity, that of Abyssinia is the only one which still adheres to the Mosaic rites (Ceddes's Church History of Æthiopia, and Dissertations de la Grand sur la Relation du P. Lobo)

Moses, the various heretics deviated into equal but opposite extremes of error and extravagance. From the acknowledged truth of the Jewish religion, the Ebionites had concluded that it could never be abolished. From its supposed imperfections the Gnostics as hastily inferred that it never was instituted by the wisdom of the Deity. There are some objections against the authority of Moses and the prophets, which too readily present themselves to the sceptical mind, though they can only be derived from our ignorance of remote antiquity, and from our incapacity to form an adequate judgment of the divine economy. These objections were eagerly embraced and as petulantly urged by the vain science of the Gnostics. As those heretics were, for the most part, averse to the pleasures of sense, they morosely arraigned the polygamy of the patriarchs, the gallantries of David, and the seraglio of Solomon. The conquest of the land of Canaan, and the extirpation of the suspecting natives, they were at a loss how to reconcile with the common notions of humanity and justice. But when they recollected the sanguinary list of murders, of executions, and of massacres, which stain almost every page of the Jewish annals, they acknowledged that the barbarians of Palestine had exercised as much compassion towards their idolatrous enemies, as they had ever shown to their friends or countrymen.<sup>d</sup> Passing from the sectaries of the law to the law itself, they asserted that it was impossible that a religion which consisted only of bloody sacrifices and trifling ceremonies, and whose rewards as well as punishments were all of a carnal and temporal nature, could inspire the love of virtue or restrain the impetuosity of passion. The Mosaic account of the creation and fall of man was treated with profane derision by the Gnostics, who would not listen with patience to the repose of the Deity after six days' labour, to the rib of Adam, the garden of Eden, the trees of life and of knowledge, the speaking serpent, the forbidden fruit, and the condemnation pronounced against human kind for the venial offence of their first progenitors. The God of Israel was impudently represented by the Gnostics, as a being liable to passion and to error, capricious in his favour, implacable in his resentment, meanly jealous of his superstitious worship, and confining his partial providence to a single people, and to this transitory life. In such a character they could discover none of the features of the wise and omnipotent Father of the universe.<sup>e</sup> They allowed that the religion of the Jews was somewhat less criminal than the idolatry of the Gentiles, but it was their fundamental doctrine, that the Christ whom they adored as the first and brightest emanation of the Deity, appeared upon earth to rescue mankind from their various errors, and to reveal a new system of truth and perfection. The most learned of the fathers, by a very singular condescension, have imprudently admitted the sophistry of the Gnostics. Acknowledging that the literal sense is repugnant to every principle of faith as well as reason, they deem themselves secure and invulnerable behind the ample veil of allegory, which they carefully spread over every tender part of the Mosaic dispensation.<sup>f</sup>

It has been remarked with more ingenuity than truth, that the virgin <sup>their sects, progress, and influence</sup> purity of the church was never violated by schism or heresy before the reign of Trajan or Hadrian, about one hundred years after the death of Christ.<sup>g</sup> We may observe with much more propriety, that, during that period, the disciples of the Messiah were indulged in a freer latitude both of faith and practice, than has ever been allowed in succeeding ages. As the terms of communion were insensibly narrowed, and the spiritual authority of the prevailing party was exercised with increasing severity, many of its most respectable adherents, who were called upon to renounce, were provoked to assert, their private opinions, to pursue the consequences of their mistaken principles, and openly to erect the standard of rebellion against the unity of the church. The Gnostics were distinguished as the most polite, the most learned, and the most wealthy of the christian name, and that general appellation, which expressed a superiority of knowledge, was either assumed by their own pride, or ironically bestowed by the envy of their adversaries. They were almost without exception of the race of the Gentiles, and their principal founders seem to have been natives of Syria or Egypt, where the warmth of the climate disposes both the mind and the body to indolent and contemplative devotion. The Gnostics blended with the faith of Christ many sublime but obscure tenets, which they derived from oriental philosophy, and even from the religion of Zoroaster, concerning the eternity of matter, the existence of two principles, and the mysterious hierarchy of the invisible world.<sup>h</sup> As soon as they launched out into that vast abyss, they delivered themselves to the guidance of a disordered imagination, and as

<sup>d</sup> The eunuch of the queen Candace might suggest some suspicions, but as we are assured (Socrates, i. 19. Sozomen ii. 24. Ludolphus, p. 281.) that the Æthiopians were not converted till the fourth century, it is more reasonable to believe, that they respected the sabbath and abstained from the forbidden meats, in imitation of the Jews, who, in a very early period, were seated on both sides of the Red sea. Circumcision had been practised by the most ancient Æthiopians, from motives of health and cleanliness, which seem to be explained in the Recherches Philosophiques sur les Américains, tom. ii. p. 117.

<sup>e</sup> Beausobre, Histoire du Manichéisme, l. i. c. 3. has stated their objections, particularly those of Faustus, the adversary of Augustin, with the most learned impartiality.

<sup>f</sup> Apud ipsos fides obstituta, misericordia in promptu adversus omnes alios hostile odium. Theil. Hist. v. 4. Surely Tertius had seen the Jews with too favourable an eye. The perusal of Josephus must have destroyed the antithesis.

<sup>g</sup> Dr Burnet (Archæologia, l. ii. c. 7.) has discussed the first chapters of Genesis with too much wit and freedom.

<sup>h</sup> The milder Gnostics considered Jehovah, the Creator, as a Being of a mixed nature between God and the demon. Others confounded him with the evil principle. Consult the second century of the general history of Mosheim, which gives a very distinct, though concise, account of their strange opinions on this subject.

<sup>i</sup> See Beausobre, Hist. du Manichéisme, l. i. c. 4. Origen and St Augustin were among the allegorists.

<sup>k</sup> Hegesippus, ap. Euseb. l. iii. c. 32. iv. 22. Clemens Alexandrin. Stromat. vii. 17.

<sup>l</sup> In the account of the Gnostics of the second and third centuries, Mosheim is ingenious and candid, Le Clerc dull, but exact; Beausobre almost always an apologist, and it is much to be feared that the primitive fathers are very frequently calumniators.

the paths of error are various and infinite, the Gnostics were imperceptibly divided into more than fifty particular sects,<sup>k</sup> of whom the most celebrated appear to have been the Basilidians, the Valentinians, the Marcionites, and, in a still later period, the Manichæans. Each of these sects could boast of its bishops and congregations, of its doctors and martyrs,<sup>l</sup> and, instead of the four gospels adopted by the church, the heretics produced a multitude of histories, in which the actions and discourses of Christ and of his apostles were adapted to their respective tenets.<sup>m</sup> The success of the Gnostics was rapid and extensive.<sup>n</sup> They covered Asia and Egypt, established themselves in Rome, and sometimes penetrated into the provinces of the west. For the most part they arose in the second century, flourished during the third, and were suppressed in the fourth or fifth, by the prevalence of more fashionable controversies, and by the superior ascendant of the reigning power. Though they constantly disturbed the peace, and frequently disgraced the name, of religion, they contributed to assist rather than to retard the progress of christianity. The Gentile converts, whose strongest objections and prejudices were directed against the law of Moses, could find admission into many christian societies, which required not from their untutored mind any belief of an antecedent revelation. Their faith was insensibly fortified and enlarged, and the church was ultimately benefited by the conquests of its most inveterate enemies.<sup>o</sup>

The demons considered as the gods of antiquity

But whatever difference of opinion might subsist between the orthodox, the Ebionites, and the Gnostics, concerning the divinity or the obligation of the Mosaic law, they were all equally animated by the same exclusive zeal, and by the same abhorrence for idolatry which had distinguished the Jews from the other nations of the ancient world. The philosopher, who considered the system of polytheism as a composition of human fraud and error, could disguise a smile of contempt under the mask of devotion, without apprehending that either the mockery, or the compliance, would expose him to the resentment of any invisible, or, as he conceived them, imaginary powers. But the established religions of paganism were seen by the primitive christians in a much more odious and formidable light. It was the universal sentiment both of the church and of heretics, that the dæmons were the authors, the patrons, and the objects of idolatry.<sup>p</sup> Those rebellious spirits who had been degraded from the rank of angels, and cast down into the infernal pit, were still permitted to roam upon earth, to torment the bodies, and to seduce the minds, of sinful men. The dæmons soon discovered and abused the natural propensity of the human heart towards devotion, and, artfully withdrawing the adoration of mankind from their Creator, they usurped the place and honours of the Supreme Deity. By the success of their malicious contrivances, they at once gratified their own vanity and revenge, and obtained the only comfort of which they were yet susceptible, the hope of involving the human species in the participation of their guilt and misery. It was confessed, or at least it was imagined, that they had distributed among themselves the most important characters of polytheism, one dæmon assuming the name and attributes of Jupiter, another of Æsculapius, a third of Venus, and a fourth perhaps of Apollo,<sup>q</sup> and that, by the advantage of their long experience and aerial nature, they were enabled to execute, with sufficient skill and dignity, the parts which they had undertaken. They lurked in the temples, instituted festivals and sacrifices, invented fables, pronounced oracles, and were frequently allowed to perform miracles. The christians, who, by the interposition of evil spirits, could so readily explain every preternatural appearance, were disposed and even desirous to admit the most extravagant fictions of the pagan mythology. But the belief of the christian was accompanied with horror. The most trifling mark of respect to the national worship he considered as a direct homage yielded to the dæmon, and as an act of rebellion against the majesty of God.

In consequence of this opinion, it was the first but arduous duty of a christian to preserve himself pure and undefiled from the practice of idolatry. The religion of the nations was not merely a speculative doctrine professed in the schools or preached in the temples. The innumerable deities and rites of polytheism were closely interwoven with every circumstance of business or pleasure, of public or of private life, and it seemed impossible to escape the observance of them, without, at the same time, renouncing the commerce of mankind, and all the offices and amusements of society.<sup>r</sup> The important transactions of peace and war were prepared

Abhorrence of the christians for idolatry

Ceremonies

<sup>k</sup> See the catalogues of Irenæus and Epiphanius. It must indeed be allowed, that those writers were inclined to multiply the number of sects which opposed the unity of the church.

<sup>l</sup> Eusebius l. iv. c. 15. Sozomen, l. ii. c. 32. See in Bayle, in the article of Marcion a curious detail of a dispute on that subject. It should seem that some of the Gnostics (the Basilidians) declined, and even refused, the honour of martyrdom. Their reasons were singular and abstruse. See Moëm, p. 339.

<sup>m</sup> See a very remarkable passage of Origen (Proem ad Lucan). That indefatigable writer who had consumed his life in the study of the scriptures, relies for their authenticity on the inspired authority of the church. It was impossible that the Gnostics could receive our present gospels many parts of which (particularly in the resurrection of Christ) are directly, and as it might seem decidedly, pointed against their favourite tenets. It is therefore somewhat singular that Ignatius (Epist. ad Smyrn. Patr. Apostol. tom. ii. p. 34) should choose to employ a vague and doubtful tradition, instead of quoting the certain testimony of the evangelists.

<sup>n</sup> Taciturni favos ei vespa. faciunt ecclesias et Marcionitæ, is the strong expression of Tertullian, which I am obliged to quote from memory. In the time of Epiphanius (advers. Hæreses, p. 302.) the Marcionites were very numerous in Italy, Syria, Egypt, Arabia and Persia.

<sup>o</sup> Augustin is a memorable instance of this gradual progress from reason to faith. He was, during several years, engaged in the Manichæan sect.

<sup>p</sup> The universal sentiment of the primitive church is very clearly explained by Justin Martyr Apolog. Major by Athenagoras, Legat. c. 22, &c. and by Lactantius Institut. Divin. ii. 11-19.

<sup>q</sup> Tertullian (Apolog. c. 23) alleges the confession of the dæmons themselves as often as they were tormented by the christian exorcists.

<sup>r</sup> Tertullian has written a most severe treatise against idolatry, to or concluded by solemn sacrifices, in which the magistrate, the senator, and the soldier, were obliged to preside or to participate.* The public spectacles were an essential part of the cheerful devotion of the pagans, and the gods were supposed to accept, as the most grateful offering, the games that the prince and people celebrated in honour of their peculiar festivals.<sup>1</sup> The christian, who with pious horror avoided the abomination of the circus or the theatre, found himself encompassed with infernal snares in every convivial entertainment, as often as his friends, invoking the hospitable deities, poured out libations to each other's happiness.<sup>2</sup> When the bride, struggling with well-affected reluctance, was forced in hymeneal pomp over the threshold of her new habitation,<sup>3</sup> or when the sad procession of the dead slowly moved towards the funeral pile,<sup>4</sup> the christian, on these interesting occasions, was compelled to desert the persons who were the dearest to him, rather than contrain the guilt inherent to those impious ceremonies. Every art and every trade that was in the least concerned in the framing or adorning of idols was polluted by the stain of idolatry,<sup>5</sup> a severe sentence, since it devoted to eternal misery the far greater part of the community, which is employed in the exercise of liberal or mechanic professions. If we cast our eyes over the numerous remains of antiquity, we shall perceive, that besides the immediate representations of the gods, and the holy instruments of their worship, the elegant forms and agreeable fictions consecrated by the imagination of the Greeks, were introduced as the richest ornaments of the houses, the dress, and the furniture of the pagans.* Even the arts of music and painting, of eloquence and poetry, flowed from the same impure origin. In the style of the fathers, Apollo and the Muses were the organs of the infernal spirit, Homer and Virgil were the most eminent of his servants, and the beautiful mythology which pervades and animates the compositions of their genius, is destined to celebrate the glory of the demons. Even the common language of Greece and Rome abounded with familiar but impious expressions, which the imprudent christian might too carelessly utter, or too patiently hear.<sup>6</sup>

Festivals.

The dangerous temptations which on every side lurked in ambush to sur-caution his brethren against the hourly danger of incurring, that fatal Hereditas sylvani, et quædam latitanti spina. De Coron. Milich. c. 10.

* The Roman ætate was always held in a temple or consecrated place (Aulus Gellius xii. 7.) Before they entered on business, every senator dropped some wine and frankincense on the altar. Sueton. in August. c. 35.

<sup>1</sup> See Tertullian, De Spectaculis. This severe reformer shows no more indulgence to a trade of Lupitides, than to a combat of gladiators. The dress of the actors particularly offends him. By the use of the lofty bowen, they impudently strive to add a cult to their stature. c. 23.

<sup>2</sup> The ancient practice of concluding the entertainment with libations may be found in every classic. Socrus and Succa in their last moments made a noble application of this custom. Postquam signum edidit apina, inquit, respiciens proximos æscorum, addita voce libare se liquorem illum Jovi Iuvernor! Tunc Annal. vi. 64.

<sup>3</sup> See the elegant but molitious hymn of Catullus, on the nuptials of Manlius and Julia. O Hymen, Hymenee Jo! Quis hinc Deo com paraverit nupti!

<sup>4</sup> The ancient funerals (in those of Visenus and Pallus) are no less accurately described by Virgil, than they are illustrated by his commentator Servius. The pile itself was an altar, the flames were fed with the unguarded believer, assailed him with redoubled violence on the days of solemn festivals. So artfully were they framed and disposed throughout the year, that superstition always wore the appearance of pleasure, and often of virtue.* Some of the most sacred festivals in the Roman ritual were destined to salute the new calends of January with vows of public and private felicity, to indulge the pious remembrance of the dead and living, to ascertain the inviolable bounds of property, to hail, on the return of spring, the genial powers of fecundity, to perpetuate the two memorable eras of Rome, the foundation of the city, and that of the republic, and to restore, during the human licence of the Saturnalia, the primitive equality of mankind. Some idea may be conceived of the abhorrence of the christians for such impious ceremonies, by the scrupulous delicacy which they displayed on a much less alarming occasion. On days of general festivity, it was the custom of the ancients to adorn their doors with lamps and with branches of laurel, and to crown their heads with a garland of flowers. This innocent and elegant practice might perhaps have been tolerated as a mere civil institution. But it most unluckily happened that the doors were under the protection of the household gods, that the laurel was sacred to the lover of Daphne, and that garlands of flowers, though frequently worn as a symbol either of joy or mourning, had been dedicated in their first origin to the service of superstition. The trembling christians, who were persuaded in this instance to comply with the fashion of their country, and the commands of the magistrate, laboured under the most gloomy apprehensions, from the reproaches of their own conscience, the censures of the church, and the denunciations of divine vengeance.<sup>1</sup>

Such was the anxious diligence which Zeal for christianity was required to guard the chastity of the gospel from the infectious breath of idolatry. The superstitious observances of public or private rites were carelessly practised, from education and habit, by the followers of the established religion. But as often as they occurred, they afforded the christians an opportunity of declaring and confirming their zealous opposition. By these frequent protestations their attachment to the faith was continually fortified, and in proportion to the in-the blood of victims, and all the assistants were sprinkled with lustral water. * Tertullian de Idololatriâ c. 11.

<sup>1</sup> See every part of Montfaucon's Antiquities. Even the reverses of the Greek and Roman coins were frequently of an idolatrous nature. Here indeed the scruples of the christian were suspended by a stronger passion.

<sup>2</sup> Tertullian de Idololatriâ, c. 20, 21, 22. If a Pagan friend (on the occasion perhaps of sneering) used the familiar expression of "Jupiter bless you," the christian was obliged to protest against the divinity of Jupiter.

<sup>3</sup> Consult the most laboured work of Ovid, his imperfect Fasts. He finished no more than the first six months of the year. The compilation of Macrobius is called the Saturnalia, but it is only a small part of the first book that bears any relation to the title.

<sup>4</sup> Tertullian has composed a defence, or rather panegyric, of the rash action of a christian soldier, who by throwing away his crown of laurel, had exposed himself and his brethren to the most imminent danger. By the mention of the emperor (Severus and Caracalla) it is evident, notwithstanding the wishes of M. de Tillemont, that Tertullian composed his treatise De Coronâ, long before he was engaged in the errors of the Montanists. See Memoires Ecclesiastiques, tom. iii. p. 381.

crease of zeal, they combated with the more ardour and success in the holy war, which they had undertaken against the empire of the dæmons.

II The writings of Cicero<sup>e</sup> represent in the most lively colours the ignorance, the errors, and the uncertainty of the ancient philosophers with regard to the immortality of the soul.

When they are desirous of arming their disciples against the fear of death, they inculcate, as an obvious though melancholy position, that the fatal stroke of our dissolution releases us from the calamities of life, and that those can no longer suffer, who no longer exist. Yet there were a few sages of Greece and Rome who had conceived a more exalted, and, in some respects, a juster idea of human nature, though it must be confessed, that, in the sublime inquiry, their reason had been often guided by their imagination, and that their imagination had been prompted by their vanity. When they viewed with complacency the extent of their own mental powers, when they exercised the various faculties of memory, of fancy, and of judgment, in the most profound speculations, or the most important labours, and when they reflected on the desire of fame, which transported them into future ages, far beyond the bounds of death and of the grave, they were unwilling to confound themselves with the beasts of the field, or to suppose, that a being, for whose dignity they entertained the most sincere admiration, could be limited to a spot of earth, and to a few years of duration. With this favourable prepossession they summoned to their aid the science, or rather the language, of metaphysics. They soon discovered, that as none of the properties of matter will apply to the operations of the mind, the human soul must consequently be a substance distinct from the body, pure, simple, and spiritual, incapable of dissolution, and susceptible of a much higher degree of virtue and happiness after the release from its corporeal prison. From these specious and noble principles, the philosophers who trod in the footsteps of Plato, deduced a very unjustifiable conclusion, since they asserted, not only the future immortality, but the past eternity, of the human soul, which they were too apt to consider as a portion of the infinite and self-existing spirit, which pervades and sustains the universe. A doctrine thus removed beyond the senses and the experience of mankind, might serve to amuse the leisure of a philosophic mind, or, in the silence of solitude, it might sometimes impart a ray of comfort to desponding virtue, but the faint impression which had been received in the schools, was soon obliterated by the commerce and business of active life. We are sufficiently acquainted with the eminent persons who flourished in the age of Cicero, and of the first Cæsars, with their actions, their characters, and their motives, to be assured that their conduct in this life was never regulated by any serious conviction of the rewards or punishments of a future state. At the bar and in the senate of Rome the ablest orators were not apprehensive of giving offence to their hearers, by exposing that doctrine as an idle and extravagant opinion, which was rejected with contempt by every man of a liberal education and understanding.

Since therefore the most sublime efforts of philosophy can extend no further than feebly to point out the desire, the hope, or, at most, the probability, of a future state, there is nothing, except a divine revelation, that can ascertain the existence, and describe the condition, of the invisible country which is destined to receive the souls of men after their separation from the body. But we may perceive several defects inherent to the popular religions of Greece and Rome, which rendered them very unequal to so arduous a task. 1. The general system of their mythology was unsupported by any solid proofs, and the wisest among the pagans had already disclaimed its usurped authority. 2. The description of the infernal regions had been abandoned to the fancy of painters and of poets, who peopled them with so many phantoms and monsters, who dispensed their rewards and punishments with so little equity, that a solemn truth, the most congenial to the human heart, was oppressed and disgraced by the absurd mixture of the wildest fictions. 3. The doctrine of a future state was scarcely considered among the devout polytheists of Greece and Rome as a fundamental article of faith. The providence of the gods, as it related to public communities rather than to private individuals, was principally displayed on the visible theatre of the present world. The petitions which were offered on the altars of Jupiter or Apollo, expressed the anxiety of their worshippers for temporal happiness, and their ignorance or indifference concerning a future life. The important truth of the immortality of the soul was inculcated with more diligence as well as success in India, in Assyria, in Egypt, and in Gaul, and since we cannot attribute such a difference to the superior knowledge of the barbarians, we must ascribe it to the influence of an established priesthood, which employed the motives of virtue as the instrument of ambition.

<sup>e</sup> In particular, the first book of the Tusculan Questions, and the treatise De Senectute and the Summum Scipionis contain in the most beautiful language every thing that Grecian philosophy, or Roman good sense could possibly suggest on this dark but important object.

<sup>f</sup> The pre-existence of human souls so far at least as that doctrine is compatible with religion was adopted by many of the Greek and Latin fathers. See Bransonius Hist. du Manichisme l. vi. c. 4.

<sup>g</sup> See Cicero pro Cluent. c. 61. Cæsar ap. Sallust. de Bell. Catilin. c. 30. Juvenal. Satir. ii. 149.

<sup>h</sup> See aliquos manes, et subterranea regna,

Nec pueri credunt, nisi qui nondum ere lavantur

<sup>h</sup> The eleventh book of the Odyssæy gives a very dreary and incoherent account of the infernal shades. Pindar and Virgil have embellished the picture, but even those poets, though more correct than their great model are guilty of very strange misconceptions. See Bayle, Responses aux Questions d'un Provincial, part. iii. c. 22.

<sup>i</sup> See the sixteenth epistle of the first book of Horace, the thirteenth Satire of Juvenal and the second Satire of Persius. These popular discourses express the sentiment and language of the multitude.

<sup>k</sup> If we confine ourselves to the Civil we may observe, that they trusted, not only their lives but even their money, to the security of another world. Velut ille mos Græcorum occurrit (says Valerius Maximus, l. ii. c. 6. p. 10) quos memoria proditum est, pecunias multas

among the sages of Greece and Rome.

among the
barbarians

We might naturally expect, that a principle so essential to religion, would have been revealed in the clearest terms to the chosen people of Palestine, and that it might safely have been intrusted to the hereditary priesthood of Aaron. It is incumbent on us to adore the mysterious dispensations of Providence,<sup>1</sup> when we discover, that the doctrine of the immortality of the soul is omitted in the law of Moses, it is darkly insinuated by the prophets, and during the long period which elapsed between the Egyptian and the Babylonian servitudes the hopes as well as fears of the Jews appear to have been confined within the narrow compass of the present life.<sup>2</sup> After Cyrus had permitted the exiled nation to return into the promised land, and after Ezra had restored the ancient records of their religion, two celebrated sects, the Sadducees and the Pharisees, insensibly arose at Jerusalem.<sup>3</sup> The former, selected from the more opulent and distinguished ranks of society, were strictly attached to the literal sense of the Mosaic law, and they piously rejected the immortality of the soul, as an opinion that received no countenance from the divine book, which they revered as the only rule of their faith. To the authority of scripture the Pharisees added that of tradition, and they accepted, under the name of traditions, several speculative tenets from the philosophy or religion of the eastern nations. The doctrines of fate or predestination of angels and spirits, and of a future state of rewards and punishments, were in the number of these new articles of belief, and as the Pharisees, by the austerity of their manners, had drawn into their party the body of the Jewish people, the immortality of the soul became the prevailing sentiment of the synagogue, under the reign of the Asmonæan princes and pontiffs. The temper of the Jews was incapable of contenting itself with such a cold and languid assent as might satisfy the mind of a polytheist, and as soon as they admitted the idea of a future state, they embraced it with the zeal which has always formed the characteristic of the nation. Their zeal, however, added nothing to its evidence, or even probability, and it was still necessary, that the doctrine of life and immortality, which had been dictated by nature, approved by reason, and received by superstition, should obtain the sanction of divine truth from the authority and example of Christ.

quia hic apud inferos redderentur, dare solitos. The same custom is more darkly insinuated by Mela l. i. c. 2. It is almost needless to add, that the profits of trade hold a just proportion to the credit of the merchant, and that the Druids derived from their holy profession a character of responsibility, which could scarcely be claimed by any other order of men.

<sup>1</sup> The right reverend author of the Divine Legation of Moses assigns a very curious reason for the omission, and most ingeniously retorts it on the unbelievers.

<sup>2</sup> See Le Clerc (Prolegomena ad Hist. Ecclesiast. sect. 1. c. 8.) His authority seems to carry the greater weight, as he has written a learned and judicious commentary on the books of the Old Testament.

<sup>3</sup> Joseph Antiquitat. l. xiii. c. 10. De Bell. Jud. ii. 8. According to the most natural interpretation of his words, the Sadducees admitted only the Pentateuch, but it has pleased some modern critics to add the prophets to their creed, and to suppose that they contented themselves with rejecting the traditions of the Pharisees. Dr. Jortin has argued that point in his Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. ii. p. 103.

When the promise of eternal happiness was proposed to mankind on condition of adopting the faith, and of observing the precepts of the gospel, it is no wonder that so advantageous an offer should have been accepted by great numbers of every religion, of every rank, and of every province in the Roman empire. The ancient christians were animated by a contempt for their present existence, and by a just confidence of immortality, of which the doubtful and imperfect faith of modern ages cannot give us any adequate notion. In the primitive church, the influence of truth was very powerfully strengthened by an opinion, which, however it may deserve respect for its usefulness and antiquity, has not been found agreeable to experience. It was universally believed, that the end of the world, and the kingdom of heaven, were at hand. The near approach of this wonderful event had been predicted by the apostles, the tradition of it was preserved by their earliest disciples, and those who understood in their literal sense the discourses of Christ himself, were obliged to expect the second and glorious coming of the Son of man in the clouds, before that generation was totally extinguished, which had beheld his humble condition upon earth, and which might still be witness of the calamities of the Jews under Vespasian or Hadrian. The revolution of seventeen centuries has instructed us not to press too closely the mysterious language of prophecy and revelation, but as long as, for wise purposes, this error was permitted to subsist in the church, it was productive of the most salutary effects on the faith and practice of christians, who lived in the awful expectation of that moment when the globe itself, and all the various race of mankind, should tremble at the appearance of their divine Judge.<sup>4</sup>

The ancient and popular doctrine of the millennium was intimately connected with the second coming of Christ. As the works of the creation had been finished in six days, their duration in their present state, according to a tradition which was attributed to the prophet Elijah, was fixed to six thousand years.<sup>5</sup> By the same analogy it was inferred, that this long period of labour and contention, which was now almost elapsed,<sup>6</sup> would be succeeded by a joyful sabbath of a thousand years, and that Christ, with the triumphant band of the saints and the elect who had <sup>4</sup> This expectation was countenanced by the twenty fourth chapter of St. Matthew, and by the first epistle of St. Paul to the Thessalonians. Lactantius removes the difficulty by the help of allegory and metaphor, and the learned Grotius ventures to insinuate, that, for wise purposes, the pious deception was permitted to take place.

<sup>5</sup> See Burnet's Sacred Theory, part iii. c. 5. This tradition may be traced as high as the author of the epistle of Barnabas, who wrote in the first century, and who seems to have been half a Jew.

<sup>6</sup> The primitive church of Antioch computed almost 6000 years from the creation of the world to the birth of Christ. Africanus, Lactantius, and the Greek church, have reduced that number to 5500, and Lactantius has contented himself with 5200 years. These calculations were formed on the Septuagint which was universally received during the six first centuries. The authority of the Vulgate and of the Hebrew text has determined the moderns, protestants as well as catholics, to prefer a period of about 4000 years, though, in the study of profane antiquity, they often find themselves straitened by those narrow limits.

escaped death, or who had been miraculously revived, would reign upon earth till the time appointed for the last and general resurrection. So pleasing was this hope to the mind of believers, that the New Jerusalem, the seat of this blissful kingdom, was quickly adorned with all the gayest colours of the imagination. A felicity consisting only of pure and spiritual pleasure would have appeared too refined for its inhabitants, who were still supposed to possess their human nature and senses. A garden of Eden, with the amusements of the pastoral life, was no longer suited to the advanced state of society which prevailed under the Roman empire. A city was therefore erected of gold and precious stones, and a supernatural plenty of corn and wine was bestowed on the adjacent territory, in the free enjoyment of whose spontaneous productions, the happy and benevolent people was never to be restrained by any jealous laws of exclusive property. The assurance of such a millennium was carefully inculcated by a succession of fathers from Justin Martyr and Irenæus, who conversed with the immediate disciples of the apostles, down to Lactantius, who was preceptor to the son of Constantine. Though it might not be universally received, it appears to have been the reigning sentiment of the orthodox believers, and it seems so well adapted to the desires and apprehensions of mankind, that it must have contributed in a very considerable degree to the progress of the christian faith. But when the edifice of the church was almost completed, the temporary support was laid aside. The doctrine of Christ's reign upon earth was at first treated as a profound allegory, was considered by degrees as a doubtful and useless opinion, and was at length rejected as the absurd invention of heresy and fanaticism. A mysterious prophecy, which still forms a part of the sacred canon, but which was thought to favour the exploded sentiment, has very narrowly escaped the proscription of the church.

Conflagration of Rome and of the world

Whilst the happiness and glory of a temporal reign were promised to the disciples of Christ, the most dreadful calamities were denounced against an unbelieving world. The edification of the new Jerusalem was to advance by equal steps with the destruction of the mystic Babylon, and as long as the emperors who reigned before Constantine persisted in the profession of idolatry, the epithet of Babylon was applied to the city and to the empire of Rome. A regular series was prepared of all the moral and physical evils which can afflict a flourishing nation, intestine discord, and the invasion of the fiercest barbarians from the unknown regions of the north, pestilence and famine, comets and eclipses, earthquakes and inundations. All these were only so many preparatory and alarming signs of the great catastrophe of Rome, when the country of the Scipios and Cæsars should be consumed by a flame from heaven, and the city of the seven hills, with her palaces, her temples, and her triumphal arches, should be buried in a vast lake of fire and brimstone. It might, however, afford some consolation to Roman vanity, that the period of their empire would be that of the world itself, which, as it had once perished by the element of water, was destined to experience a second and speedy destruction from the element of fire. In the opinion of a general conflagration, the faith of the christian very happily coincided with the tradition of the east, and the philosophy of the Stoics, and the analogy of nature, and even the country, which, from religious motives, had been chosen for the origin and principal scene of the conflagration, was the best adapted for that purpose by natural and physical causes, by its deep caverns, beds of sulphur, and numerous volcanoes, of which those of Ætna, of Vesuvius, and of Lipari, exhibit a very imperfect representation. The calmest and most intrepid sceptic could not refuse to acknowledge, that the destruction of the present system of the world by fire, was in itself extremely probable. The christian, who founded his belief much less on the fallacious arguments of reason than on the authority of tradition and the interpretation of scripture, expected it with terror and confidence as a certain and approaching event, and as his mind was perpetually filled with the solemn idea, he considered every disaster that happened to the empire as an infallible symptom of an expiring world.

The condemnation of the wisest and most virtuous of the pagans, on account of their ignorance or disbelief of the divine truth, seems to offend the reason and the humanity of the present age. But the primitive

The pagans devoted to eternal punishment

* Most of these pictures were borrowed from a misinterpretation of Isaiah Daniel, and the Apocalypse. One of the grossest images may be found in Irenæus, (l. i. p. 455) the disciple of Papias who had seen the apostle St John.

† See the second dialogue of Justin with Trypho, and the seventh book of Lactantius. It is unnecessary to allege all the intermediate fathers as the fact is not disputed. Yet the curious reader may consult Baillet de l'Église Patrum l. ii. c. 4.

‡ The testimony of Justin, of his own faith and that of his orthodox brethren, in the doctrine of a millennium, is delivered in the clearest and most solemn manner (Dialog. cum Tryphonte Jud. p. 177, 178 Edit. Benedictum). If in the beginning of this important passage there is any thing like an inconsistency, we may impute it as we think proper either to the author or to his transcribers.

§ Dupin Bibliothéque Ecclesiastique tom. i. p. 223 tom. ii. p. 368 and Mosheim p. 720 though the title of these learned divines is not altogether candid on this occasion.

¶ In the council of Laodicea, (about the year 360) the Apocalypse was tacitly excluded from the sacred canon by the same churches of Asia to which it is addressed, and we may learn from the complaint of Sulpicius Severus that their sentence had been ratified by the greater number of christians of his time. From what causes then is the Apocalypse at present so generally received by the Greek, the Roman, and the protestant churches? The following ones may be assigned. 1 The Greeks were subdued by the authority of an impostor, who in the sixth century assumed the character of Dionysius the Areopagite. 2 A just apprehension, that the grammarians might become more important than the theologians, engaged the council of Trent in fix the seal of their infallibility on all the books of Scripture contained in the Latin Vulgate in the number of which the Apocalypse was fortunately included (Fr. Paolo Istoria del Concilio Tridentino, l. ii.) 3 The advantage of turning those mysterious prophecies against the see of Rome inspired the protestants with uncommon veneration for so useful an ally. See the ingenious and elegant discourses of the present bishop of Litchfield on this unpromising subject.

§ Lactantius (Institut. Divin. vii. 15, &c.) relates the dismal tale of similarly with great spirit and eloquence.

¶ On this subject every reader of taste will be entertained with the third part of Burnet's Sacred Theory. He blends philosophy scripture, and tradition, into one magnificent system in the description of which he displays a strength of fancy not inferior to that of Milton himself.

† And yet whatever may be the language of individuals, it is still the public doctrine of all the christian churches nor can even our own refuse to admit the conclusions which must be drawn from the eighth and the eighteenth of her Articles. The Jansenists, who have so diligently church, whose faith was of a much firmer consistence, delivered over, without hesitation, to eternal torture, the far greater part of the human species. A charitable hope might perhaps be indulged in favour of Socrates, or some other sages of antiquity, who had consulted the light of reason before that of the gospel had arisen.<sup>b</sup> But it was unanimously affirmed, that those who, since the birth or the death of Christ, had obstinately persisted in the worship of the dæmons, neither deserved nor could expect a pardon from the irritated justice of the Deity. These rigid sentiments, which had been unknown to the ancient world, appeared to have infused a spirit of bitterness into a system of love and harmony. The ties of blood and friendship were frequently torn asunder by the difference of religious faith, and the christians, who in this world found themselves oppressed by the power of the pagans, were sometimes seduced by resentment and spiritual pride to delight in the prospect of their triumph. "You are fond of spectacles," exclaims the stern Tertullian, "expect the greatest of all spectacles, the last and eternal judgment of the universe. How shall I admire, how laugh, how rejoice, how exult, when I behold so many proud monarchs, and fancied gods, groaning in the lowest abyss of darkness, so many magistrates, who persecuted the name of the Lord, liquefying in fiercer fires than they ever kindled against the christians, so many sage philosophers blushing in red hot flames with their deluded scholars, so many celebrated poets trembling before the tribunal, not of Minos, but of Christ, so many tragedians, more tuneful in the expression of their own sufferings, so many dancers—!" But the humanity of the reader will permit me to draw a veil over the rest of this infernal description, which the zealous African pursues in a long variety of affected and unfeeling witteisms.<sup>c</sup>

<sup>b</sup> Were often often vented by their fears

Doubtless there were many among the primitive christians of a temper more suitable to the meekness and charity of their profession. There were many who felt a sincere compassion for the danger of their friends and countrymen, and who exerted the most benevolent zeal to save them from the impending destruction. The careless polytheist, assailed by new and unexpected terrors, against which neither his priests nor his philosophers could afford him any certain protection, was very frequently terrified and subdued by the menace of eternal tortures. His fears might assist the progress of his faith and reason, and if he could once persuade himself to suspect that the christian religion might possibly be true, it became an easy task to convince him that it was the safest and most prudent party that he could possibly embrace.

III The supernatural gifts, which even in this life were ascribed to the christians above the rest of mankind, must have conduced to their own comfort, and very frequently to the conviction of infidels. Besides the occasional prodigies, which might sometimes be effected by the immediate interposition of the Deity when he suspended the laws of nature for the service of religion, the christian church, from the time of the apostles and their first disciples,<sup>d</sup> has claimed an uninterrupted succession of miraculous powers, the gift of tongues, of vision, and of prophecy, the power of expelling dæmons, of healing the sick, and of raising the dead. The knowledge of foreign languages was frequently communicated to the contemporaries of Irenæus, though Irenæus himself was left to struggle with the difficulties of a barbarous dialect, whilst he preached the gospel to the natives of Gaul.<sup>e</sup> The divine inspiration, whether it was conveyed in the form of a waking or of a sleeping vision, is described as a favour very liberally bestowed on all ranks of the faithful, on women as on elders, on boys as well as upon bishops. When their devout minds were sufficiently prepared by a course of prayer, of fasting, and of vigils, to receive the extraordinary impulse, they were transported out of their senses, and delivered in ecstacy what was inspired, being mere organs of the Holy Spirit, just as a pipe or flute is of him who blows into it.<sup>f</sup> We may add, that the design of these visions was, for the most part, either to disclose the future history, or to guide the present administration, of the church. The expulsion of the dæmons from the bodies of those unhappy persons whom they had been permitted to torment, was considered as a signal though ordinary triumph of religion, and is repeatedly alleged by the ancient apologists, as the most convincing evidence of the truth of christianity. The awful ceremony was usually performed in a public manner, and in the presence of a great number of spectators, the patient was relieved by the power or skill of the exorcist, and the vanquished dæmon was heard to confess, that he was one of the fabled gods of antiquity, who had impiously usurped the adoration of mankind.<sup>g</sup> But the miraculous cure of diseases of the most inveterate or even preternatural

THE THIRD
CAUSE Miraculous powers of the primitive church

studied the works of the fathers maintain this sentiment with distinguished zeal, and the learned M. de Tillemont never dismisses a virtuous emperor without pronouncing his damnation. Zuinglius is perhaps the only leader of a party who has ever adopted the milder sentiment, and he, we are less obliged to the Lutherans than to the catholics. See Bossuet, Histoire des Variations des Eglises Protestantes, l. ii. c. 19—22.
<sup>b</sup> Justin and Clemens of Alexandria allow that some of the philosophers were instructed by the Logos, confounding its double significance of the human reason and of the divine word.
<sup>c</sup> Tertullian de Spectaculis, c. 30. In order to ascertain the degree of authority which the zealous African had acquired, it may be sufficient to allege the testimony of Cyprian the doctor and guide of all the western churches (See Prudent. Hym. xiii. 100.) As often as he applied himself to his daily study of the writings of Tertullian he was accustomed to say, "Da mihi magistrum. Give me my master." (Hieronym. de Viris Illustribus, tom. i. p. 284.)

<sup>d</sup> Notwithstanding the evasions of Dr Middleton, it is impossible to overlook the clear traces of vision and inspiration, which may be found in the apostolic fathers.

<sup>e</sup> Irenæus adv. Hæres. Proem. p. 3. Dr Middleton (Free Inquiry, p. 46, &c.) observes that as this pretension of all others was the most difficult to support by art it was the soonest given up. The observation suits his hypothesis.

<sup>f</sup> Athenagoras in Legatione. Justin Martyr, Cohort. ad Gentes. Tertullian adv. Marcionem l. iv. These descriptions are not very unlike the prophetic fury, for which Cicero (de Divinat. ii. 54) expresses so little reverence.

<sup>g</sup> Tertullian (Apolog. c. 23) throws out a bold defiance to the pagan magistrates. Of the primitive miracles the power of exorcising is the only one which has been assumed by the protestants.

kind, can no longer occasion any surprise, when we recollect, that in the days of Irenæus, about the end of the second century, the resurrection of the dead was very far from being esteemed an uncommon event, that the miracle was frequently performed on necessary occasions, by great fasting and the joint supplication of the church of the place, and that the persons thus restored to their prayers had lived afterwards among them many years.<sup>b</sup> At such a period, when faith could boast of so many wonderful victories over death, it seems difficult to account for the scepticism of those philosophers, who still rejected and derided the doctrine of the resurrection. A noble Grecian had rested on this important ground the whole controversy, and promised Theophilus, bishop of Antioch that if he could be gratified with the sight of a single person who had been actually raised from the dead, he would immediately embrace the christian religion. It is somewhat remarkable, that the prelate of the first eastern church, however anxious for the conversion of his friend, thought proper to decline this fair and reasonable challenge.<sup>c</sup>

Their truth contested

The miracles of the primitive church after obtaining the sanction of ages, have been lately attacked in a very free and ingenious inquiry,<sup>k</sup> which though it has met with the most favourable reception from the public, appears to have excited a general scandal among the divines of our own as well as of the other protestant churches of Europe.<sup>l</sup> Our different sentiments on this subject will be much less influenced by any particular arguments, than by our habits of study and reflection, and above all, by the degree of the evidence which we have accustomed ourselves to

Our perplexity in defining the miraculous period

require for the proof of a miraculous event. The duty of an historian does not call upon him to interpose his private judgment in this nice and important controversy, but he ought not to dissemble the difficulty of adopting such a theory as may reconcile the interest of religion with that of reason, of making a proper application of that theory, and of defining with precision the limits of that happy period exempt from error and from deceit, to which we might be disposed to extend the gift of supernatural powers. From the first of the fathers to the last of the popes, a succession of bishops, of saints, of martyrs, and of miracles, is continued without interruption, and the progress of superstition was so gradual and almost imperceptible, that we know not in what particular link we should break the chain of tradition. Every age bears testimony to the wonderful events by which it was distinguished, and its testimony appears no less weighty and respectable than that of the preceding generation, till we are insensibly led on to accuse our own inconsistency, if in the eighth or in the twelfth century we deny to the venerable Bede, or to the holy Bernard, the same degree of confidence which, in the second century, we had so liberally granted to Justin or to Irenæus.<sup>m</sup> If the truth of any of those miracles is appreciated by their apparent use and propriety, every age had unbelievers to convince, heretics to confute, and idolatrous nations to convert, and sufficient motives might always be produced to justify the interposition of heaven. And yet, since every friend to revelation is persuaded of the reality, and every reasonable man is convinced of the cessation, of miraculous powers, it is evident that there must have been some period in which they were either suddenly or gradually withdrawn from the christian church. Whatever era is chosen for that purpose, the death of the apostles, the conversion of the Roman empire, or the extinction of the Arian heresy,<sup>n</sup> the insensibility of the christians who lived at that time will equally afford a just matter of surprise. They still supported their pretensions after they had lost their power. Credulity performed the office of faith, fanaticism was permitted to assume the language of inspiration, and the effects of accident or contrivance were ascribed to supernatural causes. The recent experience of genuine miracles should have instructed the christian world in the ways of Providence, and habituated their eye (if we may use a very inadequate expression) to the style of the Divine artist. Should the most skilful painter of modern Italy presume to decorate his feeble imitations with the name of Raphael or of Correggio, the insolent fraud would be soon discovered, and indignantly rejected.

Whatever opinion may be entertained of the miracles of the primitive church since the time of the apostles, this unresisting softness of temper, so conspicuous among the believers of the second and third centuries, proved of some accidental benefit to the cause of truth and religion. In modern times, a latent and even involuntary scepticism adheres to the most pious dispositions. Their admission of supernatural truths is much less an active consent than a cold and passive acquiescence. Accustomed long since to observe and to respect the invariable order of nature, our reason, or at least our imagination, is not sufficiently prepared to sustain the visible action of the Deity. But, in the first ages of christianity, the situation of mankind was extremely different. The most curious, or the most credulous, among the pagans, were often persuaded to enter into a society,

Use of the primitive miracles.

<sup>a</sup> Irenæus adv. Hæreses, l. ii. 56. 57. l. v. c. 6. Mr. Dodwell (Disserat. ad Irenæum n. 42.) concludes that the second century was still more fertile in miracles than the first.

<sup>b</sup> Theophilus ad Autolyum l. i. p. 315. Edit. Benedictini Paris, 1742.

<sup>c</sup> Dr. Middleton sent out his Introduction in the year 1747, published his Free Inquiry in 1749 and before his death which happened in 1750, he had prepared a vindication of it against his numerous adversaries.

<sup>d</sup> The university of Oxford conferred degrees on his opponents. From the indignation of Mosheim (p. 221.) we may discover the sentiments of the Lutheran divines.

<sup>m</sup> It may seem somewhat remarkable that Bernard of Clairvaux, who records so many miracles of his friend St. Malachi never takes any notice of his own which in their turn however, are carefully related by his companions and disciples. In the long series of ecclesiastical history, does there exist a single instance of a saint asserting that he himself possessed the gift of miracles?

<sup>n</sup> The conversion of Constantine is the era which is most usually fixed by protestants. The more rational divines are unwilling to admit the miracles of the fourth, whilst the more credulous are unwilling to reject those of the fifth, century.

which asserted an actual claim to miraculous powers. The primitive christians perpetually trod on mystic ground, and their minds were exercised by the habits of believing the most extraordinary events. They felt, or they fancied, that on every side they were incessantly assaulted by dæmons, comforted by visions, instructed by prophecy, and surprisingly delivered from danger, sickness, and from death itself, by the supplications of the church. The real or imaginary prodigies, of which they so frequently conceived themselves to be the objects, the instruments, or the spectators, very happily disposed them to adopt with the same ease, but with far greater justice, the authentic wonders of the evangelic history, and thus miracles that exceeded not the measure of their own experience, inspired them with the most lively assurance of mysteries which were acknowledged to surpass the limits of their understanding. It is this deep impression of supernatural truths, which has been so much celebrated under the name of faith, a state of mind described as the surest pledge of the Divine favour and of future felicity, and recommended as the first or perhaps the only merit of a christian. According to the more rigid doctors, the moral virtues, which may be equally practised by infidels, are destitute of any value or efficacy in the work of our justification.

THE FOURTH CAUSE But the primitive christian demonstrated his faith by his virtues, and it was very justly supposed that the divine persuasion, which enlightened or subdued the understanding, must, at the same time, purify the heart, and direct the actions, of the believer. The first apologists of christianity who justify the innocence of their brethren, and the writers of a later period who celebrate the sanctity of their ancestors, display, in the most lively colours, the reformation of manners which was introduced into the world by the preaching of the gospel. As it is my intention to remark only such human causes as were permitted to second the influence of revelation, I shall slightly mention two motives which might naturally render the lives of the primitive christians much purer and more austere than those of their pagan contemporaries, or their degenerate successors, repentance for their past sins, and the laudable desire of supporting the reputation of the society in which they were engaged.

Effects of their repentance It is a very ancient reproach, suggested by the ignorance or the malice of infidelity, that the christians allured into their party the most atrocious criminals, who, as soon as they were touched by a sense of remorse, were easily persuaded to wash away, in the water of baptism, the guilt of their past conduct, for which the temples of the gods refused to grant them any expiation. But this reproach, when it is cleared from misrepresentation, contributes as much to the honour as it did to the increase of the church. The friends of christianity may acknowledge, without a blush, that many of the most eminent saints had been before their baptism the most abandoned sinners. Those persons, who in the world had followed, though in an imperfect manner, the dictates of benevolence and propriety, derived such a calm satisfaction from the opinion of their own rectitude, as rendered them much less susceptible of the sudden emotions of shame, of grief, and of terror, which have given birth to so many wonderful conversions. After the example of their divine Master, the missionaries of the gospel disdained not the society of men, and especially of women, oppressed by the consciousness, and very often by the effects, of their vices. As they emerged from sin and superstition to the glorious hope of immortality, they resolved to devote themselves to a life, not only of virtue, but of penitence. The desire of perfection became the ruling passion of their soul, and it is well known, that while reason embraces a cold mediocrity, our passions hurry us, with rapid violence, over the space which lies between the most opposite extremes.

When the new converts had been enrolled in the number of the faithful, <sup>Care of their reputation</sup> and were admitted to the sacraments of the church, they found themselves restrained from relapsing into their past disorders by another consideration of a less spiritual, but of a very innocent and respectable nature. Any particular society that has departed from the great body of the nation, or the religion to which it belonged, immediately becomes the object of universal as well as invidious observation. In proportion to the smallness of its numbers, the character of the society may be affected by the virtue and vices of the persons who compose it, and every member is engaged to watch with the most vigilant attention over his own behaviour, and over that of his brethren, since, as he must expect to incur a part of the common disgrace, he may hope to enjoy a share of the common reputation. When the christians of Bithynia were brought before the tribunal of the younger Phry, they assured the proconsul, that, far from being engaged in any unlawful conspiracy, they were bound by a solemn obligation to abstain from the commission of those crimes which disturb the private or public peace of society, from theft, robbery, adultery, perjury, and fraud.<sup>p</sup> Near a century afterwards, Tertullian, with an honest pride, could boast, that very few christians had suffered by the hand of the executioner, except on account of their religion.<sup>q</sup> Their serious and sequestered life, averse to the gay luxury of the age, inured them to chastity, temperance, economy, and all the sober and domestic virtues. As the greater number were of some trade or profession, it was incumbent on them, by the strictest integrity and the fairest dealing, to remove the suspicions which the profane are too apt to conceive against the appearances of sanctity. The contempt of the world exercised them in the habits of humility, meekness, and patience. The more they were persecuted, the more closely they adhered to each other. Their mutual charity and unsuspecting confidence has been remarked by infidels, and was too often abused by perfidious friends.*

<sup>p</sup> The imputations of Celsus and Julian, with the defence of the fathers, are very fairly stated by Spanheim, Commentaire sur les Césars de Julian, p. 468.

<sup>p</sup> Plin. Epist. x. 97.
<sup>q</sup> Tertullian, Apolo., c. 44. He adds, however, with some degree of hesitation, "Aut si aliud, jam non christianus."

Morality of the fathers It is a very honourable circumstance for the morals of the primitive christians, that even their faults, or rather errors, were derived from an excess of virtue. The bishops and doctors of the church, whose evidence attests, and whose authority might influence, the professions, the principles, and even the practice, of their contemporaries, had studied the scriptures with less skill than devotion, and they often received, in the most literal sense, those rigid precepts of Christ and the apostles, to which the prudence of succeeding commentators has applied a looser and more figurative mode of interpretation. Ambitious to exalt the perfection of the gospel above the wisdom of philosophy, the zealous fathers have earned the duties of self-mortification, of purity, and of patience, to a height which it is scarcely possible to attain, and much less to preserve, in our present state of weakness and corruption. A doctrine so extraordinary and so sublime must inevitably command the veneration of the people, but it was ill calculated to obtain the suffrage of those worldly philosophers, who, in the conduct of this transitory life, consult only the feelings of nature and the interest of society.*

Principles of human nature. There are two very natural propensities which we may distinguish in the most virtuous and liberal dispositions, the love of pleasure and the love of action. If the former be refined by art and learning, improved by the charms of social intercourse, and corrected by a just regard to economy, to health, and to reputation, it is productive of the greatest part of the happiness of private life. The love of action is a principle of a much stronger and more doubtful nature. It often leads to anger, to ambition, and to revenge, but when it is guided by the sense of propriety and benevolence, it becomes the parent of every virtue, and if those virtues are accompanied with equal abilities, a family, a state, or an empire, may be indebted for their safety and prosperity to the undaunted courage of a single man. To the love of pleasure we may therefore ascribe most of the agreeable, to the love of action we may attribute most of the useful and respectable qualifications. The character in which both the one and the other should be united and harmonized, would seem to constitute the most perfect idea of human nature. The insensible and inactive disposition, which should be supposed alike destitute of both, would be rejected, by the common consent of mankind, as utterly incapable of procuring any happiness to the individual, or any public benefit to the world. But it was not in this world that the primitive christians were desirous of making themselves either agreeable or useful.

The acquisition of knowledge, the exercise of our reason or fancy, and the cheerful flow of unguarded conversation, may employ the leisure of a liberal mind. Such amusements, however, were rejected with abhorrence, or admitted with the utmost caution, by the severity of the fathers, who despised all knowledge that was not useful to salvation, and who considered all levity of discourse as a criminal abuse of the gift of speech. In our present state of existence, the body is so inseparably connected with the soul, that it seems to be our interest to taste, with innocence and moderation, the enjoyments of which that faithful companion is susceptible. Very different was the reasoning of our devout predecessors, vainly aspiring to imitate the perfection of angels, they disdained, or they affected to disdain, every earthly and corporeal delight.† Some of our senses indeed are necessary for our preservation, others for our subsistence, and others again for our information, and thus far it was impossible to reject the use of them. The first sensation of pleasure was marked as the first moment of their abuse. The unfeeling candidate for heaven was instructed, not only to resist the grosser allurements of the taste or smell, but even to shut his ears against the profane harmony of sounds, and to view with indifference the most finished productions of human art. Gay apparel, magnificent houses, and elegant furniture, were supposed to unite the double guilt of pride and of sensuality. A simple and mortified appearance was more suitable to the christian who was certain of his sins and doubtful of his salvation. In their censures of luxury, the fathers are extremely minute and circumstantial,‡ and among the various articles which excite their pious indignation, we may enumerate false hair, garments of any colour except white, instruments of music, vases of gold or silver, downy pillows, (as Jacob reposed his head on a stone,) white bread, foreign wines, public salutations, the use of warm baths, and the practice of shaving the beard, which, according to the expression of Tertullian, is a lie against our own faces, and an impious attempt to improve the works of the Creator. When christianity was introduced among the rich and the polite, the observation of these singular laws was left, as it would be at present, to the few who were ambitious of superior sanctity. But it is always easy, as well as agreeable, for the inferior ranks of mankind to claim a merit from the contempt of that

The primitive christians condemn pleasure and luxury

* The philosopher Peregrinus (of whose life and death Lucian has left us so entertaining an account) imposed, for a long time, on the credulous simplicity of the christians of Asia.

† See a very judicious treatise of Barbeyrac sur la Morale des Peres Lactant. Institut. Divin. l. ii. c. 20—22.

‡ Consult a work of Clement of Alexandria, entitled the Pedagogue which contains the rudiments of ethics as they were taught in the most celebrated of the christian schools.

† Tertullian, de Spectaculis, c. 23. Clement Alexandrin. Pedagogue l. iii. c. 8.

pomp and pleasure, which fortune has placed beyond their reach. The virtue of the primitive christians, like that of the first Romans, was very frequently guarded by poverty and ignorance.

Their sentiments concerning marriage and chastity. The chaste severity of the fathers, in whatever related to the commerce of the two sexes, flowed from the same principle, their abhorrence of every enjoyment which might gratify the sensual, and degrade the spiritual, nature of man. It was their favourite opinion, that if Adam had preserved his obedience to the Creator, he would have lived for ever in a state of virgin purity, and that some harmless mode of vegetation might have peopled paradise with a race of innocent and immortal beings.<sup>y</sup> The use of marriage was permitted only to his fallen posterity, as a necessary expedient to continue the human species, and as a restraint, however imperfect, on the natural licentiousness of desire. The hesitation of the orthodox casuists on this interesting subject, betrays the perplexity of men, unwilling to approve an institution, which they were compelled to tolerate.<sup>z</sup> The enumeration of the very whimsical laws, which they most circumstantially imposed on the marriage-bed, would force a smile from the young, and a blush from the fair. It was their unanimous sentiment, that a first marriage was adequate to all the purposes of nature and of society. The sensual connexion was refined into a resemblance of the mystic union of Christ with his church, and was pronounced to be indissoluble either by divorce or by death. The practice of second nuptials was branded with the name of a legal adultery, and the persons who were guilty of so scandalous an offence against christian purity, were soon excluded from the honours, and even from the alms, of the church.<sup>a</sup> Since desire was imputed as a crime, and marriage was tolerated as a defect, it was consistent with the same principles to consider a state of celibacy as the nearest approach to the divine perfection. It was with the utmost difficulty that ancient Rome could support the institution of six vestals,<sup>b</sup> but the primitive church was filled with a great number of persons of either sex, who had devoted themselves to the profession of perpetual chastity.<sup>c</sup> A few of these, among whom we may reckon the learned Origen, judged it the most prudent to disarm the tempter.<sup>d</sup> Some were insensible and some were invincible against the assaults of the flesh. Disdaining an ignominious flight, the virgins of the warm climate of Africa encountered the enemy in the closest engagement, they permitted priests and deacons to share their bed, and gloried amidst the flames in their unsullied purity. But insulted nature sometimes vindicated her rights, and this new species of martyrdom served only to introduce a new scandal into the church.<sup>e</sup> Among the christian ascetics, however, (a name which they soon acquired from their painful exercise,) many, as they were less presumptuous, were probably more successful. The loss of sensual pleasure was supplied and compensated by spiritual pride. Even the multitude of pagans were inclined to estimate the merit of the sacrifice by its apparent difficulty, and it was in the praise of these chaste spouses of Christ that the fathers have poured forth the troubled stream of their eloquence.<sup>f</sup> Such are the early traces of monastic principles and institutions, which, in a subsequent age, have counterbalanced all the temporal advantages of Christianity.<sup>g</sup>

The christians were not less averse to the business than to the pleasures of this world. The defence of our persons and property they knew not how to reconcile with the patient doctrine which enjoined an unlimited forgiveness of past injuries, and commanded them to invite the repetition of fresh insults. Their simplicity was offended by the use of oaths, by the pomp of magistracy, and by the active contention of public life, nor could their humane ignorance be convinced, that it was lawful on any occasion to shed the blood of our fellow-creatures, either by the sword of justice, or by that of war, even though their criminal or hostile attempts should threaten the peace and safety of the whole community.<sup>h</sup> It was acknowledged, that, under a less perfect law, the powers of the Jewish constitution had been exercised, with the approbation of heaven, by inspired prophets and by anointed kings. The christians felt and confessed, that such institutions might be necessary for the present system of the world, and they cheerfully submitted to the authority of their pagan governors. But while they inculcated the maxims of passive obedience, they refused to take any active part in the civil administration or the military defence of the empire. Some indulgence might perhaps be allowed to those persons who, before their conversion, were already engaged in such violent and sanguinary

Their aversion to the business of war and government.

<sup>y</sup> Beausobre, Hist. Critique du Manichéisme, l. vii. c. 3. Justin, Gregory of Nyssa, Augustin, &c. strongly inclined to this opinion.

<sup>z</sup> Some of the Gnostic heretics were more consistent: they rejected the use of marriage.

<sup>a</sup> See a chain of tradition, from Justin Martyr to Jerome, in the Morale des Peres, c. iv. 6—26.

<sup>b</sup> See a very curious Dissertation on the Vestals in the Memoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. ix. p. 161—227. Notwithstanding the honours and rewards which are bestowed on those virgins, it was difficult to procure a sufficient number, nor could the dread of the most horrible death always restrain their incontinence.

<sup>c</sup> Cupiditatem procreandi aut inam seminis aut nullam Minuimus, c. 31. Justin Apolog. Major. Athenagoras in Legat. c. 28. Tertullian de Cultu Feminae l. ii.

<sup>d</sup> Eusebius, l. vi. 8. Before the fame of Origen had excited envy and persecution, this extraordinary action was rather admired than censured. As it was his general practice to allegorize scripture, it seems unfortunate that, in this instance only, he should have adopted the literal sense.

<sup>e</sup> Cyprian Epist. 4. and Dodwell Dissertat. Cyprianicæ iii. Something like this rash attempt was long afterwards imputed to the founder of the order of Pontevault. Bayle has amused himself and his readers on that very delicate subject.

<sup>f</sup> Dupin (Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique, tom. i. p. 195) gives a particular account of the dialogue of the ten virgins, as it was composed by Methodius, Bishop of Tyre. The praises of virginity are excessive.

<sup>g</sup> The ascetics (as early as the second century) made a public profession of mortifying their bodies and of abstaining from the use of flesh and wine. Mosheim, p. 310.

<sup>h</sup> See the Morale des Peres. The same patient principles have been revived since the Reformation by the Socinians, the modern Anabaptists and the Quakers. Barclay, the apostle of the Quakers, has protected his brethren, by the authority of the primitive christians, p. 542—549.

occupations,<sup>1</sup> but it was impossible that the christians, without renouncing a more sacred duty, could assume the character of soldiers, of magistrates, or of princes.<sup>k</sup> This indolent or even criminal disregard to the public welfare, exposed them to the contempt and reproaches of the pagans, who very frequently asked, What must be the fate of the empire, attacked on every side by the barbarians, if all mankind should adopt the pusillanimous sentiments of the new sect?<sup>l</sup> To this insulting question the christian apologists returned obscure and ambiguous answers, as they were unwilling to reveal the secret cause of their security, the expectation that, before the conversion of mankind was accomplished, war, government, the Roman empire, and the world itself, would be no more. It may be observed, that, in this instance likewise, the situation of the first christians coincided very happily with their religious scruples, and that their aversion to an active life contributed rather to excuse them from the service, than to exclude them from the honours, of the state and army.

THE FIFTH
CAUSE
The Christians active in the government of the church

V. But the human character, however it may be exalted or depressed by a temporary enthusiasm, will return by degrees to its proper and natural level, and will resume those passions that seem the most adapted to its present condition. The primitive christians were dead to the business and pleasures of the world, but their love of action, which could never be entirely extinguished, soon revived, and found a new occupation in the government of the church. A separate society, which attacked the established religion of the empire, was obliged to adopt some form of internal policy, and to appoint a sufficient number of ministers, intrusted not only with the spiritual functions, but even with the temporal direction, of the christian commonwealth. The safety of that society, its honour, its aggrandizement, were productive, even in the most pious minds, of a spirit of patriotism, such as the first of the Romans had felt for the republic, and sometimes, of a similar indifference, in the use of whatever means might probably conduce to so desirable an end. The ambition of raising themselves or their friends to the honours and offices of the church, was disguised by the laudable intention of devoting to the public benefit, the power and consideration, which, for that purpose only, it became their duty to solicit. In the exercise of their functions, they were frequently called upon to detect the errors of heresy, or the arts of faction, to oppose the designs of perfidious brethren, to stigmatize their characters with deserved infamy, and to expel them from the bosom of a society, whose peace and happiness they had attempted to disturb. The ecclesiastical governors of the christians were taught to unite the wisdom of the serpent with the innocence of the dove, but as the former was refined, so the latter was insensibly corrupted, by the habits of government. In the church as well as in the world, the persons who were placed in any public station rendered themselves considerable by their eloquence and firmness, by their knowledge of mankind, and by their dexterity in business, and while they concealed from others, and perhaps from themselves, the secret motives of their conduct, they too frequently relapsed into all the turbulent passions of active life, which were tinctured with an additional degree of bitterness and obstinacy from the infusion of spiritual zeal.

The government of the church has its primitive freedom and equality often been the subject, as well as the prize, of religious contention. The hostile disputants of Rome, of Paris, of Oxford, and of Geneva, have alike struggled to reduce the primitive and apostolic model<sup>m</sup> to the respective standards of their own policy. The few who have pursued this inquiry with more candour and impartiality, are of opinion,<sup>n</sup> that the apostles declined the office of legislation, and rather chose to endure some partial scandals and divisions, than to exclude the christians of a future age from the liberty of varying their forms of ecclesiastical government according to the changes of times and circumstances. The scheme of policy, which, under their approbation, was adopted for the use of the first century, may be discovered from the practice of Jerusalem, of Ephesus, or of Corinth. The societies which were instituted in the cities of the Roman empire, were united only by the ties of faith and charity. Independence and equality formed the basis of their internal constitution. The want of discipline and human learning was supplied by the occasional assistance of the prophets,<sup>o</sup> who were called to that function without distinction of age, of sex, or of natural abilities, and who, as often as they felt the divine impulse, poured forth the effusions of the spirit in the assembly of the faithful. But these extraordinary gifts were frequently abused or misapplied by the prophetic teachers. They displayed them at an improper season, presumptuously disturbed the service of the assembly, and by their pride or mistaken zeal they introduced, particularly into the apostolic church of Corinth, a long and melancholy train of disorders.<sup>p</sup> As the institution of prophets became useless, and even pernicious, their powers were withdrawn, and their office abolished. The public functions of religion were solely intrusted to the established ministers of the

<sup>1</sup> Tertullian Apolog. c. 21. De Idololatria c. 17. 18. Origen contra Celsum, l. v. p. 253. l. vii. p. 348. l. viii. p. 423—428.

<sup>k</sup> Tertullian (de Corona Militis c. 11) suggests to them the expedient of deserting a counsel which, if it had been generally known, was not very proper to conciliate the favour of the emperors towards the christian sect.

<sup>l</sup> As well as we can judge from the mutilated representation of Origen, (l. viii. p. 423) his adversary, Celsus, had urged his objection with great force and candour.

<sup>m</sup> The aristocratical party in France, as well as in England has strenuously maintained the divine origin of bishops. But the Calvinistical presbyters were impatient of a superior and the Roman pontiff refused to acknowledge an equal. See Fra Paolo.

<sup>n</sup> In the history of the christian hierarchy I have, for the most part followed the learned and candid Mosheim.

<sup>o</sup> For the prophets of the primitive church see Mosheim, Disserta. tuncad Hist. Eccles. pertinentes tam. ii. p. 132—208.

<sup>p</sup> See the epistles of St. Paul, and of Clement, to the Corinthians.

church, the bishops and the presbyters, two appellations, which, in their first origin, appear to have distinguished the same office and the same order of persons. The name of presbyter was expressive of their age, or rather of their gravity and wisdom. The title of bishop denoted their inspection over the faith and manners of the christians who were committed to their pastoral care. In proportion to the respective numbers of the faithful, a larger or smaller number of these episcopal presbyters guided each infant congregation with equal authority, and with united counsels.<sup>q</sup>

Institution of bishops as presidents of the college of presbyters

But the most perfect equality of freedom requires the directing hand of a superior magistrate, and the order of public deliberations soon introduces the office of a president, invested at least with the authority of collecting the sentiments, and of executing the resolutions, of the assembly. A regard for the public tranquillity, which would so frequently have been interrupted by annual or by occasional elections, induced the primitive christians to constitute an honourable and perpetual magistracy, and to choose one of the wisest and most holy among their presbyters to execute, during his life, the duties of their ecclesiastical governor. It was under these circumstances that the lofty title of Bishop began to raise itself above the humble appellation of presbyter, and while the latter remained the most natural distinction for the members of every christian senate, the former was appropriated to the dignity of its new president.<sup>r</sup> The advantages of this episcopal form of government, which appears to have been introduced before the end of the first century,<sup>s</sup> were so obvious, and so important for the future greatness, as well as the present peace, of christianity, that it was adopted without delay by all the societies which were already scattered over the empire, had acquired in a very early period the sanction of antiquity,<sup>t</sup> and is still revered by the most powerful churches, both of the east and of the west, as a primitive and even as a divine establishment.<sup>u</sup> It is needless to observe, that the pious and humble presbyters, who were first dignified with the episcopal title, could not possess, and would probably have rejected, the power and pomp which now encircles the tiara of the Roman pontiff, or the mitre of a German prelate. But we may define, in a few words, the narrow limits of their original jurisdiction, which was chiefly of a spiritual, though in some instances of a temporal, nature.<sup>x</sup> It consisted in the administration of the sacraments and discipline of the church, the superintendency of religious ceremonies, which imperceptibly increased in number and variety, the consecration of ecclesiastical ministers, to whom, the bishop assigned their respective functions, the management of the public fund, and the determination of all such differences as the faithful were unwilling to expose before the tribunal of an idolatrous judge. These powers, during a short period, were exercised according to the advice of the presbyterial college, and with the consent and approbation of the assembly of christians. The primitive bishops were considered only as the first of their equals, and the honourable servants of a free people. Whenever the episcopal chair became vacant by death, a new president was chosen among the presbyters by the suffrage of the whole congregation, every member of which supposed himself invested with a sacred and sacerdotal character.<sup>y</sup>

Such was the mild and equal constitution by which the christians were governed more than an hundred years after the death of the apostles. Every society formed within itself a separate and independent republic, and although the most distant of these little states maintained a mutual as well as friendly intercourse of letters and deputations, the christian world was not yet connected by any supreme authority or legislative assembly. As the numbers of the faithful were gradually multiplied, they discovered the advantages that might result from a closer union of their interest and designs. Towards the end of the second century, the churches of Greece and Asia adopted the useful institutions of provincial synods, and they may justly be supposed to have borrowed the model of a representative council from the celebrated examples of their own country, the Amphictyons, the Achæan league, or the assemblies of the Ionian cities. It was soon established as a custom and as a law, that the bishops of the independent churches should meet in the capital of the province at the stated periods of spring and autumn. Their deliberations were assisted by the advice of a few distinguished presbyters, and moderated by the presence of a listening multitude.<sup>z</sup> Their decrees, which were styled canons, regulated every important controversy of faith and discipline, and it was natural to believe that a liberal effusion of the Holy Spirit would be poured on the united assembly of the delegates of the christian people. The institution of synods was so well suited to private ambition, and to public interest, that in the space of a few years

<sup>q</sup> Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, l vii

<sup>r</sup> See Jerome ad Titum, c 1 and Epistol 85 (in the Benedictine edition, 101) and the elaborate apology of Blondel, pro sententiâ Hieronymi. The ancient state, as it is described by Jerome, of the bishop and presbyters of Alexandria, receives a remarkable confirmation from the patriarch Eutychius (Annal tom 1 p 330 Vers Pocock) whose testimony I know not how to reject, in spite of all the objections of the learned Pearson in his Vindiciæ Ignatiane, part 1 c 11

<sup>s</sup> See the Introduction to the Apocalypse. Bishops, under the name of angels, were already instituted in the seven cities of Asia. And yet the epistle of Clement (which is probably of as ancient a date) does not lead us to discover any traces of episcopacy either at Corinth or Rome.

<sup>t</sup> Nulla ecclesia sine episcopo, has been a fact as well as a maxim since the time of Tertullian and Irenæus.

<sup>u</sup> After we have passed the difficulties of the first century, we find the episcopal government universally established, till it was interrupted by the republican genius of the Swiss and German reformers.

<sup>y</sup> See Mosheim in the first and second centuries. Ignatius (ad Smyrnon, c 3 &c) is fond of exalting the episcopal dignity. Le Clerc (Hist. Eccles. p 569) very bluntly censures his conduct. Mosheim, with a more critical judgment, (p 161) suspects the purity even of the smaller epistles.

<sup>z</sup> Nonne et laici sacerdotes sumus? Tertullian, Exhort ad Castitat c 7. As the human heart is still the same, several of the observations which Mr Hume has made on Enthusiasm (Essays, vol 1 p 76 quarto edit.) may be applied even to real inspiration.

<sup>aa</sup> Acta Concilii Carthaginiensis et Cyprian Edit Fell, p 158. This council was composed of eighty-seven bishops from the provinces of Mauritania, Numidia, and Africa. Some presbyters and deacons resisted at the assembly, præsentis plebis maximâ parte.

it was received throughout the whole empire. A regular correspondence was established between the provincial councils, which mutually communicated and approved their respective proceedings, and the catholic church soon assumed the form, and acquired the strength, of a great federative republic.<sup>a</sup>

As the legislative authority of the particular churches was insensibly superseded by the use of councils, the bishops obtained by their alliance a much larger share of executive and arbitrary power, and as soon as they were connected by a sense of their common interest, they were enabled to attack, with united vigour, the original rights of their clergy and people. The prelates of the third century imperceptibly changed the language of exhortation into that of command, scattered the seeds of future usurpations, and supplied, by scripture allegories and declamatory rhetoric, their deficiency of force and of reason. They exalted the unity and power of the church, as it was represented in the episcopal office, of which every bishop enjoyed an equal and undivided portion.<sup>b</sup> Princes and magistrates, it was often repeated, might boast an earthly claim to a transitory dominion: it was the episcopal authority alone which was derived from the Deity, and extended itself over this and over another world. The bishops were the vicegerents of Christ, the successors of the apostles, and the mystic substitutes of the high priest of the Mosaic law. Their exclusive privilege of conferring the sacerdotal character, invaded the freedom both of clerical and of popular elections, and if, in the administration of the church, they still consulted the judgment of the presbyters, or the inclination of the people, they most carefully inculcated the merit of such a voluntary condescension. The bishops acknowledged the supreme authority which resided in the assembly of their brethren, but in the government of his peculiar diocese, each of them exacted from his flock the same implicit obedience as if that favourite metaphor had been literally just, and as if the shepherd had been of a more exalted nature than that of his sheep.<sup>c</sup> This obedience, however, was not imposed without some efforts on one side, and some resistance on the other. The democratical part of the constitution was, in many places, very warmly supported by the zealous or interested opposition of the inferior clergy. But their patriotism received the ignominious epithets of faction and schism, and the episcopal cause was indebted for its rapid progress to the labours of many active prelates, who, like

Cyprian of Carthage, could reconcile the arts of the most ambitious statesman with the Christian virtues which seem adapted to the character of a saint and martyr.<sup>d</sup>

The same causes which at first had destroyed the equality of the presbyters, introduced among the bishops a pre-eminence of rank, and from thence a superiority of jurisdiction. As often as in the spring and autumn they met in provincial synod, the difference of personal merit and reputation was very sensibly felt among the members of the assembly, and the multitude was governed by the wisdom and eloquence of the few. But the order of public proceedings required a more regular and less invidious distinction, the office of perpetual presidents in the councils of each province, was conferred on the bishops of the principal city, and these aspiring prelates, who soon acquired the lofty titles of metropolitans and primates, secretly prepared themselves to usurp over their episcopal brethren the same authority which the bishops had so lately assumed above the college of presbyters.<sup>e</sup> Nor was it long before an emulation of pre-eminence and power prevailed among the metropolitans themselves, each of them affecting to display, in the most pompous terms, the temporal honours and advantages of the city over which he presided, the numbers and opulence of the christians, who were subject to their pastoral care, the saints and martyrs who had arisen among them, and the purity with which they preserved the tradition of the faith, as it had been transmitted through a series of orthodox bishops from the apostle or the apostolic disciple, to whom the foundation of their church was ascribed.<sup>f</sup> From every cause either of a civil or of an ecclesiastical nature, it was easy to foresee that Rome must enjoy the respect, and would soon claim the obedience, of the provinces. The society of the faithful bore a just proportion to the capital of the empire, and the Roman church was the greatest, the most numerous, and, in regard to the west, the most ancient of all the christian establishments, many of which had received their religion from the pious labours of her missionaries. Instead of one apostolic founder, the utmost boast of Antioch, of Ephesus, or of Corinth, the banks of the Tyber were supposed to have been honoured with the preaching and martyrdom of the two most eminent among the apostles,<sup>g</sup> and the bishops of Rome very prudently claimed the inheritance of whatsoever prerogatives were attributed either to the person or to the office of St. Peter.<sup>h</sup>

Pre-eminence of the metropolitan churches

Ambition of the Roman pontiff

<sup>a</sup> Aguntur præterea per Græcias illas, certis in locis concilia &c Tertullian de Jejuniis c. 13. The African mentions it as a recent and foreign institution. The coalition of the christian churches is very ably explained by Mosheim p. 164—170.

<sup>b</sup> Cyprian, in his admired treatise De Unitate Ecclesiae, p. 75—86.

<sup>c</sup> We may appeal to the whole tenor of Cyprian's conduct of his doctrine and of his epistles. Le Clerc in a short life of Cyprian (Bibliothèque Universelle tom. xii. p. 207—378) has laid him open with great freedom and accuracy.

<sup>d</sup> If Novatus, Felicissimus &c whom the bishop of Carthage expelled from his church and from Africa were not the most detestable monsters of wickedness the zeal of Cyprian must occasionally have prevailed over his veracity. For a very just account of these obscure quarrels see Mosheim p. 497—512.

<sup>e</sup> Mosheim p. 203, 574 Dupin Antiquæ Ecclesæ Disciplinæ p. 10, 20 & Tertullian, in a distinct treatise, has pleaded against the heretics the right of prescription, as it was held by the apostolic churches.

<sup>f</sup> The journey of St. Peter to Rome is mentioned by most of the ancients (see Eusebius ii. 25) maintained by all the catholics, allowed by some protestants (see Pearson and Dodwell de Success. Episcop. Roman.) but has been vigorously attacked by Spelman (Miscellaneæ Sæcra iii. 3). According to father Harloui the monks of the thirteenth century, who composed the Æneid represented St. Peter under the allegorical character of the Trojan hero.

<sup>h</sup> It is in Trenchard only, that the famous allusion to St. Peter's name is

The bishops of Italy and of the provinces were disposed to allow them a primacy of order and association (such was their very accurate expression) in the christian aristocracy.<sup>1</sup> But the power of a monarch was rejected with abhorrence, and the aspiring genius of Rome experienced from the nations of Asia and Africa, a more vigorous resistance to her spiritual, than she had formerly done to her temporal, dominion. The patriotic Cyprian, who ruled with the most absolute sway the church of Carthage and the provincial synods, opposed with resolution and success the ambition of the Roman pontiff, artfully connected his own cause with that of the eastern bishops, and, like Hannibal, sought out new allies in the heart of Asia.<sup>2</sup> If this Punic war was carried on without any effusion of blood, it was owing much less to the moderation than to the weakness of the contending prelates. Invectives and excommunications were then only weapons, and these, during the progress of the whole controversy, they hurled against each other with equal fury and devotion. The hard necessity of censuring either a pope, or a saint and martyr, distresses the modern catholics, whenever they are obliged to relate the particulars of a dispute, in which the champions of religion indulged such passions as seem much more adapted to the senate or to the camp.<sup>3</sup>

Laity and clergy

The progress of the ecclesiastical authority gave birth to the memorable distinction of the laity and of the clergy, which had been unknown to the Greeks and Romans.<sup>4</sup> The former of these appellations comprehended the body of the christian people, the latter, according to the signification of the word, was appropriated to the chosen portion that had been set apart for the service of religion, a celebrated order of men which has furnished the most important, though not always the most edifying, subjects for modern history. Their mutual hostilities sometimes disturbed the peace of the infant church, but their zeal and activity were united in the common cause, and the love of power, which (under the most artful disguises) could insinuate itself into the breasts of bishops and martyrs, animated them to increase the number of their subjects, and to enlarge the limits of the christian empire. They were destitute of any temporal force, and they were for a long time discouraged and oppressed, rather than assisted, by the civil magistrate, but they had acquired, and they employed within their own society, the two most efficacious instruments of government, rewards and punishments, the former derived from the pious liberality, the latter from the devout apprehensions, of the faithful.

I The community of goods, which had so agreeably amused the imagination of Plato,<sup>5</sup> and which subsisted in some degree among the austere sect of the Essenians,<sup>6</sup> was adopted for a short time in the primitive church. The fervour of the first proselytes prompted them to sell those worldly possessions, which they despised, to lay the price of them at the feet of the apostles, and to content themselves with receiving an equal share out of the general distribution.<sup>7</sup> The progress of the christian religion relaxed and gradually abolished this generous institution, which, in hands less pure than those of the apostles, would too soon have been corrupted and abused by the returning selfishness of human nature, and the converts who embraced the new religion were permitted to retain the possession of their patrimony, to receive legacies and inheritances, and to increase their separate property by all the lawful means of trade and industry. Instead of an absolute sacrifice, a moderate proportion was accepted by the ministers of the gospel, and in their weekly or monthly assemblies, every believer, according to the exigency of the occasion, and the measure of his wealth and piety, presented his voluntary offering for the use of the common fund.<sup>8</sup> Nothing, however inconsiderable, was refused, but it was diligently inculcated, that, in the article of tithes, the Mosaic law was still of divine obligation, and that since the Jews, under a less perfect discipline, had been commanded to pay a tenth part of all that they possessed, it would become the disciples of Christ to distinguish themselves by a superior degree of liberality,<sup>9</sup> and to acquire some merit by resigning a superfluous treasure, which must so soon be annihilated with the world itself.<sup>10</sup> It is almost unnecessary to observe, that the revenue of each particular church, which was of so uncertain and fluctuating a nature, must have varied with the poverty or the opulence of the faithful, as they were dispersed in obscure villages, or collected in the great cities of the empire. In the time of the emperor Decius, it was the opinion exact. Tu es Pierre, et sur cette pierre—The same is imperfect in Greek, Latin, Italian, &c. and totally unintelligible in our Pentecost languages.

<sup>1</sup> Irenæus adv. Hæreses, iii. 3. Tertullian de Prescription c. 36 and Cyprian Epistol. 27, 50, 71, 75. Le Clerc (Hist. Eccles. p. 764) and Mosheim (p. 258, 278) labour in the interpretation of these passages. But the loose and rhetorical style of the fathers often appears favourable to the pretensions of Rome.

<sup>2</sup> See the sharp epistle from Firmilianus, bishop of Caesarea, to Stephen, bishop of Rome, ap. Cyprian Epistol. 75.

<sup>3</sup> Concerning this dispute of the re-baptism of heretics, see the epistles of Cyprian and the seventh book of Irenæus.

<sup>4</sup> From the origin of these words, see Mosheim p. 141. Spinheim, Hist. Ecclesiast. p. 633. The distinction of Clerus and Laicus was established before the time of Tertullian.

<sup>5</sup> The community instituted by Plato is more perfect than that which Sir Thomas More has imagined for his Utopia. The community of women, and that of temporal goods, may be considered as inseparable parts of the same system.

<sup>6</sup> Joseph Antiquitat. xviii. 2. Philo, de Vit. Contemplativ.

<sup>7</sup> See the Acts of the Apostles, c. 2, 4, 5 with Grotius's Commentary Mosheim, in a particular dissertation, attacks the common opinion with very inconclusive arguments.

<sup>8</sup> Justin Martyr, Apolog. Major, c. 89. Tertullian, Apolog. c. 39.

<sup>9</sup> Irenæus ad Hæres. i. iv. c. 27, 31. Origen in Num. Hom. ii. Cyprian de Unitat. Eccles. Constitut. Apostol. i. ii. c. 34, 35 with the notes of Cotelerius. The Constitutions introduce this divine precept, by declaring that priests are as much above kings, as the soul is above the body. Among the tithable articles, they enumerate corn, wine, oil, and wool. On this interesting subject, consult Pridaure's History of Tithes, and Fra Paolo delle Materie Beneficarie, two writers of a very different character.

<sup>10</sup> The same opinion which prevailed about the year one thousand, was productive of the same effects. Most of the donations express their motive, "appropinquante mundi fine." See Mosheim's General History of the Church, vol. i. p. 457.

of the magistrates, that the christians of Rome were possessed of very considerable wealth, that vessels of gold and silver were used in their religious worship, and that many among their proselytes had sold their lands and houses to increase the public riches of the sect, at the expense, indeed, of their unfortunate children, who found themselves beggars, because their parents had been saints. We should listen with distrust to the suspicions of strangers and enemies on this occasion, however, they receive a very specious and probable colour from the two following circumstances, the only ones that have reached our knowledge, which define any precise sums, or convey any distinct idea. Almost at the same period, the bishop of Carthage, from a society less opulent than that of Rome, collected an hundred thousand sesterces, (above eight hundred and fifty pounds sterling,) on a sudden call of charity to redeem the brethren of Numidia, who had been carried away captives by the barbarians of the desert. About an hundred years before the reign of Decius, the Roman church had received, in a single donation, the sum of two hundred thousand sesterces from a stranger of Pontus, who proposed to fix his residence in the capital. These oblations, for the most part, were made in money, nor was the society of christians either desirous or capable of acquiring, to any considerable degree, the incumbrance of landed property. It had been provided by several laws, which were enacted with the same design as our statutes of mortmain, that no real estates should be given or bequeathed to any corporate body, without either a special privilege or a particular dispensation from the emperor or from the senate, who were seldom disposed to grant them in favour of a sect, at first the object of their contempt, and at last of their fears and jealousy. A transaction however is related under the reign of Alexander Severus, which discovers that the restraint was sometimes eluded or suspended, and that the christians were permitted to claim and to possess lands within the limits of Rome itself. The progress of christianity, and the civil confusion of the empire, contributed to relax the severity of the laws, and before the close of the third century many considerable estates were bestowed on the opulent churches of Rome, Milan, Carthage, Antioch, Alexandria, and the other great cities of Italy and the provinces.

* Tum summa cura est fratribus
(Ut sermo testatur loquax,) Offerre, fundis venditis,
Sextertiorum millia
Addita avorum prædia
Fœdis sub auctionibus
Successor ætheres gemit
Sanctis egens parentibus
Hæc occutuntur abditis
Ecclesiarum in angustis
Et summa pietas creditur
Nudare dulces liberos

Prudent περί σφραγῶν Hymn 2.

The subsequent conduct of the deacon Laurence only proves how proper a use was made of the wealth of the Roman church, it was undoubtedly very considerable but Fra Paolo (c 3) appears to exaggerate when he supposes, that the successors of Commodus were urged to persecute the christians by their own avarice or that of their pre-

The bishop was the natural steward of the church, the public stock was intrusted to his care without account or control, the presbyters were confined to their spiritual functions, and the more dependent order of deacons was solely employed in the management and distribution of the ecclesiastical revenue. If we may give credit to the vehement declamations of Cyprian, there were too many among his African brethren, who, in the execution of their charge, violated every precept, not only of evangelic perfection, but even of moral virtue. By some of these unfaithful stewards the riches of the church were lavished in sensual pleasures, by others they were perverted to the purposes of private gain, of fraudulent purchases, and of rapacious usury. But as long as the contributions of the christian people were free and unconstrained, the abuse of their confidence could not be very frequent, and the general uses to which their liberality was applied, reflected honour on the religious society. A decent portion was reserved for the maintenance of the bishop and his clergy, a sufficient sum was allotted for the expenses of the public worship, of which the feasts of love, the agapæ, as they were called, constituted a very pleasing part. The whole remainder was the sacred patrimony of the poor. According to the discretion of the bishop, it was distributed to support widows and orphans, the lame, the sick, and the aged of the community, to comfort strangers and pilgrims, and to alleviate the misfortunes of prisoners and captives, more especially when their sufferings had been occasioned by their firm attachment to the cause of religion. A generous intercourse of charity united the most distant provinces, and the smaller congregations were cheerfully assisted by the alms of their more opulent brethren. Such an institution, which paid less regard to the merit than to the distress of the object, very materially conduced to the progress of christianity. The pagans, who were actuated by a sense of humanity, while they derided the doctrines, acknowledged the benevolence, of the new sect. The prospect of immediate relief and of future protection allured into its hospitable bosom many of those unhappy persons whom the neglect of the world would have abandoned to the miseries of want, of sickness, and of old age. There is some reason likewise to believe, that great numbers of infants, who, according to the inhuman

Distribution of the revenue.

u Cyprian Epistol 62

x Tertullian de Præscriptione, c 20

y Diocletian gave a rescript, which is only a declaration of the old law "Collegium, si nullo speciali privilegio subnixum sit, hæreditatem capere non potest dubium non est." Fra Paolo (c 4) thinks that these regulations had been much neglected since the reign of Valerian.

z Hist. August p 131. The ground had been public and was now disputed between the society of christians, and that of butchers.

a Constitut Apostol 11 35

b Cyprian de Lapsis, p 89 Epistol 65 The charge is confirmed by the 19th and 20th canon of the council of Nîmes.

c See the apologies of Justin, Tertullian, &c d The wealth and liberality of the Romans to their most distant brethren is gratefully celebrated by Dionysius of Corinth, ap Euseb 1 iv c 23

e See Lucian in Peregrin Julian (Epist 49) seems mortified, that the christian charity maintains not only their own, but likewise the heathen poor

practice of the times had been exposed by their parents, were frequently rescued from death, baptized, educated, and maintained by the piety of the christians, and at the expense of the public treasure<sup>f</sup>

Excommunication II It is the undoubted right of every society to exclude from its communion and benefits such among its members as reject or violate those regulations which have been established by general consent. In the exercise of this power, the censures of the christian church were chiefly directed against scandalous sinners, and particularly those who were guilty of murder, of fraud, or of incontinence, against the authors, or the followers, of any heretical opinions which had been condemned by the judgment of the episcopal order, and against those unhappy persons, who, whether from choice or from compulsion, had polluted themselves after their baptism by any act of idolatrous worship. The consequences of excommunication were of a temporal as well as a spiritual nature. The christian against whom it was pronounced, was deprived of any part in the oblations of the faithful. The ties both of religious and of private friendship were dissolved. He found himself a profane object of abhorrence to the persons whom he the most esteemed, or by whom he had been the most tenderly beloved, and as far as an expulsion from a respectable society could imprint on his character a mark of disgrace, he was shunned or suspected by the generality of mankind. The situation of these unfortunate exiles was in itself very painful and melancholy, but, as it usually happens, their apprehensions far exceeded their sufferings. The benefits of the christian communion were those of eternal life, nor could they erase from their minds the awful opinion, that to those ecclesiastical governors by whom they were condemned, the Deity had committed the keys of hell and of paradise. The heretics, indeed, who might be supported by the consciousness of their intentions, and by the flattering hope that they alone had discovered the true path of salvation, endeavoured to regain, in their separate assemblies, those comforts, temporal as well as spiritual, which they no longer derived from the great society of christians. But almost all those who had reluctantly yielded to the power of vice or idolatry, were sensible of their fallen condition, and anxiously desirous of being restored to the benefits of the christian communion.

With regard to the treatment of these penitents, two opposite opinions, the one of justice, the other of mercy, divided the primitive church. The more rigid and inflexible casuists refused them for ever, and without exception, the meanest place in the holy community, which they had disgraced or deserted, and leaving them to the remorse of a guilty conscience, indulged them only with a faint ray of hope, that the contrition of their life and death might possibly be accepted by the Supreme Being. A milder sentiment was embraced in practice as well as in theory, by the purest and most respectable of the Christian churches.<sup>h</sup> The gates of reconciliation and of heaven were seldom shut against the returning penitent, but a severe and solemn form of discipline was instituted, which, while it served to expiate his crime, might powerfully deter the spectators from the imitation of his example. Humbled by a public confession, emaciated by fasting, and clothed in sackcloth, the penitent lay prostrate at the door of the assembly, imploring with tears the pardon of his offences, and soliciting the prayers of the faithful.<sup>i</sup> If the fault was of a very heinous nature, whole years of penance were esteemed an inadequate satisfaction to the divine justice, and it was always by slow and painful gradations that the sinner, the heretic, or the apostate, was re-admitted into the bosom of the church. A sentence of perpetual excommunication was, however, reserved for some crimes of an extraordinary magnitude, and particularly for the inexorable relapses of those penitents who had already experienced and abused the clemency of their ecclesiastical superiors. According to the circumstances or the number of the guilty, the exercise of the christian discipline was varied by the discretion of the bishops. The councils of Ancyra and Illiberis were held about the same time, the one in Galatia, the other in Spain, but their respective canons, which are still extant, seem to breathe a very different spirit. The Galatian, who after his baptism had repeatedly sacrificed to idols, might obtain his pardon by a penance of seven years, and if he had seduced others to imitate his example, only three years more were added to the term of his exile. But the unhappy Spaniard, who had committed the same offence, was deprived of the hope of reconciliation, even in the article of death, and his idolatry was placed at the head of a list of seventeen other crimes, against which a sentence no less terrible was pronounced. Among these we may distinguish the inexpressible guilt of calumniating a bishop, a presbyter, or even a deacon.<sup>k</sup>

The well-tempered mixture of liberality and rigour, the judicious dispensation of rewards and punishments, according to the maxims of policy as well as justice, constituted the human strength of the church. The

<sup>f</sup> Such, at least, has been the laudable conduct of more modern missionaries, under the same circumstances. Above three thousand new born infants are annually exposed in the streets of Pekin. See Le Comte Memoires sur la Chine, and the Recherches sur les Chinois et les Egyptiens, tom. i. p. 61.

<sup>g</sup> The Montanists and the Novatians, who adhered to this opinion with the greatest rigour and obstinacy, found themselves at last in the number of excommunicated heretics. See the learned and copious Morheim, Secl. ii. and, iii.

<sup>h</sup> Dionysius ap. Euseb. iv. 23. Cyprian de Lapsis.

<sup>i</sup> Cave's Primitive Christianity, part iii. c. 5. The admirers of antiquity regret the loss of this public penance.

<sup>k</sup> See in Dupin Bibliothèque Ecclesiastique tom. ii. p. 304—313 a short but rational exposition of the canons of those councils, which were assembled in the first moments of tranquillity, after the persecution of Diocletian. This persecution had been much less severely felt in Spain than in Galatia: a difference which may, in some measure, account for the contrast of their regulations.

bishops, whose paternal care extended itself to the government of both worlds, were sensible of the importance of these prerogatives, and covering their ambition with the fair pretence of the love of order, they were jealous of any rival in the exercise of a discipline so necessary to prevent the desertion of those troops which had enlisted themselves under the banner of the cross, and whose numbers every day became more considerable. From the imperious declamations of Cyprian, we should naturally conclude, that the doctrines of excommunication and penance formed the most essential part of religion, and that it was much less dangerous for the disciples of Christ to neglect the observance of the moral duties, than to despoise the censures and authority of their bishops. Sometimes we might imagine that we were listening to the voice of Moses, when he commanded the earth to open, and to swallow up, in consuming flames, the rebellious race which refused obedience to the priesthood of Aaron, and we should sometimes suppose that we heard a Roman consul asserting the majesty of the republic, and declaring his inflexible resolution to enforce the rigour of the laws. "If such irregularities are suffered with impunity, (it is thus that the bishop of Carthage chides the lenity of his colleague,) if such irregularities are suffered, there is an end of episcopal vigour,<sup>1</sup> an end of the sublime and divine power of governing the church, an end of christianity itself." Cyprian had renounced those temporal honours, which it is probable he would never have obtained, but the acquisition of such absolute command over the consciences and understanding of a congregation, however obscure or despised by the world, is more truly grateful to the pride of the human heart, than the possession of the most despotic power, imposed by arms and conquest on a reluctant people.

Recapitulation of the five causes.

In the course of this important, though perhaps tedious, inquiry, I have attempted to display the secondary causes which so efficaciously assisted the truth of the christian religion. If among these causes we have discovered any artificial ornaments, any accidental circumstances, or any mixture of error and passion, it cannot appear surprising that mankind should be the most sensibly affected by such motives as were suited to their imperfect nature. It was by the aid of these causes, exclusive zeal, the immediate expectation of another world, the claim of miracles, the practice of rigid virtue, and the constitution of the primitive church, that Christianity spread itself with so much success in the Roman empire. To the first of these the christians were indebted for their invincible valour, which disdained to capitulate with the enemy whom they were resolved to vanquish. The three succeeding causes supplied their valour with the most formidable arms. The last of these causes united their courage, directed their arms, and gave their efforts that irresistible weight, which even a small band of well-trained and intrepid volunteers has so often possessed over an undisciplined multitude, ignorant of the subject, and careless of the event of the war. In the various religions of polytheism, some wandering fanatics of Egypt and Syria, who addressed themselves to the credulous superstition of the populace, were perhaps the order of priests<sup>m</sup> that derived their whole support and credit from their sacerdotal profession, and were very deeply affected by a personal concern for the safety or prosperity of their tutelar deities. The ministers of polytheism, both in Rome and in the provinces, were, for the most part, men of a noble birth, and of an affluent fortune, who received as an honourable distinction the care of a celebrated temple, or of a public sacrifice, exhibited, very frequently at their own expense, the sacred games,<sup>a</sup> and with cold indifference performed the ancient rites, according to the laws and fashion of their country. As they were engaged in the ordinary occupations of life, their zeal and devotion were seldom animated by a sense of interest, or by the habits of an ecclesiastical character. Confined to their respective temples and cities, they remained without any connexion of discipline or government, and whilst they acknowledged the supreme jurisdiction of the senate, of the college of pontiffs, and of the emperor, those civil magistrates contented themselves with the easy task of maintaining, in peace and dignity, the general worship of mankind. We have already seen how various, how loose, and how uncertain were the religious sentiments of polytheists. They were abandoned, almost without control, to the natural workings of a superstitious fancy. The accidental circumstances of their life and situation determined the object as well as the degree of their devotion, and as long as their adoration was successively prostituted to a thousand deities, it was scarcely possible that their hearts could be susceptible of a very sincere or lively passion for any of them.

When christianity appeared in the world, even these faint and imperfect impressions had lost much of their original power. Human reason, which by its unassisted strength is incapable of perceiving the mysteries of faith, had already obtained an easy triumph over the folly of paganism, and when Tertullian or Lactantius employ their labours in exposing its falsehood and extravagance, they are obliged to transcribe the eloquence of Cicero or the wit of Lucian. The contagion of these sceptical writings had been diffused far beyond the number of their readers. The fashion of incredulity was

Weakness of polytheism

The scepticism of the pagan world proved favourable to the new religion,

<sup>1</sup> Cyprian, Epist. 69.

<sup>m</sup> The arts, the manners, and the vices of the priests of the Syrian goddess are very humorously described by Apuleius, in the eighth book of his Metamorphoses.

<sup>a</sup> The office of Asarcl was of this nature, and it is frequently mentioned in Aristides, the Incriptions, &c. It was annual and elective.

None but the vainest citizens could desire the honour, none but the most wealthy could support the expense. See in the Patres Apostolici n. p. 260 with how much indifference Philip the Asarcl conducted himself in the martyrdom of Polycarp. There were likewise Bithynarchs, Lycarchs, &c.

communicated from the philosopher to the man of pleasure or business, from the noble to the plebeian, and from the master to the menial slave who waited at his table, and who eagerly listened to the freedom of his conversation. On public occasions the philosophic part of mankind affected to treat with respect and decency the religious institutions of their country, but their secret contempt penetrated through the thin and awkward disguise, and even the people, when they discovered that their deities were rejected and derided by those whose rank or understanding they were accustomed to reverence, were filled with doubts and apprehensions concerning the truth of those doctrines, to which they had yielded the most implicit belief. The decline of ancient prejudice exposed a very numerous portion of human kind to the danger of a painful and comfortless situation. A state of scepticism and suspense may amuse a few inquisitive minds. But the practice of superstition is so congenial to the multitude, that if they are forcibly awakened, they still regret the loss of their pleasing vision. Their love of the marvellous and supernatural, their curiosity with regard to future events, and their strong propensity to extend their hopes and fears beyond the limits of the visible world, were the principal causes which favoured the establishment of polytheism. So urgent on the vulgar is the necessity of believing, that the fall of any system of mythology will most probably be succeeded by the introduction of some other mode of superstition. Some deities of a more recent and fashionable cast might soon have occupied the deserted temples of Jupiter and Apollo, if, in the decisive moment, the wisdom of Providence had not interposed a genuine revelation, fitted to inspire the most rational esteem and conviction, whilst, at the same time, it was adorned with all that could attract the curiosity, the wonder, and the veneration of the people. In their actual disposition, as many were almost disengaged from their artificial prejudices, but equally susceptible and desirous of a devout attachment, an object much less deserving would have been sufficient to fill the vacant place in their hearts, and to gratify the uncertain eagerness of their passions. Those who are inclined to pursue this reflection, instead of viewing with astonishment the rapid progress of christianity, will perhaps be surprised that its success was not still more rapid and still more universal.

as well as the peace and union of the Roman empire

It has been observed, with truth as well as propriety, that the conquests of Rome prepared and facilitated those of christianity. In the second chapter of this work we have attempted to explain in what manner the most civilized provinces of Europe, Asia, and Africa, were united under the dominion of one sovereign, and gradually connected by the most intimate ties of laws, of manners, and of language. The Jews of Palestine, who had fondly expected a temporal deliverer, gave so cold a reception to the miracles of the divine Prophet, that it was found unnecessary to publish, or at least to preserve, any Hebrew gospel.<sup>o</sup> The authentic histories of the actions of Christ were composed in the Greek language, at a considerable distance from Jerusalem, and after the Gentile converts were grown extremely numerous.<sup>p</sup> As soon as those histories were translated into the Latin tongue, they were perfectly intelligible to all the subjects of Rome, excepting only to the peasants of Syria and Egypt, for whose benefit particular versions were afterwards made. The public highways, which had been constructed for the use of the legions, opened an easy passage for the christian missionaries from Damascus to Corinth, and from Italy to the extremity of Spain or Britain, nor did those spiritual conquerors encounter any of the obstacles which usually retard or prevent the introduction of a foreign religion into a distant country. There is the strongest reason to believe, that before the reigns of Diocletian and Constantine, the faith of Christ had been preached in every province, and in all the great cities of the empire, but the foundations of the several congregations, the numbers of the faithful who composed them, and their proportion to the unbelieving multitude, are now buried in obscurity, or disguised by fiction and declamation. Such imperfect circumstances, however, as have reached our knowledge concerning the increase of the christian name in Asia and Greece, in Egypt, in Italy, and in the west, we shall now proceed to relate, without neglecting the real or imaginary acquisitions which lay beyond the frontiers of the Roman empire.

Historical view of the progress of christianity

The rich provinces that extend from the Enphrates to the Ionian sea, were the principal theatre on which the apostle of the gentiles displayed his zeal and piety. The seeds of the gospel, which he had scattered in a fertile soil, were diligently cultivated by his disciples, and it should seem that, during the two first centuries, the most considerable body of christians was contained within those limits. Among the societies which were instituted in Syria, none were more ancient or more illustrious than those of Damascus, of Berea or Aleppo, and of Antioch. The prophetic introduction of the Apocalypse has described and immortalized the seven churches of Asia, Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira,<sup>q</sup> Sardes, Laodicea, and Philadelphia, and their colonies were soon diffused over that populous country. In a very early period, the islands of Cyprus and Crete, the provinces of Thrace and Macedonia, gave a favourable reception to the new religion, and christian

In the east.

<sup>o</sup> The modern critics are not disposed to believe what the fathers almost unanimously assert that St. Matthew composed a Hebrew gospel of which only the Greek translation is extant. It seems, however, dangerous to reject their testimony.

<sup>p</sup> Under the reigns of Nero and Domitian, and in the cities of Alexandria, Antioch, Rome, and Ephesus. See Mill Prolegomena ad Nov. Testament. and Dr. J. J. Orelli's fair and extensive collection, vol. xv.

<sup>q</sup> The Alogians (Epiphanius de Hæres. 51) disputed the genuineness of the Apocalypse, because the church of Thyatira was not yet founded. Epiphanius, who allows the fact, extricates himself from the republics were soon founded in the cities of Corinth, of Sparta, and of Athens.* The antiquity of the Greek and Asiatic churches allowed a sufficient space of time for their increase and multiplication, and even the swarms of Gnostics and other heretics serve to display the flourishing condition of the orthodox church, since the appellation of heretics has always been applied to the less numerous party. To these domestic testimonies we may add the confession, the complaints, and the apprehensions of the gentiles themselves. From the writings of Lucian, a philosopher who had studied mankind, and who describes their manners in the most lively colours, we may learn, that, under the reign of Commodus, his native country of Pontus was filled with Epicureans and christians†. Within fourscore years after the death of Christ, the humane Pliny laments the magnitude of the evil which he vainly attempted to eradicate. In his very curious epistle to the emperor Trajan, he affirms, that the temples were almost deserted, that the sacred victims scarcely found any purchasers, and that the superstition had not only infected the cities, but had even spread itself into the villages and the open country of Pontus and Bithynia‡.

Without descending into a minute scrutiny of the expressions, or of the motives, of those writers who either celebrate or lament the progress of christianity in the east, it may in general be observed, that none of them have left us any grounds from whence a just estimate might be formed of the real numbers of the faithful in those provinces. One circumstance, however, has been fortunately preserved, which seems to cast a more distinct light on this obscure but interesting subject. Under the reign of Theodosius, after christianity had enjoyed, during more than sixty years, the sunshine of imperial favour, the ancient and illustrious church of Antioch consisted of one hundred thousand persons, three thousand of whom were supported out of the public oblations§. The splendour and dignity of the queen of the east, the acknowledged populousness of Cæsarea, Seleucia, and Alexandria, and the destruction of two hundred and fifty thousand souls in the earthquake which afflicted Antioch under the elder Justin,¶ are so many convincing proofs that the whole number of its inhabitants was not less than half a million, and that the christians, however multiplied by zeal and power, did not exceed a fifth part of that great city. How different a proportion must we adopt when we compare the persecuted with the triumphant church, the west with the East, remote villages with populous towns, and countries recently converted to the faith, with the place where the believers first received the appellation of Christians! It must not, however, be dissembled, that, in another passage, Chrysostom, to whom we are indebted for this useful information, computes the multitude of the faithful as even superior to that of the Jews and pagans*. But the solution of this apparent difficulty is easy and obvious. The eloquent preacher draws a parallel between the civil and the ecclesiastical constitution of Antioch, between the list of christians who had acquired heaven by baptism, and the list of citizens who had a right to share the public liberality. Slaves, strangers, and infants were comprised in the former, they were excluded from the latter.

The extensive commerce of Alexandria, and its proximity to Palestine, In Egypt gave an easy entrance to the new religion. It was at first embraced by great numbers of the Therapeutæ, or Essenians of the lake Mareotis, a Jewish sect which had abated much of its reverence for the Mosaic ceremonies. The austere life of the Essenians, their fasts and excommunications, the community of goods, the love of celibacy, their zeal for martyrdom, and the warmth though not the purity of their faith, already offered a very lively image of the primitive discipline. It was in the school of Alexandria that the christian theology appears to have assumed a regular and scientific form, and when Hadrian visited Egypt, he found a church composed of Jews and of Greeks, sufficiently important to attract the notice of that inquisitive prince. But the progress of christianity was for a long time confined within the limits of a single city, which was itself a foreign colony, and till the close of the second century the predecessors of Demetrius were the only prelates of the Egyptian church. Three bishops were consecrated by the hands of Demetrius, and the number was increased to twenty by his successor Heraclas. The body of the natives, a people distinguished by a sullen inflexibility of temper, entertained the new doctrine with coldness and reluctance, and even in the time of Origen, it was rare to meet with an Egyptian who had surmounted his early prejudices in favour of the sacred animals of his country. As soon, indeed, as christianity difficulty by ingeniously supposing, that St. John wrote in the spirit of prophecy. See Abauzit Discours sur l'Apocalypse.

* The epistles of Ignatius and Dionysius (see Euseb. iv. 23.) point out many churches in Asia and Greece. That of Athens seems to have been one of the least flourishing.

† Lucian in Alexandro c. 25. Christianity, however, must have been very unequally diffused over Pontus, since in the middle of the third century there were no more than seventeen believers in the extensive diocese of Neo-Cæsarea. See M. de Tillmont Mémoires I. ecclesiast. tom. iv. p. 675 from Basil and Gregory of Nyssa, who were themselves natives of Cappadocia.

‡ According to the ancients, Jesus Christ suffered under the consulship of the two Gemini, in the year 29 of our present æra, Pliny was sent into Bithynia (according to Pagi) in the year 110.

§ Philo. i. p. 1. & 177.

* Chrysostom Opera tom. vii. p. 658. 810.

¶ John Malek tom. ii. p. 144. He draws the same conclusion with regard to the populousness of Antioch.

* Chrysostom tom. i. 592. I am indebted for these passages, though not for my inference to the learned Dr. Lardner. Credibility of the Gospel History vol. xii. p. 370.

† Basnage, Histoire des Juifs, l. 2. c. 20—23 has examined with the most critical accuracy the curious treatise of Philo, which describes the Therapeutæ. By proving that it was composed as early as the time of Augustus, Basnage has demonstrated, in spite of Eusebius (l. ii. c. 17) and a crowd of modern catholics, that the Therapeutæ were neither christians nor monks. It still remains probable that they changed their name, preserved their manners, adopted some new articles of faith, and gradually became the fathers of the Egyptian Ascetics.

‡ See a letter of Hadrian in the Augustan History p. 245.

§ For the succession of Alexandrian bishops, consult Renaudot's History, p. 24, &c. This curious fact is preserved by the patriarch Eulychius (Annal tom. i. p. 334. Vers. Pocock) and its internal evidence would alone be a sufficient answer to all the objections which Bishop Pearson has urged in the Vindiciæ Ignorantiæ.

¶ Ammian. Marcellin. xxii. 16. c. Origen contra Celsum, l. i. p. 40.

ascended the throne, the zeal of those barbarians obeyed the prevailing impulsion, the cities of Egypt were filled with bishops, and the deserts of Thebais swarmed with hermits.

In Rome A perpetual stream of strangers and provincials flowed into the capacious bosom of Rome. Whatever was strange or odious, whoever was guilty or suspected, might hope, in the obscurity of that immense capital, to elude the vigilance of the law. In such a various conflux of nations, every teacher, either of truth or of falsehood, every founder, whether of a virtuous or criminal association, might easily multiply his disciples or accomplices. The christians of Rome, at the time of the accidental persecution of Nero, are represented by Tacitus as already amounting to a very great multitude,<sup>f</sup> and the language of that great historian is almost similar to the style employed by Livy, when he relates the introduction and the suppression of the rites of Bacchus. After the Bacchanals had awakened the severity of the senate, it was likewise apprehended that a very great multitude as it were another people, had been initiated into those abhorred mysteries. A more careful inquiry soon demonstrated, that the offenders did not exceed seven thousand, a number indeed sufficiently alarming when considered as the object of public justice.<sup>g</sup> It is with the same candid allowance that we should interpret the vague expressions of Tacitus, and in a former instance of Pliny, when they exaggerate the crowds of deluded fanatics who had forsaken the established worship of the gods. The church of Rome was undoubtedly the first and most populous of the empire, and we are possessed of an authentic record which attests the state of religion in that city about the middle of the third century, and after a space of thirty-eight years. The clergy at that time, consisted of a bishop, forty-six presbyters, seven deacons as many sub-deacons, forty-two acolythes, and fifty readers, exorcists, and porters. The number of widows, of the infirm, and of the poor, who were maintained by the oblations of the faithful, amounted to fifteen hundred.<sup>h</sup> From reason, as well as from the analogy of Antioch, we may venture to estimate the christians of Rome at about fifty thousand. The populousness of that great capital cannot perhaps be exactly ascertained, but the most modest calculation will not surely reduce it lower than a million of inhabitants, of whom Christians might constitute at the most a twentieth part.<sup>i</sup>

<sup>f</sup> Ingenis multitudinis is the expression of Tacitus xv. 44. <sup>g</sup> T. liv. xxxix. 12, 14-17. Nothing could exceed the horror and consternation of the senate on the discovery of the Bacchanals, whose depravity is described, and perhaps exaggerated, by Livy. <sup>h</sup> Euseb. i. vi. c. 43. The Latin translator (M. de Valdes) has thought proper to reduce the number of presbyters to forty-four. <sup>i</sup> This proportion of the presbyters and of the poor, to the rest of the people, was originally fixed by Burnet, (Travels into Italy, p. 168) and is approved by Drey (vol. ii. p. 151). They were both unacquainted with the practice of Chrysostom, which converts their conjecture almost into a fact. <sup>k</sup> Scripta trans Alpes, religiose Diuina Scripta. Sulpitius Severus, l. ii. These were the celebrated martyrs of Lyons. See Euseb. i. 1. Tillamont Mem. Eccles. tom. ii. p. 316. According to the Donatists, whose assertion is confirmed by the tacit acknowledgment of

The western provincials appeared to have derived the knowledge of christianity from the same source which had diffused among them the language, the sentiments, and the manners of Rome. In this more important circumstance, Africa, as well as Gaul, was gradually fashioned to the imitation of the capital. Yet notwithstanding the many favourable occasions which might invite the Roman missionaries to visit the Latin provinces, it was late before they passed either the sea or the Alps,<sup>k</sup> nor can we discover in those great countries any assured traces, either of faith or of persecution that ascend higher than the reign of the Antonines.<sup>l</sup> The slow progress of the gospel in the cold climate of Gaul, was extremely different from the eagerness with which it seems to have been received on the burning sands of Africa. The African christians soon formed one of the principal members of the primitive church. The practice introduced into that province, of appointing bishops to the most inconsiderable towns, and very frequently to the most obscure villages, contributed to multiply the splendour and importance of their religious societies, which during the course of the third century were animated by the zeal of Tertullian, directed by the abilities of Cyprian, and adorned by the eloquence of Lactantius. But if, on the contrary, we turn our eyes towards Gaul, we must content ourselves with discovering, in the time of Marcus Antoninus, the feeble and united congregations of Lyons and Vienna, and even as late as the reign of Decius, we are assured, that in a few cities only, Arles, Narbonne, Thoulouse, Limoges, Clermont, Tours, and Paris, some scattered churches were supported by the devotion of a small number of christians.<sup>m</sup> Silence is indeed very consistent with devotion, but as it is seldom compatible with zeal, we may perceive and lament the languid state of christianity in those provinces which had exchanged the Celtic for the Latin tongue, since they did not, during the three first centuries, give birth to a single ecclesiastical writer. From Gaul, which claimed a just pre-eminence of learning and authority over all the countries on this side of the Alps, the light of the gospel was more faintly reflected on the remote provinces of Spain and Britain, and if we may credit the vehement assertions of Tertullian, they had already received the first rays of the faith, when he addressed his apology to the magistrates of the emperor Severus.<sup>n</sup> But the obscure and imperfect

In Africa and the western provinces.

Augustin. Africa was the last of the provinces which received the gospel. Tillamont, Mem. Eccles. tom. i. p. 754. <sup>l</sup> Iam primum intra Gallias martyria vira Sulp. Severus, l. ii. With regard to Africa, see Tertullian ad Scapulum, c. 3. It is imagined that the Scythian martyrs were the first (Acta Sincera Rumin. p. 31). One of the adversaries of Apuleius seems to have been a christian. Apuleius, p. 490. 497. edit. Delphin. <sup>m</sup> Rara in aliquibus civitatibus ecclesiarum paucorum Christianorum deservit, resurgunt. Acta Sincera, p. 130. Gregory of Tours, l. i. c. 28. Mosheim, p. 207, 149. There is some reason to believe that, in the beginning of the fourth century, the extensive dioceses of Liège, of Treves, and of Cologne, composed a single bishopric, which had been very recently founded. See Memoirs de Tillamont, tom. vi. part. i. p. 47. 411. <sup>n</sup> The date of Tertullian's Apology is fixed, in a dissertation of Mosheim, in the year 198.

either in active or contemplative life, their excellent understandings were improved by study, philosophy had purified their minds from the prejudices of the popular superstition, and their days were spent in the pursuit of truth and the practice of virtue. Yet all these sages (it is no less an object of surprise than of concern) overlooked or rejected the perfection of the Christian system. Their language or their silence equally discover their contempt for the growing sect, which in their time had diffused itself over the Roman empire. Those among them who condescend to mention the Christians, consider them only as obstinate and perverse enthusiasts, who exacted an implicit submission to their mysterious doctrines, without being able to produce a single argument that could engage the attention of men of sense and learning.<sup>a</sup>

It is at least doubtful whether any of these philosophers perused the apologies which the primitive Christians repeatedly published in behalf of themselves and of their religion, but it is much to be lamented that such a cause was not defended by abler advocates. They expose with superfluous wit and eloquence the extravagance of polytheism. They interest our compassion by displaying the innocence and sufferings of their injured brethren. But when they would demonstrate the divine origin of Christianity, they insist much more strongly on the predictions which announced, than on the miracles which accompanied, the appearance of the Messiah. Their favourite argument might serve to edify a Christian or to convert a Jew, since both the one and the other acknowledge the authority of those prophecies, and both are obliged, with devout reverence, to search for their sense and their accomplishment. But this mode of persuasion loses much of its weight and influence, when it is addressed to those who neither understand nor respect the Mosaic dispensation and the prophetic style.<sup>b</sup> In the unskilful hands of Justin and of the succeeding apologists, the sublime meaning of the Hebrew oracles evaporates in distant types, affected conceits, and cold allegories, and even their authenticity was rendered suspicious to an unenlightened Gentile, by the mixture of pious forgeries, which, under the names of Orpheus, Hermes, and the Sibyls,<sup>c</sup> were obtruded on him as of equal value with the genuine inspirations of heaven. The adoption of fraud and sophistry in the defence of revelation, too often reminds us of the injudicious conduct of those poets, who load their invulnerable heroes with a useless weight of cumbersome and brittle armour.

But how shall we excuse the supine <sup>and of miracles</sup> inattention of the pagan and philosophic world, to those evidences which were presented by the hand of Omnipotence, not to their reason, but to their senses? During the age of Christ, of his apostles, and of their first disciples, the doctrine which they preached was confirmed by innumerable prodigies. The lame walked, the blind saw, the sick were healed, the dead were raised, demons were expelled, and the laws of nature were frequently suspended for the benefit of the church. But the sages of Greece <sup>General silence concerning the darkness of the</sup> and Rome turned aside from the awful spectacle, and pursuing the ordinary occupations of life and study, appeared unconscious of any alterations in the moral or physical government of the world. Under the reign of Tiberius, the whole earth,<sup>k</sup> or at least a celebrated province of the Roman empire,<sup>l</sup> was involved in a preternatural darkness of three hours. Even this miraculous event, which ought to have excited the wonder, the curiosity, and the devotion of mankind, passed without notice in an age of science and history.<sup>m</sup> It happened during the lifetime of Seneca and the elder Pliny, who must have experienced the immediate effects, or received the earliest intelligence, of the prodigy. Each of these philosophers, in a laborious work, has recorded all the great phenomena of nature, earthquakes, meteors, comets, and eclipses, which his indefatigable curiosity could collect.<sup>n</sup> Both the one and the other have omitted to mention the greatest phenomenon to which the mortal eye has been witness since the creation of the globe. A distinct chapter of Pliny<sup>o</sup> is designed for eclipses of an extraordinary nature and unusual duration, but he contents himself with describing the singular defect of light which followed the murder of Cæsar, when, during the greatest part of the year, the orb of the sun appeared pale and without splendour. This season of obscurity, which cannot surely be compared with the preternatural darkness of the Passion, had been already celebrated by most of the poets<sup>p</sup> and historians of that memorable age.<sup>q</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Dr Lardner, in his first and second volumes of Jewish and Christian testimonies, collects and illustrates those of Pliny the younger, of Tacitus of Gilet, of Marcus Antoninus, and perhaps of Epictetus, (for it is doubtful whether that philosopher means to speak of the Christians.) The new sect is totally unnoticed by Seneca, the elder Pliny, and Plutarch.

<sup>b</sup> If the Amos prophecy of the seventy weeks had been alleged to a Roman philosopher, would he not have replied in the words of Cicero: 'Quæ tandem ista auguratio est, annorum potius quam mense mensum aut dierum? De Divinatione l. 30. Observe with what irreverence Lælius (in Alexandr. c. 13) and his friend Celsus ap. Origen (l. vii. p. 327) express themselves concerning the Hebrew prophecies.'

<sup>c</sup> The philosophers who derided the more ancient predictions of the Sibyls would easily have detected the Jewish and Christian forgeries which had been so triumphantly quoted by the fathers, from Justin Martyr to Lactantius. When the Sibylline verses had performed their appointed task, they, like the system of the millennium, were quietly laid aside. The Christian Sibyl had unluckily fixed the ruin of Rome for the year 195 A. U. C. 948.

<sup>k</sup> The fathers, as they are drawn out in battle array by Dom Calmel, (Dissertation sur la Bible, tom. iii. p. 295—309) seem to cover the whole earth with darkness, in which they are followed by most of the moderns.

<sup>l</sup> Origen ad Math. c. 27. and a few modern critics. Beza, Le Clerc, Lardner, &c. are desirous of confining it to the land of Judea.

<sup>m</sup> The celebrated passage of Phlegon is now wisely abandoned. When Tertullian assures the pagans, that the mention of the prodigy is found in Arminius (not Archimædus) vestris, (see his Apology, c. 21.) he probably alludes to the Sibylline verses, which relate it exactly in the words of the Gospel.

<sup>n</sup> Seneca Quest. Natur. l. 15. vi. 1, vii. 17. Plin. Hist. Natur. l. ii. c. 19. Hist. Natur. l. 30.

<sup>o</sup> Virgil Georgic. i. 466. Tibullus l. i. Eleg. v. ver. 75. Ovid Metamorph. vi. 782. Lucan Pharsal. i. 540. The last of these poets places this prodigy before the civil war.

<sup>p</sup> See a public epistle of M. Antony in Josephus Antiquit. xiv. 12. Plutarch in Cæsar. p. 471. Appian, Bell. Civil. l. iv. Dion Cassius l. xlv. p. 431. Julius Obsequens, c. 128. His little treatise is an abstract of Livy's prodigies.

CHAP XVI

The conduct of the Roman government towards the christians, from the reign of Nero to that of Constantine

Christianity persecuted by the Roman emperors. If we seriously consider the purity of the christian religion, the sanctity of its moral precepts, and the innocent as well as austere lives of the greater number of those who during the first ages embraced the faith of the gospel, we should naturally suppose, that so benevolent a doctrine would have been received with due reverence, even by the unbelieving world, that the learned and the polite, however they might deride the miracles, would have esteemed the virtues of the new sect, and that the magistrates, instead of persecuting, would have protected an order of men who yielded the most passive obedience to the laws, though they declined the active cares of war and government. If, on the other hand, we recollect the universal toleration of polytheism, as it was invariably maintained by the faith of the people, the incredulity of philosophers, and the policy of the Roman senate and emperors, we are at a loss to discover what new offence the christians had committed, what new provocation could exasperate the mild indifference of antiquity, and what new motives could urge the Roman princes, who beheld without concern a thousand forms of religion subsisting in peace under their gentle sway, to inflict a severe punishment on any part of their subjects, who had chosen for themselves a singular but an inoffensive mode of faith and worship.

The religious policy of the ancient world seems to have assumed a more stern and intolerant character, to oppose the progress of christianity. About fourscore years after the death of Christ, his innocent disciples were punished with death by the sentence of a proconsul of the most amiable and philosophic character, and according to the laws of an emperor distinguished by the wisdom and justice of his general administration. The apologies which were repeatedly addressed to the successors of Trajan are filled with the most pathetic complaints, that the christians who obeyed the dictates, and solicited the liberty, of conscience, were alone, among all the subjects of the Roman empire, excluded from the common benefits of their auspicious government. The deaths of a few eminent martyrs have been recorded with care, and from the time that christianity was invested with the supreme power, the governors of the church have been no less diligently employed in displaying the cruelty, than in imitating the conduct, of their pagan adversaries. To separate (if it be possible) a few authentic as well as interesting facts from an undigested mass of fiction and error, and to relate, in a clear and rational manner, the causes, the extent, the duration, and the most important circumstances, of the persecutions to which the first christians were exposed, is the design of the present chapter.

The sectaries of a persecuted religion, depressed by fear, animated <sup>Inquiry into their motives</sup> with resentment, and perhaps heated by enthusiasm, are seldom in a proper temper of mind calmly to investigate, or candidly to appreciate, the motives of their enemies, which often escape the impartial and discerning view even of those who are placed at a secure distance from the flames of persecution. A reason has been assigned for the conduct of the emperors towards the primitive christians, which may appear the more specious and probable, as it is drawn from the acknowledged genius of polytheism. It has already been observed, that the religious concord of the world was principally supported by the implicit assent and reverence which the nations of antiquity expressed for their respective traditions and ceremonies. It might therefore be expected, that they would unite with indignation against any sect of people which should separate itself from the communion of mankind, and claiming the exclusive possession of divine knowledge, should disdain every form of worship, except its own, as impious and idolatrous. The rights of toleration were held by mutual indulgence: they were justly forfeited by a refusal of the accustomed tribute. As the payment of this tribute was inflexibly refused by the Jews, and by them alone, the consideration of the treatment which they experienced from the Roman magistrates, will serve to explain how far these speculations are justified by facts, and will lead us to discover the true causes of the persecution of christianity.

Without repeating what has been already mentioned of the reverence of <sup>Rebellious spirit of the Jews.</sup> the Roman princes and governors for the temple of Jerusalem, we shall only observe, that the destruction of the temple and city was accompanied and followed by every circumstance that could exasperate the minds of the conquerors, and authorize religious persecution by the most specious arguments of political justice and the public safety. From the reign of Nero to that of Antoninus Pius, the Jews discovered a fierce impatience of the dominion of Rome, which repeatedly broke out in the most furious massacres and insurrections. Humanity is shocked at the recital of the horrid cruelties which they committed in the cities of Egypt, of Cyprus, and of Cyrene, where they dwelt in treacherous friendship with the unsuspecting natives,<sup>a</sup> and we are tempted to applaud the severe retaliation which was exercised by the arms of the legions against a race of fanatics, whose dire and credulous superstition seemed to render them the

<sup>a</sup> In Cyrene they massacred 220,000 Greeks, in Cyprus 240,000 in Egypt a very great multitude. Many of these unhappy victims were sawed asunder, according to a precedent to which David had given the sanction of his example. The victorious Jews devoured the flesh, licked up the blood, and twisted the entrails like a girdle round their bodies. See Dion Cassius, l. lxxviii p. 1145.

implacable enemies not only of the Roman government, but of human kind<sup>b</sup> The enthusiasm of the Jews was supported by the opinion, that it was unlawful for them to pay taxes to an idolatrous master, and by the flattering promise which they derived from their ancient oracles, that a conquering Messiah would soon arise, destined to break their fetters, and to invest the favourites of heaven with the empire of the earth It was by announcing himself as their long-expected deliverer, and by calling on all the descendants of Abraham to assert the hope of Israel, that the famous Barchochebas collected a formidable army, with which he resisted during two years the power of the emperor Hadrian<sup>c</sup>

Notwithstanding these repeated provocations, the resentment of the Roman princes expired after the victory, nor were their apprehensions continued beyond the period of war and danger By the general indulgence of polytheism, and by the mild temper of Antoninus Pius, the Jews were restored to their ancient privileges, and once more obtained the permission of circumcising their children, with the easy restraint, that they should never confer on any foreign proselyte that distinguishing mark of the Hebrew race<sup>d</sup> The numerous remains of that people, though they were still excluded from the precincts of Jerusalem, were permitted to form and to maintain considerable establishments both in Italy and in the provinces, to acquire the freedom of Rome, to enjoy municipal honours, and to obtain at the same time an exemption from the burthensome and expensive offices of society The moderation or the contempt of the Romans gave a legal sanction to the form of ecclesiastical police which was instituted by the vanquished sect The patriarch, who had fixed his residence at Tiberias, was empowered to appoint his subordinate ministers and apostles, to exercise a domestic jurisdiction, and to receive from his dispersed brethren an annual contribution<sup>e</sup> New synagogues were frequently erected in the principal cities of the empire, and the sabbaths, the fasts, and the festivals, which were either commanded by the Mosaic law, or enjoined by the traditions of the Rabbis, were celebrated in the most solemn and public manner<sup>f</sup> Such gentle treatment insensibly assuaged the stern temper of the Jews Awakened from their dream of prophecy and conquest, they assumed the behaviour of peaceable and industrious subjects Their irreconcilable hatred of mankind, instead of flaming out in acts of blood and violence, evaporated in less dangerous gratifications They embraced every opportunity of overreaching the idolaters in trade, and they pronounced secret and ambiguous imprecations against the haughty kingdom of Edom<sup>g</sup>

Since the Jews, who rejected with abhorrence the deities adored by their sovereign and by their fellow-subjects, enjoyed however the free exercise of their unsocial religion, there must have existed some other cause, which exposed the disciples of Christ to those severities from which the posterity of Abraham was exempt The difference between them is simple and obvious, but, according to the sentiments of antiquity, it was of the highest importance The Jews were a nation, the christians were a sect and if it was natural for every community to respect the sacred institutions of their neighbours, it was incumbent on them to persevere in those of their ancestors The voice of oracles, the precepts of philosophers, and the authority of the laws, unanimously enforced this national obligation By their lofty claim of superior sanctity, the Jews might provoke the polytheists to consider them as an odious and impure race By disdaining the intercourse of other nations, they might deserve their contempt The laws of Moses might be for the most part frivolous or absurd, yet, since they had been received during many ages by a large society, his followers were justified by the example of mankind, and it was universally acknowledged, that they had a right to practise what it would have been criminal in them to neglect But this principle, which protected the Jewish synagogue, afforded not any favour or security to the primitive church By embracing the faith of the gospel, the christians incurred the supposed guilt of an unnatural and unpardonable offence They dissolved the sacred ties of custom and education, violated the religious institutions of their country, and presumptuously despised whatever their fathers had believed as true, or had revered as sacred Nor was this apostasy (if we may use the expression) merely of a partial or local kind, since the pious deserter who withdrew himself from the temples of Egypt or Syria, would equally disdain to seek an asylum in those of Athens or Carthage Every christian rejected with contempt the superstitions of his family, his city, and his province The whole body of christians unanimously refused to hold any communion with the gods of Rome, of the empire, and of mankind It was in vain that the oppressed believer asserted the inalienable rights of conscience and private judgment Though his situation might excite the pity, his arguments could never reach the understanding, either of the

<sup>b</sup> Without repeating the well known narratives of Josephus we may learn from Dion (l. ix. p. 1162.) that in Hadrian's war 580 000 Jews were cut off by the sword besides an infinite number which perished by famine by disease and by fire

<sup>c</sup> For the sect of the Zealots, see Basnage Histoire des Juifs, l. i. c. 17 for the characters of the Messian according to the Rabbis, l. v. c. 11—17 for the actions of Barchochebas l. vii. c. 12

<sup>d</sup> It is to Modestinus a Roman lawyer (l. i. regular) that we are indebted for a distinct knowledge of the Edict of Antoninus See Casaubon ad Hist. August. p. 27

<sup>e</sup> See Basnage Histoire des Juifs l. iii. c. 2, 3 The office of Patriarch was suppressed by Theodosius the younger

<sup>f</sup> We need only mention the Purim, or deliverance of the Jews from the rage of Haman, which till the reign of Theodosius, was celebrated with insolent triumph and riotous intemperance Basnage, Hist. des Juifs l. vi. c. 17 l. viii. c. 6

<sup>g</sup> According to the false Josephus Tephlo the grandson of Esau conducted into Italy the army of Zeno, king of Carthage Another colony of Idumeans flying from the sword of David, took refuge in the dominions of Romulus For these, or for other reasons of equal weight, the name of Edom was applied by the Jews to the Roman empire

philosophic or of the believing part of the pagan world To their apprehensions, it was no less a matter of surprise, that any individuals should entertain scruples against complying with the established mode of worship, than if they had conceived a sudden abhorrence to the manners, the dress, or the language, of their native country <sup>a</sup>

The surprise of the pagans was soon succeeded by resentment, and the most pious of men were exposed to the unjust but dangerous imputation of impiety Malice and prejudice concurred in representing the christians as a society of atheists, who, by the most daring attack on the religious constitution of the empire, had merited the severest animadversion of the civil magistrate They had separated themselves (they gloried in the confession) from every mode of superstition which was received in any part of the globe by the various temper of polytheism, but it was not altogether so evident what deity, or what form of worship, they had substituted to the gods and temples of antiquity The pure and sublime idea which they entertained of the Supreme Being escaped the gross conception of the pagan multitude, who were at a loss to discover a spiritual and solitary God, that was neither represented under any corporeal figure or visible symbol, nor was adored with the accustomed pomp of libations and festivals, of altars and sacrifices <sup>b</sup> The sages of Greece and Rome, who had elevated their minds to the contemplation of the existence and attributes of the First Cause, were induced by reason or by vanity to reserve for themselves and their chosen disciples the privilege of this philosophical devotion <sup>c</sup> They were far from admitting the prejudices of mankind as the standard of truth, but they considered them as flowing from the original disposition of human nature, and they supposed that any popular mode of faith and worship which presumed to disclaim the assistance of the senses, would, in proportion as it receded from superstition, find itself incapable of restraining the wanderings of the fancy, and the visions of fanaticism The careless glance which men of wit and learning condescended to cast on the christian revelation, served only to confirm their hasty opinion, and to persuade them, that the principle, which they might have revered, of the divine unity, was defaced by the wild enthusiasm, and annihilated by the airy speculations, of the new sectaries The author of a celebrated dialogue, which has been attributed to Lucian, whilst he affects to treat the mysterious subject of the Trinity in a style of ridicule and contempt, betrays his own ignorance of the weakness of human reason, and of the inscrutable nature of the divine perfections <sup>d</sup>

It might appear less surprising, that the founder of christianity should not only be revered by his disciples as a sage and a prophet, but that he should be adored as a God The polytheists were disposed to adopt every article of faith, which seemed to offer any resemblance, however distant or imperfect, with the popular mythology, and the legends of Bacchus, of Hercules, and of Æsculapius had, in some measure, prepared their imagination for the appearance of the Son of God under a human form <sup>e</sup> But they were astonished that the christians should abandon the temples of those ancient heroes, who, in the infancy of the world, had invented arts, instituted laws, and vanquished the tyrants or monsters who infested the earth, in order to choose for the exclusive object of their religious worship, an obscure teacher, who, in a recent age, and among a barbarous people, had fallen a sacrifice either to the malice of his own countrymen, or to the jealousy of the Roman government The Pagan multitude, reserving their gratitude for temporal benefits alone, rejected the inestimable present of life and immortality, which was offered to mankind by Jesus of Nazareth His mild constancy in the midst of cruel and voluntary sufferings, his universal benevolence, and the sublime simplicity of his actions and character, were insufficient, in the opinion of those carnal men, to compensate for the want of fame, of empire, and of success; and whilst they refused to acknowledge his stupendous triumph over the powers of darkness and of the grave, they misrepresented, or they insulted, the equivocal birth, wandering life, and ignominious death, of the divine author of christianity <sup>f</sup>

The personal guilt which every christian had contracted, in thus preferring his private sentiment to the national religion, was aggravated in a very high degree by the number and union of the criminals It is well known, and has been already observed, that Roman policy viewed with the utmost jealousy and distrust any association among its subjects, and that the privileges of private corporations, though formed for the most harmless or be-

The union and resemblance of the christians considered as a dangerous conspiracy

<sup>a</sup> From the arguments of Celsus, as they are represented and refuted by Origen, (l. i. p. 247-259) we may clearly discover the distinction that was made between the Jewish people and the Christian sect See in the Dialogue of Minucius Felix, (c. 5, 6) a fair and not inelegant description of the popular sentiments, with regard to the desertion of the established worship

<sup>b</sup> Cur nullas aras habent? templa nulla? nulla nota simulacra? — Unde autem, vel quis ille, ut ubi Deus unicus, solitarius, destitutus? Minucius Felix, c. 10 The pagan interlocutor goes on to make a distinction in favour of the Jews, who had once a temple, altars, victims &c

<sup>c</sup> It is difficult (says Plato) to attain, and dangerous to publish the knowledge of the true God See the Philologie des Philosophes, in the Abbé d'Olivet's French translation of Tully's de Naturâ Deorum, tom. i. p. 275

<sup>d</sup> The author of the Philopatris perpetually treats the christians as a company of dreaming enthusiasts, δαιμονιοι, αιδεριοι, αιδεραβαντες, αεροβαυτες, &c and in one place manifestly alludes to the vision in which St Paul was transported to the third heaven In another place, Triphon, who personates a christian, after deriding the gods of paganism, proposes a mysterious oath, ὑψιμεδοντα θεοι, μετὰν, ἀμβροτοι, ὑρανιωνα, χιτοι πατρος, πνευμα εκ πατρος εκπορευομενον

Ἐν εκ τριωι, και εβ εις ος τρια

Ἀριθμειν με διδασκει, (is the profane answer of Critias,) και ορκος η ἀριθμητικη εκ οιδας γαρ τι λεγειν εν τρια, τρια εν

<sup>e</sup> According to Justin Martyr, (Apolo. Major c. 70-85) the demon, who had gained some imperfect knowledge of the prophecies purposely contrived this resemblance which might deter, though by different means, both the people and the philosophers from embracing the faith of Christ

<sup>f</sup> In the first and second books of Origen, Celsus treats the birth and character of our Saviour with the most impious contempt The orator Libanius praises Porphyry and Julian for confuting the folly of a sect which styles a dead man of Palestine, God, and the Son of God So erates, Hist Ecclesiast. in 23

neficial purposes, were bestowed with a very sparing hand. The religious assemblies of the christians, who had separated themselves from the public worship, appeared of a much less innocent nature: they were illegal in their principle, and in their consequences might become dangerous, nor were the emperors conscious that they violated the laws of justice, when, for the peace of society, they prohibited those secret and sometimes nocturnal meetings. The pious disobedience of the christians made their conduct, or perhaps their designs, appear in a much more serious and criminal light, and the Roman princes, who might perhaps have suffered themselves to be disarmed by a ready submission, deeming their honour concerned in the execution of their commands, sometimes attempted, by rigorous punishments, to subdue this independent spirit, which boldly acknowledged an authority superior to that of the magistrate. The extent and duration of this spiritual conspiracy seemed to render it every day more deserving of his animadversion. We have already seen that the active and successful zeal of the christians had insensibly diffused them through every province and almost every city of the empire. The new converts seemed to renounce their family and country, that they might connect themselves in an indissoluble band of union with a peculiar society, which every where assumed a different character from the rest of mankind. Their gloomy and austere aspect, their abhorrence of the common business and pleasures of life, and their frequent predictions of impending calamities, inspired the pagans with the apprehension of some danger, which would arise from the new sect, the more alarming as it was the more obscure. "Whatever," says Pliny, "may be the principle of their conduct, their inflexible obstinacy appeared deserving of punishment."

Their manners
calumniated

The precautions with which the disciples of Christ performed the offices of religion were at first dictated by fear and necessity, but they were continued from choice. By imitating the awful secrecy which reigned in the Eleusinian mysteries, the christians had flattered themselves that they should render their sacred institutions more respectable in the eyes of the pagan world.<sup>a</sup> But the event, as it often happens to the operations of subtle policy, deceived their wishes and their expectations. It was concluded, that they only concealed what they would have blushed to disclose. Their mistaken prudence afforded an opportunity for malice to invent, and for suspicious credulity to believe, the horrid tales which described the christians as the most wicked of human kind, who practised in their dark recesses every abomination that a depraved fancy could suggest, and who solicited the favour of their unknown God by the sacrifice of every moral virtue. There were many who pretended to confess or to relate the ceremonies of this abhorred society. It was asserted, "that a new-born infant, entirely covered over with flour, was presented, like some mystic symbol of initiation, to the knife of the proselyte, who unknowingly inflicted many a secret and mortal wound on the innocent victim of his error, that as soon as the cruel deed was perpetrated, the sectaries drank up the blood, greedily tore asunder the quivering members, and pledged themselves to eternal secrecy, by a mutual consciousness of guilt. It was as confidently affirmed, that this inhuman sacrifice was succeeded by a suitable entertainment, in which intemperance served as a provocative to brutal lust, till, at the appointed moment, the lights were suddenly extinguished, shame was banished, nature was forgotten, and, as accident might direct, the darkness of the night was polluted by the incestuous commerce of sisters and brothers, of sons and of mothers."

But the perusal of the ancient apologies was sufficient to remove even the slightest suspicion from the mind of a candid adversary. The christians, with the intrepid security of innocence, appeal from the voice of rumour to the equity of the magistrates. They acknowledge, that if any proof can be produced of the crimes which calumny has imputed to them, they are worthy of the most severe punishment. They provoke the punishment, and they challenge the proof. At the same time they urge, with equal truth and propriety, that the charge is not less devoid of probability, than it is destitute of evidence, they ask, whether any one can seriously believe that the pure and holy precepts of the gospel, which so frequently restrain the use of the most lawful enjoyments, should inculcate the practice of the most abominable crimes, that a large society should resolve to dishonour itself in the eyes of its own members, and that a great number of persons of either sex, and every age and character, insensible to the fear of death or infamy, should consent to violate those principles which nature and education had imprinted most deeply in their minds. Nothing, it should seem, could weaken the force or destroy the effect of so unanswerable a justification, unless it were the injudicious conduct of the apologists themselves, who betrayed the common cause of religion, to gratify their

Their imprudent defence

<sup>a</sup> The emperor Trajan refused to incorporate a company of 150 firemen for the use of the city of Nicomedia. He disliked all associations. See Plin. Epist. x. 42. 43.

<sup>b</sup> The proconsul Pliny had published a general edict against unlawful meetings. The prudence of the christians suspended their Agapæ, but it was impossible for them to omit the exercise of public worship.

<sup>c</sup> As the prophecies of the antichrist, approaching conflagration, &c. provoked those pagans whom they did not convert, they were mentioned with caution and reserve, and the Manichæans were censured for disclosing too freely the dangerous secret. See Mosheim, p. 413.

<sup>d</sup> Neque enim dubitabam, quodcumque esset quod faterentur, (such are the words of Pliny,) perveraciam certe et inflexibilem obstinationem debere puniri!

<sup>e</sup> See Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. p. 701 and Spanheim, Remarque sur les Césars de Julien p. 468. &c.

<sup>f</sup> See Justin Martyr Apolog. i. 35. ii. 14. Athenagoras, in Legatione c. 27. Tertullian Apolog. c. 7-9. Minucius Felix, c. 9. 10. 30. 31. The last of these writers relates the accusation in the most elegant and circumstantial manner. The answer of Tertullian is the boldest and most vigorous.

<sup>g</sup> In the persecution of Lyons, some gentile slaves were compelled, by the fear of tortures, to accuse their christian master. The church of Lyons, writing to their brethren of Asia, treat the horrid charge with proper indignation and contempt. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. v. 1.

devout hatred to the domestic enemies of the church. It was sometimes faintly insinuated, and sometimes boldly asserted, that the same bloody sacrifices, and the same incestuous festivals, which were so falsely ascribed to the orthodox believers, were in reality celebrated by the Marcionites, by the Carpocratians, and by several other sects of the Gnostics, who, notwithstanding they might deviate into the paths of heresy, were still actuated by the sentiments of men, and still governed by the precepts of christianity.* Accusations of a similar kind were retorted upon the church by the schismatics who had departed from its communion,† and it was confessed on all sides, that the most scandalous licentiousness of manners prevailed among great numbers of those who affected the name of christians. A pagan magistrate, who possessed neither leisure nor abilities to discern the almost imperceptible line which divides the orthodox faith from heretical depravity, might easily have imagined that their mutual animosity had extorted the discovery of their common guilt. It was fortunate for the repose, or at least for the reputation, of the first christians, that the magistrates sometimes proceeded with more temper and moderation than is usually consistent with religious zeal, and that they reported, as the impartial result of their judicial inquiry, that the sectaries, who had deserted the established worship, appeared to them sincere in their professions, and blameless in their manners, however they might incur, by their absurd and excessive superstition, the censure of the laws.‡

Idea of the conduct of the emperors towards the christians. History, which undertakes to record the transactions of the past, for the instruction of future ages, would ill deserve that honourable office, if she condescended to plead the cause of tyrants, or to justify the maxims of persecution. It must, however, be acknowledged, that the conduct of the emperors who appeared the least favourable to the primitive church, is by no means so criminal as that of modern sovereigns, who have employed the arm of violence and terror against the religious opinions of any part of their subjects. From their reflections, or even from their own feelings, a Charles V or a Lewis XIV might have acquired a just knowledge of the rights of conscience, of the obligation of faith, and of the innocence of error. But the princes and magistrates of ancient Rome were strangers to those principles which inspired and authorized the inflexible obstinacy of the christians in the cause of truth, nor could they themselves discover in their own breasts any motive which would have prompted them to refuse a legal, and as it were a natural, submission to the sacred institutions of their country. The same reason which contributes to alleviate the guilt, must have tended to abate the rigour, of their persecutions. As they were actuated, not by the furious zeal of bigots, but by the temperate policy of legislators, contempt must often have relaxed, and humanity must frequently have suspended, the execution of those laws, which they enacted against the humble and obscure followers of Christ. From the general view of their character and motives we might naturally conclude I That a considerable time elapsed before they considered the new sectaries as an object deserving of the attention of government. II That in the conviction of any of their subjects who were accused of so very singular a crime, they proceeded with caution and reluctance. III That they were moderate in the use of punishments, and IV That the afflicted church enjoyed many intervals of peace and tranquillity. Notwithstanding the careless indifference which the most copious and the most minute of the pagan writers have shown to the affairs of the christians,§ it may still be in our power to confirm each of these probable suppositions, by the evidence of authentic facts.

I By the wise dispensation of Providence, a mysterious veil was cast over the infancy of the church, which, till the faith of the christians was matured, and their numbers were multiplied, served to protect them not only from the malice but even from the knowledge of the pagan world. The slow and gradual abolition of the Mosaic ceremonies afforded a safe and innocent disguise to the more early proselytes of the gospel. As they were far the greater part of the race of Abraham, they were distinguished by the peculiar mark of circumcision, offered up their devotions in the temple of Jerusalem till its final destruction, and received both the law and the prophets as the genuine inspirations of the deity. The gentile converts, who by a spiritual adoption had been associated to the hope of Israel, were likewise confounded under the garb and appearance of Jews,|| and as the polytheists paid less regard to articles of faith than to the external worship, the new sect, which carefully concealed, or faintly announced, its future greatness and ambition, was permitted to shelter itself under the general toleration which was granted to an ancient and celebrated people in the Roman empire. It was not long, perhaps, before the Jews themselves, animated with a fiercer zeal and a more jealous faith, perceived the gradual separation of their Nazarene brethren from the doctrine of the syna-

They neglected the christians as a sect of Jews

* See Justin Martyr Apolo. 1. 3. Irenæus adv. Hæres. 1. 24. Clement Alexandrin. Stromat. 1. in p. 438. Lancel. 1. 8. It would be tedious and disgusting to relate all that the succeeding writers have imagined, all that Epiphanius has received, and all that Tillemont has copied. M. de Beausobre (Hist. du Manichéisme, 1. ix. c. 8. §) has exposed, with great spirit, the dissingenuous art of Augustin and Pope Leo I.

† When Tertullian became a Montanist, he aspersed the morals of the church which he had so resolutely defended. "Sed majoris est Apepe, quia per hanc adolescentia in eum sororibus dormiunt, appen dices scilicet gnia. Incivita et luxuria." De Jejunio, c. 17. The 35th canon of the council of Eliberis provides against the scandals which too often polluted the vigils of the church, and disgraced the christian name, in the eyes of unbelievers.

‡ Tertullian (Apolog. c. 2.) expatiates on the fair and honourable testimony of Pliny, with much reason, and some declamation.

§ In the various compilation of the Augustan History, (a part of which was composed under the reign of Constantine) there are not six lines which relate to the christians, nor has the diligence of Xiphilin discovered their name in the large history of Dion Cassius.

|| An obscure passage of Suetonius (in Claud. c. 25.) may seem to offer a proof how strangely the Jews and christians of Rome were confounded with each other.

gogue, and they would gladly have extinguished the dangerous heresy in the blood of its adherents. But the decrees of heaven had already disarmed their malice, and though they might sometimes exert the licentious privilege of sedition, they no longer possessed the administration of criminal justice, nor did they find it easy to infuse into the calm breast of a Roman magistrate the rancour of their own zeal and prejudice. The provincial governors declared themselves ready to listen to any accusation that might affect the public safety, but as soon as they were informed, that it was a question not of facts but of words, a dispute relating only to the interpretation of the Jewish laws and prophecies, they deemed it unworthy of the majesty of Rome seriously to discuss the obscure differences which might arise among a barbarous and superstitious people. The innocence of the first christians was protected by ignorance and contempt, and the tribunal of the pagan magistrate often proved their most assured refuge against the fury of the synagogue. If indeed we were disposed to adopt the traditions of a too credulous antiquity, we might relate the distant peregrinations, the wonderful achievements, and the various deaths of the twelve apostles: but a more accurate inquiry will induce us to doubt, whether any of those persons who had been witnesses to the miracles of Christ were permitted, beyond the limits of Palestine, to seal with their blood the truth of their testimony. From the ordinary term of human life, it may very naturally be presumed that most of them were deceased before the discontent of the Jews broke out into that furious war, which was terminated only by the ruin of Jerusalem. During a long period, from the death of Christ to that memorable rebellion, we cannot discover any traces of Roman intolerance, unless they are to be found in the sudden, the transient, but the cruel persecution, which was exercised by Nero against the christians of the capital, thirty-five years after the former, and only two years before the latter, of those great events. The character of the philosophic historian, to whom we are principally indebted for the knowledge of this singular transaction, would alone be sufficient to recommend it to our most attentive consideration.

The fire of Rome under the reign of Nero, the capital of the empire was afflicted by a fire which raged beyond the memory or example of former ages. The monuments of Grecian art and of Roman virtue, the trophies of the Punic and Gallic wars, the most holy temples, and the most splendid palaces, were involved in one common destruction. Of the fourteen regions or quarters into which Rome was divided, four only subsisted entire, three were levelled with the ground, and the remaining seven, which had experienced the fury of the flames, displayed a melancholy prospect of ruin and desolation. The vigilance of government appears not to have neglected any of the precautions which might alleviate the sense of so dreadful a calamity. The imperial gardens were thrown open to the distressed multitude, temporary buildings were erected for their accommodation, and a plentiful supply of corn and provisions was distributed at a very moderate price. The most generous policy seemed to have dictated the edicts which regulated the disposition of the streets and the construction of private houses, and as it usually happens, in an age of prosperity, the conflagration of Rome, in the course of a few years, produced a new city, more regular and more beautiful than the former. But all the prudence and humanity reflected by Nero on this occasion were insufficient to preserve him from the popular suspicion. Every crime might be imputed to the assassin of his wife and mother, nor could the prince, who prostituted his person and dignity on the theatre, be deemed incapable of the most extravagant folly. The voice of rumour accused the emperor as the incendiary of his own capital, and as the most incredible stories are the best adapted to the genius of an enraged people, it was gravely reported, and firmly believed, that Nero, enjoying the calamity which he had occasioned, amused himself with singing to his lyre the destruction of ancient Troy. To divert a suspicion, which the power of despotism was unable to suppress, the emperor resolved to substitute in his own place some fictitious criminals. "With this view (continues Tacitus) he inflicted the most exquisite tortures on those Cruel punishment of the christians, as the incendiaries of the city men, who, under the vulgar appellation of christians, were already branded with deserved infamy. They derived their name and origin from Christ, who in the reign of Tiberius had suffered death, by the sentence of the procurator Pontius Pilate. For a while this dire superstition was checked, but it again burst forth, and not only spread itself over Judea, the first seat of this mischievous sort, but was even introduced into Rome, the common asylum which receives and protects whatever is impure, whatever is atrocious. The confessions of those who were seized, discovered a great multitude of their accomplices, and

<sup>a</sup> See in the eighteenth and twenty-fifth chapters of the Acts of the Apostles the behaviour of Gallio, proconsul of Achaia, and of Festus, procurator of Judea.

<sup>b</sup> In the time of Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria, the glory of martyrdom was confined to St. Peter, St. Paul and St. James. It was gradually bestowed on the rest of the apostles by the more recent Greeks, who prudently selected for the theatre of their preaching and sufferings some remote country beyond the limits of the Roman empire. See Mosheim, p. 81 and Tillamont's Memoires Ecclesiastiques, tom. i. part iii.

<sup>c</sup> Tacit. Annal. xi. 38–44. Sueton. in Nero c. 38. Dion Cassius, l. lxvi. 1011. Orosius vii. 7.

<sup>d</sup> The price of wheat (probably of the modius) was reduced to four denarii nummi which would be equivalent to about fifteen shillings the English quarter.

<sup>e</sup> We may observe that the rumour is mentioned by Tacitus with a very becoming distrust and hesitation, whilst it is greedily transcribed by Suetonius and solemnly confirmed by Dion.

<sup>f</sup> This testimony is alone sufficient to expose the anachronism of the Jews, who place the birth of Christ near a century sooner (Revue Historique des Juifs, l. i. c. 14, 15). We may learn from Josephus (Antiquities xiii. 3) that the procuratorship of Pilate corresponded with the last ten years of Tiberius, A. D. 27–37. As to the particular time of the death of Christ a very early tradition fixed it to the 23rd of March A. D. 29 under the consulship of the two Gemini (Tertullian adv. Julianos c. 8). This title, which is adopted by Pagi, cardinal Norris, and Le Clerc seems at least as probable as the vulgar error, which is placed (I know not from what conjectures) four years later.

they were all convicted, not so much for the crime of setting fire to the city, as for their hatred of human kind<sup>1</sup>. They died in torments, and their torments were embittered by insult and derision. Some were nailed on crosses, others sown up in the skins of wild beasts, and exposed to the fury of dogs, others again, smeared over with combustible materials, were used as torches to illuminate the darkness of the night. The gardens of Nero were destined for the melancholy spectacle, which was accompanied with a horse race, and honoured with the presence of the emperor, who mingled with the populace in the dress and attitude of a charioteer. The guilt of the christians deserved indeed the most exemplary punishment, but the public abhorrence was changed into commiseration, from the opinion that those unhappy wretches were sacrificed, not so much to the public welfare, as to the cruelty of a jealous tyrant<sup>2</sup>. Those who survey with a curious eye the revolutions of mankind, may observe, that the gardens and circus of Nero on the Vatican, which were polluted with the blood of the first christians, have been rendered still more famous, by the triumph and by the abuse of the persecuted religion. On the same spot, a temple, which far surpasses the ancient glories of the capitol, has since been erected by the christian pontiffs, who, deriving their claim of universal dominion from an humble fisherman of Galilee, have succeeded to the throne of the Cæsars, given laws to the barbarian conquerors of Rome, and extended their spiritual jurisdiction from the coast of the Baltic to the shores of the Pacific ocean.

But it would be improper to dismiss this account of Nero's persecution, till we have made some observations, that may serve to remove the difficulties with which it is perplexed, and to throw some light on the subsequent history of the church.

1 The most sceptical criticism is obliged to respect the truth of this extraordinary fact, and the integrity of this celebrated passage of Tacitus.

The former is confirmed by the diligent and accurate Suetonius, who mentions the punishment which Nero inflicted on the christians, a sect of men who had embraced a new and criminal superstition<sup>3</sup>. The latter may be proved by the consent of the most ancient manuscripts, by the inimitable character of the style of Tacitus, by his reputation, which guarded his text from the interpolations of pious fraud, and by the purport of his narration, which accused the first christians of the most atrocious crimes, without insinuating that they possessed any miraculous or even magical powers above the rest of mankind<sup>4</sup>. 2 Notwithstanding it is probable that Tacitus was born some years before the fire of Rome,<sup>5</sup> he could derive only from reading and conversation the knowledge of an event which happened during his infancy. Before he gave himself to the public, he calmly waited till his genius had attained its full maturity, and he was more than forty years of age, when a grateful regard for the memory of the virtuous Agricola, extorted from him the most early of those historical compositions which will delight and instruct the most distant posterity. After making a trial of his strength in the life of Agricola and the description of Germany, he conceived, and at length executed, a more arduous work, the history of Rome, in thirty books, from the fall of Nero to the accession of Nerva. The administration of Nerva introduced an age of justice and prosperity, which Tacitus had destined for the occupation of his old age,<sup>6</sup> but when he took a nearer view of his subject, judging, perhaps, that it was a more honourable or a less invidious office, to record the vices of past tyrants, than to celebrate the virtues of a reigning monarch, he chose rather to relate, under the form of annals, the actions of the four immediate successors of Augustus. To collect, to dispose, and to adorn a series of fourscore years, in an immortal work, every sentence of which is pregnant with the deepest observations and the most lively images, was an undertaking sufficient to exercise the genius of Tacitus himself during the greatest part of his life. In the last years of the reign of Trajan, whilst the victorious monarch extended the power of Rome beyond its ancient limits, the historian was describing, in the second and fourth books of his annals, the tyranny of Tiberius,<sup>7</sup> and the emperor Hadrian must have succeeded to the throne, before Tacitus, in the regular prosecution of his work, could relate the fire of the capital and the cruelty of Nero towards the unfortunate christians. At the distance of sixty years, it was the duty of the annalist to adopt the narratives of contemporaries, but it was natural for the philosopher to indulge himself in the description of the origin, the pro-

<sup>1</sup> Odio humani generis convicti. These words may either signify the hatred of mankind towards the christians or the hatred of the christians towards mankind. I have preferred the latter sense, as the most agreeable to the style of Tacitus, and in the popular error, of which a precept of the gospel (see Luke xiv 26) had been, perhaps, the innocent occasion. My interpretation is justified by the authority of Lipsius of the Italian, the French, and the English translators of Tacitus, of Mosheim, (p. 102) of Le Clerc, (Historia Ecclesiastica p. 427) of Dr Lardner (Testimonies, vol. 1 p. 315) and of the bishop of Gloucester (Divine Legation, vol. iii p. 38). But as the word convicti does not unite very happily with the rest of the sentence, James Gronovius has preferred the reading of confuncti, which is authorized by the valuable MS of Florence.

<sup>2</sup> Nardinus Romæ Antiquæ, p. 457. Donatus de Romæ Antiquis, l. iii p. 419.

<sup>3</sup> Suetonius in Nerone c. 16. The epithet of maleficus, which some sagacious commentators have translated magical, is considered by the more rational Mosheim as only synonymous to the extravagant of Tacitus.

<sup>4</sup> The passage concerning Jesus Christ which was inserted into the text of Josephus, between the time of Origen and that of Eusebius, may furnish an example of an vulgar forgery. The accomplishment of the prophecies, the virtues, miracles, and resurrection of Jesus, are distinctly related. Josephus acknowledges that he was the Messiah, and hesitates whether he should call him a man. If any doubt can still remain concerning this celebrated passage, the reader may examine the pointed objections of Le Père, (Hævercamp Josephi tom. ii p. 267—271) the hundred answers of Dabuz, (p. 187—232) and the masterly reply (Bibliothèque Ancienne et Moderne, tom. vii p. 237—286) of an anonymous critic, whom I believe to have been the learned Abbé de Longuerue.

<sup>5</sup> See the lives of Tacitus by Lipsius and the Abbi de la Bletterie, Dictionnaire de Bayle à l'article TACITE, and Fabricius, Bibliotheca Latinæ tom. ii p. 386. Edit. Ernest.

<sup>6</sup> Principatum Divi Nervæ, et imperium Trajani, ubiorem securamque materiam senectuti sponsum. Tacit. Hist. l.

<sup>7</sup> See Tacit. Annal. l. i c. 14 p. 4.

gress, and the character of the new sect, not so much according to the knowledge or prejudices of the age of Nero, as according to those of the time of Hadrian. 3 Tacitus very frequently trusts to the curiosity or reflection of his readers to supply those intermediate circumstances and ideas, which, in his extreme conciseness, he has thought proper to suppress. We may therefore presume to imagine some probable cause which could direct the cruelty of Nero against the christians of Rome, whose obscurity, as well as innocence, should have shielded them from his indignation, and even from his notice. The Jews, who were numerous in the capital, and oppressed in their own country, were a much fitter object for the suspicions of the emperor and of the people: nor did it seem unlikely that a vanquished nation, who already discovered their abhorrence of the Roman yoke, might have recourse to the most atrocious means of gratifying their implacable revenge. But the Jews possessed very powerful advocates in the palace, and even in the heart of the tyrant, his wife and mistress, the beautiful Poppæa, and a favourite player of the race of Abraham, who had already employed their intercession in behalf of the obnoxious people. In their room it was necessary to offer some other victims, and it might easily be suggested that, although the genuine followers of Moses were innocent of the fire of Rome, there had arisen among them a new and pernicious sect of GALILEANS, which was capable of the most horrid crimes. Under the appellation of GALILEANS, two distinctions of men were confounded, the most opposite to each other in their manners and principles, the disciples who had embraced the faith of Jesus of Nazareth, and the zealots who had followed the standard of Judas the Gaulonite. The former were the friends, the latter were the enemies, of human kind, and the only resemblance between them consisted in the same inflexible constancy, which, in the defence of their cause, rendered them insensible of death and tortures. The followers of Judas, who impelled their countrymen into rebellion, were soon buried under the ruins of Jerusalem, whilst those of Jesus, known by the more celebrated name of christians, diffused themselves over the Roman empire. How natural was it for Tacitus, in the time of Hadrian, to appropriate to the christians the guilt and the sufferings, which he might, with far greater truth and justice, have attributed to a sect whose odious memory was almost extinguished. 4 Whatever opinion may be entertained of this conjecture, (for it is no more than a conjecture,) it is evident that the effect, as well as the cause, of Nero's persecution, were confined to the walls of Rome, that the religious tenets of the Galileans, or christians, were never made a subject of punishment, or even of inquiry, and that, as the idea of their sufferings was, for a long time, connected with the idea of cruelty and injustice, the moderation of succeeding princes inclined them to spare a sect, oppressed by a tyrant, whose rage had been usually directed against virtue and innocence.

It is somewhat remarkable, that the flames of war consumed almost at the same time the temple of Jerusalem and the capitol of Rome,* and it appears no less singular, that the tribute which devotion had destined to the former, should have been converted by the power of an assaulting victor to restore and adorn the splendour of the latter. The emperors levied a general capitation tax on the Jewish people, and although the sum assessed on the head of each individual was inconsiderable, the use for which it was designed, and the severity with which it was exacted, were considered as an intolerable grievance. Since the officers of the revenue extended their unjust claim to many persons who were strangers to the blood or religion of the Jews, it was impossible that the christians, who had so often sheltered themselves under the shadow of the synagogue, should now escape this rapacious persecution. Anxious as they were to avoid the slightest infection of idolatry, their conscience forbade them to contribute to the honour of that daemon who had assumed the character of the capitoline Jupiter. As a very numerous though declining party among the christians still adhered to the law of Moses, their efforts to dissemble their Jewish origin were detected by the decisive test of circumcision: nor were the Roman magistrates at leisure to inquire into the difference of their religious tenets. Among the christians, who were brought before the tribunal of the emperor, or, as it seems more probable, before that of the procurator of Judæa, two persons are said to have appeared, distinguished by their extraction, which was more truly noble than that of the greatest monarchs. These were the grandsons of St. Jude the apostle who himself was the brother of Jesus Christ.†

* The player's name was Aliturus. Through the same channel, Josephus (de Vita sua, c. 3) about two years before, had obtained the pardon and release of some Jewish priests who were prisoners at Rome.

† The learned Dr. Lardner (Jewish and Hebræan Testimonies, vol. ii. p. 102, 103) has proved that the name of Galileans was a very ancient and perhaps the primitive appellation of the christians.

‡ Joseph. Antiquitat. xiii. l. 2. Tillmont. Ruines de Jussé p. 742. The sons of Judas were crucified in the time of Claudius. His grandson Eleazar, after Jerusalem was taken, defended a strong fortress with 960 of his most devoted followers. When the battering ram had made a breach, they turned their swords against their wives, their children, and at length against their own breasts. They died to the last man.

§ See Dodwell. Pauertat Marci l. xiii. The Spanish inscription in Gruter p. 238 No. 9 is manifest and acknowledged forgery, contrived by that doled impostor Cyrillus of Ancyra to flatter the pride and prejudices of the Spaniards. See Ferreras, Histoire d'Espagne, tom. i. p. 192.

¶ The capitol was burnt during the civil war between Vitellius and Vespasian the 19th of December, A. D. 69. On the 10th of August, A. D. 70 the temple of Jerusalem was destroyed by the hands of the Jews themselves, rather than by those of the Romans.

‡ The new capitol was dedicated by Domitian. Sueton. in Domitian c. 5. Plutarch in Poplicola l. iii. p. 230. Edit. Bryan. The gilding alone cost 12,000 talents (above two millions and a half). It was the opinion of Martial, (l. ix. Epigram 3) that if the emperor had called in his debts Jupiter himself, even though he had made a general ruction of Olympus, would have been unable to pay two shillings in the pound.

§ With regard to the tribute see Dion Cassius l. lxxvi. p. 1082 with Reimar's notes. Spanheim de Usu Numismatum, tom. ii. p. 571 and Barye. Histoire des Juifs l. vii. c. 2.

¶ Suetonius (in Domitian c. 12.) had seen an old man of ninety publicly examined before the procurator's tribunal. This is what Martial calls Mentula tributus dramata.

‡ This appellation was at first understood in the most obvious sense, and it was supposed, that the brothers of Jesus were the lawful issue of

Their natural pretensions to the throne of David might perhaps attract the respect of the people, and excite the jealousy of the governor, but the meanness of their garb, and the simplicity of their answers, soon convinced him that they were neither desirous nor capable of disturbing the peace of the Roman empire. They frankly confessed their royal origin, and their near relation to the Messiah, but they disclaimed any temporal views, and professed that his kingdom, which they devoutly expected, was purely of a spiritual and angelic nature. When they were examined concerning their fortune and occupation, they showed their hands hardened with daily labour, and declared that they derived their whole subsistence from the cultivation of a farm near the village of Coceba, of the extent of about twenty-four English acres, and of the value of nine thousand drachms or three hundred pounds sterling. The grandsons of St Jude were dismissed with compassion and contempt.<sup>d</sup>

Execution of Clemens the consul

But although the obscurity of the house of David might protect them from the suspicions of a tyrant, the present greatness of his own family alarmed the pusillanimous temper of Domitian, which could only be appeased by the blood of those Romans whom he either feared, or hated, or esteemed. Of the two sons of his uncle Flavius Salinus,<sup>e</sup> the elder was soon convicted of treasonable intentions, and the younger, who bore the name of Flavius Clemens, was indebted for his safety to his want of courage and ability.<sup>f</sup> The emperor, for a long time, distinguished so harmless a kinsman by his favour and protection, bestowed on him his own niece Domitilla, adopted the children of that marriage to the hope of the succession, and invested their father with the honours of the consulship. But he had scarcely finished the term of his annual magistracy, when on a slight pretence he was condemned and executed, Domitilla was banished to a desolate island on the coast of Campania,<sup>g</sup> and sentence either of death or of confiscation was pronounced against a great number of persons who were involved in the same accusation. The guilt imputed to their charge was that of atheism and Jewish manners,<sup>h</sup> a singular association of ideas, which cannot with any propriety be applied except to the christians, as they were obscurely and imperfectly viewed by the magistrates and by the writers of that period.

Joseph and of Mary. A devout respect for the virginity of the mother of God, suggested to the Gnostics, and afterwards to the orthodox Greeks, the expedient of her having a second wife on Joseph. The Latins (from the time of Jerome) improved on this hint asserted the perpetual celibacy of Joseph, and justified by many similar examples the new interpretation that Jude, as well as Simon and James, who are styled the brothers of Jesus Christ, were only his first cousins. See Tillamont, Mém. Ecclesiast. tom. i. part. ii. and Beausobre, Hist. Critique du Manichéisme l. ii. c. 2.

<sup>d</sup> Thirty nine πλεθρα, squares of an hundred feet each, which, if strictly computed, would scarcely amount to nine acres. But the probability of circumstances, the practice of other Greek writers, and the authority of M. de Valois, incline me to believe that the πλεθρον is used to express the Roman jugurum.

<sup>e</sup> Tacitus, lib. 20. The story is taken from Hieronymus.

<sup>f</sup> See the death and character of Salinus in Tacitus (Hist. lib. 74).

<sup>g</sup> Salinus was the elder brother, and, till the accession of Vespasian, had been considered as the principal support of the Flavian family.

<sup>h</sup> Flavianum Clementina patrui in sinum contentissimæ inertæ—ex tenuissimi suscipiente intermit. Sueton. in Domitian. c. 15.

On the strength of so probable an interpretation, and too eagerly admitting the suspicions of a tyrant as an evidence of their honourable crime, the church has placed both Clemens and Domitilla among its first martyrs, and has branded the cruelty of Domitian with the name of the second persecution. But this persecution (if it deserves that epithet) was of no long duration. A few months after the death of Clemens, and the banishment of Domitilla, Stephen, a freedman belonging to the latter, who had enjoyed the favour, but who had not sorely embraced the faith, of his mistress, assassinated the emperor in his palace.<sup>i</sup> The memory of Domitian was condemned by the senate, his acts were rescinded, his exiles recalled, and under the gentle administration of Nerva, while the innocent were restored to their rank and fortunes, even the most guilty either obtained pardon or escaped punishment.<sup>k</sup>

II About ten years afterwards, under the reign of Trajan, the younger Pliny, <sup>ignorance of Pliny concerning the christians</sup> was intrusted by his friend and master with the government of Bithynia and Pontus. He soon found himself at a loss to determine by what rule of justice or of law he should direct his conduct in the execution of an office the most repugnant to his humanity. Pliny had never assisted at any judicial proceedings against the christians, with whose name alone he seems to be acquainted, and he was totally uninformed with regard to the nature of their guilt, the method of their conviction, and the degree of their punishment. In this perplexity he had recourse to his usual expedient, of submitting to the wisdom of Trajan an impartial, and in some respects, a favourable account of the new superstition, requesting the emperor, that he would condescend to resolve his doubts, and to instruct his ignorance.<sup>l</sup> The life of Pliny had been employed in the acquisition of learning, and in the business of the world. Since the age of nineteen he had pleaded with distinction in the tribunals of Rome,<sup>m</sup> filled a place in the senate, had been invested with the honours of the consulship, and had formed very numerous connections with every order of men, both in Italy and in the provinces. From his ignorance therefore we may derive some useful information. We may assure ourselves that when he accepted the government of Bithynia, there were no general laws or decrees of the senate in force against the <sup>g</sup> The tale of Prudentia, according to Dion. Brutus Præsens (apud Luceb. in 18) burieth her to that of Pontus, which was not far distant from the other. That difference, and a mistake, either of Eusebius, or of his transcribers, have given occasion to suppose two Domitillas, the wife and the niece of Clemens. See Tillamont, Mémoires Ecclesiastiques, tom. i. p. 224.

<sup>h</sup> Dion, lib. xvii p. 112. If the Brutus Præsens from whom it is probable that he collected this account was the correspondent of Pliny (Epistol. lib. 3) we may consider him as a contemporary writer.

<sup>i</sup> Suet. in Domit. c. 17. Philostratus in Vit. Apollon. lib. viii.

<sup>k</sup> Dion, lib. xviii p. 1118. Plin. Epistol. lib. 22.

<sup>l</sup> Plin. Epistol. x 97. The learned Mosheim expresses himself (p. 147, 232) with the highest approbation of Pliny a moderate and candid temper. Notwithstanding Dr Lardner's suppositions, (see Jewish and Heathen Testimonies vol. ii. p. 46) I am unable to discover any bigotry, in his language or proceeding.

<sup>m</sup> Plin. Epistol. v 8. He pleaded his first cause A. D. 81, the year after the famous eruption of Mount Vesuvius, in which his uncle lost his life.

christians, that neither Trajan nor any of his virtuous predecessors, whose edicts were received into the civil and criminal jurisprudence, had publicly declared their intentions concerning the new sect, and that whatever proceedings had been carried on against the christians, there were none of sufficient weight and authority to establish a precedent for the conduct of a Roman magistrate

Trajan and his successors establish a legal mode of proceeding against them

The answer of Trajan, to which the christians of the succeeding age have frequently appealed, discovers as much regard for justice and humanity as could be reconciled with his mistaken notions of religious policy.<sup>a</sup> Instead of displaying the implacable zeal of an inquisitor, anxious to discover the most minute particles of heresy, and exulting in the number of his victims, the emperor expresses much more solicitude to protect the security of the innocent, than to prevent the escape of the guilty. He acknowledges the difficulty of fixing any general plan, but he lays down two salutary rules, which often afforded relief and support to the distressed christians. Though he directs the magistrates to punish such persons as are legally convicted, he prohibits them, with a very humane inconsistency, from making any inquiries concerning the supposed criminals. Nor was the magistrate allowed to proceed on every kind of information. Anonymous charges the emperor rejects, as too repugnant to the equity of his government, and he strictly requires, for the conviction of those to whom the guilt of christianity is imputed, the positive evidence of a fair and open accuser. It is likewise probable, that the persons who assumed so invidious an office, were obliged to declare the grounds of their suspicions, to specify (both in respect to time and place) the secret assemblies, which their christian adversary had frequented, and to disclose a great number of circumstances, which were concealed with the most vigilant jealousy from the eye of the profane. If they succeeded in their prosecution, they were exposed to the resentment of a considerable and active party, to the censure of the more liberal portion of mankind, and to the ignominy which, in every age and country, has attended the character of an informer. If, on the contrary, they failed in their proofs, they incurred the severe and perhaps capital penalty, which, according to a law published by the emperor Hadrian, was inflicted on those who falsely attributed to their fellow-citizens the crime of christianity. The violence of personal or superstitious animosity might sometimes prevail over the most natural apprehensions of disgrace and danger, but it cannot surely be imagined, that accusations of so unpromising an appearance were either lightly or frequently undertaken by the pagan subjects of the Roman empire.<sup>b</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Plin. Epist. x. 98. Tertullian (Apolog. c. 5) considers this rescript as a relaxation of the ancient penal laws. quos Trajanus ex parte frustulatus est and yet Tertullian, in another part of his Apologists, exposes the inconsistency of prohibiting inquiries, and enjoining punishments.

<sup>b</sup> Eusebius (Hist. Ecclesiast. l. iv. c. 9) has preserved the edict of Hadrian. He has likewise (c. 13) given us one still more favourable

The expedient which was employed to elude the prudence of the laws, affords a sufficient proof how effectually they disappointed the mischievous designs of private malice or superstitious zeal. In a large and tumultuous assembly the restraints of fear and shame, so forcible on the minds of individuals, are deprived of the greatest part of their influence. The pious christian, as he was desirous to obtain, or to escape, the glory of martyrdom, expected, either with impatience or with terror, the stated returns of the public games and festivals. On those occasions, the inhabitants of the great cities of the empire were collected in the circus of the theatre, where every circumstance of the place, as well as of the ceremony, contributed to kindle their devotion, and to extinguish their humanity. Whilst the numerous spectators, crowned with garlands, perfumed with incense, purified with the blood of victims, and surrounded with the altars and statues of their tutelary deities, resigned themselves to the enjoyment of pleasures, which they considered as an essential part of their religious worship, they recollected, that the christians alone abhorred the gods of mankind, and by their absence and melancholy on these solemn festivals, seemed to insult or to lament the public felicity. If the empire had been afflicted by any recent calamity, by a plague, a famine, or an unsuccessful war, if the Tyber had, or if the Nile had not, risen beyond its banks, if the earth had shaken, or if the temperate order of the seasons had been interrupted, the superstitious pagans were convinced, that the crimes and the impiety of the christians, who were spared by the excessive lenity of the government, had at length provoked the Divine justice. It was not among a licentious and exasperated populace, that the forms of legal proceedings could be observed, it was not in an amphitheatre, stained with the blood of wild beasts and gladiators, that the voice of compassion could be heard. The impatient clamours of the multitude denounced the christians as the enemies of gods and men, doomed them to the severest tortures, and venturing to accuse by name some of the most distinguished of the new sectaries, required with irresistible vehemence that they should be instantly apprehended and cast to the lions.<sup>c</sup> The provincial governors and magistrates who presided in the public spectacles were usually inclined to gratify the inclinations, and to appease the rage, of the people, by the sacrifice of a few obnoxious victims. But the wisdom of the emperors protected the church from the danger of these tumultuous clamours and irregular accusations, which they justly censured as repugnant both to the firmness and to the equity of their administration. The edicts of Hadrian and of Antoninus Pius expressly declared, that the voice of the multitude should never be admitted as under the name of Antoninus the authenticity of which is not universally allowed. The second Apology of Justin contains some curious particulars relative to the accusation of christians.

Popular clamours

<sup>c</sup> See Tertullian (Apolog. c. 40). The acts of the martyrdom of Polycarp exhibit a lively picture of these tumults, which were usually fomented by the malice of the Jews.

legal evidence to convict or to punish those unfortunate persons who had embraced the enthusiasm of christians <sup>9</sup>

<sup>Trial of the christians.</sup> III Punishment was not the inevitable consequence of conviction, and the christians, whose guilt was the most clearly proved by the testimony of witnesses, or even by their voluntary confession, still retained in their own power the alternative of life or death. It was not so much the past offence, as the actual resistance, which excited the indignation of the magistrate. He was persuaded that he offered them an easy pardon, since if they consented to cast a few grains of incense upon the altar, they were dismissed from the tribunal in safety and with applause. It was esteemed the duty of a humane judge to endeavour to reclaim, rather than to punish, those deluded enthusiasts. Varying his tone according to the age, the sex, or the situation of the prisoners, he frequently condescended to set before their eyes every circumstance which could render life more pleasing, or death more terrible, and to solicit, nay to entreat, them, that they would show some compassion to themselves, to their families, and to their friends. If threats and persuasions proved ineffectual, he had often recourse to violence, the scourge and the rack were called in to supply the deficiency of argument, and every art of cruelty was employed to subdue such inflexible, and, as it appeared to the pagans, such criminal, obstinacy. The ancient apologists of christianity have censured with equal truth and severity, the irregular conduct of their persecutors, who, contrary to every principle of judicial proceeding, admitted the use of torture, in order to obtain, not a confession, but a denial, of the crime which was the object of their inquiry. The monks of the succeeding ages, who, in their peaceful solitudes, entertained themselves with diversifying the deaths and sufferings of the primitive martyrs, have frequently invented torments of a much more refined and ingenious nature. In particular, it has pleased them to suppose, that the zeal of the Roman magistrates, disdaining every consideration of moral virtue or public decency, endeavoured to seduce those whom they were unable to vanquish, and that by their orders the most brutal violence was offered to those whom they found it impossible to seduce. It is related, that pious females, who were prepared to despise death, were sometimes condemned to a more severe trial, and called upon to determine whether they set a higher value on their religion or on their chastity

The youths to whose licentious embraces they were abandoned, received a solemn exhortation from the judge, to exert their most strenuous efforts to maintain the honour of Venus against the impious virgin who refused to burn incense on her altars. Their violence, however, was commonly disappointed, and the seasonable interposition of some miraculous power preserved the chaste spouses of Christ from the dishonour even of an involuntary defeat. We should not indeed neglect to remark, that the more ancient as well as authentic memorials of the church are seldom polluted with these extravagant and indecent fictions.

The total disregard of truth and probability in the representation of these primitive martyrdoms was occasioned by a very natural mistake. The ecclesiastical writers of the fourth or fifth centuries ascribed to the magistrates of Rome the same degree of implacable and unrelenting zeal which filled their own breasts against the heretics or the idolaters of their own times. It is not improbable that some of those persons who were raised to the dignities of the empire, might have imbibed the prejudices of the populace, and that the cruel disposition of others might occasionally be stimulated by motives of avarice or of personal resentment. But it is certain, and we may appeal to the grateful confessions of the first christians, that the greatest part of those magistrates who exercised in the provinces the authority of the emperor, or of the senate, and to whose hands alone the jurisdiction of life and death was intrusted, behaved like men of polished manners and liberal education, who respected the rules of justice, and who were conversant with the precepts of philosophy. They frequently declined the odious task of persecution, dismissed the charge with contempt, or suggested to the accused christian some legal evasion, by which he might elude the severity of the laws. Whenever they were invested with a discretionary power, they used it much less for the oppression, than for the relief and benefit, of the afflicted church. They were far from condemning all the christians who were accused before their tribunal, and very far from punishing with death, all those who were convicted of an obstinate adherence to the new superstition. Contenting themselves, for the most part, with the milder chastisements of imprisonment, exile, or slavery in the mines, they left the unhappy victims of their justice some reason to hope, that a prosperous event, the accession, the marriage, or the triumph of an em-

Humanity of the Roman magistrates

<sup>9</sup> These regulations are inserted in the above mentioned edicts of Hadrian and Pius. See the apology of Melito (apud Juseli l. iv. c. 26.)

<sup>10</sup> See the rescript of Tryjan, and the conduct of Phry. The most authentic relics of the martyrs abound in these exhortations.

<sup>11</sup> In particular, see Tertullian (Apolog. c. 2, 3.) and Lactantius (Institut. Divin. v. 9.) Their reasonings are almost the same, but we may discover, that one of these apologists had been a lawyer, and the other a rhetorician.

<sup>12</sup> See two instances of this kind of torture in the Acta Sancti Mar. Tyrini, published by Ruinart, p. 169, 399. Jerome in his Legend of Paul the Hermit, tells a strange story of a young man, who was chained naked on a bed of flowers, and assaulted by a beautiful and wanton courtesan. He quelled the rising temptation by biting off his tongue.

<sup>13</sup> The conversion of his wife provoked Claudius Hermianus, governor of Cappadocia, to treat the Christians with uncommon severity. Tertullian ad Scapulum, c. 3.

<sup>14</sup> Tertullian, in his epistle to the Governor of Africa, mentions several remarkable instances of lenity and forbearance, which had happened within his knowledge, c.

<sup>15</sup> Neque enim in universum aliquid quod quasi certum formam habet, constitui potest: an expression of Tryjan, which gives a very great latitude to the Governors of provinces.

<sup>16</sup> In metallis damnantur, in insulis releguntur. Tertullian Apolog. c. 12. The names of Numidia contained nine bishops, with a proportionable number of their clergy and people, to whom Cyprian addressed a pious epistle of praise and comfort. See Cyprian, Epistol. 76, 77.

peror, might speedily restore them by a general pardon to their former state. The martyrs, devoted to immediate execution by the Roman magistrates, appear to have been selected from the most opposite extremes. They were either bishops and presbyters, the persons the most distinguished among the christians by their rank and influence, and whose example might strike terror into the whole sect,<sup>a</sup> or else they were the meanest and most abject among them, particularly those of the servile condition, whose lives were esteemed of little value, and whose sufferings were viewed by the ancients with too careless an indifference.<sup>b</sup> The learned Origen, who, from his experience as well as reading, was intimately acquainted with the history of the christians, declares in the most express terms, that the number of martyrs was very inconsiderable.<sup>c</sup> His authority would alone be sufficient to annihilate that formidable army of martyrs, whose relics, drawn for the most part from the catacombs of Rome, have replenished so many churches,<sup>d</sup> and whose marvellous achievements have been the subject of so many volumes of holy romance.<sup>e</sup> But the general assertion of Origen may be explained and confirmed by the particular testimony of his friend Dionysius, who, in the immense city of Alexandria, and under the rigorous persecution of Decius, reckons only ten men and seven women who suffered for the profession of the christian name.<sup>f</sup>

Example of Cyprian bishop of Carthage

During the same period of persecution, the zealous, the eloquent, the ambitious Cyprian governed the church, not only of Carthage, but even of Africa. He possessed every quality which could engage the reverence of the faithful, or provoke the suspicions and resentment of the pagan magistrates. His character as well as his station seemed to mark out that holy prelate as the most distinguished object of envy and of danger.<sup>g</sup> The experience, however, of the life of Cyprian, is sufficient to prove, that our fancy has exaggerated the perilous situation of a christian bishop, and that the dangers to which he was exposed were less imminent than those which temporal ambition is always prepared to encounter in the pursuit of honours. Four Roman emperors, with their families, their favourites, and their adherents, perished by the sword in the space of ten years, during which the bishop of Carthage guided by his authority and eloquence the counsels of the African church. It was only in the third year of his administration, that he had reason, during a few months, to apprehend the severe edicts of Decius, the vigilance of the magistrate, and the clamours of the multitude, who loudly demanded, that Cyprian, the leader of the christians, should be thrown to the lions. Prudence suggested the necessity of a temporary retreat, and the voice of prudence was obeyed. He withdrew himself into an obscure solitude, from whence he could maintain a constant correspondence with the clergy and people of Carthage, and concealing himself till the tempest was past, he preserved his life, without relinquishing either his power or his reputation. His extreme caution did not however escape the censure of the more rigid christians who lamented, or the reproaches of his personal enemies who insulted, a conduct which they considered as a pusillanimous and criminal desertion of the most sacred duty.<sup>h</sup> The propriety of reserving himself for the future exigencies of the church, the example of several holy bishops,<sup>i</sup> and the divine admonitions which, as he declares himself, he frequently received in visions and ecstasies, were the reasons alleged in his justification.<sup>k</sup> But his best apology may be found in the cheerful resolution, with which, about eight years afterwards, he suffered death in the cause of religion. The authentic history of his martyrdom has been recorded with unusual candour and impartiality. A short abstract therefore of its most important circumstances will convey the clearest information of the spirit, and of the forms, of the Roman persecutions.<sup>l</sup>

When Valerian was consul for the third, and Gallienus for the fourth, time, Paternus, proconsul of Africa, summoned Cyprian to appear in his private council-chamber. He there acquainted him with the imperial mandate

<sup>a</sup> Though we cannot receive with entire confidence, either the epistles, or the acts of Ignatius (they may be found in the 2nd volume of the Apostolic Fathers,) yet we may quote that bishop of Antioch as one of these exemplary martyrs. He was sent in chains to Rome as a public spectacle, and when he arrived at Tros he received the pleasing intelligence, that the persecution of Antioch was already at an end.

<sup>b</sup> Among the martyrs of Lyons (Euseb. l. v. c. 1) the slave Blandina was distinguished by more exquisite tortures. Of the five martyrs so much celebrated in the nets of Felicitas and Perpetua, two were of a servile, and two others of a very mean, condition.

<sup>c</sup> Origen aduers. Celsum, l. iii. p. 116. His words deserve to be translated: "Ὁλίγοι κατὰ καίρους, καὶ σφοδρὰ ἐναριθμητοὶ περὶ τὴν Χριστιανὴν θεοσεβείαν τελέτηται."

<sup>d</sup> If we recollect that all the plebeians of Rome were not christians, and that all the christians were not saints and martyrs, we may judge with how much safety religious honours can be ascribed to bones or urns indiscriminately taken from the public burial place. After ten centuries of a very free and open trade some suspicions have arisen among the more learned catholics. They now require, as a proof of sanctity and martyrdom, the letters B M, a vial full of red liquor supposed to be blood, or the figure of a palm tree. But the two former signs are of little weight, and with regard to the last, it is observed by the critics 1. That the figure, as it is called, of a palm, is perhaps a cypress, and perhaps only a stop, the flourish of a emblem used in the monumental inscriptions. 2. That the palm was the symbol of victory among the pagans. 3. That among the christians it served as the emblem not only of martyrdom but in general of a joyful resurrection. See the epistle of P. Malinon on the worship of unknown saints, and Muratori, supra le Antichità Italiane, Dissert. lvi.

<sup>e</sup> As a specimen of these legends, we may be satisfied with 10,000 christian soldiers crucified in one day, either by Trajan or Hadrian on Mount Ararat. See Baronius ad Martyrologium Romanum Tillemont Mem. Ecclesiast. tom. ii. part. ii. p. 438 and Geddes's Miscellanea, vol. ii. p. 203. The abbreviation of MIL which may signify either soldiers or thousands, is said to have occasioned some extraordinary mistakes.

<sup>f</sup> Dionysius ap. Euseb. l. vi. c. 41. One of the seventeen was likewise accused of robbery.

<sup>g</sup> The letters of Cyprian exhibit a very curious and original picture both of the man and of the times. See likewise the two lives of Cyprian, composed with equal accuracy, though with very different views, the one by Le Clerc (Bibliothèque Universelle tom. xii. p. 208—378.) the other by Tillemont, Mémoires Ecclesiastiques, tom. iv. part. i. p. 76—459.

<sup>h</sup> See the polite but severe epistle of the clergy of Rome to the bishop of Carthage (Cyprian Epist. 89.) Pontius labours with the greatest care and diligence to justify his master against the general censure.

<sup>i</sup> In particular those of Dionysius of Alexandria, and Gregory Thaumaturgus, of Neo-Cæsarea. See Euseb. Hist. Ecclesiast. l. vi. c. 40 and Mémoires de Tillemont tom. ii. part. ii. p. 685.

<sup>k</sup> See Cyprian, Epist. 16 and his life by Pontius.

<sup>l</sup> We have an original life of Cyprian by the deacon Pontius the companion of his exile and the spectator of his death, and we likewise possess the ancient promissory acts of his martyrdom. These two relations are consistent with each other, and with probability, and what is somewhat remarkable, they are both unsullied by any miraculous circumstances.

which he had just received,<sup>m</sup> that those who had abandoned the Roman religion should immediately return to the practice of the ceremonies of their ancestors. Cyprian replied without hesitation, that he was a christian and a bishop, devoted to the worship of the true and only Deity, to whom he offered up his daily supplications for the safety and prosperity of the two emperors, his lawful sovereigns. With modest confidence he pleaded the privilege of a citizen, in refusing to give any answer to some invidious and indeed illegal questions which the proconsul had proposed. A sentence of banishment was pronounced as the penalty of Cyprian's disobedience, and he was conducted without delay to Curubis, a free and maritime city of Zeugitania, in a pleasant situation, a fertile territory, and at the distance of about forty miles from Carthage.<sup>n</sup> The exiled bishop enjoyed the conveniences of life and the consciousness of virtue. His reputation was diffused over Africa and Italy, an account of his behaviour was published for the edification of the christian world,<sup>o</sup> and his solitude was frequently interrupted by the letters, the visits, and the congratulations of the faithful. On the arrival of a new proconsul in the province, the fortune of Cyprian appeared for some time to wear a still more favourable aspect. He was recalled from banishment, and though not yet permitted to return to Carthage, his own gardens in the neighbourhood of the capital were assigned for the place of his residence.<sup>p</sup>

<sup>His condemnation</sup> At length, exactly one year<sup>q</sup> after Cyprian was first apprehended, Galerius Maximus, proconsul of Africa, received the imperial warrant for the execution of the christian teachers. The bishop of Carthage was sensible that he should be singled out for one of the first victims, and the frailty of nature tempted him to withdraw himself by a secret flight, from the danger and the honour of martyrdom. but soon recovering that fortitude which his character required, he returned to his gardens, and patiently expected the ministers of death. Two officers of rank, who were intrusted with that commission, placed Cyprian between them in a chariot, and as the proconsul was not then at leisure, they conducted him, not to a prison, but to a private house in Carthage, which belonged to one of them. An elegant supper was provided for the entertainment of the bishop, and his christian friends were permitted for the last time to enjoy his society, whilst the streets were filled with a multitude of the faithful, anxious and alarmed at the approaching fate of their spiritual father.<sup>r</sup> In the morning he appeared before the tribunal of the proconsul, who, after informing himself of the name and situation of Cyprian, commanded him to offer sacrifice, and pressed him to reflect on the consequences of his disobedience. The refusal of Cyprian was firm and decisive, and the magistrate, when he had taken the opinion of his council, pronounced with some reluctance the sentence of death. It was conceived in the following terms: "That Thascius Cyprianus should be immediately beheaded, as the enemy of the gods of Rome, and as the chief and ringleader of a criminal association, which he had seduced into an impious resistance against the laws of the most holy emperors, Valerian and Gallienus."<sup>s</sup> The manner of his execution was the mildest and least painful that could be inflicted on a person convicted of any capital offence, nor was the use of torture admitted to obtain from the bishop of Carthage either the recantation of his principles, or the discovery of his accomplices.

As soon as the sentence was proclaimed, a general cry of "We will die with him," arose at once among the listening multitude of christians who waited before the palace gates. The generous effusions of their zeal and affection were neither serviceable to Cyprian nor dangerous to themselves. He was led away under a guard of tribunes and centurions, without resistance and without insult, to the place of his execution, a spacious and level plain near the city, which was already filled with great numbers of spectators. His faithful presbyters and deacons were permitted to accompany their holy bishop. They assisted him in laying aside his upper garment, spread linen on the ground to catch the precious relics of his blood, and received his orders to bestow five and twenty pieces of gold on the executioner. The martyr then covered his face with his hands, and at one blow his head was separated from his body. His corpse remained during some hours exposed to the curiosity of the gentiles, but in the night it was removed, and transported in a triumphal procession, and with a splendid illumination, to the burial-place of the christians. The funeral of Cyprian was publicly celebrated without receiving any interruption from the Roman magistrates, and those among the faithful, who had performed the last offices to his person and his memory, were secure from the danger of inquiry or of punishment. It is remarkable, that of so great a multitude of bishops in the province of Africa, Cyprian was <sup>m</sup> It should seem that these were circular orders sent at the same time to all the governors. Dionysius (ap. Lucel. l. vii. c. 11) relates the history of his own banishment from Alexandria almost in the same manner. But as he escaped and survived the persecution, we must account him either more or less fortunate than Cyprian.

<sup>n</sup> See Plin. Hist. Natur. v. 3. Cellarius Geograph. Antiq. part iii. p. 96. Shaw's Travels p. 90. and for the adjacent country (which is terminated by Cape Bona, or the promontory of Mercury,) l. Afrique de Marmol tom. ii. p. 494. There are the remains of an aqueduct near an inscription which styles that city Colonia Fulvia. The deacon Pontius (in Vit. Cyprian. c. 12.) calls it Aprium et competentem locum hospitum pro voluntate secretum et quicquid apponi eis ante promissum est, qui regnum et justitiam Dei querunt.

<sup>o</sup> See Cyprian Epistol. 77. Edit. Fell.

<sup>p</sup> Upon his conversion, he had sold those gardens for the benefit of the poor. The indulgence of God (most probably the liberality of some christian friend) restored them to Cyprian. See Pontius c. 15.

<sup>q</sup> When Cyprian a twelvemonth before was sent into exile, he dreamt that he should be put to death the next day. The event made it necessary to explain that word, as signifying a year. Pontius c. 12.

<sup>r</sup> Pontius (c. 15) acknowledges that Cyprian with whom he supped passed the night eulodis delicata. The bishop exercised a last and very proper act of jurisdiction, by directing that the younger females who watched in the street should be removed from the dangers and temptations of a nocturnal crowd. Act. Proconsularia, c. 2.

<sup>s</sup> See the original sentence in the Acts c. 4. and in Pontius, c. 17. The latter expresses it in a more rhetorical manner.

the first who was esteemed worthy to obtain the crown of martyrdom<sup>t</sup>

It was in the choice of Cyprian, either to die a martyr, or to live an apostate but on that choice depended the alternative of honour or infamy. Could we suppose that the bishop of Carthage had employed the profession of the christian faith only as the instrument of his avarice or ambition, it was still incumbent on him to support the character which he had assumed,<sup>u</sup> and, if he possessed the smallest degree of manly fortitude, rather to expose himself to the most cruel tortures, than by a single act to exchange the reputation of a whole life, for the abhorrence of his christian brethren, and the contempt of the gentile world. But if the zeal of Cyprian was supported by the sincere conviction of the truth of those doctrines which he preached, the crown of martyrdom must have appeared to him as an object of desire rather than of terror. It is not easy to extract any distinct ideas from the vague though eloquent declamations of the fathers, or to ascertain the degree of immortal glory and happiness which they confidently promised to those who were so fortunate as to shed their blood in the cause of religion<sup>x</sup>. They inculcated with becoming diligence, that the fire of martyrdom supplied every defect and expiated every sin, that while the souls of ordinary christians were obliged to pass through a slow and painful purification, the triumphant sufferers entered into the immediate fruition of eternal bliss, where, in the society of the patriarchs, the apostles, and the prophets, they reigned with Christ, and acted as his assessors in the universal judgment of mankind. The assurance of a lasting reputation upon earth, a motive so congenial to the vanity of human nature, often served to animate the courage of the martyrs. The honours which Rome or Athens bestowed on those citizens who had fallen in the cause of their country, were cold and unmeaning demonstrations of respect, when compared with the ardent gratitude and devotion which the primitive church expressed towards the victorious champions of the faith. The annual commemoration of their virtues and sufferings was observed as a sacred ceremony, and at length terminated in religious worship. Among the christians who had publicly confessed their religious principles, those who (as it very frequently happened) had been dismissed from the tribunal or the prisons of the pagan magistrates, obtained such honours as were justly due to their imperfect martyrdom, and their generous resolution. The most pious females courted the permission of imprinting kisses on the fetters which they had worn, and on the wounds which they had received. Their persons were esteemed holy, their decisions were admitted with deference, and they too often abused, by their spiritual pride and licentious manners, the pre-eminence which their zeal and intrepidity had acquired. Distinctions like these, whilst they display the exalted merit, betray the inconsiderable number, of those who suffered, and of those who died, for the profession of christianity.

The sober discretion of the present Age will more readily censure than <sup>Arduour of the first christians</sup> admire, but can more easily admire than imitate, the fervour of the first christians, who, according to the lively expression of Sulpicius Severus, desired martyrdom with more eagerness than his own contemporaries solicited a bishopric<sup>y</sup>. The epistles which Ignatius composed as he was carried in chains through the cities of Asia, breathe sentiments the most repugnant to the ordinary feelings of human nature. He earnestly beseeches the Romans, that when he should be exposed in the amphitheatre, they would not, by their kind but unseasonable intercession, deprive him of the crown of glory, and he declares his resolution to provoke and irritate the wild beasts which might be employed as the instruments of his death<sup>z</sup>. Some stories are related of the courage of martyrs, who actually performed what Ignatius had intended, who exasperated the fury of the lions, pressed the executioner to hasten his office, cheerfully leaped into the fires which were kindled to consume them, and discovered a sensation of joy and pleasure in the midst of the most exquisite tortures. Several examples have been preserved of a zeal impatient of those restraints which the emperors had provided for the security of the church. The christians sometimes supplied by their voluntary declaration the want of an accuser, rudely disturbed the public service of paganism,<sup>a</sup> and rushing in crowds round the tribunal of the magistrates, called upon them to pronounce and to inflict the sentence of the law. The behaviour of the christians was too remarkable to escape the notice of the ancient philosophers, but they seem to have considered it with much less admiration than astonishment. Incapable of conceiving the motives which sometimes transported the fortitude of believers beyond the bounds of prudence or reason, they treated such an eagerness to die as the strange result of obstinate despair, of stupid insensibility, <sup>t</sup> Pontius c 19 M de Tillemont (Memoires, tom iv part 1 p 450 note 50) is not pleased with so positive an exclusion of any former merits of the episcopal rank.

<sup>u</sup> Whatever opinion we may entertain of the character or principles of Thomas Becket we must acknowledge that he suffered death with a constancy not unworthy of the primitive martyrs. See Lord Lyttelton's History of Henry II vol ii p 592 &c.

<sup>x</sup> See in particular the treatise of Cyprian de Lapsis, p 87—94. Edil Fell. The learning of Dodwell (Dissertat. Cyprianicæ xii xiii) and the ingenuity of Middleton (Free Inquiry, p 162, &c) have left scarcely any thing to add concerning the merit, the honours, and the motives of the martyrs.

<sup>y</sup> Cyprian Epistol 5—7, 22, 24 and de Unitat. Ecclesie. The number of pretended martyrs has been very much multiplied, by the custom which was introduced of bestowing that honourable name on confessors

<sup>z</sup> Certum gloriosa in certamina ruebatur nullique avidius lum. martyria gloriosis martibus querebatur, quam nunc episcopatus pravis ambitionibus appelluntur Sulpicius Severus, l ii. He might have omitted the word nunc.

<sup>a</sup> See Epist. ad Roman. c 4 5 ap. Patres Apostol. tom ii p 27. It suited the purpose of Bishop Pearson (see Vindiciæ L. Juliano part ii c 9) to justify by a profusion of examples and authorities, the sentiments of Ignatius.

<sup>b</sup> The story of Polyuctes, on which Corneille has founded a very beautiful tragedy is one of the most celebrated though not perhaps the most authentic instances of this excessive zeal. We should observe that the 60th canon of the council of Nicaea refines the title of martyrs to those who exposed themselves to death, by publicly destroying the idols.

or of superstitious phrensy. "Unhappy men!" exclaimed the proconsul Antoninus to the christians of Asia, "unhappy men! if you are thus weary of your lives, is it so difficult for you to find ropes and precipices?"<sup>a</sup> He was extremely cautious (as it is observed by a learned and pious historian) of punishing men who had found no accusers but themselves, the imperial laws not having made any provision for so unexpected a case. condemning therefore a few, as a warning to their brethren, he dismissed the multitude with indignation and contempt. Notwithstanding this real or affected disdain, the intrepid constancy of the faithful was productive of more salutary effects on those minds which nature or grace had disposed for the easy reception of religious truth. On these melancholy occasions, there were many among the gentiles who pitied, who admired, and who were converted. The generous enthusiasm was communicated from the sufferer to the spectators, and the blood of martyrs, according to a well-known observation, became the seed of the church.

Gradual relaxation But although devotion had raised, and eloquence continued to inflame, this fever of the mind, it insensibly gave way to the more natural hopes and fears of the human heart, to the love of life, the apprehension of pain, and the horror of dissolution. The more prudent rulers of the church found themselves obliged to restrain the indiscreet ardour of their followers, and to distrust a constancy which too often abandoned them in the hour of trial.<sup>b</sup> As the lives of the faithful became less mortified and austere, they were every day less ambitious of the honours of martyrdom, and the soldiers of Christ, instead of distinguishing themselves by voluntary deeds of heroism, frequently deserted their post, and fled in confusion before the enemy whom it was their duty to resist. There were three methods, however, of escaping the flames of persecution, which were not attended with an equal degree of guilt: the first indeed was generally allowed to be innocent, the second was of a doubtful, or at least of a venial, nature, but the third implied a direct and criminal apostasy from the christian faith.

Three methods of escaping martyrdom

I A modern inquisitor would hear with surprise, that whenever an information was given to a Roman magistrate, of any person within his jurisdiction who had embraced the sect of the christians, the charge was communicated to the party accused, and that a

<sup>a</sup> See Epictetus, l. ii. c. 7 (though there is some doubt whether he alludes to the christians), Marcus Antoninus de Rebus suis, l. xi. c. 3. Luerin in Peregrin.

<sup>b</sup> Tertullian ad Scapula c. 5. The learned are divided between three persons of the same name, who were all proconsuls of Asia. I am inclined to ascribe this story to Antoninus Pius who was afterwards emperor, and who may have governed Asia, under the reign of Tryjan.

<sup>c</sup> Moheim de Rebus Christi. ante Constantinum p. 235.

<sup>d</sup> See the Epistle of the Church of Smyrna, ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. l. iv. c. 15.

<sup>e</sup> In the second apology of Justin there is a particular and very curious instance of this legal delay. The same indulgence was granted to accused christians in the persecution of Decius and Cyprian (de Lapsis) expressly mentions the "Drenergantibus praestitutus."

<sup>f</sup> Tertullian considers flight from persecution as an imperfect, but very criminal, apostasy, as an impious attempt to elude the will of God, &c. &c. He has written a treatise on this subject (see p. 536—

convenient time was allowed him to settle his domestic concerns, and to prepare an answer to the crime which was imputed to him. If he entertained any doubt of his own constancy, such a delay afforded him an opportunity of preserving his life and honour by flight, of withdrawing himself into some obscure retirement or some distant province, and of patiently expecting the return of peace and security. A measure so consonant to reason was soon authorized by the advice and example of the most holy prelates, and seems to have been censured by few, except by the Montanists, who deviated into heresy by their strict and obstinate adherence to the rigour of ancient discipline.<sup>h</sup> II. The provincial governors, whose zeal was less prevalent than their avarice, had countenanced the practice of selling certificates, (or libels as they were called,) which attested, that the persons therein mentioned had complied with the laws, and sacrificed to the Roman deities. By producing these false declarations, the opulent and timid christians were enabled to silence the malice of an informer, and to reconcile in some measure their safety with their religion. A slight penance atoned for this profane dissimulation.<sup>i</sup> III. In every persecution there were great numbers of unworthy christians, who publicly disowned or renounced the faith which they had professed, and who confirmed the sincerity of their abjuration, by the legal acts of burning incense or of offering sacrifices. Some of these apostates had yielded on the first menace or exhortation of the magistrate, whilst the patience of others had been subdued by the length and repetition of tortures. The affrighted countenances of some betrayed their inward remorse, while others advanced with confidence and alacrity to the altars of the gods.<sup>k</sup> But the disguise, which fear had imposed, subsisted no longer than the present danger. As soon as the severity of the persecution was abated, the doors of the churches were assailed by the returning multitude of penitents, who detested their idolatrous submission, and who solicited with equal ardour, but with various success, their readmission into the society of christians.<sup>l</sup>

IV Notwithstanding the general rules established for the conviction and punishment of the christians, the fate of those sectaries, in an extensive and arbitrary government, must still, in a great measure, have depended on their own behaviour, the circumstances of the times, and the temper of their supreme as

Alternatives of severity and toleration

544 Edit Rigalt) which is filled with the wildest fanaticism and the most incoherent declamation. It is, however, somewhat remarkable, that Tertullian did not suffer martyrdom himself.

<sup>h</sup> The Libellatici, who are chiefly known by the writing of Cyprian, are described with the utmost precision, in the copious commentary of Mosheim, p. 483—489.

<sup>i</sup> Phil. Epistol. x. 97. Dionysius Alexandrin ap. Euseb. l. vi. c. 41. Ad primum statim verba inimici maximus fratrum numerus fidem suam prodidit nec prostratus est persecutionis impetu sed voluntario lapsu seipsum prostravit. Cyprian Opera, p. 89. Among these deserters were many priests and even bishops.

<sup>k</sup> It was on this occasion that Cyprian wrote his treatise De Lapsis, and many of his epistles. The controversy concerning the treatment of penitent apostates, does not occur among the christians of the preceding century. Shall we ascribe this to the superiority of their faith and courage, or to our less intimate knowledge of their history?

well as subordinate rulers Zeal might sometimes provoke and prudence might sometimes avert or assuage, the superstitious fury of the pagans. A variety of motives might dispose the provincial governors either to enforce or to relax the execution of the laws, and of these motives the most forcible was their regard not only for the public edicts, but for the secret intentions of the emperor, a glance from whose eye was sufficient to kindle or to extinguish the flames of persecution. As often as any occasional severities were exercised in the different parts of the empire, the primitive christians lamented and perhaps magnified their own sufferings; but the celebrated number of ten persecutions has been determined by the ecclesiastical writers of the fifth century, who possessed a more distinct view of the prosperous or adverse fortunes of the church, from the age of Nero to that of Diocletian. The ingenious parallels of the ten plagues of Egypt, and of the ten horns of the Apocalypse, first suggested this calculation to their minds; and in their application of the faith of prophecy to the truth of history, they were careful to select those reigns which were indeed the most hostile to the christian cause.<sup>a</sup> But these transient persecutions served only to revive the zeal and to restore the discipline of the faithful, and the moments of extraordinary rigour were compensated by much longer intervals of peace and security. The indifference of some princes, and the indulgence of others, permitted the christians to enjoy, though not perhaps a legal yet an actual and public toleration of their religion.

The apology of Tertullian contains two very ancient, very singular but at the same time very suspicious instances of imperial clemency; the edicts published by Tiberius, and by Marcus Antoninus, and designed not only to protect the innocence of the christians but even to proclaim those stupendous miracles which had attested the truth of their doctrine. The first of these examples is attended with some difficulties which might perplex the sceptical mind.<sup>b</sup> We are required to believe, that Pontius Pilate informed the emperor of the unjust sentence of death which he had pronounced against an innocent, and, as it appeared, a divine, person, and that, without acquiring the merit, he exposed himself to the danger, of martyrdom, that Tiberius, who avowed his contempt for all religion, immediately conceived the design of placing the Jewish Messiah among the gods of Rome; that his servile senate ventured to disobey the commands of their master, that Tiberius, instead of resenting their refusal, contented himself with protecting the christians from the severity of the laws, many years before such laws were enacted, or before the church had assumed any distinct name or existence; and lastly, that the memory of this extraordinary transaction was preserved in the most public and authentic records, which escaped the knowledge of the historians of Greece and Rome, and were only visible to the eyes of an African christian who composed his Apology one hundred and sixty years after the death of Tiberius. The edict of Marcus Antoninus is supposed to have been the effect of his devotion and gratitude for the miraculous deliverance which he had obtained in the Marcomannic war. The distress of the legions, the seasonable tempest of rain and hail, of thunder and of lightning, and the dismay and defeat of the barbarians have been celebrated by the eloquence of several pagan writers. If there were any christians in that army, it was natural that they should ascribe some merit to the fervent prayers which in the moment of danger, they had offered up for their own and the public safety. But we are still assured by monuments of brass and marble, by the imperial medals and by the Antonine column, that neither the prince nor the people entertained any sense of this signal obligation since they unanimously attribute their deliverance to the providence of Jupiter, and to the interposition of Mercury. During the whole course of his reign, Marcus despised the christians as a philosopher and punished them as a sovereign.<sup>c</sup>

By a singular fatality, the hardships which they had endured under the government of a virtuous prince, immediately ceased on the accession of a tyrant, and as none except themselves had experienced the injustice of Marcus, so they alone were protected by the lenity of Commodus. The celebrated Marcia, the most favoured of his concubines and who at length contrived the murder of her imperial lover, entertained a singular affection for the oppressed church, and though it was impossible that she could reconcile the practice of vice with the precepts of the gospel, she might hope to atone for the frailties of her sex and profession, by declaring herself the patroness of the christians.<sup>d</sup> Under the gracious protection of Marcia they passed in safety the thirteen years of a cruel tyranny, and when the empire was established in the house of Severus they formed a domestic but more honourable connexion with the new court. The emperor was persuaded that, in a dangerous sickness he had derived some benefit, either spiritual or physical, from the holy oil, with which one of his slaves had anointed him. He always treated with peculiar distinction several persons of both sexes who had embraced the new religion. The nurse as well as the preceptor of Caracalla were christians and if that young prince ever betrayed a sentiment of humanity, it was occasioned by an incident,

State of the christians in the reigns of Commodus and Severus.

A. D. 180

<sup>a</sup> See Valesius, p. 100. Cyprianus Severus was the first author of this narrative, which he copied down, as he supposed, from the tenth and eleventh books of the annals of the emperor.

<sup>b</sup> The testimony given by Paterus Pilate is first conveyed by Justin. The narrative is corroborated by the story of the apostles, and is passed through the hands of Tertullian, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Chrysostom, and others.

the story of Pilate, are very fully stated by Dom Calmet, Dissert. de l'Écriture, tom. iii. p. 631 &c.

<sup>c</sup> On this subject, as it is common to all, of the thunder and lightning, see the admirable criticism of Mr. Moyle, in his Works, vol. i. p. 201-202.

<sup>d</sup> Dom Calmet, on the life of the emperor, A. D. 180, p. 1294. Mr. Valesius, p. 201, has explained the credulity of the church under the reign of Commodus.

which, however trifling, bore some relation to the cause of christianity <sup>a</sup> Under the reign of Severus, the fury of the populace was checked, the rigour of ancient laws was for some time suspended, and the provincial governors were satisfied with receiving an annual present from the churches within their jurisdiction, as the price, or as the reward, of their moderation <sup>r</sup> The controversy concerning the precise time of the celebration of Easter, armed the bishops of Asia and Italy against each other, and was considered as the most important business of this period of leisure and tranquillity <sup>s</sup> Nor was the peace of the church interrupted, till the increasing numbers of proselytes seem at length to have attracted the attention, and to have alienated the mind, of Severus With the design of restraining the progress of christianity, he published an edict, which, though it was designed to affect only the new converts, could not be carried into strict execution, without exposing to danger and punishment the most zealous of their teachers and missionaries In this mitigated persecution, we may still discover the indulgent spirit of Rome and of polytheism, which so readily admitted every excuse in favour of those who practised the religious ceremonies of their fathers <sup>t</sup>

A D 198

But the laws which Severus had enacted, soon expired with the authority of that emperor, and the christians, after this accidental tempest, enjoyed a calm of thirty-eight years <sup>u</sup> Till this period they had usually held their assemblies in private houses and sequestered places They were now permitted to erect and consecrate convenient edifices for the purpose of religious worship, <sup>v</sup> to purchase lands, even at Rome itself, for the use of the community, and to conduct the elections of their ecclesiastical ministers in so public, but at the same time in so exemplary, a manner, as to deserve the respectful attention of the gentiles <sup>y</sup> This long repose of the church was accompanied with dignity The reigns of those princes who derived their extraction from the Asiatic provinces, proved the most favourable to the christians, the eminent persons of the sect, instead of being reduced to implore the protection of a slave or concubine, were admitted into the palace in the honourable characters of priests and philosophers, and their mysterious doctrines, which were already diffused among the people, insensibly attracted the curiosity of their sovereign When the empress Mammæa passed through Antioch, she expressed a desire of conversing with the celebrated Origen, the fame of whose piety and learning was spread over the east Origen obeyed so flattering an invitation, and though he could not expect to succeed in the conversion of an artful and ambitious woman, she listened with pleasure to his eloquent exhortations, and honourably dismissed him to his retirement in Palestine <sup>z</sup> The sentiments of Mammæa were adopted by her son Alexander, and the philosophic devotion of that emperor was marked by a singular but injudicious regard for the christian religion In his domestic chapel he placed the statues of Abraham, of Orpheus, of Apollonius, and of Christ, as an honour justly due to those respectable sages who had instructed mankind in the various modes of addressing their homage to the supreme and universal Deity <sup>a</sup> A purer faith, as well as worship, was openly professed and practised among his household Bishops, perhaps, for the first time, were seen at court, and, after the death of Alexander, when the inhuman Maximin discharged his fury

A D 235

on the favourites and servants of his unfortunate benefactor, a great number of christians, of every rank, and of both sexes, were involved in the promiscuous massacre, which, on their account, has improperly received the name of persecution <sup>b</sup>

Notwithstanding the cruel disposition of Maximin, the effects of his resentment against the christians were

Of Maximin, Philip, and Decius

of a very local and temporary nature, and the pious Origen, who had been proscribed as a devoted victim, was still reserved to convey the truths of the gospel to the ear of monarchs <sup>c</sup> He addressed several edifying letters to the emperor Philip, to his wife, and to his mother, and as soon as that prince, who was born in the neighbourhood of Palestine, had usurped the imperial sceptre, the christians acquired a friend and a protector The public and even partial favour of Philip towards the sectaries of the new religion, and his constant reverence for the ministers of the church, gave some colour to the suspicion, which

A D 244

<sup>a</sup> Compare the life of Caracalla in the Augustan History, with the epistle of Tertullian to Scipula Dr Jortin (Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol ii p 5, &c) considers the cure of Severus by the means of holy oil, with a strong desire to convert it into a miracle

<sup>r</sup> Tertullian de Fui, l. c 13 The present was made during the feast of the Saturnalia and it is a matter of serious concern to Tertullian, that the faithful should be confounded with the most infamous professions which purchased the connivance of the government

<sup>s</sup> Euseb l v c 23 24 Mosheim, p 135-447

<sup>t</sup> Julæus fieri sub gravi poenâ vetuit Idem etiam de christianis scribit Hist August p 70

<sup>u</sup> Sulpicius Severus, l ii p 384 This computation (allowing for a small exception) is confirmed by the history of Eusebius, and by the writings of Cyprian

<sup>v</sup> The antiquity of christian churches is discussed by Tillemont, (Mémoires Ecclesiastiques tom iii part ii p 68-72.) and by Mr Moyle (vol i p 378-358) The former refers the first construction of them to the peace of Alexander Severus, the latter, to the peace of Gallienus

<sup>y</sup> See the Augustan History, p 170 The emperor Alexander adopted their method of publicly proposing the names of those persons who were candidates for ordination It is true, that the honour of this practice is likewise attributed to the Jews

<sup>z</sup> Euseb Hist Ecclesiast l vi c 21 Hieronym de Script Eccles c 54 Mammæa was styled a holy and pious woman, both by the christians and the pagans. From the former, therefore, it was impossible that she should deserve that honourable epithet

<sup>a</sup> See the Augustan History, p 123 Mosheim (p 465) seems to refine too much on the domestic religion of Alexander His design of building a public temple to Christ, (Hist August p 129) and the object which was suggested either to him, or in similar circumstances, to Hadrian appear to have no other foundation than an improbable report, invented by the christians, and credulously adopted by an historian of the age of Constantine

<sup>b</sup> Euseb l vi c 28 It may be presumed, that the success of the christians had exasperated the increasing bigotry of the pagans Dion Cassius, who composed his history under the former reign, had most probably intended for the use of his master those counsels of persecution which he ascribes to a better age, and to the favourite of Augustus Concerning this oration of Mæcenas, or rather of Dion I may refer to my own unbiassed opinion (p 14 note b) and to the Abbé de la Bléterie (Mémoires de l'Académie, tom xxii p 303 tom xxv p 432)

<sup>c</sup> Orosius l vii c 19 mentions Origen as the object of Maximin's resentment and Firmilianus a Cappadoecian bishop of that age, gives us a just and confined idea of this persecution (apud Cyprian Epist 75)

prevailed in his own times, that the emperor himself was become a convert to the faith,<sup>d</sup> and afforded some grounds for a fable which was afterwards invented, that he had been purified by confession and penance from the guilt contracted by the murder of his innocent predecessor.<sup>e</sup> The fall of Philip introduced, with the change of masters, a new system of government, so oppressive to the christians, that their former condition, ever since the time of Domitian, was represented as a state of perfect freedom and security, if compared with the rigorous treatment which they experienced under the short reign of Decius.<sup>f</sup> The virtues of that prince will scarcely allow us to suspect that he was actuated by a mean resentment against the favourites of his predecessor, and it is more reasonable to believe, that in the prosecution of his general design to restore the purity of Roman manners, he was desirous of delivering the empire from what he condemned as a recent and criminal superstition. The bishops of the most considerable cities were removed by exile or death, the vigilance of the magistrates prevented the clergy of Rome during sixteen months from proceeding to a new election, and it was the opinion of the christians, that the emperor would more patiently endure a competitor for the purple, than a bishop in the capital.<sup>g</sup> Were it possible to suppose that the penetration of Decius had discovered pride under the disguise of humility, or that he could foresee the temporal dominion which might insensibly arise from the claims of spiritual authority, we might be less surprised, that he should consider the successors of St Peter as the most formidable rivals to those of Augustus.

Of Valerian Gil The administration of Valerian was lenient and his distinguished by a levity and inconsiderateness.

A D 253-260 staney, ill suited to the gravity of the Roman censor. In the first part of his reign, he surpassed in clemency those princes who had been suspected of an attachment to the christian faith. In the last three years and a half, listening to the insinuations of a minister addicted to the superstitions of Egypt, he adopted the maxims, and imitated the severity, of his predecessor Decius.<sup>h</sup> The accession of Gallienus, which increased the calamities of the empire, restored peace to the

<sup>d</sup> The mention of those princes who were publicly supposed to be christians, as we find it in an epistle of Dionysius of Alexandria, (ep. Euseb. l. vii. c. 10) evidently alludes to Philip and his family, and forms a contemporary evidence, that such a report had prevailed. But the Egyptian bishop, who lived at a humble distance from the court of Rome, expresses himself with a becoming diffidence concerning the truth of the fact. The epistles of Origen (which were extant in the time of Eusebius, see l. vi. c. 36) would most probably decide this curious rather than important question.

<sup>e</sup> Euseb. l. vi. c. 31. The story is usual has been embellished by succeeding writers and is confuted, with much superfluous learning, by Frederick Spanheim (Opera Variora, tom. ii. p. 400, &c.).

<sup>f</sup> Lactantius, de Mortibus Persecutorum, c. 34. After celebrating the felicity and increase of the church, under a long succession of good princes, he adds: 'Exstitit post annos plurimos, execrabilis animal, Decius qui vexaret ecclesiam.'

<sup>g</sup> Euseb. l. vi. c. 39. (supra Epistol. 55. The see of Rome remained vacant from the martyrdom of Fabianus, the 20th of January, A D 230, till the election of Cornelius, the 4th of June, A D 251. Decius had probably left Rome, since he was killed before the end of that year.)

<sup>h</sup> Euseb. l. vii. c. 10. Modestus (p. 548) has very clearly shown, that the prefect Maerianus and the Egyptian Magus, are one and the same person.

church, and the christians obtained the free exercise of their religion, by an edict addressed to the bishops, and conceived in such terms as seemed to acknowledge their office and public character.<sup>i</sup> The ancient laws, without being formally repealed, were suffered to sink into oblivion, and (excepting only some hostile intentions which are attributed to the emperor Aurelian<sup>k</sup>) the disciples of Christ passed above forty years in a state of prosperity, far more dangerous to their virtue than the severest trials of persecution.

The story of Paul of Samosata, who filled the metropolitan see of Antioch, while the east was in the hands of Odenathus and Zenobia, may serve to illustrate the condition and character of the times. The wealth of that prelate was a sufficient evidence of his guilt, since it was neither derived from the inheritance of his fathers, nor acquired by the arts of honest industry. But Paul considered the service of the church as a very lucrative profession.<sup>l</sup> His ecclesiastical jurisdiction was venal and rapacious, he extorted frequent contributions from the most opulent of the faithful, and converted to his own use a considerable part of the public revenue. By his pride and luxury, the christian religion was rendered odious in the eyes of the gentiles. His council chamber and his throne, the splendour with which he appeared in public, the suppliant crowd who solicited his attention, the multitude of letters and petitions to which he dictated his answers, and the perpetual hurry of business in which he was involved, were circumstances much better suited to the state of a civil magistrate,<sup>m</sup> than to the humility of a primitive bishop. When he harangued his people from the pulpit, Paul affected the figurative style and the theatrical gestures of an Asiatic sophist, while the cathedral resounded with the loudest and most extravagant acclamations in the praise of his divine eloquence. Against those who resisted his power, or refused to flatter his vanity, the prelate of Antioch was arrogant, rigid, and inexorable, but he relaxed the discipline, and lavished the treasures, of the church on his dependent clergy, who were permitted to imitate their master in the gratification of every sensual appetite. For Paul indulged himself very freely in the plea-

<sup>i</sup> Eusebius (l. vii. c. 13) gives us a Greek version of this Latin edict, which seems to have been very concise. By another edict, he directed that the caemeteria should be restored to the christians.

<sup>k</sup> Euseb. l. vii. c. 30. Lactantius de M. P. c. 6. Hieronymus in Chron. p. 177. Orosius l. vii. c. 23. Their language is in general so ambiguous and incorrect, that we are at a loss in determining how far Aurelian had carried his intentions before he was assassinated. Most of the moderns (except Dodwell, Disser. in Cyprian. xi. 64) have seized the occasion of giving a few extraordinary martyrs.

<sup>l</sup> Paul was better pleased with the title of ducentarius, than with that of bishop. The ducentarius was an imperial procurator, so called, from his salary of two hundred sestertia, or £1600 a year (see Val. Maximus ad Hist. August. p. 121). Some critics suppose, that the bishop of Antioch had actually obtained such an office from Zenobia while others consider it only as a figurative expression of his pomp and insolence.

<sup>m</sup> Simony was not unknown in those times and the clergy sometimes sought what they intended to sell. It appears that the bishopric of Carthage was purchased by a wealthy matron named Neilla for her servant Majorinus. The price was 400 solidi (Monument. Antiqu. ad calcem Optati, p. 263). Every solidus contained 12 pieces of silver, and the whole sum may be computed at about £2100.

Paul of Samosata, his manners,
A D 260

sures of the table, and he had received into the episcopal palace two young and beautiful women, as the constant companions of his leisure moments."

He is degraded from the see of Antioch A D 270 Notwithstanding these scandalous vices, if Paul of Samosata had preserved the purity of the orthodox faith, his reign over the capital of Syria would have ended only with his life, and had a seasonable persecution intervened, an effort of courage might perhaps have placed him in the rank of saints and martyrs. Some nice and subtle errors, which he imprudently adopted and obstinately maintained, concerning the doctrine of the Trinity, excited the zeal and indignation of the eastern churches. From Egypt to the Euxine sea the bishops were in arms and in motion. Several councils were held, constitutions were published, excommunications were pronounced, ambiguous explanations were by turns accepted and refused, treaties were concluded and violated, and at length Paul of Samosata was degraded from his episcopal character, by the sentence of seventy or eighty bishops, who assembled for that purpose at Antioch, and who, without consulting the rights of the clergy or people, appointed a successor by their own authority. The manifest irregularity of this proceeding increased the numbers of the discontented faction, and as Paul, who was no stranger to the arts of courts, had insinuated himself into the favour of Zenobia, he maintained above four years the possession of the episcopal house and office. The victory of Aurelian changed the face of the east, and the two contending parties who applied to each other the epithets of schism and heresy, were either commanded or permitted to plead their cause before the tribunal of the conqueror. This public and very singular trial affords a convincing proof, that the existence, the property, the privileges, and the internal policy, of the Christians, were acknowledged, if not by the laws, at least by the magistrates of the empire. As a pagan and as a soldier, it could scarcely be expected that Aurelian should enter into the discussion, whether the sentiments of Paul or those of his adversaries were most agreeable to the true standard of the orthodox faith. His determination, however, was founded on the general principles of equity and reason. He considered the bishops of Italy as the most impartial and respectable judges among the Christians, and as soon as he was informed, that they had unanimously approved the sentence of the council, he acquiesced in their opinion, and immediately gave orders that Paul should be compelled to relinquish the temporal possessions belonging to an office, of which, in the judgment of his brethren, he had been regularly deprived. But while we applaud the justice, we should not overlook the policy, of Aurelian, who was desirous of restoring and cementing the dependence of the provinces on the capital, by every means which could bind the interest or prejudices of any part of his subjects."

Amidst the frequent revolutions of the empire, the Christians still flourished in peace and prosperity, and notwithstanding a celebrated era of martyrs has been deduced from the accession of Diocletian, the new system of policy, introduced and maintained by the wisdom of that prince, continued, during more than eighteen years, to breathe the mildest and most liberal spirit of religious toleration. The mind of Diocletian himself was less adapted indeed to speculative inquiries, than to the active labours of war and government. His prudence rendered him averse to any great innovation, and though his temper was not very susceptible of zeal or enthusiasm, he always maintained an habitual regard for the ancient duties of the empire. But the leisure of the two empresses, of his wife Prisca, and of Valeria his daughter, permitted them to listen with more attention and respect to the truths of christianity, which in every age has acknowledged its important obligations to female devotion. The principal eunuchs, Lucian and Dorotheus, Gorgonius and Andrew, who attended the person, possessed the favour, and governed the household, of Diocletian, protected by their powerful influence the faith which they had embraced. Their example was imitated by many of the most considerable officers of the palace, who, in their respective stations, had the care of the imperial ornaments, of the robes of the furniture, of the jewels, and even of the private treasury, and, though it might sometimes be incumbent on them to accompany the emperor when he sacrificed in the temple, they enjoyed with their wives, their children, and their slaves, the free exercise of the christian religion. Diocletian and his colleagues frequently conferred the most important offices on those persons who avowed their abhorrence for the worship of the gods, but who had displayed abilities proper for the service of the state. The bishops held an honourable rank in their respective provinces, and were treated with distinction and respect, not only by the people, but by the magistrates themselves. Almost in every city, the ancient churches were found insufficient to contain the inn If we are desirous of extenuating the vices of Paul, we must suspect the assembled bishops of the east of partiality, the most malicious calumnies in circular epistles addressed to all the churches of the empire (ap. Euseb. l. vii. c. 30.)

Persecution and prosperity of the church under Diocletian, A D 284—303

o His heresy (like those of Noetus and Sabellius in the same century) tended to confound the mysterious distinction of the divine persons. See Mosheim p. 702, &c.

p Euseb. Hist. Ecclesiast. l. vii. c. 30. We are entirely indebted to him for the curious story of Paul of Samosata.

q The Era of Martyrs which is still in use among the Copts and the Abyssinians, must be reckoned from the 29th of August, A D 234, as the beginning of the Egyptian year was nineteen days earlier than the real accession of Diocletian. See Dissertation Preliminaires à l'Art de vérifier les Dates.

r The expression of Iacelantius (de M. P. c. 15) "sacrificio polluitur," implies their antecedent conversion to the faith, but does not seem to justify the assertion of Mosheim, (p. 912.) that they had been privately baptized.

s M. de Tillemont (Mémoires Ecclesiastiques, tom. v. part. 1. p. 11, 12) has quoted from the Spicilegium of Dom Luc d'Acheri, a very curious instruction which bishop Theon composed for the use of Iacelantius de M. P. c. 10.

prevailed in his own times, that the emperor himself was become a convert to the faith,<sup>d</sup> and afforded some grounds for a fable which was afterwards invented that he had been purified by confession and penance from the guilt contracted by the murder of his innocent predecessor.<sup>e</sup> The fall

of Philip introduced, with the change of masters a new system of government, so oppressive to the christians, that their former condition, ever since the time of Domitian, was represented as a state of perfect freedom and security, if compared with the rigorous treatment which they experienced under the short reign of Decius.<sup>f</sup> The virtues of that prince will scarcely allow us to suspect that he was actuated by a mean resentment against the favourites of his predecessor; and it is more reasonable to believe that in the prosecution of his general design to restore the purity of Roman manners he was desirous of delivering the empire from what he condemned as a venient and criminal superstition. The bishops of the most considerable cities were removed by exile or death: the vigilance of the magistrates prevented the clergy of Rome during sixteen months from proceeding to a new election; and it was the opinion of the christians, that the emperor would more patiently endure a competitor for the purple, than a bishop in the capital.<sup>g</sup> Were it possible to suppose that the penetration of Decius had discovered pride under the disguise of humility, or that he could foresee the temporal dominion which might insensibly arise from the claims of spiritual authority, we might be less surprised, that he should consider the successors of St Peter as the most formidable rivals to those of Augustus.

<sup>OF VALENTINUS, GIL.</sup> The administration of Valerian was distinguished by a levity and inconsistency, ill suited to the gravity of the Roman censor. In the first part of his reign, he surpassed in clemency those princes who had been suspected of an attachment to the christian faith. In the last three years and a half listening to the insinuations of a minister addicted to the superstitions of Egypt, he adopted the maxims, and imitated the severity, of his predecessor Decius.<sup>h</sup> The accession of Gallienus which increased the calamities of the empire, restored peace to the

<sup>d</sup> The nature of these princes who were publicly supposed to be converts as we find in an epistle of Dionysius of Alexandria, (ap. Euseb. l. vii. c. 10th) evidently alludes to Philip and his family, and is a contemporary evidence, that even a report had prevailed, but by Egyptian bishop who lived at a distance from the court of Rome expresses himself as a moderate difference concerning the truth of the fact. The epistles of Origen (which were extant in the time of Euseb. c. 1. vi. c. 30.) would most probably give this account, rather than insinuate a mistake.

<sup>e</sup> Euseb. l. vi. c. 34. The story as it is usual has been embellished by succeeding writers and is confirmed, with much servile learning, by Frederic Schaefer, Opera Variora, vol. II. p. 40, &c.

<sup>f</sup> Lactantius de M. v. c. 10. Persecutiones, c. 3. 4. After celebrating the 10th anniversary of the emperor, under a long succession of good princes, he adds "Extr. in. post. annis 1. annis, excessive annis, Decius cum venient ecclesiam."

<sup>g</sup> Euseb. l. vi. c. 39. Cyrillus, Epist. c. 53. The story of Rome returning from the massacre of Fabianus, the 20th of January, A. D. 257, for election of Cornelius, the 4th of June, A. D. 258. Decius had perished 10th Rome since he was killed before the end of the year.

<sup>h</sup> Euseb. l. vi. c. 10. Maximian (p. 548.) has very clearly shown, that the present Valerian, and the Egyptian Helios, are not and the same person.

church; and the christians obtained the free exercise of their religion, by an edict addressed to the bishops and conceived in such terms as seemed to acknowledge their office and public character.<sup>i</sup> The ancient laws, without being formally repealed, were suffered to sink into oblivion; and (excepting only some hostile intentions which are attributed to the emperor Aurelian<sup>k</sup>) the disciples of Christ passed above forty years in a state of prosperity, far more dangerous to their virtue than the severest trials of persecution.

The story of Paul of Samosata, who filled the metropolitan see of Antioch, while the east was in the hands of Odenathus and Zenobia, may serve to illustrate the condition and character of the times. The wealth of that prelate was a sufficient evidence of his guilt, since it was neither derived from the inheritance of his fathers, nor acquired by the arts of honest industry. But Paul considered the service of the church as a very lucrative profession.<sup>l</sup> His ecclesiastical jurisdiction was venal and rapacious, he extorted frequent contributions from the most opulent of the faithful, and converted to his own use a considerable part of the public revenue. By his pride and luxury, the christian religion was rendered odious in the eyes of the gentiles. His council chamber and his throne, the splendour with which he appeared in public, the suppliant crowd who solicited his attention, the multitude of letters and petitions to which he dictated his answers, and the perpetual hurry of business in which he was involved, were circumstances much better suited to the state of a civil magistrate,<sup>m</sup> than to the humility of a primitive bishop. When he harangued his people from the pulpit, Paul affected the figurative style and the theatrical gestures of an Asiatic sophist, while the cathedral resounded with the loudest and most extravagant acclamations in the praise of his divine eloquence. Against those who resisted his power, or refused to flatter his vanity, the prelate of Antioch was arrogant, rigid, and inexorable; but he relaxed the discipline, and lavished the treasures, of the church on his dependent clergy, who were permitted to imitate their master in the gratification of every sensual appetite. For Paul indulged himself very freely in the plea-

<sup>i</sup> Euseb. c. 1. vii. c. 13. cites as a Greek version of this Latin edict, which seems to have been very common. By another edict, he directed that the ceremonies should be restored to the christians.

<sup>j</sup> Euseb. l. vii. c. 37. Lactantius de M. v. c. 10. Hieronymus, c. 17. Origen, l. vii. c. 23. Their language is in general so ambiguous and incoherent, that we are at a loss to determine how far Aurelian had carried his toleration, or how far he was assented. Most of the writers (except De Rossi, Despretz, Cyrillus, c. 64.) have not done more than give a few extraordinary instances.

<sup>k</sup> Paul was better pleased with the title of discussor, than with that of bishop. The discussion was an unusual prerogative ascribed, from his salary of two hundred sesterces, or 2100 a year. (See Schaefer, Hist. Aegypt. p. 124.) Some writers suppose, that Aurelian of the east had actually obtained some office from Zenobia, while others consider it only as a figurative expression of his power and influence.

<sup>l</sup> Some writers not taken in those times, and the clergy were times brought what they intended to sell. It appears that the bishopric of Antioch was purchased for a weekly tribute, named Leontis, by her sister, Marciana. The price was 4000 denarii (Mennest, p. 103.) and column Optatus, p. 232. Euseb. f. 124 continued 125 denarii, and the whole sum may be accepted at about 2200.

Part of Samosata, l. vii. c. 13. A. D. 258

christians sometimes offered the most specious pretences. A sentence of death was executed upon Maximilian, an African youth, who had been produced by his own father before the magistrate as a sufficient and legal recruit, but who obstinately persisted in declaring, that his conscience would not permit him to embrace the profession of a soldier.<sup>a</sup> It could scarcely be expected that any government should suffer the action of Marcellus the centurion to pass with impunity. On the day of a public festival, that officer threw away his belt, his arms, and the ensigns of his office, and exclaimed with a loud voice, that he would obey none but Jesus Christ the eternal King, and that he renounced for ever the use of carnal weapons, and the service of an idolatrous master. The soldiers, as soon as they recovered from their astonishment, secured the person of Marcellus. He was examined in the city of Tingi, by the president of that part of Mauritania, and as he was convicted by his own confession, he was condemned and beheaded for the crime of desertion.<sup>b</sup> Examples of such a nature savour much less of religious persecution than of martial or even civil law: but they served to alienate the mind of the emperors, to justify the severity of Galerius, who dismissed a great number of christian officers from their employments, and to authorize the opinion, that a sect of enthusiasts, which avowed principles so repugnant to the public safety, must either remain useless, or would soon become dangerous, subjects of the empire.

Galerius prevails on Diocletian to begin a general persecution

After the success of the Persian war had raised the hopes and the reputation of Galerius, he passed a winter with Diocletian in the palace of Nicomedia, and the fate of christianity became the object of their secret consultations.<sup>c</sup> The experienced emperor was still inclined to pursue measures of lenity, and though he readily consented to exclude the christians from holding any employments in the household or the army, he urged in the strongest terms the danger as well as cruelty of shedding the blood of those deluded fanatics. Galerius at length extorted from him the permission of summoning a council, composed of a few persons the most distinguished in the civil and military departments of the state. The important question was agitated in their presence, and those ambitious courtiers easily discerned, that it was incumbent on them to second, by their eloquence, the importunate violence of the Cæsar. It may be presumed, that they insisted on every topic which might interest the pride, the piety, or the fears, of their sovereign in the destruction of christianity. Perhaps they represented, that the glorious work of the deliverance of the empire was left imperfect, as long as an independent people was permitted to subsist and multiply in the heart of the provinces. The christians, (it might speciously be alleged), renouncing the gods and the institutions of Rome, had constituted a distinct republic, which might yet be suppressed before it had acquired any military force, but which was already governed by its own laws and magistrates, was possessed of a public treasure, and was intimately connected in all its parts, by the frequent assemblies of the bishops, to whose decrees their numerous and opulent congregations yielded an implicit obedience. Arguments like these may seem to have determined the reluctant mind of Diocletian to embrace a new system of persecution: but though we may suspect, it is not in our power to relate, the secret intrigues of the palace, the private views and resentments, the jealousy of women or eunuchs, and all those trifling but decisive causes which so often influence the fate of empires, and the councils of the wisest monarchs.<sup>d</sup>

The pleasure of the emperors was at length signified to the christians, who, during the course of this melancholy winter, had expected, with anxiety,

Demolition of the church of Nicomedia
A D 303
23rd Feb

the result of so many secret consultations. The twenty-third of February, which coincided with the Roman festival of the Terminalia,<sup>e</sup> was appointed (whether from accident or design) to set bounds to the progress of christianity. At the earliest dawn of day, the prætorian præfect,<sup>f</sup> accompanied by several generals, tribunes, and officers of the revenue, repaired to the principal church of Nicomedia, which was situated on an eminence in the most populous and beautiful part of the city. The doors were instantly broke open, they rushed into the sanctuary, and as they searched in vain for some visible object of worship, they were obliged to content themselves with committing to the flames the volumes of holy scripture. The ministers of Diocletian were followed by a numerous body of guards and pioneers, who marched in order of battle, and were provided with all the instruments used in the destruction of fortified cities. By their incessant labour, a sacred edifice, which towered above the imperial palace, and had long excited the indignation and envy of the gentiles, was in a few hours levelled with the ground.<sup>g</sup> long believed, that the Theban legion, consisting of 6000 christians suffered martyrdom, by the order of Maximian, in the valley of the Penine Alps. The story was first published about the middle of the fifth century, by Encherius, bishop of Lyons, who received it from certain persons who received it from Icare, bishop of Geneva, who is said to have received it from Theodore bishop of Octodurum. The abbey of St Maurice still subsists, a rich monument of the credulity of Sigismund, king of Burgundy. See an excellent Dissertation in the thirty sixth volume of the Bibliothèque Raisonnée, p 427—454.

<sup>e</sup> See the Acta Sincera, p 299. The accounts of his martyrdom, and that of Marcellus bear every mark of truth and authenticity.
<sup>h</sup> Acta Sincera p 302.

<sup>i</sup> De M P e 11. Lactantius (or whoever was the author of this little treatise) was at that time an inhabitant of Nicomedia: but it seems difficult to conceive how he could require so accurate a knowledge of what passed in the imperial cabinet.

<sup>k</sup> The only circumstance which we can discover, is the devotion and jealousy of the mother of Galerius. She is described by Lactantius, as Deorum montium cultrix, mulier admodum superstitionis. She had a great influence over her son, and was offended by the disregard of some of her christian servants.

<sup>l</sup> The worship and festival of the god Terminus are elegantly illustrated by M de Boze Mem de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom 1 p 50.

<sup>m</sup> In our only MS of Lactantius, we read præfectus: but reason, and the authority of all the critics, allow us, instead of that word, which destroys the sense of the passage, to substitute præfectus.

<sup>n</sup> Lactantius de M P e 12 gives a very lively picture of the destruction of the church.

creasing multitude of proselytes and in their place more stately and capacious edifices were erected for the public worship of the faithful. The corruption of manners and principles, so forcibly lamented by Eusebius,<sup>a</sup> may be considered, not only as a consequence, but as a proof, of the liberty which the christians enjoyed and abused under the reign of Diocletian. Prosperity had relaxed the nerves of discipline. Fraud, envy, and malice, prevailed in every congregation. The presbyters aspired to the episcopal office, which every day became an object more worthy of their ambition. The bishops, who contended with each other for ecclesiastical preeminence, appeared by their conduct to claim a secular and tyrannical power in the church, and the lively faith which still distinguished the christians from the gentiles, was shown much less in their lives, than in their controversial writings.

Progress of zeal and superstition among the pagans

Notwithstanding this seeming security, an attentive observer might discern some symptoms that threatened the church with a more violent persecution than any which she had yet endured. The zeal and rapid progress of the christians awakened the polytheists from their supine indifference in the cause of those deities, whom custom and education had taught them to revere. The mutual provocations of a religious war, which had already continued above two hundred years, exasperated the animosity of the contending parties. The pagans were incensed at the rashness of a recent and obscure sect, which presumed to accuse their countrymen of error, and to devote their ancestors to eternal misery. The habits of justifying the popular mythology against the invectives of an implacable enemy, produced in their minds some sentiments of faith and reverence for a system which they had been accustomed to consider with the most careless levity. The supernatural powers assumed by the church inspired at the same time terror and emulation. The followers of the established religion intrenched themselves behind a similar fortification of prodigies, invented new modes of sacrifice, of expiation, and of initiation,<sup>x</sup> attempted to revive the credit of their expiring oracles,<sup>y</sup> and listened with eager credulity to every impostor, who flattered their prejudices by a tale of wonders.<sup>z</sup> Both parties seemed to acknowledge the truth of those miracles which were claimed by their adversaries, and while they were contented with ascribing them to the arts of magic, and to the power of dæmons, they mutually concurred in restoring and establishing the reign of superstition.<sup>a</sup> Philosophy, her most dangerous enemy, was now converted into her most useful ally. The groves of the academy, the gardens of Epicurus, and even the portico of the stoics, were almost deserted, as so many different schools of scepticism or impiety<sup>b</sup> and many among the Romans were desirous that the writings of Cicero should be condemned and suppressed by the authority of the senate.<sup>c</sup> The prevailing sect of the new Platonicians judged it prudent to connect themselves with the priests, whom they perhaps despised, against the christians, whom they had reason to fear. These fashionable philosophers prosecuted the design of extracting allegorical wisdom from the fictions of the Greek poets, instituted mysterious rites of devotion for the use of their chosen disciples, recommended the worship of the ancient gods as the emblems or ministers of the Supreme Deity, and composed against the faith of the gospel many elaborate treatises,<sup>d</sup> which have since been committed to the flames by the prudence of orthodox emperors.<sup>e</sup>

Although the policy of Diocletian<sup>f</sup> and the humanity of Constantius<sup>g</sup> inclined them to preserve inviolate the maxims of toleration, it was soon discovered that their two associates, Maximian and Galerius, entertained the most implacable aversion for the name and religion of the christians. The minds of those princes had never been enlightened by science, education had never softened their temper. They owed their greatness to their swords, and in their most elevated fortune they still retained their superstitious prejudices of soldiers and peasants. In the general administration of the provinces they obeyed the laws which their benefactor had established, but they frequently found occasions of exercising within their camp and palaces a secret persecution,<sup>h</sup> for which the imprudent zeal of the

<sup>a</sup> Eusebius, Hist. Ecclesiast. l. viii. c. 1. The reader who consults the original will not accuse me of heightening the picture. Eusebius was about sixteen years of age at the accession of the emperor Diocletian.

<sup>x</sup> We might quote, among a great number of instances, the mysterious worship of Mystras and the Turobolin (the latter of which became fashionable in the time of the Antonines, (see a Dissertation of M. de Boze in the Memoires de l'Academie des Inscriptions, tom. ii. p. 443). The romance of Apuleius is as full of devotion as of satire.

<sup>y</sup> The impostor Alexander very strongly recommended the oracle of Trophonius at Mallow and those of Apollo at Clarus and Miletus (Lucian tom. ii. p. 236 edit. Reitz). The list of these singular history would furnish a very curious episode, were it consulted by Diocletian before he published his edicts of persecution (Laetantius de M. P. c. 11).

<sup>z</sup> Besides the ancient stories of Pythagoras and Aristeas the cures performed at the shrine of Æsculapius and the fables related of Apollonius of Tyana, were frequently opposed to the miracles of Christ, though I agree with Dr. Lardner (see Testimonies, vol. iii. p. 263, 367) that when Philostratus composed the life of Apollonius, he had no such intention.

<sup>a</sup> It is seriously to be lamented that the christian fathers by acknowledging the supernatural or, as they deem it the infernal, part of paganism, destroy with their own hands the great advantage which we might otherwise derive from the liberal concessions of our adversaries.

<sup>b</sup> Julian (p. 301 edit. Spanheim) expresses a pious joy, that the providence of the gods had extinguished the impious sects and for the most part destroyed the books of the Pythagorians and Epicureans which had been very numerous, since Epicurus himself composed no less than 300 volumes. See Diogenes Laertius, l. x. c. 26.

<sup>c</sup> Cumque animi audiam musitare indignanter et dicere oportere statim per sententiam abolerantur et hæc scripta, quibus christiana religio comprobatur et velut ista opprimatur auctoritas. Arnobius adversus Gentes l. iii. p. 103, 104. He adds very properly. Erroris convincite Ciceronem nam miserepere scripta et publicatam velle submergere lectionem, non est Deum defendere sed veritatis testificationem timere.

<sup>d</sup> Laetantius (Divin. Institut. l. v. c. 2, 3) gives a very clear and spirited account of two of these philosophic adversaries of the faith. The large treatise of Porphyry against the christians consisted of thirty books and was composed in Sicily about the year 270.

<sup>e</sup> See Socrates, Hist. Ecclesiast. l. i. c. 9 and Codex Justinian, l. i. tit. 1, 3.

<sup>f</sup> Eusebius l. viii. c. 4. c. 17. He limits the number of military martyrs by a remarkable expression (ὁρισμὸς τῶν μὲν ἐκ τοῦ καὶ δευτέρου) of which neither his Latin nor French translator has rendered the energy. Notwithstanding, the authority of Eusebius and the silence of Laetantius, Ambrose, Sulpicius, Orosius &c. it has been

A few days afterwards Galerius hastily withdrew himself from Nicomedia, declaring, that if he delayed his departure from that devoted palace, he should fall a sacrifice to the rage of the christians. The ecclesiastical historians, from whom alone we derive a partial and imperfect knowledge of this persecution, are at a loss how to account for the fears and dangers of the emperors. Two of these writers, a prince and a rhetorician, were eye-witnesses of the fire of Nicomedia. The one ascribes it to lightning, and the divine wrath, the other affirms, that it was kindled by the malice of Galerius himself.*

Execution of the first edict. As the edict against the christians was designed for a general law of the whole empire, and as Diocletian and Galerius, though they might not wait for the consent, were assured of the concurrence, of the western princes, it would appear more consonant to our ideas of policy, that the governors of all the provinces should have received secret instructions to publish, on one and the same day, this declaration of war within their respective departments. It was at least to be expected, that the convenience of the public highways and established posts would have enabled the emperors to transmit their orders with the utmost despatch from the palace of Nicomedia to the extremities of the Roman world, and that they would not have suffered fifty days to elapse, before the edict was published in Syria, and near four months before it was signified to the cities of Africa. This delay may perhaps be imputed to the cautious temper of Diocletian, who had yielded a reluctant consent to the measures of persecution, and who was desirous of trying the experiment under his more immediate eye, before he gave way to the disorders and discontent which it must inevitably occasion in the distant provinces. At first, indeed, the magistrates were restrained from the effusion of blood, but the use of every other severity was permitted, and even recommended, to their zeal, nor could the christians, though they cheerfully resigned the ornaments of their churches, resolve to interrupt their religious assemblies, or to deliver their sacred books to the flames. The pious obstinacy of Felix, an African bishop, appears to have embarrassed the subordinate ministers of the government. The curator of his city sent him in chains to the proconsul. The proconsul transmitted him to the prætorian præfect of Italy, and Felix, who disdained even to give an evasive answer, was at length beheaded at Venusia, in Lucania, a place on which the birth of Horace has conferred fame. This precedent, and perhaps some imperial rescript, * See Lactantius, Eusebius, and Constantine, ad Cæterum Sanctorum, c. 25. Eusebius confesses his ignorance of the cause of the fire.

† Tillemont, Mémoires Ecclesiastiques tom. v. part. i. p. 43.

‡ See the Acta Sincera of Ruinart, p. 353. those of Felix of Thiburi, or Tiburi, appear much less corrupted than in the other editions, which afford a lively specimen of legendary licence.

§ See the first book of Opiatus of Milevis against the Donatists at Paris 1700 edit Dupin. He lived under the reign of Ophius.

¶ The ancient monuments, published at the end of Ophius, p. 261, &c. describe, in a very circumstantial manner the proceedings of the governors in the destruction of churches. They made a minute inventory of the plate, &c. which they found in them. That of the

which was issued in consequence of it, appeared to authorize the governors of provinces, in punishing with death the refusal of the christians to deliver up their sacred books. There was undoubtedly many persons who embraced this opportunity of obtaining the crown of martyrdom, but there were likewise too many who purchased an ignominious life, by discovering and betraying the holy scripture into the hands of infidels. A great number even of bishops and presbyters acquired, by this criminal compliance, the opprobrious epithet of Traditors, and their offence was productive of much present scandal, and of much future discord, in the African church.†

The copies, as well as the versions, of scripture, were already so multiplied in the empire, that the most severe inquisition could no longer be attended with any fatal consequences, and even the sacrifice of those volumes, which, in every congregation, were preserved for public use, required the consent of some treacherous and unworthy christians. But the ruin of the churches was easily effected by the authority of the government, and by the labour of the pagans. In some provinces, however, the magistrates contented themselves with shutting up the places of religious worship. In others, they more literally complied with the terms of the edict, and after taking away the doors, the benches, and the pulpit, which they burnt, as it were in a funeral pile, they completely demolished the remainder of the edifice.‡ It is perhaps to this melancholy occasion, that we should apply a very remarkable story, which is related with so many circumstances of variety and improbability, that it serves rather to excite than to satisfy our curiosity. In a small town in Phrygia, of whose name as well as situation we are left ignorant, it should seem, that the magistrates and the body of the people had embraced the christian faith, and as some resistance might be apprehended to the execution of the edict, the governor of the province was supported by a numerous detachment of legionaries. On their approach the citizens threw themselves into the church, with the resolution either of defending by arms that sacred edifice, or of perishing in its ruins. They indignantly rejected the notice and permission which was given to them to retire, till the soldiers, provoked by their obstinate refusal, set fire to the building on all sides, and consumed, by this extraordinary kind of martyrdom, a great number of Phrygians, with their wives and children.‡

Some slight disturbances, though they were suppressed almost as soon as they arose, appeared church of Ciria, in Numidia, is still extant. It consisted of two chandeliers of gold, and six of silver. There were one kettle, seven lamps, all likewise of silver, besides a large quantity of brass utensils, and wearing apparel.

§ Lactantius (Institut. Divin. v. 11) confines the calamity to the continent, with its congregation. Eusebius (viii. 11) extends it to a whole city, and introduces something very like a regular siege. His ancient Latin translator Rufinus adds the important circumstance of the permission given to the inhabitants of retiring, from thence. As Phrygia reached to the confines of Isauria, it is possible that the restless temper of those independent barbarians may have contributed to this misfortune.

The first edict against the christians,
24th of February

The next day the general edict of persecution was published,<sup>o</sup> and though Diocletian, still averse to the effusion of blood, had moderated the fury of Galerius, who proposed, that every one refusing to offer sacrifice, should immediately be burnt alive, the penalties inflicted on the obstinacy of the christians might be deemed sufficiently rigorous and effectual. It was enacted, that their churches, in all the provinces of the empire, should be demolished to their foundations, and the punishment of death was denounced against all who should presume to hold any secret assemblies for the purpose of religious worship. The philosophers, who now assumed the unworthy office of directing the blind zeal of persecution, had diligently studied the nature and genius of the christian religion, and as they were not ignorant that the speculative doctrines of the faith were supposed to be contained in the writings of the prophets, of the evangelists, and of the apostles, they most probably suggested the order, that the bishops and presbyters should deliver all their sacred books into the hands of the magistrates, who were commanded, under the severest penalties, to burn them in a public and solemn manner. By the same edict, the property of the church was at once confiscated, and the several parts of which it might consist, were either sold to the highest bidder, united to the imperial domain, bestowed on the cities and corporations, or granted to the solicitations of rapacious courtiers. After taking such effectual measures to abolish the worship, and to dissolve the government, of the christians, it was thought necessary to subject to the most intolerable hardships the condition of those perverse individuals who should still reject the religion of nature, of Rome, and of their ancestors. Persons of a liberal birth were declared incapable of holding any honours or employments, slaves were for ever deprived of the hopes of freedom, and the whole body of the people were put out of the protection of the law. The judges were authorized to hear and to determine every action that was brought against a christian. But the christians were not permitted to complain of any injury which they themselves had suffered, and thus those unfortunate sectaries were exposed to the severity, while they were excluded from the benefits, of public justice. This new species of martyrdom, so painful and lingering, so obscure and ignominious, was, perhaps, the most proper to weary the constancy of the faithful: nor can it be doubted that the passions and interest of mankind were disposed on this occasion to second the designs of the emperors. But the policy of a well ordered government must sometimes have interposed in behalf of the oppressed christians, nor was it possible for the Roman princes entirely to remove the apprehension of punishment, or to connive at every act of fraud and violence, without exposing their own authority and the rest of their subjects to the most alarming dangers.<sup>r</sup>

This edict was scarcely exhibited to the public view, in the most conspicuous place of Nicomedia, before it was torn down by the hands of a christian, who expressed, at the same time, by the bitterest invectives, his contempt as well as abhorrence for such impious and tyrannical governors. His offence, according to the mildest laws, amounted to treason, and deserved death. And if it be true that he was a person of rank and education, those circumstances could serve only to aggravate his guilt. He was burnt, or rather roasted, by a slow fire, and his executioners, zealous to revenge the personal insult which had been offered to the emperors, exhausted every refinement of cruelty, without being able to subdue his patience, or to alter the steady and insulting smile which in his dying agonies he still preserved in his countenance. The christians, though they confessed that his conduct had not been strictly conformable to the laws of prudence, admired the divine fervour of his zeal, and the excessive commendations which they lavished on the memory of their hero and martyr, contributed to fix a deep impression of terror and hatred in the mind of Diocletian.<sup>s</sup>

His fears were soon alarmed by the view of a danger from which he very narrowly escaped. Within fifteen days the palace of Nicomedia, and even the bedchamber of Diocletian, were twice in flames, and though both times they were extinguished without any material damage, the singular repetition of the fire was justly considered as an evident proof that it had not been the effect of chance or negligence. The suspicion naturally fell on the christians, and it was suggested, with some degree of probability, that those desperate fanatics, provoked by their present sufferings, and apprehensive of impending calamities, had entered into a conspiracy with their faithful brethren, the eunuchs of the palace, against the lives of two emperors, whom they detested as the irreconcilable enemies of the church of God. Jealousy and resentment prevailed in every breast, but especially in that of Diocletian. A great number of persons, distinguished either by the offices which they had filled, or by the favour which they had enjoyed, were thrown into prison. Every mode of torture was put in practice, and the court, as well as city, was polluted with many bloody executions.<sup>t</sup> But as it was found impossible to extort any discovery of this mysterious transaction, it seems incumbent on us either to presume the innocence, or to admire the resolution, of the sufferers.

Greeks celebrate his memory under that of John. See Tillemont, Mémoires Ecclesiastiques tom. 4. part. 11. p. 320.

<sup>o</sup> Mosheim, (p. 922—926) from many scattered passages of Lactantius and Eusebius has collected a very just and accurate notion of this edict, though he sometimes deviates into conjecture and refinement.

<sup>r</sup> Many ages afterwards Edward I. practised with great success, the same mode of persecution against the clergy of England. See Hume's History of England vol. 11. p. 300 1st 4to edition.

<sup>s</sup> Lactantius only calls him quidam, etc. non recte magno tamen animo &c. c. 12. Eusebius (l. viii. c. 5) adorns him with secular honours. Neither have condescended to mention his name, but the

Zeal and punishment of a christian

Fire of the palace of Nicomedia imputed to the christians

A few days afterwards Galerius hastily withdrew himself from Nicomedia, declaring, that if he delayed his departure from that devoted palace, he should fall a sacrifice to the rage of the christians. The ecclesiastical historians, from whom alone we derive a partial and imperfect knowledge of this persecution, are at a loss how to account for the fears and dangers of the emperors. Two of these writers, a prince and a rhetorician, were eye-witnesses of the fire of Nicomedia. The one ascribes it to lightning, and the divine wrath, the other affirms, that it was kindled by the malice of Galerius himself.*

Execution of the first edict. As the edict against the christians was designed for a general law of the whole empire, and as Diocletian and Galerius, though they might not wait for the consent, were assured of the concurrence, of the western princes, it would appear more consonant to our ideas of policy, that the governors of all the provinces should have received secret instructions to publish, on one and the same day, this declaration of war within their respective departments. It was at least to be expected, that the convenience of the public highways and established posts would have enabled the emperors to transmit their orders with the utmost despatch from the palace of Nicomedia to the extremities of the Roman world, and that they would not have suffered fifty days to elapse, before the edict was published in Syria, and near four months before it was signified to the cities of Africa.† This delay may perhaps be imputed to the cautious temper of Diocletian, who had yielded a reluctant consent to the measures of persecution, and who was desirous of trying the experiment under his more immediate eye, before he gave way to the disorders and discontent which it must inevitably occasion in the distant provinces. At first, indeed, the magistrates were restrained from the effusion of blood, but the use of every other severity was permitted, and even recommended, to their zeal, nor could the christians, though they cheerfully resigned the ornaments of their churches, resolve to interrupt their religious assemblies, or to deliver their sacred books to the flames. The pious obstinacy of Felix, an African bishop, appears to have embarrassed the subordinate ministers of the government. The curator of his city sent him in chains to the proconsul. The proconsul transmitted him to the prætorian præfect of Italy, and Felix, who disdained even to give an evasive answer, was at length beheaded at Venusia, in Lucania, a place on which the birth of Horace has conferred fame.‡ This precedent, and perhaps some imperial rescript, * See Lactantius, Eusebius and Constantine, ad Cæsum Sanctorum, c. 25. Eusebius confesses his ignorance of the cause of the fire.

† Tillemont Memoires Ecclesiast. tom v. part 1. p. 42.

‡ See the Acta Sincera of Ruinart, p. 363. those of Felix of Thiburi, or Tibur, appear much less corrupted than in the other editions, which afford a lively specimen of legendary licence.

* See the first book of Optatus of Milevis against the Donatists at Paris 1700 edit. Dupin. He lived under the reign of Valens.

† The ancient monuments, published at the end of Optatus, p. 261, &c. describe, in a very circumstantial manner, the proceedings of the governors in the destruction of churches. They made a minute inventory of the plate, &c. which they found in them. Plut. of the

which was issued in consequence of it, appeared to authorize the governors of provinces, in punishing with death the refusal of the christians to deliver up their sacred books. There was undoubtedly many persons who embraced this opportunity of obtaining the crown of martyrdom, but there were likewise too many who purchased an ignominious life, by discovering and betraying the holy scripture into the hands of infidels. A great number even of bishops and presbyters acquired, by this criminal compliance, the opprobrious epithet of Traitors, and their offence was productive of much present scandal, and of much future discord, in the African church.*

The copies, as well as the versions, Demolition of of scripture, were already so multiplied the churches in the empire, that the most severe inquisition could no longer be attended with any fatal consequences, and even the sacrifice of those volumes, which, in every congregation, were preserved for public use, required the consent of some treacherous and unworthy christians. But the ruin of the churches was easily effected by the authority of the government, and by the labour of the pagans. In some provinces, however, the magistrates contented themselves with shutting up the places of religious worship. In others, they more literally complied with the terms of the edict, and after taking away the doors, the benches, and the pulpit, which they burnt, as it were in a funeral pile, they completely demolished the remainder of the edifice.† It is perhaps to this melancholy occasion, that we should apply a very remarkable story, which is related with so many circumstances of variety and improbability, that it serves rather to excite than to satisfy our curiosity. In a small town in Phrygia, of whose name as well as situation we are left ignorant, it should seem, that the magistrates and the body of the people had embraced the christian faith, and as some resistance might be apprehended to the execution of the edict, the governor of the province was supported by a numerous detachment of legionaries. On their approach the citizens threw themselves into the church, with the resolution either of defending by arms that sacred edifice, or of perishing in its ruins. They indignantly rejected the notice and permission which was given to them to retire, till the soldiers, provoked by their obstinate refusal, set fire to the building on all sides, and consumed, by this extraordinary kind of martyrdom, a great number of Phrygians, with their wives and children.*

Some slight disturbances, though they were suppressed almost as soon Subsequent edicts church of Cirta, in Numidia, is still extant. It consisted of two chancels of gold, and six of silver, six iron one kettle, seven lamps, all likewise of silver, besides a large quantity of brass utensils, and war in apparel.

† Lactantius (Institut. Divin. l. 11.) confines the calamity to the continentum, with its congregation. Eusebius (viii. 11.) extends it to a whole city, and introduces something very like a regular siege. His ancient Latin translator Rufinus adds the important circumstance of the permission given to the inhabitants of retiring, from thence. As Phrygia reached to the confines of Isauria, it is possible that the rest less temper of those independent barbarians may have contributed to this misfortune.

as excited, in Syria and the frontiers of Armenia, afforded the enemies of the church a very plausible occasion to insinuate, that those troubles had been secretly fomented by the intrigues of the bishops, who had already forgotten their ostentatious professions of passive and unlimited obedience<sup>a</sup>. The resentment, or the fears, of Diocletian, at length transported him beyond the bounds of moderation, which he had hitherto preserved, and he declared, in a series of cruel edicts, his intention of abolishing the christian name. By the first of these edicts, the governors of the provinces were directed to apprehend all persons of the ecclesiastical order, and the prisons, destined for the vilest criminals, were soon filled with a multitude of bishops, presbyters, deacons, readers, and exorcists. By a second edict, the magistrates were commanded to employ every method of severity, which might reclaim them from their odious superstition, and oblige them to return to the established worship of the gods. This rigorous order was extended, by a subsequent edict, to the whole body of christians, who were exposed to a violent and general persecution<sup>b</sup>. Instead of those salutary restraints, which had required the direct and solemn testimony of an accuser, it became the duty as well as the interest of the imperial officers, to discover, to pursue, and to torment, the most obnoxious among the faithful. Heavy penalties were denounced against all who should presume to save a proscribed sectary from the just indignation of the gods, and of the emperors. Yet, notwithstanding the severity of this law, the virtuous courage of many of the pagans, in concealing their friends or relations, affords an honourable proof, that the rage of superstition had not extinguished in their minds the sentiments of nature and humanity<sup>c</sup>.

General idea of the persecution. Diocletian had no sooner published his edicts against the christians, than, as if he had been desirous of committing to other hands the work of persecution, he divested himself of the imperial purple. The character and situation of his colleagues and successors sometimes urged them to enforce, and sometimes inclined them to suspend, the execution of these rigorous laws, nor can we acquire a just and distinct idea of this important period of ecclesiastical history, unless we separately consider the state of christianity, in the different parts of the empire, during the space of ten years, which elapsed between the first edicts of Diocletian, and the final peace of the church.

<sup>a</sup> Eusebius, l. viii. c. 6. M. de Valois (with some probability) thinks that he has discovered the Syrian rebellion in an oration of Libanius; and that it was a rash attempt of the tribune Eugenius, who with only five hundred men, seized Antioch and might perhaps allure the christians by the promise of religious toleration. From Eusebius (l. ix. c. 8) as well as from Moses of Chorene, (Hist. Armen. l. ii. c. 77 &c.) it may be inferred that christianity was already introduced into Armenia.

<sup>b</sup> See Mosheim, p. 939, the text of Eusebius very plainly shows that the governors, whose powers were enlarged, not restrained, by the new laws, could punish with death the most obstinate christians, as an example to their brethren.

<sup>c</sup> Albanusus p. 833 ap. Tillemont, Mem. Ecclesiast. tom. v. part. i. p. 90.

<sup>d</sup> Eusebius l. vii. c. 13. Lactantius de M. P. c. 15. Dodwell

